"You owe us a life debt," the Dark Lord continued, "And that debt will be paid with an Unbreakable Vow."

Dread came over Sirius like the touch of a Dementor, cold and consuming.

"N-never..."

Voldemort's expression didn't change, and he didn't look surprised in the least. With complete calm, the dark wizard covered Sirius' mouth with his hand and pinched his nose shut. His eyes widened, and he tried to lift his arms to fight him off, but they were weak and the monster had always been so very strong.

"Then you die, and all that Harry has suffered will be for nothing, and I have my apprentice all to myself once again. Slivermoon won't last the year, I suspect, deprived of both his mate and his godson. Greyback will continue his rule completely unchallenged until his strength fades enough for some weaker alpha to finish him off, and I will pull the leash on your people as I always have. But what do you care? You'll be dead. Absolved of responsibility. Reborn as a shit eating worm or something else equally appropriate."

Voldemort removed his hand, leaving his prey gasping weakly, struggling to retrieve the oxygen he had lost.

"Or you can promise never to raise your hand against me in war or to allow any under your authority to do so, either. I believe my price is quite cheap considering. I'm not asking that you to be my ally, Blackbone, I'm just making sure you can never be my enemy."

Sirius glared hatefully, wishing more than anything that he were a wolf right then, and tearing the other man to tiny meaty pieces. But all he had left to him were two impossible choices. To live as another one of the Dark Lord's pawns or to abandon everyone and everything he cared about to the creature's mercy. Staring up at the monster's amused red eyes, he was ready to choose death, but he could hear Harry's voice drifting towards him, soft, tortured sounds and Remus whined softly on the other side of the bars, pacing helplessly to and fro. He knew he couldn't just leave them. He didn't know what Voldemort's pawn could do to protect them, but it would definitely be more than his corpse could.

As if he'd read his mind, and that was actually quite likely, the Dark Lord's mouth curled back into a wicked grin.

"There's a good dog."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The next morning was quiet. Exhausted men and women stumbled to the nearest shelter they could find, curled up with whoever else they found there, and fell asleep. Sirius was unconscious again after the Dark Lord forced half a dozen more healing potions down his throat, and once the door to the cage was open Remus drug himself inside to sleep beside him.

Voldemort was feeling quite energized, however, his latest magical experiment a resounding success so far. All that remained was to make sure that Harry was alright. The boy was more exhausted than anyone, and didn't so much as stir when the Dark Lord lifted him up into his arms and carried to his tent. Predictably, the tent was partially destroyed by the night's activities, but nothing left inside was breakable, and after kicking out a few sleepy pups it suited his purposes just fine.

"Is he alright?"

He turned to see Luna standing in the doorway of his tent, naked as could be, mud covering her hands and feet and forest debris sticking out of her hair. Something about her struck him as charming, so he indulged her.

"His breathing and heart beat are strong, but of course he's exhausted. And dirty. I'll know more once he wakes up."

She nodded once, and wandered off. Thinking that was the last he'd see of her for a while, Voldemort flipped over a torn pallet to its undamaged side and laid Harry down. He went back to the field to retrieve some of his possessions from the cage, and when he returned Luna was back. Her hands were clean, although she hadn't bothered fixing her feet or hair, and she had pulled on a cotton tunic. She had brought food, drink, some blankets, and a bucket full of water.

"You're tenacious, I'll grant you that," the Dark Lord remarked, settling himself a short distance away in order to watch her as he reviewed his notes. "But I hope you realize, he isn't for you."

Leaning over Harry, she gently washed his face, unperturbed by the man's presence.

"He's not for you, either," she said. If she had sounded smug or accusing, Greyback's daughter or not, Voldemort would have smacked her and thrown her out, but there was only a dreamy sort of observation in her voice.

Instead, he merely said, "I could argue with you, about that."

oo
oo

Greyback went in search of Luna late that afternoon. He'd slept away most of his post-transformation drowsiness in his own house, and in the course of finding himself something to eat, had become aware that a member of his family was absent. His adopted daughter, though remarkable, was the most fragile of his children, and it was with some unease that he went out in search of her.

He didn't have to search long. His suspicion that she might have followed Harry was proven correct when he found her sharing peaches with the Dark Lord. The wizard was cutting up pieces of fruit, and when Greyback entered he offered some to him.

"Hungry?"

While meat sounded better, he wasn't going to turn it down.

"Thanks." He entered the tent and found a place to make himself comfortable, taking a quick inventory of the space. Harry was wrapped in a blanket, deeply asleep and smelled a little different, but otherwise seemed okay. There was a place beside him composed of ruffled blankets where Luna must have been napping. The Dark Lord himself was situated nearby, but Greyback thought he must have wandered the entirety of the tent throughout the morning. "So did it work?"

Voldemort smirked.

"Almost perfectly. Blackbone didn't transform at all, and I managed to wrangle an Unbreakable Vow from him, as well. You will have your successor Greyback, and you will never have to fear war between our peoples for as long as he rules."

The Head Alpha nodded once, not revealing exactly how much of a burden had truly been lifted from his shoulders. They might be allies, and to some extent even friends, but that didn't mean the wizard wouldn't call on a debt if he thought he could get one.

"Almost perfectly?"

The Dark Lord's cockiness faded a little.

"There was an unexpected... side effect."

He made a gesture towards Luna, who turned to Harry and pulled down a portion of his blanket. The blood had all been cleaned away, but an expanse of flesh on Harry's chest remained marred with a red crescent moon.

"It won't come off. I suspect it's tattooed into his skin and will never come out. Magic of this magnitude frequently leaves magical scars, but I hadn't anticipated this. There is no way of knowing if or how it may have affected him physically or magically. I do know he's not a werewolf or even contracted lycanthrosis. I checked him for possible spirit possession, but the only spirit in his body is his own."

"Mm. Fascinating."

The Dark Lord made a rude sound. "It might be. He's been touched by a wolf spirit and by the Moon Goddess. His fate may now be linked to that of your people, if it wasn't already."

Greyback yawned, climbing to his feet. "I'm sure I'll care more tomorrow. We'll talk more then. Right now all I want is about ten pounds of meat and a half a galleon of beer. Come on, girl, your lover boy will still be here tomorrow."

Luna looked down at Harry for a moment, shrugged, and followed after her father. Voldemort let them go with a wave of good-natured disgust.

"Last time I try to have a meaningful discussion about magic with a wild dog," he muttered.

oo
oo

"Padfoot," Remus growled as his friend cautiously stretched himself out. Sirius had woken up looking much better than he had in days. He was still sickly looking, but his skin was now just pale rather than gray, and the infections had all but disappeared. The wound to his stomach was still an ugly mess of stitches and scars, but even that looked better. After an afternoon of being hand fed fruit, broth, and well ground pieces of meat, some of his strength had returned as well. "You're in no condition to wander around. Lay down. I'll go and check on Harry myself and then come back."

"I'm fine, Moony. Besides, I need to talk to him myself," he said, trying to find muscles he could stretch that wouldn't pull at his stomach wound and having little luck. "I put it off long enough."

"He might not even be awake yet, and if he isn't, you shouldn't wake him."

"Or he's awake and wondering why his asshole of a godfather hasn't come to visit him after saving his life. Give it a rest, Moony."

"You know I almost preferred you comatose," Remus muttered, lending his shoulder for Sirius to lean on. Sirius smirked, and hobbled his way out of the Healer's hut. It was vaguely embarrassing to be so weak out in public, especially when those few werewolves actually out and about watched him so intently. A few started to approach them, but Remus gave them a warning growl and they quickly backed off.

“You know they may have just wanted to wish me well.”

“They probably did, but you said you wanted to talk to Harry and I'm not making you stand around in this heat because they feel chatty. If they want to talk to you, they can do it while you're laying down.”

Sirius rolled his eyes, but didn't argue. He was happy just to have his beta talking to him, and having him actively mothering him was more than he could ever have hoped for. Dying, or in his case almost dying, had brought things into perspective very quickly for a lot of people. Sirius, in particular, was seeing things clearly. He could now even list his revelations in order of significance.

Being alive was a lot better than dying.

Remus and Harry loved him more than he deserved, which was why being alive was so important.

He needed to be more careful with his actions, since he wasn't the only one affected by them.

Voldemort was still a #& *#&$! , and deserved to die horribly, but he wasn't going to be the one to bring it about.

And speak of the devil, there's the giant snake now, slithering out of his den. Elsbeth was perched on his arm, a scroll attached to her leg, and after finding an open space with enough room to take off, flew from his arm and into the sky. The Dark Lord watched her until she disappeared, then his crimson eyes slid over to the two approaching guests.

Sirius could feel his hackles rising, but reminded himself it was pointless. He wasn't here for him anyway.

“Is Harry awake?”

Voldemort said nothing for a moment, simply looking at him as if he hadn't spoken, then looked back at the tent as if to consider.

“Sort of. You can have ten minutes.”

Sirius was very tempted to snap at him for thinking he could limit his time with godson (never mind that he technically could and did so regularly), but settled for an annoyed glower and let Remus lead him inside the tent. Both werewolves grimaced at the strong smell of incense as they entered. They waded through the haze to the prone figure laying beside one wall.

Harry was wrapped in a blanket, despite the day's heat, and his eyes looked bruised with exhaustion and his face smooth with sleep. It was jarring to see him so exposed, so vulnerable, so very, very young. They were both used to seeing him alert, focused, and self-possessed. Even in a crisis, when everything was falling apart, Harry had always retained some sort of strength. Magically or intellectually or psychologically or all at once. It had been a long time since either man had really thought of Harry as a child. He had become a young man in an even younger body without either of them realizing when the transition had happened.

“Harry?” Sirius called softly, thinking perhaps the Dark Lord had lied about Harry being even 'sort of' awake. Bright green eyes peeked out between his slitted lids, staring up blearily at two unrecognizable globs.

“Mmm?”

The werewolves shared an amused look. It might have been a while since they'd seen Harry so childlike, but that didn't mean he didn't make a cute kid. They sat down on either side of him, Sirius grimacing as his wound was stretched in a new and particularly unpleasant way.

“Hey, Prongslet. How you feeling?”

“Siri...?”

"In the flesh, except of course for the few pounds Greyback took out of it. Remus is here too."

"You did great, Harry. I'm so proud of you."

"Mmmm..." the boy sighed, his eyes drifting shut again and a smile tugging at the corner of his mouth. "Tired."

"I know, and I'll let you rest in a minute," Sirius said, gently touching his shoulder. "I just needed to say this to you, because it's important."

"What is?" His green eyes drifted open again, trying to look serious but just came out looking adorably pouty.

"I'm sorry, Harry. For everything. You were only looking out for me when it should have been me looking out for you. I said a lot of stupid things that I didn't mean, knowing they'd hurt you, saying them because I knew they would. I'm sorry. All I've ever wanted from you was your respect, and when I failed to earn it, I lashed out at you. And even though I didn't deserve it you went ahead and... This is all my fault..."

Sirius broke off, unable to continue. He wasn't prone to overly sentimental displays of affection or grief, but he had never felt so much regret for something he had done as he did now. He wasn't going to cry, he wouldn't allow anyone to see such an obvious sign of weakness, but he had to stop talking. Harry didn't do anything for a moment, his sleepy green eyes just looking up at him, then slowly he lifted his hand to lay on top of Sirius.

"It's alright. We're family."

Everything that needed to be said was held in those four words, and having said them Harry drifted back to sleep as quietly and suddenly as he had awoken. Sirius just stared down at him, completely flabbergasted. Surely it wasn't that simple. Not after everything he had done, and not after everything Harry had been made to pay for it.

Remus drew back his attention with a hand to his shoulder.

“Don't over think it, Padfoot. If he wants to forgive you that's his prerogative. I hope you'll be able to do the same as well. Come on, we'd best let him sleep.”

[illegible]

After his godfathers left, Harry slept for several more hours before yet another visitor disturbed him. He couldn't say what had woken him, for Luna hadn't made a sound. One moment, he was dreaming he was drifting quietly across a lake in a boat, and the next he opened his eyes to a face so close that even he could recognize who it was without his glasses. As startling as this was, his body was still much too weak to allow him do anything more than blink owlishly at her.

The corners of her mouth pulled back to reveal a broad grin.

"You did it, Harry," she said, happily. "You said you'd try, and you did it. Thank you."

Slowly, it dawned on him what she was saying, and gradually, he found a smile of his very own to give back to her.

[illegible]

Alright, as gay as that might sound, they're not really homosexual. I feel it important to reiterate it at this point, since it becomes significant later. While I don't have anything against homosexuality, I didn't see Rowling's Sirius and Remus as gay (indeed they showed a clear preference for women), and I don't see any justifiable reason for making them so just for this story. Even if they do make a delightful pair. :)

Honey is an ancient form of antiseptic. When it ferments, it creates hydrogen peroxide, which stings like a bitch but is a magnificent disinfectant. Hurray for the History Channel!

Real Gaelic words, but they don't mean much by themselves. Unless one of my readers can actually speak Gaelic and offer up a nifty translation. That would be awesome.

Harry and company return to Hogwarts next chapter! Plus, you'll all get to see the nifty side-effects associated with his new tattoo.

Book IV:

Chapter 5: Travelers From Near and Far

Harry couldn't say how long he slept, but he could guess about how deep, for his last memory was of Luna smiling down at him in Voldemort's tent and the second time he woke up it was to a considerably less happy person scowling down at him in a hospital room.

"Honestly, Harry," Hermione snipped, "are you really this unlucky or does someone have it out for you?"

He blinked up at her, blearily, and then slightly less blearily when she put his glasses on his nose. Surveying the room, white, cold, and smelling of antiseptic, he wondered how much of what he remembered really happened and how much was the result of some sort of head trauma. He sat up, and she handed him a glass of water. He drank nearly all of it.

"How do you feel? No one has been telling me anything, except that you're suffering from exhaustion... and that I shouldn't kiss you. Why would they think I'd kiss you? Honestly! I even looked through your chart- I hope you don't mind- but it just says they're running some weird tests I've never heard of. At least I know you don't have lycanthrosis. Your test came back negative for that, you'll be happy to hear, but they still want to keep you under observation just in case. Uncle Severus won't put up with it for much longer though. He hates hospitals, and doesn't like being in them any longer than necessary, so you'll probably get out when you can walk around unassisted. With all that sleeping you might be a bit stiff and weak. If you want I can get you nurse to get you something to make you more comfortable. Or perhaps you'd just like to get home. They wouldn't let you keep Inana in the hospital obviously, but she seemed worried we left her at the house. I mean, not that I can really tell when a snake is worried or just hungry-"

"I feel fine, thanks," he interrupted her, afraid she'd pass out at any moment from lack of air. He peeked under his blankets to make sure he had pants on, then moved his legs onto the other side of the bed.

“What day is it?”

“Wednesday.”

Only the second day after the full moon? That wasn't so bad. He stood up...

“The first of July to be-”

...and fell to the floor. Oops. It seemed he'd miscalculated his inactivity by nearly a week.

“Harry!”

Shakily, he climbed back to his feet. “I'm fine. Not to worry. If I hurt myself, hey, I'm in a hospital. Where better to do it?”

She gave him a disapproving look, but he just smiled at her. Her sternness melted away, and she raced around the bed to hug him tightly. He heard a suspicious 'snuffling' sound, but couldn't be sure she was crying or not with her head at his shoulder.

“Idiot. I don't want you to get hurt at all.”

Awkwardly (it was so different hugging a witch than it was hugging a werewolf!), he hugged her back.

“Don't worry, Hermione, I didn't get hurt. I wasn't in any real danger. It's just exhaustion. Partied a little too hard and all that.”

She pulled back from him, glowered at him as if she'd never stopped, and poked him in the chest.

“I don't doubt it. How much had you drunk when you decided that would be a good idea?”

He followed her finger, which had pulled aside some of the lapel of his hospitable pajamas to expose a sliver of red on his chest.

Rushing to the bathroom and the nearest mirror he could find, he lifted his shirt to get a better look.

“Bloody hell!”

oo
oo

“Bloody hell!” McGonagall cursed, right in the middle of transfiguring plain wooden chairs into overstuffed reading chairs. The disruption caused the semi-padded chair to break out into splinters, making it resemble a giant pin cushion rather than anything one might want to sit on. Flitwick sighed, turning from the stain glass windows he had been charming against drafts. He had been waiting for this moment since they had first been assigned the rather dubious honor of making the newly reconstructed wing of the castle inhabitable for their foreign guests. He was himself a bit resentful of having his precious free time impinged upon, but McGonagall seemed to be taking it as an intentionally vindictive act rather than a security precaution.

“What is the matter, Minny?”

“Do you really have to ask?”

“No, but I have the feeling you really need to tell.”

“What are we doing here, Filius? We're teachers, not interior designers! They could have pulled in half a dozen university students for a summer job, and been done in a week.”

“That isn't true, and you know it. There are many perfectly good reasons why we should be doing this and not some kid fresh out of the dorm,” he said gently, trying to placate her.

Her response was to kick her transfigured monstrosity across the room. “If you give me that same load of crock about the school's safety that Lestrage was dishing out, I swear I won't talk to you for a week.”

"Of course not. There are other even better reasons why we should do this. Not the least of which is because this castle recognizes us and our magic. Hogwarts hasn't accepted this part of the building into its magical matrix again since the attack. It will take time, but considerably less time will be needed if the area is saturated in magic of one of its own residence."

She looked slightly mollified, but not entirely convinced. Sensing her wavering conviction, Filius decided to add a bit of humor to the situation.

"Besides, you should be honored. In a way, we can now be counted as among the schools founders. Think of it Minerva, you could have your own House. McGonagall House, house colors will be orange and copper, and the mascot will be a cat. Flitwick House shall have purple and pewter, and the mascot will be a goat."

Her expression had turned stony, and for a moment he hadn't made a mistake, but then the mental image of what he had just suggested seemed to really sink in, and the muscles in her cheeks started to twitch until they'd pulled back her lips into a smile and her shoulders shook with suppressed laughter.

"Alright," she said, "But I get to keep Potter, Granger, and LeFoy."

"As long as I can have Diggory, Boot, and Allbright."

"Diggory and Allbright aren't even Ravenclaws!"

"I know, but in Flitwick House, persistence is the defining character, not curiosity. I've never seen a pair of boys that persistent in trying to prove themselves, and since you've already taken Granger..."

She chuckled. Turning about, she seemed to regard the plain room with considerably more enthusiasm, and a bit of the old mischievousness that Flitwick could remember from when she herself was a student.

"You know, if we're going to have our own Houses, this end of the castle would be the the perfect place to start."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

A month after his hospitalization, Harry was relieved to be celebrating his birthday with the knowledge that the full moon brought nothing stranger than the ability to see perfectly (and that meant without his glasses) in the dark, some rather bizarre eye shine, and giddiness that resulted in insomnia during the full moon. Voldemort had actually taken the day and the night of the full moon to visit the house to record his observations. The Dark Lord seemed to find the results amusing (or perhaps laughter was contagious because Harry couldn't keep a straight face the entire time). Snape, who had stayed up to see what sort of madness he was housing under his roof, had drunk an entire pot of coffee and didn't find the situation funny at all.

Snape had been snippy the entire month Harry had been home, and at first he had thought it was because the potions master was nervous about his condition. Nothing had improved after the full moon, however, so he suspected there was something else bothering the man. Of course, once the full moon was over, Harry had an entire list of other things to worry about himself, and hadn't bothered looking into it. He had spent so much time just working to appear unaffected by what had happened for his friends and coworkers (who knew he had gone on a vacation with the Dark Lord, just not what that entailed), that he had neglected not only what remained of his homework, but also what he was going to do for the new school year. The foreign exchange students were only a small part of it.

This year, he had elective courses.

Lots of elective courses to choose from. Lots of electives he should choose, but couldn't without another body and perhaps Hermione's brain. Intro to Magical First Aid (a definite), Intro to the History of European Magic (which seemed a good idea if he continued to work at the Ministry or didn't want to seem a complete idiot in front of the exchange students), Care of Magical Creatures, Fundamentals of Spell Design I, and Celtic Magic and History I (the closest he was going to get to a formal education in pagan magic without following the Dark Lord around every day). The thing was, he could only take two electives on top of his core classes. Which was why he was celebrating his birthday in Diagon Alley with Draco and Hermione by brooding over a piece of chocolate cake.

"For the love of Merlin, Potter," Draco said in exasperation. "If you wanted white cake you should have just said so."

The three friends were tucked into a corner booth in a trendy little restaurant a block away from the main shopping area. They were taking a break after shopping for some non-academic essentials (owl treats, underwear, candy, etc.), their potion supplies (which the waiter had eyed resentfully when they were being seated), and some sporting gear for dueling club (and quidditch even though Hermione said it was pointless if they weren't going to be playing for the year), before they finished the day at Banikey's Books for their writing supplies and text books. Harry had to decide and decide quick what classes he was going to take.

"I like chocolate cake," he snipped, and shoved a giant piece of it into his mouth to prove it.

"You do seem a bit glum," Hermione said, grimacing at his chipmunkish cheeks. "Is everything alright with your godfathers?"

Harry waved off her concern while he finished chewing.

"Yeah, they're fine. I told you about the boots they sent me, didn't I?"

He doubted they had forgotten. The boots were black leather, bronze fixings, and lined in the softest black mink. They were charmed so that they left wolf prints rather than boot prints when you walked in snow or mud. The Malfoy siblings had both been completely envious. Remus had kept his word. They were the best damn boots in Britain.

"Then what is it?"

"Nothing serious," he assured, "I just don't know what electives I'm going to take this year."

Hermione sat up straight, and Draco let out a pained moan. "Oh, no you're going to get her started again. She's been driving me nuts about this all summer."

"Do you have your school list?" she said, ignoring her brother. Harry pulled out his list, and handed it to her. He'd already scratched out the supplies he'd bought and the classes he wasn't interested in, but that still left a lot undecided and undone. Hermione eyed his selections critically, and Harry smiled and took a more enjoyable bite of his cake as he imagined he could see the endless aisles of books that lived in her head shooting out reference materials like canon balls to decimate his latest problem. This was the obvious solution, but truthfully he preferred fixing his own problems. Kyle Reicher's lesson on friendship had been learned, but sometimes it was hard to break old habits.

"Why on Earth did you cross out Magical Theory?" she said, disapprovingly.

"The Fundamentals of Magical Design covers the same thing, just with more practical application," he pointed out. "I like classes I can actually do magic in, not just think about. Didn't you say I was a kinetic learner, or something?"

"Kinesthetic learner, and yes, I did. Fine. I see you put a star by Magical First Aid. So you've decided on that one? A good choice."

Draco snorted, "Especially for you."

Hermione continued as if he hadn't said anything.

"I don't know if Uncle Severus bothered to mention that all 'Intro' courses are only one semester long. So that gives you Introduction to Magical First Aid and the only other 'Intro' course not crossed off is... Introduction to the History of European magic. That leaves three classes to choose from. Can I ask why you put down Celtic Magic and Culture?"

"I'm pagan," he said simply. "I'd like to know what that means."

"Yes, but are you a Druid?" she said a bit condescendingly.

"Not yet. I don't have a definite religion right now, except that it involves lots of spirits and gods and rituals and running around naked."

"Maybe I should join."

Hermione slapped her brother on the shoulder.

"Anyway, Druidism is the closest thing I can find to what I am, and I know most of the rituals Voldemort performs are spoken in Gaelic, which they teach in the class. It's more of a commitment than the other classes though. If I want to take the entire course, I have to start this year and follow it all the way through my seventh. That means I won't have as many options for electives every year."

"Considering you had all summer to figure out courses for this semester and haven't figured it out for yourself, that's probably for the best," the Slytherin pointed out. "Although, I'll admit it's fun seeing you indecisive. Just like watching Hufflepuffs try to play poker or Uncle Severus sit next to Lestrage."

Hermione gave a long suffering sigh. Harry reached across the table and patted her hand comfortingly. "There, there. He'll be married off soon."

"Hey!"

"Well then, you should probably take the Celtic class. Care of Magical Creatures would be fun, but academically useless unless you want to go to Beastiary School, and you can still take three years of the Fundamentals of Spell Design later. The fourth year of that is actually a university level class, but you'd still have a better quality course at a university. What do you think?"

"I think you're a genius, and a bow before your superior wisdom."

"Don't encourage her."

Before she could come up with a clever retort of her own, Snape strode into the restaurant. Not being much of a cake person, he'd left them there while he ran some of his own errands with explicit instructions for them to wait till he came and got them. They weren't expecting him for at least another half hour, and once they'd spotted him, Draco and Harry raced to finish their cake before he actually reached the table.

"Why Potter, I see you're passing on your remarkable skill of inhaling food rather than eating it to Draco. Thank you, so much," Snape remarked blandly. Harry had a come back, but after swallowing his cake and downing half a glass of milk, his timing was off so he didn't even bother.

"We weren't expecting you back so soon," Hermione said. "I hope everything went well."

"I'm not actually done. Barnikey's Books seems to be running low on some of their stock. I thought I should come and get you before they ran out and we'd have to search for them in Glasgow. Hurry up."

They paid their tab, and hurried to the book store. The store was full, but not crowded this early in the month, but a gaunt man with graying hair and gnarled hands was arguing with the store clerk and holding up the line. Harry thought he heard the man curse in German, but before he could investigate, Snape was turning him back towards the aisles with a look that told him pointedly to stay out of it. The textbook shelf was looking alarmingly bare, and the three of them split up to gather their core class books, collecting three of the same subject at a time and then came back together to exchange between them.

"I got the last three books for Transfiguration. They were completely out of both the new and the used, after I left," Hermione said breathlessly. With their core classes out of the way, they now had to search out the harder to find elective course books. "I wonder what's going on? I've never heard of Barnikey's being short before. Don't they get an inventory list from the school?"

Harry thought he might know what had gone wrong, but he hadn't told his friends about the Triwizard Tournament, and bringing it up now seemed a good way to get yelled at. Instead, he watched Snape watching the German man at the counter, still arguing with the clerk, who was becoming more and more flustered as several people had abandoned their selections and just left.

“Bloody hell, Harry, I hope all these books are for all four years of the class,” Draco said, drawing his attention back to the book shelves. It didn't take Harry long to see what the Slytherin meant. 'Celtic Culture' took up an entire book shelf, not because of its popularity, but because of the sheer number of books the course required. Looking at his supply list, he grimaced, and wondered if he had made the right choice. Even Hermione looked surprised, until she started reading the titles.

“Oh... well, I think I get it. When they say they called it Celtic Magic and Culture, they weren't kidding. There's two books on the actually magic, but there's five books dedicated just to the culture aspect. Language, history, art, philosophy and religion, law and social order. They're being very thorough.”

“Yeah, that's one way to put it,” Harry grouched. His list required all seven books, but at least Draco hadn't been wrong about the books being for all four years. The only other Celtic books he'd have to buy over the next couple of years were more advanced language books. None of the books were small or used, and Harry grimaced at the thought of his student loan as he eyed their prices. He wondered if Voldemort would cover the cost as his 'teacher', or if he wasn't going to have to be more frugal with his summer earnings.

They got the rest of their books and headed towards the line. A manager had finally come out and was now on the receiving end of the German man's tirade, but at least the harried clerk could now attend the other customers. This still left Harry plenty of time and proximity to overhear what the problem was.

“Vat is going on here? Vat kind of établissement doesn't have enougs books to sell? Is my money not good enough for you? Is sat it? Herr Barnikey von't akzept money from a forener?”

And on and on the man went, the manager unable to break in with his repeated 'Sir, please's and 'Of course not's. Snape was still just watching, and Harry asked his friends to hold his spot in line while he spoke with him.

"You're not going to stop him?" Harry asked. Snape rolled his eyes.

"Why should I? It's the manager's fault for not ordering enough books. I know for a fact that we sent him the correct inventory. He must have thought there was error."

"Maybe it is his fault, but that guy isn't making anything better for himself or anyone else by carrying on like that."

"That man' is your new Dark Arts and Defense teacher for the year, Professor Oblitz. He's Durmstang's Dark Arts teacher and was the World Dueling Champion in '83 and '87. I recommend not crossing him. Get back in line, Potter."

At the mention of Harry's name, Oblitz suddenly went very quiet, and slowly turned around. Snape met his regard with deceptive calm, but Harry knew better. He could smell the rising magic coming off of the potion's master, an earthy smell like decaying leaves in fall. Neither man moved for a moment, but Harry felt uneasy. He had seen werewolves act this way before in their beast forms, and it was never a good sign. A tight, unpleasant smile came across Oblitz's face, and his pale blue eyes found Harry, but quickly returned to Snape.

"I hadn't realized a fellow professor was here or else I would have greeted you sooner. Good morning, sir. You must be Professor Snape."

"Indeed, I am," he said, equally unpleasant. "It's a pleasure to finally meet you in person, Professor Oblitz. Though it seems I've interrupted you at a bad time."

"They are short at last sixteen books my students require. It seems someone has made a mistake." Something about the way it was said, made the statement sound very much like an accusation. And that accusation was that the 'someone' was Snape or else someone else at Hogwarts. Harry felt himself bristle. Perhaps Snape sensed it, because he placed a firm hand on his shoulder, though he didn't look away from the German.

“Not to worry, Professor. Mr. Potter, what do you think might be done to solve this dilemma?”

Harry was startled from his anger. Snape did this sort of thing in dueling club all the time, interrupting matches or coming up unannounced, disrupting ones mindset and forcing it to think and work differently without a moment's notice. It took only a few seconds of fumbling for Harry to remember he'd already known what the solution was.

“Ah... the store has a guarantee. If it doesn't have a book, it'll order the book for you and deliver it to you without charging the delivery fee within five business days. I'm sure the manager would be happy to do it for you,” he said, and then added under his breath, “... if you'd let him.”

“Yes, yes!” the nearly forgotten manager said, looking massively relieved.

“There now. No problem the strong mind of a fourteen year-old couldn't solve, isn't that right, Mr. Potter?” Snape said, still keeping his eyes locked ahead of him. Harry looked cautiously between the now vaguely superior potions professor and the stiffly furious dark arts professor.

“I'm going to go check out my books now.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Ginny was weeding the garden, while Abe went about chasing knarls and sling shotting them over the wall nearby when she spotted their visitor. The Burrow was a small and out of the way place, and company was rare and usually during holidays and weekend afternoons. Being an ordinary Tuesday morning, Ginny decided that man riding towards them was strange enough that she should forewarn her mother and aunt.

“Mum, Auntie Sue, there's someone coming,” she said from the doorway, knowing better than to enter while still covered in dirt. She was lucky the both of them were making jams that day, instead of out back in the orchard. The Burrow had originally been an orchard farm that had gone into disrepair after Segundus Weasley left it to his town bred nephew, Arthur Weasley, but Molly and Suzanne had grown up on a farm, and with so little work to be found in town, had made work and money for themselves right at home. They did a lot of the labor themselves, but hired some squib families to help them out during the growing season. They normally would have been out in the orchards with their hired hands, but a large order for Walapple Jam* had kept them indoors for the day.

“Who is it, Gin?” Mrs. Weasley asked, but Ginny just shrugged and went back out. “Stay here, Sue. I'll check it out.”

Ginny and Abe were both at the garden gate, watching the rider cantering towards them. It didn't take them long to notice he had bright red hair.

“Bill!” Ginny called, and ran out of the yard to meet him, and Abe followed after her. William Primus Weasley pulled his horse up short, and hopped down to meet them, throwing open his arms so they could jump right into them. Molly Weasley, never one to miss an opportunity with one of her 'lost boys', wasn't far behind.

“Bill, Heaven's Blessing, what are you doing here?! And my word, what are you wearing in your ear?” she exclaimed happily, wrapping him up in a hug. He laughed and fingered the pearly white bauble hanging from his ear.

“It's a dragon tooth. Charlie sent it to me. The ladies love it.”

“Wicked,” Ginny said, and Abe nodded his agreement.

“Told you so.”

Molly Weasley sighed, the Procter family had taken care of her son for the short time before his graduation, and though she didn't doubt they were good people, she thought they'd given him a bit too much leeway as a teenager. She never would have let him leave the house thinking teeth were a fashion accessory or that men should ever wear earrings, unless they happened to be pirates. No point crying over spilt potions, she supposed.

"What are you doing here, Bill? Aren't you suppose to be in Ireland?"

"Boss pulled me back early. Government contract, and he said he wanted the best he had on it. Abe, could you go tie up Picakatte before she wanders off?"

They made their way back into the house (sans Abe who went to do as requested), spelling themselves clean as they stepped inside. Sue smiled as she spotted the eldest Weasley brother and kissed him on the cheek. It took her a moment to realize Molly looked upset.

"A government contract? You said you didn't involve yourself with the Court. You said they only wanted curse breakers so they could steal other peoples' property."

"Yeah, I meant that, but this is something else entirely. I'm going to Hogwarts."

"Hogwarts?!" Ginny said excitedly. "Are you going to be a teacher?"

Bill bulked at the very notion. "No! No! Nothing like that. It's for a some big project they've got going. I can't talk about it, yet. It's all hush-hush, but the gist of it is I'm there for safety."

"Are you helping with the expansions on the castle?" Molly asked, immediately relieved. She hated what he did for a living, even if it was honest work, but this sounded like it might be safer than his other jobs.

"Er... sort of. I really can't talk about it. I just thought I'd let you know I'd be around for a while, and might actually be able to stick around for Christmas for once... and thought I might ask to bum a room for a few weeks?"

Molly smiled. "I'll be happy to have another of my boys home for a change... as long as you take out that awful earring."

oo
oo

One year, three months, and twelve days after his 'murder', Tom landed on roof of the tallest tower in Hogwarts, took a long look around at the surrounding country and decided it was time to get to work.

oo
oo

August 28th was circled in red on Fleur's bedroom calendar. Behind it was a trail of red 'x's that ran from the 27th all the way back to the 1st. The picture on the calendar was of an Irish Blue* swimming across a lake; the sky, lake, and dragon barely discernible from each other. Fleur thought it very appropriate that morning, but standing on the perfectly manicured lawn of the Beauxbaton's she wasn't really in much of a mood to enjoy the subtle irony.

The entire school had shown up to see them off, along with everyone's parents, the media, and even the royal family. With all the hugs and goodbyes and photographs and speeches, it all felt suddenly very permanent. Which was ridiculous.

It was only nine months, and she'd be back.

Madam Maxime had promised.

oo
oo

Viktor, as had become the norm at Durmstang, was the first of his classmates to enter the ship atop the perpetually frozen lake of Durmstang valley, but even he had to wait out in the frigid wind for nearly hour. Ambassador Schwartzman had been the first person to board, followed by Headmaster Minz, a slew of other officials, and by the time he and his classmates had been given the go ahead, they were half frozen.

His classmates, used to the constant cold, laughed it off with jokes that they might actually have a pleasant weather for once in Scotland. Viktor didn't say anything, but let them have their fun. Pleasant weather was about the only good thing he imagined he'd find at Hogwarts.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Where the bloody hell are we?" Draco muttered looking around what should have been the Hogsmeade platform. All of the students looked equally confused, and some rather alarmed, but their teachers were all there to greet them and start ordering them to follow. Harry, Hermione, Draco, Clyde, Ron, and Ginny stayed close to one another, as they had since the trip had begun (mostly to crowd out hangers on and 'fans' from trying to invade their compartment and their personal space), pulling their luggage behind them and wondering where they were.

"I think we're actually in Hogsmeade," Clyde said, "There's Zonko's Joke Shop and the Three Broom Sticks is over there. There's just... more."

And indeed, there was 'more'. Townhouses, grocery stores, an owl post station, a livery, what looked to be a large garden park, and several other things that all ended up making Hogsmeade nearly five times its original size.

"Do you suppose they're ahead of schedule for starting up the university?" Hermione asked. "Maybe it's for all the new students and professors."

"Um... actually, you're sort of right and sort of not," Harry started. He wasn't supposed to talk about it per Snape's instructions, but now that they were actually at school, it seemed kind of silly to keep it secret any longer. "Have any of you ever heard of the Triwizard Tournament?"

Hermione and Draco, as Harry predicted they would, yelled at him for the entire ride up to the castle, and would have kept on going if everyone else hadn't gotten bored of listening to them and asked them what the Triwizard Tournament actually was.

Ron smirked. “Sounds like fun if its got the walking library up in arms.”

"I've never met a French person before," Ginny said, interested in meeting people from places she considered 'exotic'. "Do you think any are from Paris? Are they going to wear their own uniforms or will they have to wear ours? Are they going to get sorted like us or have dorms for themselves?"

The Great Hall was noisier than usual, even for the Welcoming Feast, everyone gossiping and wondering about the newly expanded Hogsmeade. Harry and company all looked around for the new exchange students, but it seemed none had arrived yet. The only even slightly unusual thing was the presence of the Dark Lord, Professor Oblitz, and an unknown woman at the teacher's table, and even that wasn't that unusual. The evening proceeded in the completely usual way as well, with the Sorting of the first years and the welcoming of the new teachers. It wasn't until it was time for the school year announcements to be made, that the ball finally dropped. Voldemort took the podium.

“Hogwarts, for the first time in many, many years, is opening its doors for the sake of international outreach and education...” and went on to explain what was actually happen, what it would mean for the students, for Britain, encouraged them all to be hospitable to their guests and set a good example, and of course ended with a threat of what would happen if they did not. “... including the rest of your immediate family and any pets you might happen to have.”

The utter silence that followed assured the Dark Lord that the message had been understood. Even Oblitz looked appropriately stunned. Voldemort let his expression soften into something less terrifying, and gestured towards the door.

“I know you are all hungry, but I would like you to walk down to the North 2nd Floor corridor so that you might witness the arrival of the Durmstang and Beauxbaton students.”

No one, of course, disobeyed, and within minutes everyone was crowding around the windows and waiting for them to arrive. While they were waiting, Harry caught sight of an unmistakable figure out on the lawns.

“Hey, I think I know him.”

“Who?” Hermione said, looking where he was pointing. “That man? Is he really as big as he looks?”

“Almost ten ft. tall. I've seen him carry a full grown horse like it was house cat.”

Draco looked utterly horrified. “Where do you meet these people, Potter?”

“Hey, look I see something!” someone cried nearby, “In the sky, between the two mountains.”

“It's a bird you nitwit,” someone else shouted.

“No it isn't!” Hermione shouted, “Look it turned sideways! It's a carriage and horses!”

There were gasps and 'oohs' as the carriage drew closer and closer, and grew large and larger, until it finally it landed beside the lake. The horses were so large they made even Hagrid look a bit small, but the half giant still managed to wrestle them to a standstill. The carriage was opulently decorated in gold leaf and an emblem was carved into the carriage door. Several attendants, dressed to match the carriage, hopped down to open the door and pull out a stair case, and then assist the several girls that climbed out. And women. And one GIANT woman. Then a handful of boys and men.

“Whoah... is that lady even going to fit through the front door?”

There were several snickers, but it didn't last long before they were distracted yet again.

“Look at the lake! It's boiling!”

“It's not boiling, it's freezing!”

It seemed to be doing both, bubbling madly before settling into a solid sheet of white. The ice spread to about twice the size of the quidditch pitch before it stopped at the very edge of the shore. There was an enormous cracking sound, and the still ice exploded upwards as a great ship burst from its surface, coated with ice and seaweed.

“I'll give them this,” Draco said, “Foreigners can certainly put on a show.”

Harry just nodded his head in agreement.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Fleur was happy to have landed, although she could have done without the crowd of students gawking at them all like a flock of simpletons. She could also have done without the realization that 'castle' and 'palace' were not the same thing, for though Hogwarts was magnificent architectural achievement (a thousand years ago!), it in no way compared to the splendor of Beauxbatons.

She was an adventurer, however, and wouldn't let her consternation show over something as minor as the quality of the rugs, or how little light there was, or how plain the decorations were... no, she'd just smile sweetly, and demonstrate how cultured people looked and behaved, because clearly these people needed it.

They briefly saw the Durmstang students, who looked even more brutish than the Hogwarts ones, but luckily didn't have to talk to them as they were escorted to their dormitory by a teacher whose name she thought sounded like the gargling sound one makes before spitting out mouthwash*. At least the dorm was fairly nice. The room was open and airy, with enormous windows looking out over the lake. They'd made a definite attempt with the Baroque style furniture, the white washed walls, and the abundance of elegant purple, but the whole affect was sort of ruined by the abundance of pewter goats inlaid into the doorway and the fire place.

Oh, what she sacrificed for her country.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Viktor wasn't entirely sure what to make of Hogwarts at first glance. It was just as magnificent as Dumbledore had described, and even the reign of a tyrant did nothing to diminish its magnificence both inside and out. The children who had looked out at him when he arrived didn't look any different that those back home, perhaps they even looked a bit friendlier. He wondered, perhaps if the young had been mostly spared the corruption of the Dark Lord. Sheep didn't need to be, and preferably weren't, wicked in nature after all.

He wasn't given much time to think about it before he and his classmates were escorted to their rooms to freshen up before dinner. He took one step into the common room and got a rather curious surprise. Jophery, his closest friend, came in right behind him and let out a startled laugh.

“They have sent uz to live inside a giant pumpkin, mein Freund. Zat or they like to zelebrate Halloween early here. I've never seen so much orange in my live.”

oo
oo

1. Wallaple is like an apple, only the core has a nut similar to a walnut. Both nut and pulp are edible, and most recipes include both parts of the fruit.

2. Dragon. I mention Harry seeing one in the first book.

3. McGonagall.... gargle gargle... :)

Extra special thanks to Swanpride for her help with the German accents! Otherwise I would have insulted several countries in the course of writing this chapter. :)

Book IV:

Chapter 6: The Peaceful Invasion

As the foreign students and dignitaries were exploring their living quarters for the next nine months, the Order of the Phoenix was gathered yet again, this time at a muggle ski resort that was closed for the season. The lodge house wasn't air conditioned, but opening the windows allowed in fresh cool air and soothing nature sounds. The accommodations were much finer than usual, but no one was in the mood to appreciate it.

Johan still stubbornly kept watch from the shadows, ignoring everyone, including Gilfred and his incessant jokes at his expense. Gilfred, Timmons, Fredric, and Phoebe occupied themselves with a card game, but no one was particularly enthusiastic about losing or winning. Tonks paced in the background, too agitated to sit still. And through it all, Dumbledore sat in an over stuffed chair, drinking his tea and seemingly lost in thought.

"They should be there by now," Tonks muttered. "Why haven't we been notified?"

"I have no doubt you are right," Dumbledore agreed, "But since we are not using our own spies for this mission, I'm afraid we're rather at the bottom of the 'those who must be notified' list. Still, I suspect it won't be that much longer."

"You said that an hour ago."

The old man chuckled. "My dear, when you reach my age, an hour ago isn't very much time at all."

She was ready to snap something at him, but a loud 'RINGGGG' interrupted her. Several people jumped in fright, and everyone turned to the source of the noise. The plain black telephone resting beside Dumbledore's cup of tea stopped for a moment, then let out yet another 'RINGGGG' and scared poor Fredric all over again.

"Well, here you go, my dear," the elderly wizard said. He coughed into his hand, and picked up the phone before its third ring. When he spoke again, it was with the chipper tone of twenty-something-year old female receptionist. "Guten Abend, Alstasenberg Ski Resort, mein Name ist Alba Dumbeldoff, was kann ich für sie tun?"

There was talking on the other line, which no one else could hear, but went on for nearly five minutes uninterrupted. At last, Dumbledore smiled.

"Ja, danke und auf Wiederhören."

He hung up the phone.

"What did they say?" Tonks asked excitedly.

"They said... oh, excuse me," the wizard chirped femininely, then coughed into his hand again and began speaking normally, "They said everyone arrived safely and are being treated with the utmost courtesy. No one appears to suspect a thing. A secure communications network has already been set up and tested in Hogsmeade."

"And Viktor?" Gilfred asked. "Any word on him?"

"It's still a bit early to be receiving any reports from his end. I am told the Dark Lord himself will be at the Welcoming Feast. It will be our young friend's first real test."

"And if he fails?"

"I have the utmost confidence in him, and so should you."

"He'll be fine," Johan said, not looking away from the window. "Stop looking for trouble were there isn't any. You can freak out when something actually goes wrong, otherwise you're just making a nuisance of yourself."

"Jonny, that isn't the way to talk to a lady," Gilfred admonished, and of course was ignored.

Tonks backed off anyway, stalking out of the room before she did or said something she'd regret later. She hated this plan. Had from the moment she'd been told about it. She'd tried everything to convince Viktor it was a bad idea, but his only response to all her pleas and bargains and threats had been 'If you'd been in my shoes while you were at school, you would have gone in a heart beat'. Infuriatingly true, and not the least bit comforting.

She'd had a death wish when she'd been at school.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Their arrival at the Great Hall was rather ridiculous in Viktor's opinion, what with the marching and spell work, but the Hogwarts students and staff seemed suitably impressed by it. He thought he looked a lot less ridiculous after watching the Beauxbatons students flutter in like butterflies. He felt distinct pity for those few male students who accompanied the female majority. The Great Hall was large, but still crowded, especially now that the usual four long tables was supplemented with two smaller tables at the end, yet they managed to fit into their seats comfortably.

At least the Durmstang students did. To his left, at the Beauxbatons table, the other students were trying not to look uncomfortable in their wooden seats, and doing a very poor job of it. He looked down the row of elegant, attractive, and weak looking people and couldn't imagine a single one of them being a champion of anything.

"Poor babies," Jophery snickered in German so they wouldn't hear, "How long do you think it will be before one of them starts crying?"

Viktor ignored the remark. They might not look impressive, but their curriculum was as exacting as Durmstang's, if not their physical location. It would be foolish to underestimate them before they had been tested.

Speaking of which...

He turned towards the teacher's table. Madam Maxime, as large as she was, stood out first, but he found others who were more interesting. He recognized Headmaster Minz and Professor Oblitz by sight, but there were others he recognized from photographs and secret files and newspaper articles. Headmistress Bellatrix Lestrangle, Death Eater and psychopath. Professor Severus Snape, Death Eater, potion's genius, and assassin. Professor Bonita Toure, Dark Wizard fanatic. Professor Minerva McGonagall... cat lover. He was certain he'd been thoroughly briefed on her, but the only thing he could remember was Dumbledore's offhand remark about 'poor dear Minny'.

And the King of them all, the Dark Lord Voldemort, sat right in the middle, looking completely out of place by his sheer normalcy. From what Viktor had heard, the Dark Lord should have been in his sixties, have red eyes and fangs, and probably resembled a vampire. The Dark Lord in person look in his late twenties, smiled a bit darkly, and had a tan that suggested he spent a lot of time outdoors. Although he did have red eyes. For a long time, Viktor was convinced it was someone else. Even after the man... dictator... monster... raised his goblet and made a toast as their host.

"Welcome, my brothers and sisters, in both magic and nobility. I have extended my hand to your countries in friendship, and now you have graciously reached back in return as young ambassadors. The people of Britain, myself first among them, are honored by your presence. May this be the first step to the reunion of our great nations, and the rebirth of peace."

There was thunderous applause, and everyone lifted their glasses, regardless of what they had, and drank deep. Viktor brought his own goblet to his lips, pretended to drink and then set it aside for the rest of the feast. The Dark Lord lingered only a few minutes after that, then disappeared, leaving Viktor torn between confusion and anger. Should he have just cut through all the spying bullshit and just set the creature on fire?

"Charming fellow," Jophery said, as he watched his friend watch his enemy. "De kind of guy mader vould have vanted my zister to marry... ezept for the whole laying vaste to an entire country ting. Aldough I don't see how being a banker is much better."

He gave his friend an irritated look, but of course Jophery didn't notice.

“Oohhh... look, I tink that's the 'protégé'. Poor guy... or maybe not. Apparently, British girls dig the whole 'the Dark Lord is my Pimp' ting he's got going for him.”

Viktor, of course, couldn't help but look. Harold James Potter looked as nondescript as his mentor, and even less threatening. He had glasses for Merlin's sake. He was talking with a small cluster of people, who must have been his friends, and two of them must have been the girls Jophery was talking about. One of them was a little pixie of girl, red-haired and freckled and chucking a dinner roll at a pair of boisterous twins, who had to have been related to her somehow. The second...

Was the most captivating creature Viktor had ever seen in his entire life.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“I've got to go, guys,” Hermione said, getting up from the table. “I need to talk with McGunny before taking up my prefect duties. He's probably going to call an emergency meeting later, so I might not see you for the rest of the night.”

They all said their 'good nights', but once she was out of sight, Harry surveyed the room to see if anyone was looking towards him and quietly made his own retreat.

“I'll meet you all in the Common Room later. There's someone I want to talk to.”

He didn't stick around to listen to their questions, and slipped out relatively unnoticed. Once he was clear of the Great Hall, he made a light sprint down the empty corridors to the main entry. There were House Elves sorting out the luggage, popping in and out of existence in front of him. Several of them squeaked in panic when they saw him, quite adamant in their belief that a House Elf should be neither seen nor heard unless ordered to be so.

“Shhh... It's alright. You're not in trouble,” he assured them. “I just need to step outside for a few minutes. Will you make sure no one locks me out?”

“Oh!” one of them clapped, “Yes! Yes! We will do this for the Monster Slayer! It would be great honor! It is the least we could do!”

The other elves started bobbing their bald little heads.

It took Harry several confused blinks before he realized they were talking about the Basilisk or possibly the 'acrumantula', since he had no idea how much they really knew about the incident in his second year. He figured it was more than most.

“Um... thanks.”

“We is being thanked!” it gasped. “You are too kind, Monster Slayer, sir!”

More happy head bobbing, and Harry was starting to get weirded out.

“Er, you're welcome... bye.”

He slipped out the door, and found it still light outside. The sun had just set over the mountains, but it would be over an hour before true night set in, and he went in search of his friend. As large as the castle grounds were, it wasn't hard to find someone nearly twice as tall as a normal man and furry as a bear. All he had to do was follow the sound of whinnying horses the size of small airplanes to the quidditch pitch and after that it was simple. He found Hagrid rubbing down a horse, staring off into space dreamily. The rest of the animals were eating up the pitch or snout deep barrels of a suspicious amber liquid.

“Hagrid!” he called. The half giant turned his shaggy head towards him and let out a great laugh.

“Arry! Wha' ya doin 'ere? Why ain't you at the feast with the res' o the fine folk?” he said with a wink, then laughed. “They crowd you out? Best keep a bit 'o space. These ladies don' like being crowded themselves.”

Harry wisely did as he was told, and stayed close to the door way. It was too small for any of them to squeeze through, but he couldn't help but wonder what kept them from just flying away?

“I was just wondering what you were doing here.”

“I sent you a note,” Hagrid said, and looked a bit sheepish. “I suppose you were too busy to reply.”

“Hagrid, I would have been happy to have gotten a letter from you. It probably didn't make it past the wards. Most of my mail doesn't.”

“Ya mean ya ne'er got it?”

“I would have written you back if I had. I'm here right now, aren't I?”

Hagrid seemed to think about that, then grinned. “Ya are at that. And I'll be hope'n to see more of you. I missed you back at the bestiary. I enjoyed our lunches together.”

“Me too, Hagrid. But what are you doing here to begin with?”

“Stable hand,” he said, looking rather proud of it. “For the tourney. I'm gonna help take care of the big animals, like these pretty girls.”

He patted the horse's rump affectionately, and she stopped his foot with equal enthusiasm. He barely even flinched.

“My boss didn't want ta let me go, but I told 'im to stick it in his ear... or somethin' like that, anyway. Perhaps it'll make'm appreciate me more when I'm not around. See how he does tak'n care of three headed dogs and bandywols and tubberdewiggins.”

“Harry frowned. “Are they mistreating you, Hagrid?”

The half giant waved it off. "Nah. 'Course not. Things 'ave jus been a bit tight. All these university brains coming up, want'n bigger paychecks for reading so much its pushed their wits clean out of their heads."

They talked about work and life and interesting animals they had met and their plans for the school year, but after a while Hagrid seemed to get distracted. He was ready to say something several times, but then hesitated and started talking about something else. At last, Harry decided to help him out.

"Is something bothering you?"

Hagrid's eyes widen in surprise, and he fidgeted a bit before saying, "No, nothin's bother'n me. I'm happy as could be!"

"Mmm... well, then... was there something you wanted to ask me?"

"Ask you? I... well, maybe... um... maybe later? I feel a bit out o' sorts bout it."

"Sure. I might be busy this weekend, but I should find some time during the week."

"Aye, that'd work fine. I'll put on some tea and-"

"Potter!"

Professor Snape appeared out of the shadows on the other side of the pitch walls, scowling in annoyance. Harry flinched. He had thought no one would notice his absence with all the festivities and extra students, but apparently he had been overly optimistic.

"Um... hi."

"Shut up, Potter. The Headmistress wants a word with you."

A feeling of dread settled over him. It had been a while since he had to deal with the woman, and the fact that he was starting the school year in her office didn't bode well for the rest of the year. He didn't get to dwell on it for long, for Snape grabbed him by the collar of his robe and physically dragged him back towards the castle. Harry managed a quick goodbye gesture towards a dumbfounded Hagrid, and spent the rest of his trip back inside trying not to lose his balance.

"Professor, please let go!"

"And have you take a detour with a boat ride across the lake?"

"I was just visiting a friend! I wasn't aware I had an appointment!"

"Five points from Gryffindor for wandering out of the castle without permission and another five points for back talk. Keep it up, the night is young."

Harry grimaced but wisely shut up. The professor was in a bad... worse mood than usual, but the night had carried on long and it didn't appear as if it was going to be ending any time soon. The irritated man finally let him go when they reached the first set of stairs, and by the time they reached the gargoyle guarding the headmistress' office, both had composed themselves into strangely similar expressions of cool reserve.

"Wormwood," Snape muttered, and the staircase opened before them. They climbed the stairs, and Harry took a moment to be darkly pleased at the empty case that should have housed the Sword of Gryffindor. The moment was brief. He couldn't spare any of his attention while in Lestrangle's presence.

The headmistress was sitting behind her desk, looking pleased with herself. This was rather alarming for Harry, and it became even more so when he noticed that Natalie was sitting in one of the chairs.

"How good of you to join us," Lestrangle said, smiling darkly. "I was starting to worry that something might have happened to you."

"I'm touched by your concern," Harry said evenly, "I apologize if I inconvenienced you."

"No, no. Ms. Cypher and I were just enjoying a little heart to heart. Witch to witch."

"That's terrifying," he tried, then realized what he said, "... I mean, terrific."

Natalie's stoic expression cracked for just an instant. Lestrangle pretended she hadn't noticed.

"Yes, well, have a seat, Mr. Potter. You've taken up enough of my valuable time. Are you staying, Professor?"

"I am."

"Suit yourself. Mr. Potter, Ms. Cypher, it has come to my attention that you both are fluent in German and French, respectively--"

Harry looked to Natalie, who ignored him, and wondered how he could have missed that.

"- and have an abundance of free time this year. Therefore, I thought it would be wise to apply your talents to the benefit of the school. I am enlisting you as school liaisons to our foreign students. You will assist them in navigating the school, sorting out their schedules, helping them through their studies, and generally making them feel comfortable and welcome here at Hogwarts."

"You're turning us into servants?" Natalie said, indignantly. The headmistress smiled cruelly.

"Of course not. Servants have the option of quitting." The headmistress snapped her fingers, and a large folder fell on both their laps. "These are their students files. Familiarize yourselves with them tonight. You will be leading them on a tour of the castle tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock sharp, and you would do well to know what interests them. I will be quite cross if one of them should get into trouble because you neglected to mention something or they forgot because they were too bored to listen."

"Honestly, wouldn't an older student be better for this? Most of these people are six and seventh years. There has to be-"

"Forget it, Natalie," Harry said, not looking up from the file he was now leafing through. "This was an order from higher up. There's no point in arguing with the person who can't do anything about it."

His ex-girlfriend glared at him.

"Then who should I take my argument to, Oh Wise One?"

"Lord Voldemort, unless you actually have a sense of self preservation, then I'd just take the job. Like you said, they're sixth and seventh years. After we show them around, do you really think they'll come to us if they need help with something?"

She didn't look any happier, but she was Slytherin enough to know when to keep her mouth shut. If he was right, she'd be wasting her breath.

"Well, you seem to have the gist of it," Lestrangle said, looking annoyed now, which meant Harry had probably been spot on. "You should leave now."

The two fourth years and the potion's master didn't need to be told twice, and left quickly. Once out of the office, Natalie turned to Harry.

"How did you know it was Voldemort who ordered it?"

"Because she'd have had to ask and then justify to him why she wanted me to lead around a bunch of people from a country that tried to have me killed... plus it explains why I got that job at the embassy. Practice," he explained. This was the first time she'd talked to him since last year, and he hoped this meant she was ready to forgive him, if only as a fellow victim. He was soon disappointed.

"So it's your fault I'm stuck showing around those French snobs? It figures."

She stomped off. Harry looked after her helplessly. He found himself looking towards Snape for some sort of clue of what he should do, but the man just arched his brow in a wordless 'your asking me'?

“Well, bollocks,” he muttered.

Snape smirked and strode after her, but not before leaving him with, “And another five points for foul language.”

And really, he should have seen that coming.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort was enjoying a considerably better, or at least more productive, evening in Hogsmeade with the foreign dignitaries. Most were far too self important to cram themselves into the Great Hall with hundreds of children, regardless of the occasion, and had opted to throw a little soirée of their own. The garden park that had been cultivated over the summer was decorated in canopies of of white silk and paper lanterns floated about in strategic randomness, giving the evening a warm and elegant feel. There was a lot of crystal champagne glasses, hors d'oeuvres made of strange cheeses, and laughing at things that weren't funny. Journalists and photographers circles the room, asking for quotes and pictures, and got them.

By tomorrow morning, the evening's events would be on the front page of every newspaper from Britain to Japan. He was feeling quite pleased with himself, which made it easier to smile through the French ambassador's asinine story about her cousin's attempt to learn Elvish (which was impossible for even a wizard since it required two sets of voice boxes and the ability to hear three decibels above the range of hearing of a dog) and ignore her husbands extremely poor English.

“But jokes aside,” Ambassador Prideux, her accent nearly undetectable, “I thinks its wonderful what you've managed to accomplish within the last five years. The British economy is stronger than it's been in a hundred years, even with the embargo, and your social reforms have been remarkably effective. His Majesty is quite interested in your Community Service Obligation system in particular.”

“I am flattered,” he lied easily, but couldn't help teasing her a bit. “If he's impressed with the CSO program, perhaps he'd also be interested in our Wizarding Youth Reclamation Agency. I have to say, that is the one I'm most proud of.”

Ambassador Prideux's smile froze, and her gaze suddenly became evasive. Inside, Voldemort cackled in delight. He'd thrown her into a frying pan with only a fire to escape to. Whatever her personal feelings, she couldn't voice her approval for WYRA and go against her country's popular (or at least more public) opinion, nor could she object to it before Britain's ruler in the middle of a peace mission.

“Ah, yes... well, it's certainly a unique idea,” she fumbled, trying to maintain her sophisticated demeanor.

He spared her further embarrassment, more for his own benefit than hers, and continued, “Yes, but I understand it's not for everyone. Britain was facing a critically low population in her magical communities after all, which I understand isn't the case for most of Europe. Hopefully, programs like WYRA will no longer be essential in a few decades.”

Lies. Everything he said, utter lies, but she smiled in relief and not a small bit of admiration. He wondered how she would look at him when his army marched on Paris, and she realized the truth. Would she be afraid of him then or would her admiration only grow? Women were strange and unpredictable creatures.

Schwartzmann was easier to read, but only because Voldemort understood his motivations. The man had maintained the isolationist policy in Germany because that was what the German Minister of Magic wanted, and the ambassador liked his job. Now that the Minister was facing a re-election, his scramble to gain some political clout fell to his studious lackey. Schwartzmann was a spineless worm, bending and creeping through the political muck, and holding no strong opinions about anything. At least he appeared to have the common sense to be afraid of him, and the will power not to let it show. The man had been discreetly avoiding him all night.

He'd get his claws into the man sooner or later, but for now he could afford to be generous.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Can you believe it? Why didn't they tell us!”

“Did you see their uniforms? Why can't we have uniforms like that?”

“I heard the pretty girl's name was Delacour. Fleur Delacour. I mean, wow, even her name is pretty.”

“Whose classes are they going to be in? Maybe they'll have their own teachers? There were a couple of people at the teacher's table I didn't recognize.”

“Merlin, that woman was huge!”

“Mom and dad are going to flip!”

“ALRIGHT, QUIET!”

The Hogwarts' Herald newsroom fell into an immediate hush, their eyes finding their leader immediately. Horace McGunny ran a tight ship, and this wasn't the first (although it might be the biggest) major event that he had led them through. Composed and serious, he glared out at them with the nerve of a four star general.

“Alright, listen up, we've got some major work to get done. I want the first emergency issue out by Saturday night.”

There were some groans, but he ignored them and continued.

“It won't be a full issue, but it's important we get out the general information. Professor Toure had the courtesy to inform me of events in advance, and I've gathered most of the information we'll need.

Tournament rules, schedule, history, etc as well as the list of the exchange students and professors. I'll need four volunteers to help me format and print what I've got, while the rest of you to get started on next Saturday's full issue. Volunteers raise your hands."

Three people raised their hands. He turned to Ron Weasley, trying to avoid his notice behind a seventh year photographer.

"Weasley, you're with us."

"Why me?" he grouched, "Why don't you pick Granger? She's the one who skipped out."

"Granger is performing prefect duties, and will be busy most of the weekend. You on the other hand, still owe me two articles. Besides, everyone else will be busy interviewing the new students, and you don't have the tact for that."

Several people snickered, but stopped when he glared at them.

"Alright, people, assignments are on the board. If you get an idea for an article, you know where to find me. I'll see you all tomorrow, 9 A.M. sharp."

The reporters and photographers and editors scrambled towards the news board, where scraps of paper were dangling, listing jobs and interview and photo assignments. It wasn't their usual system, which involved McGunny selecting a person that best fit a job after painstaking consideration, but in situations like these when they needed to get things done fast, it worked.

McGunny went to his desk, waiting for people with ideas and Granger. She showed up in time for the board to empty, and half the staff had already left. She approached his desk a bit sheepishly.

"Hey, sorry I'm late."

"No need to apologize. I saved you an assignment, and it's a good one."

He handed her a piece of paper that he had saved from the bulletin board melee before hand. There was a name, a picture, and few general facts. It hadn't originally been his intention to assign it to her, but something he had witnessed in the Great Hall had given him the idea.

"His name is Viktor Krum. Bulgarian. He got into Durmstang on a quidditch scholarship, but he's playing professionally now. Don't let that fool you though. He's not just a dumb jock. He was top of his class three years in a row, and is active in a lot of social causes. Muggleborn and squib rights seem to be his favorites. Out of everyone, I think he's got the best shot at being the Durmstang champion."

She scanned the sheet curiously, and that expression didn't change when she looked back to him.

"Why are you giving this to me? Wouldn't O'Connelly or Cokesbury be better suited?"

He shook his head.

"I need someone who is fair, objective, and sensitive. I know you can appreciate how important it is that we don't insult the Durmstang champion."

"Oh... yes, I can understand that, but are you sure? I mean..."

He sighed in annoyance. "Granger, just have the rough draft to me by Thursday."

"Okay." She ducked out of the news room quickly, and he rolled his eyes. He hoped she didn't end up reciprocating Krum's obvious crush. It was bad enough that he couldn't get anything about Potter out of her, it would be even worse if she clammed up over the likely Durmstang champion. He'd have to play it by ear. In the mean time, he had his own story he wanted to work on that had nothing to do with Durmstang, Beauxbatons, or the Triwizard tournament.

It involved the subject of his recent curiosity and the many weird events that seemed to revolve around him, not the least of which were the deaths of a student and a teacher and the release of werewolves upon the entirety of Britain.

Oh, yes, he was going to get some answers out of Harold James Potter if he had to tie him to a chair and pour Verisaterum down his throat.

Book IV:

Chapter 7: The Foreign Occupation

Harry did in fact see Hermione before she got to bed, and after they related their individual assignments, they decided a little cooperation might be beneficial. Harry let her look through his file notes on Krum and offered to see if he couldn't set up a meeting between them, and Hermione made him an outline for a tour around Hogwarts and tips on what might interest or confuse them. He made a copy of it and had it magically sent to Natalie with an apology note for getting her dragged into Voldemort's weird political games. Even if it wasn't his fault.

He wasn't sure what to make of his situation in general. He would have preferred being consulted first, but if asked to be a liaison he didn't think he would have said no. While the situation put him in a politically delicate situation, he couldn't help but admit that he was curious. What was the wizarding world like outside of Britain? How did they run things without a dictator?

Saturday morning, he woke up early with those questions running through his head, and unable to sleep he took Inana out of her basket and took a walk beside the lake. The Durmstang ship floated eerily in the distance, a strange mist rising up where ever it drifted, and Harry decided at some point he was definitely going to paint it. He let Inana loose to hunt, and managed to chase down a breakfast of his own back at the castle, before heading to the Durmstang Common Room.

He met with a bit of trouble along the way. He was on the second floor of the new wing (looking surprisingly ancient considering it had been destroyed and rebuilt last Christmas after Moody's attack), and on his way down to the first when a very beautiful, and very irritated girl stopped him in the hall.

"You zere!" she called, stalking towards him as if he were a criminal preparing to flee. He had to admit he was increasingly tempted to run away the closer she got. "Where are you going? Our dormitory is down zis way! 'Onestly, 'ow can you show us around a castle when you don't even know where you are going?"

He started to explain, but she grabbed his wrist suddenly to tug him along. An incredible shock ran between them, and she dropped his wrist and pulled away. There was a moment of dumbfounded incomprehension as they stared soundlessly at each other, followed by a moment of inexplicable embarrassment. Whatever had passed between them had been magic of some sort, but not the kind typically practiced from books. Now that he had a moment, he could smell magic coming off of her, similar to what he felt around werewolves, but the animal was all wrong.

He wondered what she was.

Then realizing he might have just magically violated her on accident, thought it better not to ask.

“Sorry,” he said, “I think you've got the wrong person. I'm the Durmstang guide.”

Her awkwardness quickly vanished, and she let out an annoyed sigh.

“Then I will not bother you further. We shall entertain ourselvez. Away with you.”

She made a dismissive gesture that Harry found rather insulting, but decided to ignore. He really did need to get going if he didn't want to be late. The Durmstang dormitories were easy to find. There were no portraits to conceal the entrances' whereabouts, and the doors themselves had been left open. There were only three girls amongst the twenty-something Durmstang students (but whether that was because only three girls had decided to come or there was just a disproportionate number of boys to girls at Durmstrang or both Harry didn't know) and all of them were lingering at the doorway to their separate rooms.

“Guten Morgen,” he greeted politely.

They smiled back a bit shyly, and managed their own 'good mornings' with varying levels of success.

“Good morning!” came a considerably more enthusiastic and masculine greeting from the boy's dormitory. The voice's owner, a boy with wild blond hair and a mouth meant for laughing, came out and Harry felt an automatic compulsion to like him. There was something about the openness of his expression that reminded Harry of the werewolves. “Hey, Viktor, everyone! He's here!”

He turned back to the Gryffindor and gestured for him to come in. Harry did, took one look around, and winced. It looked like the inside of a pumpkin! The boy laughed.

“I'm glad we weren't the only ones who noticed. It's really not that bad. Our dorms back home aren't decorated in anything except black or gray. This is actually a rather cheerful change of pace.”

“Sorry, I've never been in here before. They only finished re-constructing this part of the castle over the summer.”

“Re-constructing?”

“It got blown up.”

The boy laughed again, until he realized Harry was serious. “No shit? Hey, Viktor, you hear that?”

“I heard it, Jophery. I'm sure the Beauxbaton's students are wondering what you're shouting about.”

Harry's first impression of Viktor Krum was that he was Jophery's opposite in every way. Where Jophery was amiable and boisterous, Krum looked as inviting as Snape in a dark alley. Having read the professional quidditch player's file, he couldn't help but feel a bit of nervousness as he approached. This was Durmstang's most likely champion, and if Harry got on his bad side, he couldn't be certain of the consequences. And judging by the way all the other boys seemed to be looking towards Krum for instruction on what to do next, it would also determine how he got along with everyone else as well.

“Good morning,” he tried experimentally.

Krum glowered at him for a long moment, measuring him with his dark eyes, before finally speaking.

“Good morning. We go now?”

Well, that wasn't too horrible.

“Um... yeah, if everyone is ready.”

A quick glance around the room showed everyone was. Harry led the boys out into the hall where the girls joined them. It suddenly became very apparent to the Gryffindor that his job sucked. Every single one of the Durmstang students, boys and girls both, were not only older, but also taller than him. It gave him the very bad impression that they were stalking him rather than following him, and he had to brutally crush his instinct to run away very quickly. He knew the school inside and out, he could bolt into a secret passageway and they'd never find him. Not the best impression to leave them with, however.

“Um... okay, my name is Harry Potter, I'll be your guide, if you have any questions or need any help with something, just ask me. I guess we can start the tour right here...”

Hermione had gone over everything he should say, and more importantly what he shouldn't say, when showing them all around. The 'shouldn't's involved everyone who had died or been injured by typical Hogwart's weirdness in the last couple of years, and anything about himself (which mostly fell into the same category). With Krum standing beside him at the front of the crowd, looking at him with his dark measuring gaze, he thought perhaps the g-rated tour wasn't going to cut it.

“Alright, this part of the castle was destroyed last Christmas by an escaped prisoner. Former Ministry of Magic Auror Alastor Moody murdered a construction worker, assumed his identity, and planted bombs all over the school intending to blow it all up when the students returned from winter break. Luckily, he was discovered before then. Professor Vesper Larousse and Professor Severus Snape managed to stop him from destroying the school, but Professor Larousse was killed. This entire corridor was collapsed during the battle except for a section of the tower that we're heading towards now, which is named in her honor.”

There was a startled silence amongst the students as they made their way to the tower, but once they reached the stairs Krum, whose expression hadn't changed, broke it.

“We have heard of this Alastor Moody, but not the story you speak of. What I remember hearing was that Moody was killed while trying to assassinate a student.”

He was being challenged, Harry realized quickly. Challenged to be honest and confess his involvement in the matter. The only problem was that he wasn't sure what would happen if he did or didn't. If he admitted he was there, it would expose a weakness, a memory of things that still haunted his dreams some nights. If he lied or dismissed the matter, they wouldn't trust him. Of course, if he lied he wouldn't be worthy of their trust, so that wasn't unreasonable. What they'd do if they didn't trust him was anyone's guess.

He stopped on the tower stairs before a plaque.

IN HONOR OF

PROFESSOR VESPER LAROUSSE

WHO DIED PROTECTING THE SCHOOL AND ITS STUDENTS

FROM THE TERRORIST ALASTOR MOODY

Dec. 25, 19XX

“I was there when it happened,” Harry said, pointedly looking at the plaque. “The school was evacuated before Moody knew we were on to him, but there were still people I cared about left behind. I went back for them and Moody found us. We all would have died if it weren't for her and Professor Snape. I don't know everything you've heard, and I don't really care if you believe me, but that's the truth.”

He turned away and walked up the stairs without looking back at them, not wanting them to see his face until he could regain control of his emotions. Sadness was only part of it. He resented them for bringing it up. No one said anything while he struggled with it. He finally regained control of his voice.

“If you look out the window, you can see Hogsmeade a few miles out. It's normally not that big, but they have some interesting stores and pubs. There is a Hogsmeade weekend scheduled once a month...”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The tour went much easier after that. Krum started asking questions once they reached the moving staircases, which weren't exactly friendly but didn't challenge him any further. Eventually everyone else started to become curious and started asking questions as well. The Durmstang students seemed rather stoic by nature, but even they couldn't help express a bit of curiosity at all the wonder that was Hogwarts. It was a long tour, there was a lot to see after all, but the last of it Harry spent outside.

The Durmstang students soon had to strip off the outer layers of their uniforms do to the heat, but no one complained or asked to go inside. Here, several of the students remarked that the weather was remarkably pleasant compared to their school, which Harry learned was founded by a wizard prince, who slew an ice demon, and was consequently plagued by winter where ever he went. Unable to live in populated cities or anywhere near farms, the man had moved into the mountains and created a school. This was very interesting to Harry, who decided to asked Voldemort about demons the next time they met. It wouldn't do to kill one and have say, a flood follow you around... or droughts or any number of other natural disasters or phenomena.

At last, it was half past noon and Harry led everyone inside for lunch. He waved at his friends, but ended up sitting with his group to answer questions. The Beauxbaton's students were at the adjoining table, looking exhausted and extremely nervous (particularly when they noticed him looking at them), and back at the Slytherin table, Natalie was looking smug. He wondered exactly what she had told them during her tour. Some how he didn't think it was what had been on the outline he'd sent her.

"You have a very interesting school," Krum said idly, assembling a rather impressive butterbrot* out of ingredients Harry hadn't seen since he was eight. "There must be a lot of interesting people who study here."

As it turned out, Krum wasn't really Snapish at all. With Snape you could always tell that he hated you. With Krum you couldn't tell if he hated you, liked you, and or even realized you were there unless he said something.

"Oh, yeah, we've got all sorts of different people. I mean, the only real requirement to get into the school is a higher than average magical level, and that can show up anywhere and in anyone. Rich, poor, pureblood, muggleborn, athletes, geniuses, anarchists, socialites... and at least a few people who aren't entirely human. I think this one kid in Ravenclaw is part wood elf."

"Muggleborns? I thought muggleborns were not permitted to attend Hogwarts," Jophery said, looking surprised. Krum kicked him under the chair.

"No, they're allowed, My best friend is a muggleborn. You just have to take this really boring class the summer before you attend and pass an exam, and then they let you in. Actually, I met a lot of my friends in that class."

"Why would you be in that class? You're not a muggleborn," Jophery pointed out. Krum kicked him again, this time harder. Harry shrugged, pretending not to notice that they seemed to know certain things about him. He wasn't surprised. They must have heard about him in the newspapers or been told (warned) about him by someone like Schwartzmann, just as they likely had been warned about Voldemort and the headmistress and how he had been informed about them.

"I didn't know I was a wizard until I was ten, and I never knew about my parents being magical until I started at Hogwarts. They raised me in Germany as muggles, and after they died, I was raised by my mom's muggle sister in Surrey who never said anything about it. So they stuck me in the class once I'd tested with a high magical aptitude. Good thing too, since I couldn't tell the difference between a ward and owlry before that."

"Hmm..." Krum said, looking at him directly for the first time, "Tell me, have you..."

Whatever he was going to ask faded on his tongue, and Harry looked over at him to see what had happened. Krum's gaze wasn't on him, but caught on something else. He turned to see and found Hermione heading towards them with Colin Creevey at her heels. She gave them all her most charming smile, before turning to Harry.

"Hi, Harry."

"Hey, Hermione," he said, then turned to the other students. "This is Hermione Granger of Malfoy. She's with the school newspaper."

"Hello. I was wondering if we could get a picture."

Krum blinked in surprise, and came back to himself quickly.

"Ah, yes."

Harry moved out of the way and let Colin take their picture. He was vaguely amused to note that it must not have been the custom where ever they were from to smile in a picture, as they all glared fiercely. Just out of hearing range, Hermione asked him how it was going.

"It's going alright. They're not as scary as they pretend to be."

"And did you ask Krum yet?"

"Not yet. I still haven't figured out if he's planning my demise or is just disgruntled about his dorm room's color scheme."

She rolled her eyes. "Quit joking around. I'll be in the library for most of the afternoon if you want me."

“Studying before we've even had a class yet?”

“There's a reason I'm the head of our grade and you're not.”

“Yeah, probably having to do with an elaborate plot by Voldemort that will end in the conquering of Europe.”

“Just so you know, I've always wanted to own Belgium,” she said, and sauntered off. A moment later, Colin scurried after her. He went back to the table to finish eating, and noticed Krum was still distracted. The only way Harry could tell because his expression had softened from stolid interrogator to vapid school girl. It was a frightening change.

“Are you alright?”

“Hm?” the older boy started, composing himself into something closer to a lost tourist but no where near recovered. “Yes, I am fine. Very fine. That girl just now, that Her-mon-e Granger, is that your girl? She's very lovely.”

Harry choked on... absolutely nothing. It figured that something just had to go wrong today.

“No...” he admitted reluctantly, “...she's not my girl. She's just my friend, the one I mentioned before.”

Jophery chuckled. “I wasn't aware a guy could be 'just friends' with a girl.”

“It's not that hard. A lot like getting along with a sister, I suppose,” he said reasonably, ignoring the implication the other was making. With some trepidation, he turned to Krum. “If you want to meet her, I can set up an interview for the Hogwart's Herald with her.”

“Oh, can I get an 'interview' too?!” asked Jophery, looking around the great hall and landing on Angelina Johnson. “How about with her? She looks very... inquisitive.” He made a gesture with his eyebrows that had Harry choking on absolutely nothing again.

"If I have to kick you again, my friend, it's going to be in the groin," Krum warned with a menacing glower. "And once will be enough."

"It was just an innocent suggestion," he said sulkily.

Harry shook his head and wondered if he shouldn't introduce Jophrey to the Weasley twins. Then realized it probably would result in an 'international incident', especially if Fred learned about the Angelina Johnson comment. Wars had probably been started over less.

oo
oo

Tom wandered the school on silent wings, avoiding being seen but not particularly worried if he was. It would hardly be odd to see an owl, even outside of the Great Hall and the owlry, within the castle. He'd made a thorough exploration before the students had arrived to test the limitations of his current form, and found there were surprisingly few. The castle was designed to allow owls entry, and it still acknowledged Tom as one of its students.

He'd originally taken up residence in the owlry, but soon decided it was impractical, since the other birds there were scared of him and their avoidance of him would draw more attention than his avoidance of them. Now he lived in the Room of Requirement, and haunted the corridors of the schools at his leisure.

He'd spent most of the morning following around the Beauxbaton's students and the Cypher girl, which had been one of the most hilarious experiences of his life.

"And this is were the last teacher died. Terrorist attack," Natalie said with all the plastic cheer of a nursery school teacher. "Luckily, they managed to find the rest of the magical explosives... at least they think they did. They said they were pretty sure they did. Just in case I wouldn't touch the walls if I were you..."

“When the weather is good, the lake is great for swimming and boating. Just watch out for the giant squid... and the grindylows... and the carnivorous lake weed...”

“No one is suppose to go into the Forbidden Forest, hence the name Forbidden, but every so often something wanders into the school. Did I tell you about the acumantula? No? Good thing Potter killed it, or we'd be over run with the things. They lay their eggs in their victims while they're still alive, you know... Poor Sweetey, she was so young...”

So on and so forth, until no one felt safe enough to look around a corner let alone open a door. The leader of the group, a part veela he was certain, had been game at first, but after awhile even she looked disturbed. Not enough that she was cowering, just enough to look like she was questioning what exactly she had gotten herself into.

Of the entire lot, there had only been a handful of boys, but they seemed to have been rich and well taken care of, which Tom was looking for in his next body. He still wasn't entirely certain he wanted to possess a foreigner, but the idea had certain benefits. One, he could get out of the country and safely away from Voldemort to begin planning a regime of his own. Two, he could eliminate his foreign enemies before they even knew he was amongst them, chief among them Dumbledore and his Order of the Perpetually Burning Peacock. Three, if he could somehow take Harry with him, that would solve the problem of insuring the boy's safety and allow him the opportunity to reveal his elder counterpart's misdeeds against him. There was still the problem of being out of the loop in Voldemort's plans of course, and that was one of the reasons he hesitated. Possessing one of Voldemort's lackeys had benefits of its own, and if he had to choose among them it would definitely be Snape. He had both the Dark Lord's ear and authority over Harry. Snape would be tricky, however, having both a strong will and being an accomplished occlumens.

He had time to make up his mind. Opportunities would more than likely present themselves, and he still hadn't examined the Durmstang boys.

He just had to be patient.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Viktor returned to his rooms, more than a little conflicted about the day's events. He wasn't really surprised that Voldemort would send his protégé to guide (spy on) them, but he had to say he was surprised by the guy himself.

Harry Potter was a nice kid.

Not a miniature Dark Lord, not an evil incarnated into younger body, or even just an arrogant prick. He was just an ordinary sort of kid. A little nervous speaking in front of strangers, but obviously proud of his school. Perhaps a little adventurous. He seemed to know quite a bit about surrounding countryside and the secret passages and rooms in the school. A little simple with his German, but then he hadn't really had a reason to speak in six years. Nothing that gave him the impression that the kid was hiding anything or faking.

There were reports that Potter could speak to snakes, killed a monster, and commanded werewolves, but Viktor hadn't seen any evidence of it and was growing increasingly skeptical. He seemed kind of small to be doing those sorts of things.

He'd even set up an interview with his best friend, who he had been convinced was his girlfriend by how closely they had sat together during the Welcoming Feast. Apparently, Potter just happened to have friends who were girls. Which was kind of odd to Viktor. At Durmstang, there weren't very many girls, so the few that were there tended to get a boyfriend and avoid the other boys, unless they were related somehow. As annoying as Jophery's comments had been, he realized he had been thinking along the same lines. It was just one thing among hundreds that was different between Durmstang and Hogwarts, and he was starting to feel the culture shock.

He really needed Dumbledore's encouragement and insight right now. The man had tried to warn him that it would be difficult, not just because of the mission, but because of the many distractions that would present themselves. Viktor hadn't listened, convinced he had the discipline to see things through, and he still believed that, it was just...

He hadn't expected the people to be nice. Or normal. Or in Hermione's case... beautiful.

What had he gotten himself into?

"Hey, Viktor, I know we're living in the Room of Eternal Halloween, but must you act like a vampire? Your brooding is bringing me down," Jophery chided. "Are you homesick or love sick or just plain sick? I thought their sausage looked a little questionable at lunch."

"I'm fine. Just thinking about things. This place... isn't what I expected."

His friend looked a bit more sympathetic to that. They had both been raised with the belief that Britain belonged to the devil and assumed that meant it was inhabited by his demons and everywhere you went was thunderstorms and lightning and dark shadowy places. And Voldemort... He didn't seem particularly dangerous or evil, but of course they hadn't gotten very close. He looked very much like a movie star. Potter looked like his somewhat more awkward baby brother who you see occasionally dragged into photos by happenstance. At least the Headmistress and the Potions' Professor looked appropriately evil. It was so much easier when they looked like they wanted to kill you.

"Don't worry about it. We just arrived. We'll figure things out as we go. Nine months is a long time to pretend to be anything. If things aren't on the up and up, they'll slip up. Otherwise, hey, the situation isn't as bad as we thought. That's a good thing, Viktor. I think you came in expecting the worst, but it's a not bad thing if that's not what you find. Yeah?"

Viktor gave him a small smile. There were reasons he was friends with Jophery, despite how annoying he could be and normally was. He was a simple guy. He viewed things in simple terms. It was pretty hard to find a situation in which you could confuse or manipulate him.

He was glad to have him here.

“Especially when it comes to the girls. British witches are cute. They actually pluck their eyebrows here.”

And at the same time...

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Monday morning, Harry woke early with the rest of his dorm mates for their first day of classes. He couldn't have been happier. As well as things had gone this weekend with the Durmstang students, he was feeling rather put upon by Sunday night. He had wanted to hang out with his friends and settle into the dorm with everyone else, but instead found himself at the beck and call of people just a little too old and little too different for him to feel completely relaxed around. He liked them for the most part, but they weren't really his friends.

With classes starting, he hoped this would mean they would find students in their own classes to help them through the day, and he could focus on his own endeavors.

“Good morning,” Harry said, settling in beside Hermione at the breakfast table. She looked as if she had been there for hours already, reading her History of Magic text for their first period class. Clyde stumbled into a nearby seat, and looked like he wouldn't be awake until after that class was finished. Of course, both instances were fairly typical for both of them.

“Good morning,” she replied cheerfully.

“Geerrr meehhhh...” Clyde... said.

Ginny came up behind him and slapped him upside the head.

“I didn't know you'd taken Trollish over the summer,” she quipped, and he just glared at her nastily. “Hey Hermione, hey Harry.”

“Hey, Ginny, did you get your books in time?”

"I did, but I heard some of the sixth and seventh year girls complain that they didn't. They're supposed to get them by the end of the week though, so hopefully the teachers will cut them some slack."

"Hmm, maybe I should write an article about that," Hermione said thoughtfully, "... as a warning not to try and get your school supplies last minute. By sixth year, they really ought to know better."

"If they've never had a problem by the time their sixth years, it shouldn't really be a common problem," Ginny pointed out, and headed over towards the rest of her yearmates.

"She got you there. Besides, you have your interview on Krum," he reminded her. "4 o'clock in the library."

"I know, I know. Thanks by the way."

"That's what friends are for... just don't tell Draco about this. I think he might turn me into newt if he found out I set you up with a guy."

She rolled her eyes. "You didn't 'set me up'. This isn't a date. It's an interview. A perfectly professional interview."

"Mmm... well that's a relief... just don't tell Draco about it."

The day was long, as it usually was for the first day of classes, and rather boring. Most of the foreign students were fifth years or older, so they saw only two or three of them at their core classes. They had History of Magic, Herbology, and just before lunch Dark Arts and Defense. Professor Oblitz was not as bad as Professor McNair, but he wasn't nearly as fun as Larousse had been either. He was rather like Professor Snape, except he cussed when he grew impatient (which didn't take long), and he didn't seem to trust turning his back to the students. Also like Snape, he didn't dither about on the first day, just handed out a syllabus and started teaching like they'd been doing it for months.

"Der are many dark creatures that inhabit forests, and dey have killed many people, magical and non-magical alike, but perhaps the most sinister of dese creatures are the vones dat make demselves comfortable around people and der settlements..." he lectured from behind his podium. On a table beside him was a large box-shaped object covered in a tarp, which he finally removed. The box was made of glass, and inside was what looked like the skin of some sort of large black animal, but it moved around as if there was something still beneath it.

"Dis is a lethifold, perhaps the most infamous of the 'domesticated' monsters. Originally from tropical Africa, it made its way into South America, the Caribbean, and parts of da Mediterranean on slave ships during da last five hundred years, although recent efforts to remove dem have been met with some success. Dese creatures are most closely related to snakes, but only about as much, as say, a dragon would be. Most importantly, dey feed only on humans, often infants, although dey are capable of eating fully grown men. Dey come upon der victim while dey are sleeping, smother dem, and den eat dem whole."

There was a collective shiver across the classroom as they looked at the shapeless thing. They couldn't see any teeth, but neither could they see a head or any part of the thing that might actually be vulnerable to attack. Harry was rather reminded of the day he'd inadvertently attacked his cousin with his bed sheets, which looking back was pretty funny... or had been until now. It really didn't sound like a pleasant way to die... if there was such a thing.

"Lethifolds are fire resistant, but will burn under extreme temperatures. However, as dey tend to be found in villages and hovels, it is generally a bad idea to set dem on fire. Most experts agree dat a Patronus Charm is by far da most effective defense and offense against dem, but is difficult to master. The Patronus Charm is a deterrent for many dark creatures, so I expect all of you to be able to create one by midterm. I suggest you start practicing now. The first person to master it will earn twenty points for der House. For now, I expect a two foot essay on da Patronus Charm and da creatures it can be used against, due Friday. Dismissed."

There was a unified groan. No one liked essays on the first day of class, particularly two foot long ones. Hermione was, naturally, ecstatic. Of course, she hadn't noticed the weird way Oblitz had been watching Harry the entire class period, even if he hadn't said anything to him. Harry had gotten the distinct impression that the German professor was daring him to perform the Patronus Charm first.

This of course, made Harry want to rise to the challenge... and then not to. He wasn't sure what would happen if he did succeed after all. What was Oblitz looking for? Confirmation that he was a powerful wizard? That he was as evil as the Dark Lord?

He decided to ask for some advice before he did anything rash. Luckily, he had Potions just after lunch.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"I need advice," Harry said after potions class. It had been a fairly typical class, except for the fact that their first assignment was a two and a half foot essay on potions that didn't require boiling (Harry suspected Snape was now in direct competition with Oblitz which sort of suited his own purposes just fine). Everyone had left quickly, except for Harry, and in a bad mood, except of course for Hermione.

Snape didn't even bother looking away from the board he was currently writing on for the next period. "You have a Head of House, Mr. Potter, and despite what you may have heard, it isn't me."

"It's political," Harry tried.

Snape just snorted.

"It's about Professor Oblitz," he tried again.

This time he got a glance, and no sarcastic sounds. He took that as a sign to continue.

"He's having the class learn the Patronus Charm, and set a challenge to give twenty points to whoever gets it first."

Now Snape gave him a full out glower. "Are you asking my permission to show off?"

"No! I just... I get this weird feeling he was challenging me to do it."

"What gave your inflated ego that impression?"

"He was looking at me when he said it."

Snape considered, then seemed to dismiss it, then reconsidered it again.

"Play dumb...er. Wait until my goddaughter and Draco get it first, then pretend they taught you how. If this is in fact a ... test, it's one to test your potential. This could be simple curiosity on Oblitz's part, but it could still be used by those hostile towards you. A measure of your strengths and weaknesses."

Harry nodded. He had been more worried about Dumbledore sending another assassin, but Snape's assessment seemed more likely. And ironically more optimistic.

"This advice applies to your new foreign friends, as well. Don't lie directly, but avoid demonstrating any of your... unusual... talents. If the political situation changes, I don't want them taking information that might be used against us with them to our enemies. Is that understood?"

Well, that was more disturbing. The other students didn't strike him as spies... but then again if you could tell a person was a spy they must be pretty lousy at their job. But still, they were just kids like him... which thinking about it like that made the possibility of international intrigue seem more plausible.

"Yes, sir."

"Then go, before people start implying weird things... like we get along."

"Or I'm a masochist."

Snape lifted a curious brow.

“Who taught you that word?”

“... You did.”

Curiosity turned to annoyance.

“... Go.”

He left.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. A butterbrot (at least as I understand it) is German equivalent of a sandwich, except they're not really the same thing. Different sort of bread, different types of ingredients (although sandwiches are pretty versatile so perhaps they really are alike).

Book IV

Chapter 8: The Knighted

As far as Natalie was concerned the weekend had been a marvelous success. She'd terrorized half the foreign population of Hogwarts, insured there would be no foolish mischief making in the interim, and still fulfilled her obligations and all without Harry's silly little list of suggestions, which probably hadn't been written by Harry to begin with. It smacked of Encyclopedia Hermionia.

Snape hadn't been as pleased, but it was hard to please Snape anyways so she didn't feel particularly contrite.

She was still stuck with the Beauxbaton's students for lunch though, which was enough to make her a tad annoyed. Not like it mattered much, since Draco had run off with the Gryffindorks and the Great Red Prat for lunch out by the lake, and it wasn't any fun sitting at the Slytherin table if she couldn't make Pansy Parkinson jealous at the same time, but she still would have liked options.

"Ze English food is zo bland. Does no one believe in zpices 'ere?" Delacour complained. Natalie wanted to ask if she wanted some cheese with her whine, but thought that might be too clever for the other girl to understand. She was starting to doubt the promotion of peace with France. The more time she spent with them, the more she thought they really needed to get conquered before their brains turned into goo.

"Oh, yes, we used to use a lot of spices, but it took too much effort to sort out which spices had been replaced with poisons and we had to stop. I heard one year it was so bad the school lost half the house elves that worked in the kitchen," she said tiredly.

Delacour glared at her, and pointedly took a large bite of her fish. Not so stupid, after all, it seemed. Smart enough to know Natalie was teasing, at least.

"Do you not 'ave friends of your own, Natalie, or were they all killed in the last orc invasion?"

Much better. “No, no, they are around. They're enjoying the weather while they can. Showing off their summer tattoos and such.”

Delacour didn't seem to know whether she was having them on with that, which Natalie only partially was. She'd heard of Harry's tattoo from Draco, right before she'd told him to shut up, which he had done, but not before she found herself dying of curiosity about what it looked like. If she leaked the info to the press, would they manage to get a picture?

“Your British wit is so charming,” her French nemesis said offhandedly, grimacing at her left over meal, “I suppose what comes out of your mouth is a result of what you've been shoving into it.”

“If so, you'll be quite witty come May. You might actually have something interesting to say by then,” she said dismissively, taking a sip from her cup.

“Et tu peux le tatouer sur ton cul cet été.”

Natalie choked on her tea.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry was the last to arrive at Double Celtic Magic and Culture, but he didn't see anyway it could be helped. First, he'd had to go back to his room, empty out all of his morning classes' textbooks, and replace them with his Celtic ones, which filled his bag so much he barely had room for his parchment or quills. Secondly, he had gotten lost. 'In the willow grove' was printed where his class should have been. It wasn't quite specific enough for him.

He did managed to find it though, if only because he'd spotted someone who actually seemed to know where they were going.

The willow grove was exactly that, and nothing more, nestled between the edge of the Forbidden Forest and a small brook that ran into the lake. There were only ten students, aging from fourth to seventh, sitting on blankets in the spaces between the trees around a man only slightly elevated on a low stool. They had all removed their school robes and their shoes, and looked more like children at story time than serious students. The teacher was a patient looking man with white hair and had just a few strands of red in his beard, and welcomed him with a gesture of his hand. Out of everyone, Harry only recognized two of the students as fourth years, one a Slytherin and the other a Hufflepuff.

“Tagaimid,” the teacher said, and gave Harry a terrible start. His hand went instinctively to the mark on his chest, but there was not so much as a tingle of magic from it. The teacher gave him a curious look. “It means 'welcome in'. Have a seat. Make yourself comfortable.”

“I am Professor Brennan,” he said, his voice just barely hinting at an Irish accent, “But you can just call me, Teacher.”

There were no syllabuses, note taking, essay assignments, or really much of anything resembling a class with the exception that they were all learning. The older students did have assignments over the summer, but they weren't written down, and entailed translating a fable in Gaelic into English and then explaining what it was about right there. There were a lot of Fae involved, which Harry wasn't entirely sure involved witches and wizards or sort of fairy race he couldn't identify or both. Brennan listened through the entire story and explanation, and corrected nothing until the end. He never suggested their interpretations were wrong, only asked other students what else they might have thought it meant, and made references to things they might not have known while making their interpretations and asked how it might have changed their ideas.

Harry didn't understand half of it, but enjoyed listening anyway. Every so often someone said something that just sent a shiver down his spine, like the teacher's greeting had. Amongst the willows, two hours passed quickly, punctuated every so often by laughing when someone's story turned silly or was mistranslated into nonsense. By the end of it, though it was hot and his friends were waiting for him at the castle, he didn't want to leave.

“Very good,” the teacher said at last, “You have given even me something to think about. Friday there should be rain, so leave your books and wear boots if you have them. The ground should be nice and soft for a little bone hunting. Review chapter twelve in volume one of Celtic Magic and chapter 3 in Art and History.”

Harry and the two other fourth years were confused by that, but the other students seemed to know what was going on and either grinned or groaned

“My youngest pupils, if you wouldn't stay for a moment, I have something special for you.”

Harry and the others remained behind as the older students gathered up their things and left, watching as the man pulled out a small bag from under his stool.

“I want you to put your hand in the bag and feel around. When you find something that feels right, take it out. This isn't a test and you're not on the clock. Take as long as you need. Mr. Potter, you will go last.”

Harry was shocked, and strangely hurt. Had he done something wrong?

The Slytherin girl stuck her hand inside, and a few seconds later pulled out a dark purple crystal. The Hufflepuff boy took only a little longer and pulled out a large feather, reddish brown with black markings on it. Both looked very surprised. Brennan held out the bag to him, his congenial expression not changing a bit. Harry wasn't certain what was going on.

His hand found its way into the bag anyway, and there found neither stones or feathers but what seemed like marbles, glassy and smooth. He gave the teacher a questioning look.

“Keep going,” the man encouraged. “Feel around, touch them individually until you find the one you like.”

Uncertainly, he did as instructing, feeling each little marble. He wasn't sure what he meant by 'one you like', because they all felt exactly the same to him. The longer he kept searching the more convinced he was that he was being teased. His patience running out, he shoved his hand into the very bottom of the bag... and stopped. There was something odd about the bottom. It was cooler. No, not just cooler, it was cold! His fingers wiggled around, searching out the source of the chill, until at last they found a marble that felt as if it had been made of ice. He pulled it out.

In his hand was not a marble or even a piece of ice. It was a stone the size of a Snitch, dark gray with two thin lines running in a perfectly straight parallel. It was a river rock.

"Ah, I wouldn't have guessed water for you, young man. You struck me as more of an air person. That's the way it goes sometimes," Brennan laughed gently, then turned to the rest of them. "You young lady," he said, pointing to the Slytherin girl. "Have a crystal formed inside of a geode. Do you know what a geode is? It's a hollow volcanic rock in which crystals form under extreme heat. Your affinity to it suggest your spiritual element is fire."

He turned to the Hufflepuff boy. "You hold the broad feather of an Himalayan eagle, which spends more of its life riding the wind than settling on the ground. They'll even sleep while flying. Your spiritual element is air."

And finally he landed on Harry.

"This stone was pulled from a sacred spring in Ireland, flowing in one shape or another from the sea at the northern most point of the country to the sea at the southern end. This stone was pushed over hundreds of miles, over thousands of years from one end of the country to the other by the gentle, persistent force of that spring. It's been worn smooth and almost perfectly round during that time by that very same force. It is extremely powerful."

The other two looked skeptical. To them it only looked like a regular rock. They'd seen prettier ones in their gardens, but Harry could feel it, as cold in his hand as the spring water must have been for thousands of years. Harry could just imagine what this simple rock must have gone through. How many creatures had drunk from its waters? How many eras had come and gone? Floods? Wars? Summers and winters?

"These items are keystones. They have an affinity to your magic which allows them to be excellent storage devices. You can pour your extra magic into them and they'll hold it for you until you want it, say, for a very powerful spell, or in case you're in a situation where you must cast spells repeatedly without rest."

"So we can keep them?" the Slytherin girl asked, as if getting something for nothing was always a trick.

"Yes, they belong to you. They'd be useless to me, and almost everyone else. Even other people whose element is fire, probably won't be able to use your particular keystone as well as you can. There are different types of fires, after all, just as there are different types of water and air and most particularly earth. These ones are simply the ones that suit you all best from what I have. You might find keystones of your own that work even better one day."

"Do you have a keystone, Pro-, I mean, Teacher?"

The man smiled and reached into his pocket, pulling out what looked to be a stone but... not.

"What is it?" the girl asked.

"It's petrified wood, my Pupil. Wood so old, it's become fossilized into stone. This too is a powerful keystone."

"Can we touch it?" the girl asked.

"You may."

They each reached out to touch it. Harry only brushed it lightly with his finger tips. He could feel the magic inside, pulsating against his fingertips like a heart. It seemed disrespectful to fondle it too much, but the others didn't seem to notice. The man put it back into his pocket.

"Now, as much as I enjoy your company, I recommend returning to the castle and start reading the introductions in all seven of your text books, as well as chapter 1 in Celtic Magic Volume 1 on keystones. There won't be any written tests, but I guarantee I'll know who has been keeping up on their homework and who hasn't. I'll see you all on Friday."

There was some grumbling, although not too much since they didn't actually have write essays for once. They gathered up their things and made their way back to the castle. Harry lingered behind the others. Still having one more question for his teacher before he left.

"Why did you tell me to wait last?"

Brennan's expression remained as gentle as ever. "Walk with me."

Instead of heading back towards the castle, they moved further into the grove until they were walking along the spring and towards the lake.

"You are different from my other pupils, at least from those two. Understand, I don't mean that in a bad way, but you will be treated differently and held to different expectations."

"Why? How am I different?"

"Because you are a pagan, and they are not."

"How did you-"

"I could tell the moment I saw you, but I knew before then. Professor Snape had a talk with me before the school year started..." Harry wondered exactly what they had talked about, how insulting Snape had managed to be, and if he should be angry or not. "... And I'm rather glad he did. I would have completely underestimated you otherwise."

"I don't understand. What difference does it make if I'm pagan or not? I'm not really a Druid, and I don't know anymore about it than anyone else."

"That's not true," Brennan said, staring pointedly at him. "You have achieved what Druids spend most of their lives hoping to achieve. You've tapped into the very essence of the Earth, drawn on Her power, and become a tool for Her will. You have reached the very core of a Druid's way of life. She has blessed you for this."

"I didn't intend for this to happen," he insisted, "I didn't want anything from Her, but it just sort of... the Dark Lord just sort of... I don't know how I got here."

Brennan remained quiet for a while, as they reached the lake and there stopped. They stared out over the lake together, taking in the mountains and the water and the sky that seemed as if it could go on forever.

"I don't know how you got here either, and I don't know why," the man said at last, "But perhaps in your journey for knowledge you will find the answers you seek. All beings are created with a purpose, both in their life and their death, and I believe your purpose is larger than most. As your Teacher, I will help you if I can."

"Thank you."

"It seems we've gotten off topic, however. To answer your first question, I made you wait last so that you wouldn't inadvertently influence the other pupils choices in keystones. Being blessed by the Earth, your magic is more easily absorbed by different types of keystones, even those not of your element. If you had gone first, you would have... I suppose 'corrupted' is the best word I can think of... corrupted the other keystones and they may have selected different ones than they should have."

"Then the other keystones-"

"Do not worry, I can cleanse them of your magic easily enough."

Harry sighed. Now what? He had a million and one questions and wasn't sure where to start, or even if he should. They could talk here all day and night, and he still wouldn't have half the answers he was looking for. Professor Brennan patted him on the shoulder sympathetically.

“Don't let it bother you. Go enjoy the rest of your day. Talk to your friends. Start your homework assignments. The dynamics of life are best sorted out by living it, not talking about it.”

Accepting that was difficult, but he did need some time to sort himself out and he could try that back at the castle. Standing by the lake gave him the impression of standing at the edge of the world, and he needed somewhere less overwhelming to think.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

When Viktor had thought of his first real meeting with Hermione, he had to admit, he had pictured something a little more romantic. Down by the lake, alone in one of the towers, or perhaps in one of the myriad of mysterious rooms that flourished within Hogwarts walls. Honestly, he'd have been happy to have been anywhere with a window. He could even have lived without the window if it meant going without supervision, as well.

“So, what do you think of Hogwarts so far? Do you miss your own school?” Hermione asked, sitting across from him. Between them, a Quik-quotes-quill danced across a sheet of parchment. At the other end of the classroom, Professor Snape graded papers, smirking evilly. Every so often, he'd look up from his paper to check on them, and some how manage to look even less pleasant.

Viktor cleared his throat.

“Dis is a very interested school, and everyone has been very kind. I vill miss my friends and teachers at Durmstang, but I am glad I got to come. I like seeing different places,” he said carefully, feeling stupider with every word. He's sounded like such a dork!

"Have you traveled to many places?" she asked, looking genuinely interested.

"Yes. I have gone all over Europe. I travel a lot playing for da Bulgarian Quidditch team, but I don't get to stay anywere very long and my manager doesn't let me explore much. It is dangerous being alone in a rival's city. Players get hurt if dey are not careful."

Hermione had her back to the professor, but Viktor had a perfect view of the meaningful look Professor Snape gave him.

"You sound like you are familiar with competition and danger," she continued, oblivious. "Do you think these experiences will give you some advantage in being chosen as Durmstang's champion?"

"Ah... yes, maybe. Dere is no vay to know for sure dat I'll get picked."

"What will you do if you get picked?"

"Celebrate."

"And if you don't get picked?"

"Celebrate. Ve have all planned a party for da night of the drawing. Ve'll all have fun, who ever vins."

She laughed softly at that, and he felt inordinately pleased with himself. And then she got up, and he realized it was over already. They'd only talked for fifteen minutes, probably less!

"I think this will be enough for now," she said. "At least, until after the drawing. If you're chosen, would you mind letting me interview you again?"

He blinked stupidly for a moment, and then nodded. He was even more surprised when she took his hand shook it.

"Thanks for the interview, Viktor. I really appreciate it. It's a really great thing you're doing, coming all the way to Britain to expand your education. I hope I get the chance to do the same thing one day."

She left him baffled and more than a little flabbergasted. Damn, she was fast! He hadn't had a single opportunity to ask her a question, like if she had a boyfriend or if she'd like to go out with him. He hadn't even gotten to flirt! Not with the great bat lingering in the corner. Why had they had their interview here to begin with? As if to read his mind (perfectly plausible, Dumbledore had warned him that Snape was a legilimens), the man spoke up.

"If you're entertaining any ideas about my goddaughter, I suggest you stop right now. Remember, in my class, I don't need to ask for volunteers to test potions."

Well, that's just fabulous.

oo
oo

September passed at a snails pace for Harry, though his days were packed. He was used to his days being busy, but this year things were not only busy, but... different. Unpredictable. His classes had more homework on harder topics (which happened every year), except for his Celtic class, which really felt like more of a club than a class and was taking up more and more of his free time. Celtic class only met twice a week officially, but most of them ended up back at the grove about twice a week outside of class, as well. At least those of them who were Druids (and just pagan in Harry's case) which was all of them except for the fourth year Hufflepuff, Corey Watts (the fourth year Slytherin had quit after two weeks, complaining of boredom, but everyone else thought she had just gotten overwhelmed) and a sixth year Ravenclaw girl who was curious, but still resolutely Christian. Depending on the weather, the time of day, and their Teacher's willingness to help, the Druid students would gather around to perform the religious aspects of their faith. Shrine building, sacrifices of small animals and food, and sometimes just planting trees. Nothing as extreme as Harry had experiences, and luckily nothing that involved getting naked or being out after dark (which was good since he'd never told anyone about the werewolf ritual or any of the rituals he'd performed with Voldemort, and he thought it might be difficult to explain his few magical eccentricities).

His friends were curious about what he was doing, but he didn't feel comfortable talking about it with them. Once he'd seen Draco and Ron trying to follow him to the grove, but they soon lost track of him. He watched from the trees as they searched the grounds, but the place seemed to be shielded from them. It would explain why Harry had never even heard of the willow grove, let alone found it, before. In fact, most of Hogwarts didn't seem aware of the Druids at all, and Harry wondered if there wasn't some sort of enchantment going on. He had to admit, it did make life easier without people knowing their 'uncivilized' customs.

More than just the practicing of rites, Harry found himself talking with Teacher Brennan. He was the only person aside from Voldemort, who seemed to know what it truly meant to be a pagan and it helped ease his mind just to talk with someone who could give sound advice and was actually sane and morally conscientious. Besides, the man had this entire Grandfather-you-wish-you'd- had kind of thing going for him.

He still spent part of his Saturdays with the Durmstang students, making sure they were all taken care of, but like he had suspected they didn't come to him very often after the first week. Except for Krum and Jophery, whom Harry liked but didn't really trust since Oblitz was still trying to test his abilities during class. They were testing him too, he thought, but not for his magical potential.

"What do you want to do when you leave school?" was the first, seemingly innocent question during a Saturday breakfast. Harry had said he didn't know. Go to college again probably. Maybe art school.

"Do you miss your relatives? Even though they are muggles?"

"No," Harry had said bluntly, and then shut down the conversation by escaping to the loo. Meaningful conversations among toilets was a taboo their culture luckily shared. Thinking back, he probably should have elaborated. Krum had probably really been asking whether he hated muggles or not.

Jophery hadn't been as subtle. "So... Ever kill anyone?"

Harry asked if he was volunteering for the novel experience, which made the other boy grin. He didn't ask again, though.

Their morality testing turned out to be harder to avoid than Oblitz's, magical ones, but he was adaptable. Mentioning Hermione tended to distract Krum effectively, and turning a question into a joke worked best against Jophery.

Krum liked to get his friends together and play quidditch on the weekends, and play against whoever was brave enough to join them. Harry occasionally did, but he wasn't quite up to speed with Krum (or really the guy was just a bully on broom and Harry didn't fancy getting knocked off. He assumed this was typical professional competitiveness, or at least hoped it wasn't personal, cause yikes)Jophery insisted he was more than qualified to play professionally. He didn't feel too flattered though, since you could never be certain when the older boy was serious or not.

There were six new rookies in Dueling Club, and since Harry's former rookies still tended to turn to him rather than Ron, he was more than a little busy getting them up to par and getting enough practice himself to actually qualify him to do so. Snape had to complicate the matter of course, and introduce the basics of sword fighting... which was a lot harder than Harry had thought it would be. He'd handled a sword before, but his opponents hadn't had swords themselves and that made a big difference. Ron had found a new way in which he hoped to wail on him. Draco could soundly wail on everyone, having had private lessons since he was nine.

He wasn't the only one with unusual activities this year either. Hermione was dating Krum. She insisted she was just tutoring him in his English or getting an interview or some other feeble excuse, but no one believed her for a second. Draco had turned into the quidditch captain from hell, and despite there being no matches, had rounded up all of his teammates and insisted that they practice over the lake (the pitch had been taken over by giant flying horses and even Draco wasn't going to push his luck), which was amusing because as fiercely as Draco had everyone playing, it wasn't uncommon for a player to fall off their broom and into the water. Despite this, the young Malfoy refused to play or let any of his players play against Krum during the weekend matches, insisting it was 'aiding the enemy'. Ginny had made friends with the youngest of the Beauxbaton's girls, and was often cloistered away with her, drawing fashion designs and making plans to visit strange and exotic places. Clyde had become even more popular, and was chasing down girls by the handful despite how Hermione and Ginny glared at him all the time. Even Hagrid was making new 'friends', with perhaps the only other person in the world he actually had to look up at. Madam Maxim made quite a sight herself, giggling like a school girl when she thought no one was watching.

"I swear, if you manage to actually perform a Patronus," Hermione groused, "It's going to come out as a naked girl and you'll be expelled for lewdness."

"Ha!" Clyde smirked, "You're just mad because it you didn't make a Patronus first. Spoil sport."

Harry, Hermione, Clyde, Draco, and unfortunately Ron, were gathered in an empty classroom, practicing their Patronus charms. No one had gotten the charm, except...

"Harry, stop showing off!" Draco snapped, glaring at the Gryffindor as he directed his Patronus around the room with frightening ease. "It's distracting!"

Harry's Patronus stopped its prancing and turned its antlered head towards its Master as if waiting for permission. He made a gesture with his wand and the stag vanished. The spell had come quickly and easily to Harry, like many of the oldest spells they taught at Hogwarts, and he wasn't the least bit surprised to learn that it was a spell developed by Celts and that it had spread quickly across Europe. He was surprised to learn that the Patronus he had summoned was his father's.

Not a copy, not a similar one, but the exact same one. He had shown the Patronus to Hagrid, partially to find out exactly what kind of deer it was and partially to show off (since he couldn't show it off in class due to Snape's warning), and the half giant had burst into tears.

Teacher Brennan had informed him later it wasn't uncommon for Druids to inherit the corporal familiars from parents or earlier ancestors. It's original name had been Familiae Patronus, meaning 'Family Protector', but after the spell's fall into disuse, it merely became the Patronus. It was also said that every so often a person who died became one of these protector spirits, and they were feared by even the most powerful of Dark Creatures.

Harry was satisfied with the stag.

"This sucks," Ron muttered, "I'm getting dinner."

"Yeah, me too," Draco agreed and left with Clyde following happily after them. Hermione glared at them in annoyance, and tried to cast the spell again. The tip of her wand barely glowed.

"You might as well let it go," Harry said. "You're not going to find your 'happy' place glaring like that."

She gave him an annoyed look, but he just smirked. It wasn't often when he could say he had one upped Hermione.

"Come on. They're drawing from the Goblet of Fire today. If you want to get a good spot to watch from, we'll have to eat early and arrive early, right?"

There was some hesitation, but in the end she was as eager to leave behind this particular charm as everyone else. They ate dinner quickly, made a brief stop at the Durmstang table to wish Krum luck, and went down to the gallery to wait. Over the next hour the crowd around the Goblet of Fire grew until every resident of Hogwarts, from the youngest to the oldest (and that included ghosts), and not a few others, was huddled around it. When Lord Voldemort strode into the room, however, they still managed to find enough space to move out of his way.

Behind the Dark Lord the Headmaster and Headmistresses followed, and they were not there for even a minute before the Goblet flared and spat out its first piece of paper. It fluttered around like a confused moth until Voldemort snatched it out of the air. He read it.

"For Beauxbaton Academy the champion shall be Fleur Delacour," he stated and handed the strip to Madame Maxime. There was a delighted murmur among the Beauxbaton's students, but Fleur herself didn't look as if she had ever doubted it would say anything different.

The Goblet spat out yet another fluttering scrap, and Voldemort read this as well.

"For the Durmstang Institute the champion shall be Viktor Krum."

There were no surprises there, but everyone looked quite happy nonetheless. The third paper fluttered out from the Goblet and Hogwarts held its breath. The other school's champions had been fairly obvious, even to outsiders, but Hogwarts was another matter altogether. There were hundreds of students to choose from, and there was a raging debate (and not a few bets) about who would be chosen. Most of the votes were divided between Cedric Diggory of Hufflepuff and Doris Whitmore of Ravenclaw, even though half the Slytherins insisted it would be someone from their house.

"For Hogwarts," the Dark Lord read, "the champion shall be Cedric Diggory."

Applause ripped through the crowd, along with shouts of congratulations. Harry just sighed in relief and turned to Hermione.

"Thank Merlin."

She grinned at him. "You're getting paranoid, Harry."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Cedric could hardly believe it. His entire House was cheering and patting him on the shoulder and congratulating him, and he still couldn't believe it.

It was just...wow.

This sort of thing never happened to Hufflepuffs. Gryffindors had adventures. Slytherins had glory. Ravenclaws earned prestige. Hufflepuffs... just didn't.

Until now.

Until his name had been called.

Holy crap, there was no way he was graduating a virgin after this.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"I'm really starting to hate that guy," Draco muttered, shuffling his vegetables around his plate with his fork. "I don't get what people see in him."

"Says the guy who hangs out with Ron Weasley," Natalie said, rolling her eyes.

"Hey! We're not talking about my friends here. We're talking about that Krum guy."

She shrugged. She didn't have much opinion on him as she never saw him around. Draco, however, had fostered an undying hatred for the Durmstang Champion, the origin of which seemed to be from all the attention Hermione was giving him and her growing respect for his 'causes'. Draco was the jealous sort after all, and didn't like his place in Hermione's affection and admiration usurped.

"What about Krum?" she asked, resigned to his inevitable rant.

"He's up to something, I know it. He's got a sneaky look about him."

She rolled her eyes.

"Don't even start Draco. At least you don't have to babysit the guy. I swear that Delacour girl can't go a day without complaining to me about something."

Draco smirked.

“Liar. You like her.”

“Like her? She's a spoiled little harlot.”

“See? Kindred spirit. She's your idol.”

“Ugh. Now you've ruined my appetite. Thanks a lot you twat,” she muttered, threw down her own fork and stalked off. He grinned as she went. It wasn't often that he could outwit Natalie, but it was always worth the effort.

oo
oo

“Ve do not have house elves in our country. The vood elves tink of dem as abominations, and have sworn to kill anyone who creates von. You do not have dat problem here?” Viktor asked Hermione quietly. Even though they had already erected a silencing charm, it felt wrong to speak too loudly in a library.

They were having a discussion when they really should have been studying, but like so many times before they found a distraction in each other. Viktor was more convinced than ever that he had found an angel, for not only was Hermione beautiful, she was also kind and very clever. The only fault he could find in her, was her insistence to keep things 'proper', which meant very little privacy and absolutely no flirting. Even now, they were holding their time together in a library, and though no one could hear them, he was very aware of her adoptive brother glaring holes into the back of his head at another table along with his redheaded friend. What precisely did they think he was going to do to her? Potter was there too, but looked embarrassed by the other boys' behavior and was pointedly ignoring everyone.

“There isn't a significant number of wood elves in Britain to cause that kind of problem. We only have a few scattered colonies in Ireland and Northern Scotland, and they avoid witches and wizards. There's...history between our races," she said, looking regretful of it.

Truthfully, there was history between Europe's wizarding populations and the elves (wood, water, and mountain all), but the elves fared better on the continent than in Britain. More resources available to them, supposedly. In any event, it was generally agreed it was a lot easier (and cheaper) to go to war with trolls and orcs (and other wizards) than it was to war with elves, and a truce had been upheld between their races for two hundred years running now. Which didn't mean there wasn't a lot of bad blood between them. Viktor decided against mentioning it, as mentions of war seemed to sadden her.

"Dat is too bad. It might sound unfair, but if I had to choose between da friendship of an elf and da blind loyalty of a house elf, I would definitely choose da-"

A paper plane landed on the table in front of him. He picked it up and it unfolded itself to reveal a message.

"What is it, Viktor? Is everything okay?"

"Hm? Oh, yes. Every ting is fine. It seems I forgot my book in Dark Arts. I am sorry, but might ve hold dis conversation for another time?"

"Yes, of course. I understand."

Feeling a little daring, he took her hand and kissed it. She blushed , but didn't pull away.

"It has been a delightful conversation, as always."

He strode away ignoring the glares the Slytherin boys were sending his way, and left. He followed the route that was gradually becoming familiar to him to the Dark Arts classroom, passing familiar portraits and tapestries and students. It made him uneasy how quickly he was becoming comfortable in the castle, and he was finding it increasingly difficult to remember that he was on a mission and had to remain constantly alert and aware of his surroundings and potential spies-

He spun around quickly, scanning the hall behind him for just those sorts of dangers, but there was no one there. Just his imagination then.

Professor Oblitz was waiting for him in the Dark Arts classroom. The room was empty of students, everyone having left for the day, and the teacher was sitting in his chair, reading something or other.

“Sie wollten mich sprechen, Herr Oblitz?”

“Ja, es ist Zeit, dass wir reden.”

The teacher scanned the room, then raised up the privacy wards, and Viktor felt a sudden thrill. This had to do with 'the Mission'. The mission he was helping to carry out.

“Is this about the second phase?”

Oblitz shook his head distracted. “No, you needn't concern yourself with that. You'll be busy with the challenge. This has nothing to do with that, but it may prove important in the long run.”

“Tell me what you need, and I will do it.”

The man gave a satisfied smile, which was a nasty look for him, and made Viktor regret his words. There was no telling what Oblitz would want. He had never trusted the man at school, though he'd been completely professional if a bit harsh, and didn't know what had made him think he should do so now.

“It's about the Potter boy. Do you know anything about him?”

Unease coiled itself inside of him. He did not like where this conversation was heading.

“A few things,” he said, uncertainly.

“Anything unusual?”

"Of course. We have all heard the rumors, but I haven't seen anything to verify them. It seems to be hype mostly."

"Have you ever seen him talk to snakes?"

Viktor snorted. That was one rumor he didn't believe for a moment no matter how often it was repeated.

"No."

"Me neither, but I have seen his familiar. It is a cobra, Krum. A King Cobra. Now tell me that isn't a bit concerning?"

Here Viktor had to hesitate. He'd never seen Potter's snake familiar, although he had heard about the snake. He'd assumed it was just part of the rumor. The white owl had seemed more likely.

"Many people have snakes for familiars. Most of the Slytherins do. I don't see your point."

"Yes, but those people don't have venomous snakes as familiars. The only other person who has something similar is the Dark Lord himself."

"I still don't see your point. What are you asking me to do? Find out if he's a parseltongue? What if he is? That's hardly a crime, in and of itself."

Oblitz's expression darkened.

"He is the next in line to rule Britain if anything happens to the Dark Lord. It is imperative that we know as much about him as we can before the war begins. There's no telling what role he'll play in the coming war."

"If he plays a role at all and only if there is a war."

"Do not be naïve. Of course there will be a war. What do you think that creature is building an army for? Do you think he's just showing off?"

Of course not, but the way Oblitz said it. It just sounded like warmongering to him. Like he was looking to start the fight, rather than just prepare for it.

"He's just a kid. Fourteen. The war- if it even happens- will probably be over before he's old enough to fight, let alone lead. It's pointless to plot against him. The head of the Malfoy family is much more likely. More than that it's... it's cruel."

Oblitz glared daggers, but Viktor held his own. He had nothing to fear from this man. He was the school champion, so he couldn't be harmed without people finding out why, and next year he would graduate and be out of the man's reach forever. Besides, he'd had practice duels with Oblitz before. If push came to shove, he could hold his own.

"You said you would do what I tell you."

"An admittedly stupid thing to say."

"If I tell the Minister about this-"

"Did the Minister order Potter to be spied on?"

"..."

"I am sorry, sir, I'll keep an eye on him, but actively spying on one kid puts the true mission at greater risk than is justifiable. I must decline, and will instruct my classmates to do the same," he said evenly, and walked away.

"Krum! Get back here, Krum! I'm not done-"

The door slammed shut, breaking the privacy charms.

"-WITH YOU!"

He could feel himself smirking. That was damn satisfying. Movement caught the corner of his eye, and he drew his wand. He heard a ruffling of wings, and lit his wand with a 'lumos'. Shiny nocturnal eyes blinked down at him, followed by a ruffling of feathers.

“Hoo-hoooo.”

Viktor sighed. It was just an owl.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Ron held his breath from behind the suit of armor, sending out a silent prayer that Krum hadn't heard him. He was positive that for a moment, the guy must have. What would he say? What excuse could he give? Would the meathead even wait for an excuse or just blast him into pieces? But no, Krum left after quickly checking the area with a Lighting Charm.

Chump.

What the hell was he up to? Coming all the way down here for a 'book' that he clearly wasn't carrying now. He had lied to Hermione. Very, very suspicious. He half expected a girl to follow Krum out of the room (and wouldn't that shock Princess Hermione to know her Prince was a louse?), but all he'd heard was Professor Oblitz cursing. Once Krum was gone, he left the area quickly. He wanted to get caught by the surly DA&D teacher even less than he wanted to be caught by Krum.

Still, it was suspicious. What were they talking about? The next challenge? Were they cheating?

He knew the best way to find out. McGunny was good at this sort of thing, after all. Plus, it might get him out of the trouble for blowing his last two articles. Yeah. This could be fun.

Ooo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. For those who are wondering, she said “And you can tattoo it across your ass over the summer”

Book IV:

Chapter 9:

Fleur looked across the lake at Hogwarts and thought, sulkily, it looked rather pretty at a distance. In a rugged sort of way. After a month, she thought she would get use to the differences, and lately she had been doing a good job at not making comparisons between home and here. She still felt the differences though. She felt out of alignment with her surroundings, unable to find the proper flow of things.

She found herself envying the Durmstang students, who flaunted their adaptability with careless confidence. Their champion was already going out with a Hogwarts girl, who was cute and clever, but really too young and naïve to be dating someone Viktor's age in her opinion. Fleur had her own fair share of boys making offers, barely a day went by when someone wouldn't ask her on a date or at least try to, but they were either completely unappealing or reminded her painfully of Clotaire. Besides, she knew exactly what they wanted and it wasn't her conversation. She could smell it coming off of them.

Natalie was... a bitch. Sometimes she was a fun bitch, but a bitch all the same. There were a few people she might like to make friends with. Krum, maybe. He was pretty interesting, but the only girl he had eyes for was Granger. He was also a rival champion and she knew better than to make things complicated by becoming friends. The same applied to Diggory, who was just as cute as a button. Potter had sounded like he'd be interesting, but having seen him in person she felt disappointed. He was just so young. He didn't look capable of doing half the things she'd heard he had done, and when she'd asked Natalie the girl had just snorted and rolled her eyes. Of course, that could have meant anything.

Classes were dull, but she'd always found that true even at Beauxbaton's, but at least she'd had enough extra-curricular activities to take up her time and interest. Right now, the only thing she had to look forward to was the first challenge, which wasn't for another two weeks. Madam Maxime hadn't been able to give her any clues about the first challenge, except that it had been designed by Lord Voldemort himself.

And wasn't he a surprise. He was supposed to be in his sixties, but damn, he looked fine. Smelled interesting too. Like earthy things, burning leaves, and masculinity. She had only talked to him in person once, right after the Goblet of Fire had announced them as the champions, when he had been congratulating them. He had kissed her hand, looked at her with those piercing red eyes and wicked smile, and said, "Such beauty and grace hiding fierceness and power, you are a true Athena. I look forward to seeing your divinity unleashed."

Athena was the goddess of wisdom and war.

She was also the ancestor of the veela. Cursed ancestor, but ancestor nonetheless.

He'd read about her. Spied on her or something. Not unreasonable given the situation, but it sent a thrill of intrigue down her spine. But he was gone now, and she hadn't seen him since. He was supposed to be at the next challenge though. A Master of Ceremonies as it were. She wondered what he'd do if she won the next challenge? If she won the tournament?

It left her as excited as she'd first felt when Madam Maxime had told her about the tournament and invited her to enter.

Then she thought of home. Thought of Beauxbaton's and its endless gardens and lawns, the cries of peacocks wandering the grounds, dinners served on different china patterns every day, warm breezes through the bedroom windows at night, masquerades, and sneaking over the gates for an adventure in Paris whenever the days became too stifling. She thought of roaming the city with Gabrielle during Christmas time, feeling like a little girl caught up in her little sister's enthusiasm, and mama and papa acting like newly weds, testaments to fact that true love existed and was forever.

"Such a sad look for such a pretty girl."

She spun around, her wand in her hand. A man, a young man, was standing behind her, some strange object mounted on a tripod resting over his shoulder. His hair was orange, a color that seemed to be equated with the Weasley Family in Hogwarts, but she couldn't be certain. There had to be other orange haired wizards and witches in Scotland, after all.

She lowered her wand, but didn't put it away. She was aware, as any young woman alone with a strange man is aware, that he was bigger and stronger than her. He lifted a brow at her, smiled, and shook his head.

"Don't mind me, miss. I'm too busy with my job to attempt any canoodling, even with someone as pretty as you. Besides, I'm a gentleman."

Fleur didn't know what 'canoodling' meant, but she could guess. She hid her discomfort with indignation. "Az if I would canoodle with you! Gentlemen do not zneek up on young ladies."

His grin only widen, and he even had the audacity to laugh at her.

"Ah, you're one of the Frenchies."

Now, she was honestly indignant.

"I am French, not a Frenchie, and you are rude."

"I've been called a lot of things, but rude usually isn't one of them. Let's call it a cultural misunderstanding, shall we? My name is William Weasley, by the way, but everyone calls me Bill."

She wasn't interested. Not even a little. Nope.

"I am Fleur Delacour, and you may call me Miss Delacour or, preferably, you could not call me at all."

He frowned. "Now who's being rude? Or are only Frenchies allowed to get away with it?"

“Well, I never!” She started to stalk away, purposely knocking him in the shoulder as she passed to prove he didn't intimidate her. It was harder than she thought. He had very muscular arms.

“Well, maybe you should!” he called after her.

She gave him the finger without looking back.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Have you had any problems between your house and the foreigners? I know Slytherins can be a bit territorial,” Voldemort asked, not looking up from his notes. On the other side of his desk, Snape sipped his tea, looking the picture of dignified reserve, as he had for the last twenty minutes.

“Nothing too outrageous. The French students tend to irritate a lot of the girls with their complaining, but they've taken to avoiding each other rather than antagonizing. There is some worrisome behavior between Draco and young Mr. Krum, but given the situation with Ms. Granger, that might be for the best. A scandal involving a fight between two boys will be a lot less troublesome than a scandal involving a seventeen year old foreigner taking advantage of Commander Malfoy's fourteen year old daughter.”

Voldemort looked up at him. “What are the chances of that occurring?”

“I don't honestly see Krum as the type to force himself on anyone, and my goddaughter is pragmatic enough not to be seduced. Even if my estimations are wrong for the both of them, she's under a Chastity Contract. She's not getting anything more than a kiss until she's legally married. Rumors do happen, however. A protective older brother standing between them should waylay those. He's her designated chaperon in my absence.”

That made Voldemort smile.

“Does Lucius know about this?”

"I honestly don't know. I am not going to mention it to him. He tends to be unreasonable when it comes to my goddaughter."

"He is her father."

"No, he isn't."

Voldemort felt a sting of curiosity. It was a very rare occasion that Snape would contradict him so bluntly. It was also rare to see him display any sort of protectiveness for someone. He'd seen the vaguest hints of it when his godchildren were younger, and only once or twice in regards to Potter. He'd almost convinced himself such incidences had never happened.

"I'll trust your judgment in this matter then, and leave you with a reminder that it wouldn't be worth Lucius' anger to take too many liberties in Miss Granger's upbringing, even if you are her godfather."

Snape hesitated, but nodded. "Thank you, Master. Will that be all?"

"Yes. I'm sorry I can't stay longer, but you understand the schedule I'm keeping. I have one more appointment and then I'll be going."

The potions master nodded, and left. Ten minutes later, Brennan entered the office.

"Fáilte*," he said to the teacher. "It has been a while, old friend."

The man gave him a less than friendly look. "Friend, is it? If knowing exactly who you are and actively not pursuing your death qualifies me as your friend, then I suppose you can call me that."

Voldemort smirked. He'd known Brennan since he was just a boy, apprenticed to a teacher of his own and in love with the world. Now Brennan was the teacher, and though still in love with the world, he was cautious in his affections. The war hadn't been any kinder to the Druids than it had any other sort of witch or wizard. It had been a miserable time for the Irish in general.

"You should be more cautious. You never know when I won't be in the mood to tolerate your insufferable self-righteousness. I should feel bad if I killed you in a fit of pique."

Brennan just scowled.

"What do you want?"

"How is my apprentice?"

"Harry? He's magnificent. As if you didn't know. I've never seen anyone so sensitive to the flow of magic. If he had half an idea of what he was doing, he'd be the next Merlin, but his mind doesn't work like that. His element is water, after all. He needs his boundaries defined for him or he flounders. What did you do to him?"

"What do you think I did?" he laughed.

"You're the devil. You'll eat his soul given half the chance."

"That's a strange thing for a pagan to say..."

"There are many devils that the Druids fear. What did you do?"

The Dark Lord leaned further back into his chair. So Brennan truly thought he had done something to Harry? Well, he suppose he had. He'd been the one to introduce the old magics to the boy, to pull him slowly away from the 'safe' magics, and finally he help the boy sell his soul. Perhaps he really was the devil. What a titillating thought.

"Surprisingly little. He is an open and welcoming spirit. The Earth wanted him already. I think She intended me to make him Hers from the beginning. An angel to stand beside her devil."

"A balance?"

"She is all about balance."

"He's a child."

"So was I once. Won't you help me?"

"Help you? Help you what? Turn him into another one of you?"

"Of course not. There can only be one of me, but I see so much potential for him. He can fulfill the roles I can't... do as easily. I am a conqueror, he is a defender. I lead by the lash, he leads by example. He might yet become my equal, but we shall never be the same."

Brennan said nothing for a long moment, taking in what was said and what wasn't.

"And you are all right with that? Having an equal with different ideas about how the world should be? You are too conceited to lend that much trust. If you've come for assistance in binding that boy to you, I tell you I'd rather die."

Voldemort's amused expression vanished.

"That can so easily be arranged. I do not need the aid of a feeble old man to bind Harry to me. I have not even entertained the idea of such a corruption of spirit. He'd be driven insane and I want him whole. That's what I need you for. You are the only one he can turn to when I'm not here. The only guiding hand."

"I don't need to be threatened to do that. He is my pupil, my responsibility. I will not allow him to come to harm."

"But will you allow him to grow? It takes almost thirty years as a disciple to become a fully fledged priest. I want you to speed the process along."

Brennan looked horrified. "He hasn't even accepted being a Druid, only a pagan, and you want me to make him a priest? No. He'll make that decision for himself when he's an adult."

"It's the Earth's decision."

"You are not the Earth. However much she favors you, she doesn't obey your whims."

This was starting to give the Dark Lord a headache, and he rubbed his temple. He didn't want to argue with Brennan or get into metaphysical or moral arguments. Especially not if the man was going to intentionally misinterpret him at every turn.

"Fine. Suit yourself. Waste his potential. Bind his hands with your fear. He'll break free of your restrictions soon enough. Go. Plant a tree or something before I turn you into a woodpecker."

Brennan didn't dignify him with a reply and angrily stalked out. Voldemort sighed.

And to think he'd been such a sweet kid.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The First Challenge was held on a Friday. Classes and clubs were all canceled so everyone could attend. The Hogsmeade weekend would be the next day. The only classes anyone seemed to have homework in was Potions and DA&D.

It felt like Christmas to Harry, albeit a warm Christmas with a lot of pumpkins turning up in odd places. He'd been working non-stop, with barely enough time to spare any of his friends a hello, let alone sit down and enjoy their company. He had even started dreaming about classes in his sleep, and woke up one morning convinced he had already taken all his quizzes for the week.

"For someone who flies so fast, you walk really slow," Draco grouched, trying to hurry without actually looking like it. Malfoys did not hurry for anything or anyone, after all.

"It's fine, Draco. What's the rush? No one is going to steal your seat."

It was just past 8 o'clock in the morning and the tournament started at nine, but already people were heading out to snag the best seats. Most of the other students and teachers were heading for the newly constructed stands on top of the lake. Harry, Hermione, Draco, all the Weasley siblings, and a few others had found an even better vantage point. Ginny's eldest brother, Bill, was part of the Safety Team who would be standing by in case something went wrong, and had set up a floating platform opposite the stands and closer to the action. He'd invited them to take advantage of the view.

"Tell me who's brilliant idea it was to spend the tournament sitting next to the Weasley twins?" Draco groused.

"Your's," Hermione said, Colin following behind her once again with camera already out and ready. "Well, actually I accepted Ginny's invitation and you just sort of invited yourself along."

"Pfft. Like I can leave you unprotected with that lot?"

Harry and Hermione both rolled their eyes. They reached the edge of the lake, and after a precarious hike through a swampy edge, came to rocky beach. Fred and George were already there, helping Bill and Percy set up the floating platform, which was easily as big a classroom, from atop broomsticks until it was safe enough to land on. Ron and Ginny were loading two rowboats with chairs, blankets, and other things and charming them to float out to the platform. Harry and his friends quickly went to helping them, and Angelina Johnson and Penelope Clearwater turned up just as everything was ready.

They squeezed into couches and overstuffed chairs they'd transfigured from wooden benches, but only after a rather ridiculous game of musical chairs, in which Angelina squeezed herself in between Harry and her boyfriend, Fred, only to realize she was next to George, so Harry got up and sat next to Hermione, but Draco order him to move over so he could sit next to her, which left him next to Ron, who got up... and by the end of it all Harry was sitting on the orange shag rug (George's idea, along with ottoman that wouldn't let you put your feet on it) between Ginny and Colin, his bare feet hovering inches above the water.

All the while across the lake, people gathered in the stands like ants on a sugar mound, and an obstacle course started to take shape as workers set up a variety of barriers. Everyone had their own telescopes (a Charms project Flitwick had been thoughtful enough to assign, and little more than charmed paper cylinders a child might make to play pirates), but Harry simply charmed his glasses to give him eagle vision. He could make out strange sigles painted onto the grass along the shore where the challenge would start, and waiting at the shore were large golden keys, the course must have continued under water, for there were strange glowing lines beneath the water that gradually faded as the lake deepened. The course continued right up to the spectator stands, where empty spaces had been left for champions to pass through. Three broomsticks were chained to the platform, waiting for riders, and way out at the middle of the lake was a single platform on which three flags, each bearing one of the school's crest flapped in the wind. On the neighboring shore there were still more stands where the flags would have to be set, but if there were any more obstacles Harry couldn't make them out.

He felt uneasy. There was a lot of space between each relay, and a lot could go wrong... he shoved the thought aside. This was just a game. A dangerous game, but there were people like Bill all around the lake prepared to jump in if anything happened.

"Hey, Harry," Hermione said, pulling attention, "Do you know what those symbols on the ground by the lake are?"

Harry took a closer look. He didn't recognize them, but their shapes suggested they stored magic for some purpose.

"No... not really. They're not like any runes I've ever seen."

She looked disappointed. "McGunny said this challenge was designed by Voldemort himself. I thought he might have shown you something like it."

Harry didn't say anything to that. He was uncomfortably aware that everyone was now looking at him expectantly.

"What?"

Fred grinned. "Nothing, you're just so damn cute."

Everyone burst out laughing, including Harry, until Ron interrupted.

“Will you all shut up? I think it's starting.”

At the lake shore, the three champions appeared.

oo
oo

Voldemort surveyed lake. Finding everything met with his approval so far. The course had been perfectly laid, the stands completely filled, the safety team all in their places, security was nearly as thick as the spectators, and the champions appeared right on time. His Death Eaters, those still living and loyal, sat at his left as honored veterans and to his right the teachers and foreign officials as honored guests.

Lucius was seated directly beside him, looking as menacing and superior as a general should. He wasn't entirely happy to be there, Voldemort knew, as he had been diligently organizing his army and training them for a war he felt was quickly approaching. Lucius was pragmatic, however, and had accepted an invitation to meet some of his future enemies up close.

“You should relax a little, Lucius,” the Dark Lord suggested, “There will be no battles for you to fight today.”

“Yes, Master,” Malfoy Sr. agreed but didn't lighten up. He hadn't forgotten about Moody or the explosion that had nearly killed his son. Where was Draco anyway?

The Dark Lord stood as the champions took their positions at the starting line. He grinned darkly to himself and stood to address the crowd.

oo
oo

From the back of the viewing box, Oblitz glanced around, crammed with Death Eaters and political giants, the greatest among them the Dark Lord himself, and felt almost giddy with anticipation. He had to wait for the perfect moment, however, which arrived when the Dark Lord rose to address the spectators.

“Welcome-”

Every eye was turned to the creature, unwillingly captivated by his handsome face, his seductive tone, his charming vaguely archaic turn of phrase as he talked of the five elements of the world. Water, air, fire, earth, and...

“Spirit... the element with allows all living things to persist against the forces of Nature and bend it to their benefit. The source of all magic. Here today, we test these young champion's spirit in a battle...”

Oblitz stopped listening, without moving his head, he scanned the other spectators and found them all suitably distracted. From his sleeve, he pulled out a box. It wasn't a particularly interesting box. Indeed, it was like thousands of other match boxes a wizard might carry around for lighting a pipe or candle or oven, but it wasn't matches inside. He slid it open with one hand and discreetly dropped it under his seat.

Hundreds of tiny black bodies with six tiny legs scurried away from their prison as fast as they could, starved and thirsty, they sought out their sustenance and found it readily available. Dozens of giant, warm bodies all around them, and they scurried to beat their competition. As tiny as they were, they didn't share.

They found their way to every available body, but for a dozen who reeked of pesticide, crawling and hopping their way upwards, stopping only to fight off other invaders. Their own kind weren't the only danger though, as they soon found out.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape slapped his leg, crushing the little insect ruthlessly, scowling down at the bloody smear.

Determined, they all rose to their feet again, struggling to keep their balance and pulled out their wands.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Wow.”

Harry wasn't sure who said it, but it was definitely the feeling of everyone watching. From their vantage point they could see the entire field, and the champions dipping in and out of sight as hills rose and fell around them. Once they'd found their footing, the champions were really something.

There was an announcer on the other side of the lake, but they didn't need to listen to follow what was happening. Colin's camera flashed continually as he followed their progress.

“That first earth wave caught them all by surprise, but they're on their feet-”

Delacour was waving her wand around, which didn't affect the moving ground, but left her weightless and agile. She hopped from the crest of one hill to the other without pause, swift and graceful as a deer. Viktor's method was more brutal, blasting apart the ground whenever it rose up and storming over it before it dipped beneath his feet. Cedric had cast an Incorporeal Spell on himself, and simply ran straight through the solid ground, but while it was quick it was disorienting too, and the momentary blindness he experienced when he passed through a hill kept him from following a perfectly straight path.

The field was only two hundred feet, but it took them all nearly fifteen minutes to cross it. They managed to reach their keys in roughly the same time, sprinted towards the lake, and quickly disappeared beneath the water. The crowd all waited for several minutes, but nothing seemed to happen. The announcer was starting to struggle with things to fill the silence with.

“What do you think they're doing down there?” Ginny asked, curiously.

"Don't know," said George. "Might be taking bath. That last bit probably left them sweaty."

oo
oo

Natalie hadn't lied. There really was carnivorous lake weed, and it seemed quite intent on dragging Fleur to the lake floor. She shouted a muted curse and flung out her wand, shredding it to pieces, and broke free. From behind her bubble of air, she could see Viktor and Cedric had gained a lead, each partially transformed into different aquatic beasts, and contemplated propelling herself forward with a spell but decided against it. She had spent too much magic on the Earth Obstacle, and she had no idea what the other three obstacles involved. Instead, she swam naturally, and was glad she had, because the two boys ran into the grindylows first.

oo
oo

Tom cocked his head to the side curiously, watching the tiny black insects leap onto the oblivious spectators, and crawl up their bodies. He wondered if they were poisonous. He hoped so. Killing off all of his elder counterpart's minions right in front of him would be a marvelous treat to watch. Perhaps if he was really lucky Voldemort would die too. He'd have to keep his feathers crossed.

It wasn't like he had expected something like this to happen. He'd only come by to watch the competition, do a little recon on Krum, Snape, Voldemort, anyone else who caught his fancy. Perhaps check on Harry. He hadn't risked seeing the boy up close, just as he hadn't risked getting too close to Voldemort. They weren't like other wizards. There was a chance they'd sense there was something off about him.

So he'd perched himself at the back of the viewing box, and no one had noticed him. Not even Oblitz, who was directly in front of him, thought to look behind him before he released his bit of six-legged mischief.

He really did hope people would start keeling over soon. That'd be an absolute riot!

[illegible]

Viktor broke to the surface first, struggling for air as his gills receded and he regained use of his lungs. He hated that transformation for a number of reasons, but it had proved useful today. Swimming clumsily for the last couple of feet to the stands where the brooms rested, he finally pulled himself out of the water. He cast a drying spell on himself quickly, hating to waste the magic, but knowing he couldn't let the cool autumn air rob him of anymore of his body heat.

An explosive splash, and he spun around, expecting an attack. Fleur landed on her feet beside him, her faced twisted into something monstrous, as she seized a grindylow still gripping tenaciously to her leg. It screeched in pain as she drove her clawed fingers into its back and released her, escaping into the dark water. An imperious shake of her hair, now come undone, and she looked her usual beautiful self again. She lifted a regal brow at him.

“What?”

Cedric finally appeared, dragging himself out of the water in time to see the other were already using their keys to unlock their broomsticks. He struggled to do the same, but he'd been bitten on the foot and had a heavy limp. He barely remembered to dry himself off before he took flight, but once he was in the air he felt much more at ease.

And then a giant tentacle shot out of the water and nearly knocked him off his broom.

“Oh, that was a close one for Diggory!” The announcer shouted, rising above the growing din of the crowds.

Another tentacle shot out, this time aiming for Viktor, who easily rolled out of its way and then rose up as yet another slimy appendage reached for him. Fleur had already shot up out of reach with surprising speed, too far up to be a likely target, and the others followed her example.

“And they're safely out of reach! But they're not going to get their flags if they don't get down there. Yikes, it's going to take some pretty spectacular flying to get past all of those arms!”

Viktor dip sharply twice, but the tentacles followed him, appearing everywhere at once and barely escaped both times. Cedric and Fleur each tried a variety of curses and hexes, with limited success. The squid was too large and too fast. Attempting to levitate the flags to them, didn't work either.

“I have an idea!” Fleur called out to the others, “But I'll need your help.”

Both boys looked reluctant.

“Are we even allowed to help each other?” Cedric asked, skeptically. She rolled her eyes at him.

“We're not helping each other, we're helping ourselves. We need to freeze the surface of the lake! If we do that, it won't be able to move its arms or even see us, but I can't do it on my own. It's the only way any of us are going to get what we want.”

Viktor scowled even more darkly, but nodded, and Cedric shrugged. She was right after all, they couldn't do this alone. They spread out to form a rough triangle around the squid, and pointed their wands down at the water.

“Congalcio!”

Light sprang from their wands like lightening, and where ever the light touched ice bloomed like a flower, from the surface and started to spread across the water, hardening it into a solid sheet. The squid didn't seem to notice at first, continuing to swing its arms madly, smashing through the thinnest layers with ease. But slowly the ice started to thicken and harden, and the wiggly appendages started to slow, uncertain of their movements as the ice started to block the view in front of its bulbous eyes. They kept at it until the squid was barely moving at all.

“And look at that, all three champions working together! It's man against beast this time around, but how long with this truce last?! There is still one more obstacle left before the finish li- AND KRUM IS GOING FOR IT!”

Viktor broke off first, streaking towards his flag, and Cedric followed half a second behind.

“No! It's not safe yet!” Fleur cried, chasing after them anyway, but she was too late. Viktor's hand was already wrapped around the staff of his flag, pulling it free. The ice exploded beneath him, flinging him aside and straight into the Hogwart's flag. Boy, broom, and flags all landed on the edge of the ice circle. A part of it breaking off and dipped briefly beneath the surface before bobbing up again, leaving Viktor sopping wet. Cedric had managed to pull back in time to avoid being knocked from his broom, and in a quick low-flying sweep, snatched up his broken flag and sped towards the opposite shore. Viktor rolled over on to his broom, grabbed his flag, and kicked off into flight just as the ice beneath him was crushed beneath a tentacle.

The crowd burst out into wild cheers. The announcer shouting out with equal enthusiasm.

“That was FANTASTIC! Not half a second longer and they'd both have been goners! Delacour is the only one without a flag now. The pressure is on for her as the Hogwarts and Durmstang Champions widen their lead!”

Fleur was definitely feeling the pressure. Her flag now rested on ice, ice that was quickly being torn apart by nine blindly flying arms. She made two passes, but had to pull up both times when an arm passed too close. Frustrated, she made one last dive.

And then everything went black.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

There was a collective gasp, and everyone jumped to their feet.

“Oh my god,” Hermione gasped, her eyes wide with horror. They'd seen the chunk of ice flung flying through the air strike Fleur by sheer luck, knocking her off the broom and sending her skidding across the ice. There was a streak of bright red to mark her passage.

“Shit,” Bill cursed, sparing only a moment. “I think she's unconscious.”

He ran to one of the waiting boats, throwing out everything inside it except for some blankets, a first aid kit, and a length of rope.

“We'll help,” Fred said, “Just tell us what to do.”

Bill turned a warning glare at them.

“You'll stay right where you are. I'll have enough to worry about just with her, I don't want to have to worry about pulling you all out of trouble as well.”

“How are you even going to get to her?! Look, you're buddies aren't doing a very good job and they're on brooms!”

Sure enough, several safeties were already hovering over the squid, but like the school champions they couldn't get past the tentacles to get to Fleur, whose chunk of ice was starting to sink.

“I've got a ward up on this boat. The squid won't touch it! So stay out of it. You'll only be in the way,” Bill snapped, jerked the rubber of the boat twice and it groaned once before speeding towards the other end of the lake. Its progress seemed painfully slow.

“What are those idiots doing?” Ron growled as he watched the safeties hover around uselessly. “They should at least try strengthening the ice underneath her! Fucking retards! She's going to drown.”

“Shut up, Ron,” Draco growled. “You're not helping.”

"It'll be alright, Bill will get to her," Angelina said, mostly to Ginny who was ashen, staring helplessly as the situation became increasingly dire. Percy rested a comforting hand on her shoulder, but his expression was grim.

"Nonononono, oh no, oh no, no!" Penelope chanted to herself, watching as the ice finally gave way and Fleur sank beneath the water.

Harry who had been watching the entire thing without so much as blinking, reached behind himself and opened his hand.

"Up!"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Bill was half way there, but already knew he'd be too late as he watched the girl disappear into the water. It would be another two or three minutes before he reached the spot she had been in, and he had no way of knowing where she was by then. And there were things in the lake. Normally, fairly harmless things, but they'd been intentionally aggravated for the sake of the tournament. There was no telling if he'd even be able to find a body let alone save her life, if the grindylows got to her first.

He clenched his teeth. This wasn't suppose to happen! It was just a damn-

Something shot passed him, hovering close to the water and disturbing surface, making his boat chop up and down dangerously. He struggled with the rudder, adjusting his speed and angling his boat into smoother water.

"What in Merlin's name?"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape was torn between rushing down to the lake to help attempt a rescue and casting a Calming Spell on Madame Maxime, who was now shrieking hysterically and demanding someone do something, her tantrum causing the entire platform to shake dangerously. Voldemort was completely nonplussed by the situation, looking more curious than anything. Like everyone else, he was standing to get a better view, his hands resting on the railing, perfectly at ease. Next to him, Lucius looked far too amused than was appropriate. If Madame Maxime happened to notice, Snape suspected she'd stomp the aristocrat flat.

The announcer continued his monologue, now reporting the incompetent attempts of the safeties and insisting that Delacour was still somehow going to be rescued, but even he was starting to sound doubtful. At the other end of the lake, Diggory and Krum had stopped their race to the finish, instead watching the lake like everyone else for some sign of the Beauxbaton's champion.

"It's all right, Madam," Voldemort said at last. His tone was calm and level, and though he hadn't raised his voice, the Beauxbaton's headmistress heard him and fell quiet. "Help is on the way."

He pointed a little further out into the lake, but his finger moved steadily closer towards the rampaging squid. Snape found what he was pointing at and stiffened. Potter was flying across the lake at a speed he wasn't sure was possible on a broom and definitely faster than was safe, little more than a dark shadow. Really you couldn't see Harry's face, but Snape just knew.

The instant headache forming behind his eyes was a sure sign.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry felt, more than saw where he was going and how fast. His magic extended out around his body and if he could have seen it's shape he'd have described it as falcon-like, wings bent close to his sides until the sprung out with a sharp flap for extra speed. His senses extended still further than that, glasses still charmed to see perfectly at a distance, nose filled with the scent of lake water, squid, and magic.

He wasn't planning at this point. That girl didn't have time for a plan, only quick action, and he wasn't going to wait. Never mind that Snape would probably cane him for this, that he might be violating the tournament rules and cause an international incident, or that she might be dead already. He'd watched someone die right before his eyes once already, and he wasn't just going to let it happen again.

He was a hundred feet from the first tentacle, when he abruptly turned his broom on its side, nose pointed down and his right side facing the creature. It helped to slow his momentum, and the angle he kept lifted him higher above the lake rather than overshooting his target area altogether. By now the safeties had moved even further away, as the squid had taken the remaining chunks of ice and started hurling them at anything that moved.

"Who is this!? Who is this!?" shouted the announcer, "Flying in like a whirlwind, untouchable! I've never seen anything like it! Will this be Delacour's salvation?"

Harry dodged two head-sized chunks easily (they weren't nearly as quick as bludgers and only came from one direction), still not righting his boom. Pointed downwards made it more difficult to keep his hold, but at this angle he could look down at where the squids arms met its body and follow their movements more easily. He swayed to and fro, avoided being slapped out of the sky with as little wasted movement as possible, while he searched for any sign of Fleur.

Half a minute later of futile searching and dodging, and he couldn't wait any longer. He shot down, down, down...

"And he's going in! My god he's-"

The water swallowed all sound and most light and heat, and the force of the impact half robbed him of his senses. Taking a bellyflop to the face hurt. His broom continued to pull him deeper, though more slowly, the pressure pushing in on his fragile ear drums. He had to stop or risk bursting them, and took the time to prepare himself. He charmed his glasses, which immediately turned into goggles and gave him a clearer view. It was still too dark to see far, and the most he could make out was the outline of the squid's enormous head. The horrible idea that Delacour might have been eaten flitted across his mind.

He didn't have time to spare on those thoughts. He didn't know any spells for breathing under water.

He cast a locating charm.

A white light snaked out of his wand and the twisted through the water, arching downwards, beyond the squid. He pointed his broom in that direction and willed it forward, letting it drag him far faster than he could swim on his own. He had to stop after only a short distance.

He needed air. Needed it BAD.

But so did she. She'd been down here for nearly five minutes already, long enough for her heart to have stopped. He couldn't help her if he lost consciousness, though. Merlin, he need help.

Please! If you're my element, why won't you help me?

Something grabbed him by his ankle and pulled.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Vat is he doing?" Viktor asked, simultaneously horrified and transfixed as he watched Harry disappear into the lake. In the distance, he thought he could hear Hermione scream the boy's name. Beside him, Cedric gave him a wane smile.

"What he can."

"He'll never find her in time. It's impossible."

"I know. He'll probably do it anyway. It's what he does."

Viktor turned back to him, searching his expression for arrogance or disgust, but found only a sort of fond expression.

“Vat does dat mean?”

“I'll put it to you this way. If the Goblet of Fire didn't have an age restriction on it, I guarantee it wouldn't be me you're up against.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Bony hands dragged him down, and he screamed on instinct, loosing the little air that remained in his lungs. He struggled and kicked, but the hands held firm and multiplied, seizing him by his arms and legs and head. Something squishy and plant-like was shoved into the back of his throat, forcing him to swallow it and more than a little water.

Immediately, the hands all pulled away, leaving him to flounder after their mysterious attack.

He swung his wand around threateningly, not entirely sure where to point or if he should even try. No sooner than his line of sight settled on something strangely hideous and beautiful at once, a spasm wracked his body, and he felt himself started to change. Skin grew between his fingers and toes, and along his neck he could feel the skin part. A feeling of relief came over him, like he was suddenly getting his first breath of air.

Gingerly, he touched his neck and felt three large slits there, opening and closing to let water in and out.

He had gills.

He had fucking gills!

Well, at least he wasn't suffocating, and decided he should just be satisfied with that for the moment. He turned his attention back to his maybe-not-attackers, and their appearance suddenly made more sense. They were merpeople. Dozens of them, none of them under six feet and most of them easily over seven, naked from the waist up and decorated with shark teeth.

They were a benevolent race, or at least not humanity's sworn enemies. He didn't know much about them, except that they'd been known to rescue people from drowning around Hogwarts every once in a while, were known for singing when fogs rolled in, and they didn't speak English.

"Thank you," he tried, although it sounded like nothing more than gurgles underwater. A male merperson with a scraggly beard nodded, and pointed in the direction he had been heading before he'd started drowning. Recalling Fleur, he recast the location charm and sent his broom racing in the right direction. Around him the merpeople followed, keeping up easily, their tails glinting silver in the light of his spell.

She wasn't far, just deep. She was resting lifelessly at the sandy bottom, eyes closed and mouth open, yellow hair floating around her. There were already merpeople surrounding her, but unable to get close, a large pack of grindylows snarling and clawing at anyone that came near. The only thing the merpeople had been able to do was keep the creatures distracted enough so they hadn't begun to feed on her. For this Harry was supremely grateful.

The stunning spell he hit them with knocked half of them away and sent the rest scurrying for their lives. He put his wand away, grabbed the girl by her wrist (which felt uncomfortably cold and limp), and pointed his broom upwards. They shot straight up, faster than even the merpeople could follow, the water growing lighter and brighter, and the oddest thought that this was what it must feel like to go to heaven flitted through his mind.

They broke the surface, and Harry took an automatic gulp of air, only to have it go straight into his stomach. Gills he reminded himself, pulling Fleur further out of the water so her mouth and nose were exposed to nothing air, while he dipped further down to submerged his gills. It made looking around harder.

He tried calling for help, but the only was a gurgling cough. Awkwardly, he pulled out his wand, and shot out a distress signal, one of only a dozen spells he could cast with wordlessly. A blaze of red streaked upward and exploded.

“Harry! Over here!”

Bill eased the boat up beside him, not even completely stopping before he half threw himself into in the lake, pulling Fleur from Harry's grasp. He reached in to pull out Harry as well, but the boy swatted him away and pointed towards the girl. Bill took the hint and went back to her.

Harry couldn't see what he was doing, but there were spells involved and strange instruments, one that looked suspiciously like a miniature bellow, lots of yelling and cajoling and begging, and then finally Bill just beating her in the chest with his fist.

A minute dragged on and then another, and Harry grew increasingly distressed, more and more convinced that he had been too late, too slow. Another person he couldn't save.

And then there was a gasp and coughing and still more coughing.

“That a girl! That a girl!” Bill crowed, dragging her upright though she had no strength to sit up on her own. She continued to struggle for air, the blue around her lips fading to white and finally the faintest hit of pink. Harry could just barely make out her eyes, barely open, staring dazedly down at him. He smiled up at her, and laughed and cried his relief.

He had done it. Bill had done it!

Just barely.

Just enough.

She was alive.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Cautiously, the BUG crawled its way up its prey's pants, up his cloak, detoured a little towards the back for safety, and continued up until it had reached the base of the neck. Thick black hair, the perfect hiding place, beckoned across the last and most vulnerable stretch of skin. The neck was sensitive, and if the BUG didn't step lightly, it would find itself the same bloody smear Snape's BUG had become.

There was a moment of hesitation before it risked a rushed hop, and then... SAFE!

Eagerly it traveled over its victim's scalp to the clean patch of skin behind the ear. Eager to feed and quench its thirst. The skin was warm beneath its feed and smelled delicious. He clamped down with savage little pincers, knowing its prey would feel nothing, and swallowed down the first droplet of blood.

And promptly dropped dead.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. Failte, I have been informed. Is the actual Gaelic term for 'welcome'. I will be going back and replacing Taigamid with this. Just an FYI.
2. The BUGs are what they sound like, in both contexts of the word (no, not the Voltswagon Beetle type of bug, the other two meanings of the word).

Book IV:

Chapter 10: The Knights and their Honor

The Infirmary was quiet, but for Madam Pomfrey talking softly to the mediwizard behind the privacy screen. Fleur honestly didn't know why they bothered. She knew exactly what had happened to her. She had been knocked unconscious and drowned. Underwater for eight minutes and forty-two seconds. Another minute and fifty-eight seconds to restart her heart.

There had been brain damage, the mediwizard said as quietly as he could, but the water was cold enough to minimize it and the potions should repair most of what little there was. She'd be able to speak, move, and remember just fine. There might be occasional headaches and nightmares. A small price to pay for life, they said.

Except that wasn't all she had paid.

She pulled her blankets over her head and curled into a tight ball, squeezing her eyes shut. This was too humiliating. Not only to be defeated, but to be rescued afterwards. In front of everyone. Her friends, classmates, admirers, the Brits, the Germans, the Dark Lord, and worst of all, Madam Maxime. The Headmistress would be so humiliated to have made a klutz like her their champion.

And tomorrow, the rest of the world would know about her failure, and sneer.

Is that what they teach kids at Beauxbatons? To fall off their brooms and drown?

What about her family? All those rumormongers and cold-hearted débutantes mocking her parents over the daughter they had taken such pride in. Those nasty kids at school waiting to tease her sweet Gabrielle, just waiting to pick a fight. She didn't know if she would ever be able to face them.

"Pardon moi," a new voice interrupted the mediwizard and nurse. "I was hoping I might see my student."

"Oh," Madam Pomfrey said, "I'm not sure now is a good time. She's still a bit upset."

"Please," Madam Maxime insisted gently, "All of my students are very upset. It would ease their hearts and minds to know how she is doing."

There was long silence, and finally the mediwizard spoke.

"Maybe she's right. A familiar face might do Miss Delacour some good."

Fleur tightened her hold around her blankets, willing the world away even more fiercely. She couldn't handle this now. She wasn't prepared for the condemnation. The last time anyone had scolded her, she had been twelve. There was a rustling sound as the privacy screen was pulled aside, followed the scraping sound of a chair and muttered Enlargement Charm.

There was a long silence.

"My dear, I do hope your jaunt through the lake hasn't convinced you to begin your life again as a turtle. I am an awful swimmer and should miss you terribly," the headmistress said gently.

Fleur pulled back a blanket, just enough to see the woman, her expression filled with confusion.

"You aren't mad?"

Madame Maxime looked honestly surprised.

"Mad? Why would I be mad? I am just relieved that you are all right. I thought I had lost you forever. I never would have forgiven myself if you..."

She sniffed loudly, and pulled a handkerchief (easily as large a baby blanket), and dabbed her eyes. Fleur felt herself get all teary eyed just watching her, now for more than just self pity.

“But I failed... I didn't even finish the challenge...”

The headmistress made a dismissive gesture.

“You did wonderfully. Wasn't it you who came up with the idea of freezing the lake, while those other two just hovered there scratching their heads like a pair of mountain trolls? Your plan would have worked too if they hadn't messed it all up by breaking off too soon. It was just bad luck that you got knocked in the head. The only mistake you made was trusting the other two were half as clever as you.”

Fleur choked on her laugh, wiping her tears of relief away. Perhaps it was going to be okay? Madam Maxime's expression suddenly turned somber, and her heart clenched all over again.

“Fleur...” she began hesitantly, unsure of how to approach the subject. “About the competition... I'll understand if you want to drop out. I think after what you went through, anyone would second thoughts. None of us were prepared for how dangerous this tournament would really be.”

Fleur blinked confusedly.

“You mean... I wasn't disqualified already? Even though I didn't finish the challenge?”

“Finish? No, you don't need to finish a challenge. In fact, you made forty points just getting as far as you did.”

“I did? What about Krum and Diggory?”

“It took them ridiculously long to get past the fire challenge. I mean honestly! Diggory got sixty, but Krum got sixty-five for finishing first-barely.”

Fleur remained silent for moment, processing all that was being said.

“So they're not too far ahead, do you think?”

Madam Maxime blinked, and then smile. "You are going to keep going?"

"I... Can I? Next time... next time I'll definitely do better. I promise. Please? I can't let it end here, like this."

"Of course, my dear. If this is what you want, I'll support you. You were our greatest hope and pride, and that hasn't changed."

"Oh, thank you! Thank you!"

She stumbled out of bed and leaped into her arms. Hands that were large enough to crush a horse's skull patted her gently.

"I'm just so relieved," Madam Maxime continued. "I thought for sure you were dead, and then after I didn't know if you would be the same. I was so frightened. I could kiss those boys for pulling you out of the lake! Now there are true chevaliers!"

Fleur pulled back, confused. She didn't honestly remembered much of what happened until after she was given some potions. They'd only given her a very brief explanation.

"Boys? What boys?"

"Well, that Potter boy was the one to fish you out, and I mean that literally. He partially transmuted himself into a fish or something, gills and such, but he got stuck. Took nearly an hour before he could get himself sorted out. Brave child, I'll give him that, but not much on plans."

Fleur thought she might remember something about Potter, looking up at her, smiling like a very wet puppy.

"Then there was the Weasley boy... well, he's not really boy. Billius Weasley. He's actually some sort of curse breaker, even though he's only... nineteen or something. Got you breathing again before the medi-wizard even reached you. You owe them both a very big thank you."

“Billius Weasley?”

“I know... they run rampant around this part of the country.”

That wasn't exactly what Fleur was thinking.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry's much anticipated Friday was officially a bust. Aside from actually saving Fleur's life, which was really was the only redeeming event of the day, it was just one unpleasant thing after another. Alright, the flying part was actually pretty cool, looking back on it. He'd never flown that fast nor attempted to fly in that strange of a position, and it was also an interesting way to learn that a broom did work underwater. Being underwater (very cold water at that), nearly drowning, being forced to eat something very unpleasant, finding Fleur's lifeless body, and waiting for it to be resuscitated was pure misery. That hadn't been the end of it either.

He'd had to wait around in the lake for hour, unable to figure out how to get rid of his gills and unable to explain to the professors, who were trying to figure out what do, how he had gotten them. He had been very scared he'd be stuck with them forever, but luckily they had faded away before anyone had gotten any extreme ideas about how to fix it. There had been an unpleasant amount of flashbulbs, pointing, and murmuring through the whole ordeal.

The moment he was able, he'd climbed out of the lake, chilled to the bone and Snape had dragged him off. To the dungeons. Where it's cold. He had to wait for nearly ten minutes as the man sorted through his potion stores, ranting at him for being a reckless idiot (of course Snape's word choice was considerably more clever and insulting) while he felt his toes and fingers go numb. At least the Pepper-up potion warmed him up, it was the other three he'd had to drink that were just plain nasty.

The caning had been as unpleasant as he remembered. Worse. He'd gotten twenty whacks this time. And then another nasty potion to alleviate the bruises.

"You really are hopeless," Snape had muttered afterwards, running a hand through his hair and looking frustrated. "What is it with you and damsels in distress?"

Harry, who was tired, sore, and rather angry, glared at him rather than argued. Anything that came out of his mouth at that point would only have gotten him a detention.

Now, rather than having lunch and then a much deserved nap, he had been summoned to the Dark Lord's office. He seriously hoped Voldemort wasn't as peeved at him as Snape was. He didn't think he could take another punishment on top of everything else.

There were a lot of people lingering in the halls once they exited the dungeons. Students turned to them, looking as if they wanted to rush forward, but the glare their much feared potions professor gave them was enough to keep most of them away. Which was good, because even if the anti-bruising potion had helped, his back was sore and his temper short. He didn't think he could stand people manhandling or bumping against or questioning him.

They had to pass the castle entryway to get to the Dark Lord's private tower, and a mob of reporters was waiting just on the other side of the open doors, a row of severe looking Sentinels the only thing blocking their entrance. Flashbulbs and shouted questions went ignored, as he resolutely refused to look in their direction.

"Mr. Potter, how did you manage to rescue Miss Delacour?!"

"Mr. Potter, what made you decide to chase after her?!"

"Are you having a secret affair with the Beauxbaton's champion?!" That one nearly did have him spinning around, and it wasn't to answer the question.

The students had thinned out the closer they got to their destination, until there was only one left. McGunny was leaning against a wall, presumably waiting for them. He didn't have his notepad with him, and when they passed he didn't attempt to ask Harry any questions.

But there was a look. A questioning, slightly pleading look.

Harry stopped walking for just a second.

"I'll talk to you later," he said, reluctantly, then hurried to catch up with Snape. It wasn't that he wanted to go through an interview, but of all the reporters Harry knew (aside from Hermione of course), McGunny was the only one he found tolerable. He was as nosy as everyone else, but at least he was polite about it.

They entered Voldemort's office and found the man standing near a window, a glass of wine in hand and looking smug. Lucius Malfoy occupied a chair, looking arrogant as ever. Both men smirked upon seeing Harry. The young Gryffindor felt simultaneous relief and unease. They obviously weren't mad at him, but that sort of pleased expression usually spelled trouble of a different kind.

"And here's the man... boy... of the hour," Malfoy chuckled, raising his own wine glass in salute.

"Please don't encourage him. It sends a mixed message," Snape grouched and found a chair of his own. As tired as he was, Harry didn't sit down. He remained by the exit, silently stating he wanted to leave.

"I hope you weren't too hard on him, Severus," Voldemort chided. "A little parental discipline is a grand thing, but his spirit is something to admire."

Snape looked blankly at the Dark Lord for a moment, then turned to toward Harry and glared. Harry glowered right back, barely refraining from sticking out his tongue. Snape turned back to his master.

"As you can see he's still as stupidly unaware of his own mortality as ever."

The Dark Lord chuckled. The mutual annoyance the two caused each other was something he had always found amusing, and the fact that they didn't seem capable of leaving each other alone made it all doubly so.

"I thought it best we discuss what has just happened and what it means for us. Harry, you in particular should be made aware of your new position."

"New position?" the boy asked skeptically. The Dark Lord's amusement was becoming increasingly apparent. He looked as if at any moment he'd burst out laughing.

"Of course. You didn't think such acts of heroism would go unnoticed, did you?"

Not unpunished anyway, Harry thought testily, unconsciously rubbing his back.

"You performed beautifully," Voldemort said, "It was really quite magnificent to watch. Everyone thought so. So fast. So agile. So very, very brave. Rushing in to save the fair maiden from the horrible monster and certain death, risking life and limb without hesitation. And you succeeded. A miracle in and of itself."

"Yeah, well, maybe if everyone had actually tried to help her, a miracle wouldn't have been necessary," Harry muttered. Malfoy and Snape both sent him a warning glare, but Voldemort ignored the accusation.

"I admit even I was starting to worry. You were underwater for quite some time. I didn't think your education had advanced to self-transfiguration."

"It hasn't. I didn't transform myself. Some merpeople helped me out. They gave me some sort of... plant, I think. It wore off after awhile."

"Gillyweed," Snape said, thoughtfully.

"You got merpeople to help you?" the Dark Lord said, looking surprised for once. "Why didn't they rescue Delacour themselves? They're perfectly capable."

"They tried, but a pack of grindylows got to her first and weren't letting them get close. I had to knock them away with some spells before I could get to her."

"This just gets better and better," Voldemort said, looking utterly delighted. "You have no idea what this is going to do for Britain, Harry. You've done this country a great service."

Harry looked away, embarrassed. He hadn't felt particularly brave, and certainly hadn't been thinking about Britain when he rescued Fleur. Frankly, he didn't see how this was suppose to help Britain at all.

"Can you just spell it out for me? I'm too tired to figure out your political games, right now."

Voldemort sighed, somewhat disappointed with Harry's lack of enthusiasm. He couldn't really blame the boy. As much as the Dark Lord intended to benefit from Harry's foolish selflessness, the boy himself wasn't going to get much out of this. Nothing that he really wanted anyway.

"You're a hero."

"Yes, I got that. And?"

"Don't get sassy."

Harry bit his tongue and looked down, knowing he'd reached the limit of bad attitude Voldemort would tolerate from him right now.

"A hero is a much loved thing," Voldemort continued once he'd received proper contrition, "By everyone. British, French, German. You risked your life saving a girl you barely know, and you did it with class."

"I barely bumbled through it! I didn't even really save her. Bill got her breathing again. I just recovered her body."

“And Mr. Weasley will receive appropriate praise for his efforts on Ms. Delacour's behalf, but it was you who actually put yourself at risk and allowed him to help her. By Monday, every paper in Europe will know what you did. They will know that a British wizard is capable of bravery, compassion, and honor. The Europeans will feel awe... and uncertainty. You will shake the very foundation of their belief that Britain is a monster and her people are just waiting to strike at them. They will become curious about what you and this country are truly like, and that curiosity will drive them to investigate, and the more they learn, the less they'll fear, and the less they fear the sooner we can open up relations, and remove these foolish embargo and travel restrictions.”

Harry didn't say anything, just looked at him with complete disbelief. Finally, he shook his head.

“No way. It can't be that simple. This tournament was supposed to do what you're saying, and now you're telling me I'm going to do it? There's no way that's going to happen.”

Voldemort smirked.

“You're right, it isn't that simple and the tournament is...will... improve relations between our countries, but your actions will augment that process. Besides, a tournament is just a competition and once it's over, its influence is very limited. A person, however... that's a different animal altogether.”

Harry just stood there for a moment, not knowing what to say or how to react. He couldn't fathom doing any of the things Voldemort was talking about. Help Britain make friends with Europe? That was the job of ambassadors and politicians, not fourteen year old school boys. Feeling overwhelmed, he stumbled to an available chair and fell into it. He looked to the other men in the room, looking for some form of reassurance that this was just a bad joke.

Voldemort looked ready to laugh, but it wasn't at Harry. It was a giddy sort of expression when things went his way on a project he was already excited about. Malfoy was smug as ever, but he was looking at Harry differently. A strangely possessive way that made Harry things he saw too rather than a person. Snape... refused to look at him. That was the most concerning thing he'd seen so far.

"I don't know what to do..." he said. "What do you want me to do? This is just... stupid."

Alright, 'stupid' wasn't the right word, but that's what he felt like at the moment.

"Do what you've always done. Keep them guessing," Voldemort said.

Harry didn't know what he meant and waited for an elaboration, which came from Malfoy.

"There isn't a lot known about you. The newspaper gleaned fascinating tidbits about you- your parents were originally rebels who fled to Germany, you can speak to snakes, you killed a monster, your future mother was killed by an insane terrorist... Even these things, no one knows the specifics of. You're a mystery people want to unravel. Now there's just a lot more people looking to do that."

"How does being mysterious help? Won't they get suspicious?"

"Only if you come off as intentionally hiding something. If you're going to avoid the press, use the excuse that you'd rather spend time with your friends or studying. Don't talk about anything unless someone asks you about it first. Give credit to other people when talking about your accomplishments. Humility is an excellent cover for secrecy."

Harry gave him a disbelieving look. "How would you know?"

Snape let out an amused snort. "Because even Lucius was gullible once."

Malfoy glared at his friend.

"Let's not get distracted," Voldemort interrupted before they started henpecking each other. "Lucius is correct. Humility is an excellent cover, and reduces suspicion. However, we must also promote you."

You are my protege. How you are perceived affects how I am perceived, good or bad, and I need all the positive regard I can get.”

“Promote me, how? How can I be humble and advertise myself at the same time?”

“You get invited to a lot of events with a lot of important people, and politely accept,” Snape said, looking tired at the prospect. As Potter's guardian, he knew he'd be dragged along.

“Just so,” Voldemort said. “You'll have time to practice this weekend. The Champions have all been invited to attend a dinner party in Hogsmeade on Sunday. I expect that you will be receiving an invitation.”

Harry let out a huff. Perhaps he should have just let Fleur drown? That immediately brought a surge of guilt. This wasn't Fleur's fault, and even if it had been she certainly didn't deserve death for inconveniencing him. Besides, maybe he could do some good. It wasn't like he didn't want peace between Britain and everyone else. If he could help, even a little, wasn't he duty bound to try?

Merlin, this was tiring.

He sighed and rubbed his eyes.

“Fine. Great. I'll do my best. Can I go? It's been a long day.”

Voldemort gestured towards the door. “You may go, but I want to speak with you tomorrow morning.”

“Yes, my Lord,” he agreed unenthusiastically and left. Malfoy glared at the door, then turned to Snape.

“He's awfully uppity for a pawn,” he said, clearly annoyed. He risked a glance at the Dark Lord. “You're rather lenient on him, my Lord.”

Voldemort smirked cruelly. “Why Lucius, are you suggesting I've gone soft?”

Malfoy quickly looked away. "No, absolutely not. I'm curious. I just assume there is a purpose behind your tolerance."

A quick save.

"You are right of course, there is a reason, but you won't like it."

"My Lord?"

"He deserves to be a bit uppity. You underestimate his importance, my friend. He's a knight, not a pawn, and my tolerance is born of appreciation. Unlike you, he doesn't actually get paid to serve me."

"My Lord, I-"

"Don't, Lucius. I'm not criticizing you. You've earned everything I've given you. I am merely answering your question."

"... Thank you, my Lord."

"You both may go. I have to discuss the serious lack of adequate safety officials during today's match with the tournament coordinator," he said darkly, his previous good humor evaporating. Both Death Eaters bowed and left, passing a very nervous man in the hall, who they suspected they would never see again. More than likely, nor would anyone else.

Malfoy clearly wasn't happy with being rebuked, however gently, and scowled fiercely.

"Do you think he deserves it, Severus?" he sneered. Snape watched him stoically from the corner of his eye.

"You're starting to sound like a jealous wife, Lucius. I suggest you stop now. It's tacky."

"Just answer the damn question."

"... Yes."

Malfoy looked clearly surprised by the answer, though Snape didn't know why. "Merlin, he's infected the both of you."

Potter Pox, flitted through Snape's mind, making the other man's words more funny than insulting. Symptoms include; headaches, insomnia, violent mood swings, and the urge to strangle Gryffindors.

"I didn't say I liked him, only that he deserved some leniency. He's given more of himself in the last four years than you will ever have to give in your entire life. He's reckless, ill-mannered, troublesome, and sometimes right out dumb, but he's earned everything he's been given. The Dark Lord isn't wrong about that."

oo
oo

"I still say we're wasting opportunities here," Oblitz insisted. "If those BUGs can be used for spying, they definitely could have been used for something...more."

Schwartzmann gave him a bored look. Both men had sequestered themselves in the ambassador's temporary home, waiting out the horde of reporters that were lingering after the event. They'd been quarreling over whether the mission should extend beyond surveillance and into sabotage and assassination. Schwartzmann was getting very tired of repeating himself.

"Mr. Oblitz, as I've said before, it is not in Germany's intention to start a war, only to be prepared for it. Murdering Court officials and teachers at a school sporting event is hardly going to endear us to our allied nations. We received enough flack for what happened with Moody, and that wasn't even our doing."

"We don't need their help to defeat the Dark Lord."

"Spoken like a true warmonger. Believe me, the Minister knows exactly what our country's capabilities are, and if he doesn't want to fight against Voldemort's forces alone, there's a very good reason for it."

“Pft. You sound like Krum. The whole God damn country is filled with a bunch of pansies. Pansy champion, pansy minister, pansy ambassador. Fuck, fine, let the Snake destroy you. Deserve what you get, you cowards. Won't even handle Potter, and he's the most vulnerable and dangerous of the lot of them. Only Voldemort deserves it more.”

Schwartzmann rolled his eyes. Oblitz was a soldier before he was a teacher, and unfortunately he gave a bad name to the entire profession.

“You're an idiot. Potter deserves our pity, not our condemnation. God only knows what that monster has done to him already. If it's half as bad as I suspect, and these BUGs manage to prove it, I'll personally grant him sanctuary in Germany.”

Oblitz sneered but said nothing more. He wasn't going to get what he wanted yet, but when the Death Eaters came pounding at Germany's door, they'd be sorry. They'd all be sorry.

And he'd be right.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Fleur was escorted to the dormitory in Hogsmeade by Professor Flitwick. She would have preferred to have gone with Madam Maxime, but with so many reporters around they'd both decided someone more discreet would be needed. He was also more familiar with the castle, and the best ways to sneak in and out of it. They waited until dark, when most of the reporters were gone and night hid their movements. There was a boat house built into the castle that lead straight out onto the lake, and while the inky black water made her distinctly uneasy, she was pleased to find she wasn't as scared as she thought she'd be.

This was the sort of adventure she remembered from Paris, sneaking out after hours for a secret rendezvous or just to explore the mysteries of the city, but what a interesting new twist! Far from home, surrounded not by city, but forests and lakes and mountains to meet the man who had saved her life with the aid of a dwarf (part goblin? Gnome?), and risk of discovery held the potential for international scandal!

Flitwick, noticing her barely repressed excitement, smiled.

“You know, you could have just invited Bill to the castle in the morning, and talked to Harry first. You've had a difficult day as it is.”

She smiled back him and shook her head. “It would be rude to make my rescuer come to me after all he has done. I must go to him and thank him in person, without the press turning it into an interrogation.”

“And did you already talk to Harry?”

She shook her head ruefully. “I went to Gryffindor Tower to speak with him, but his friends said he was very tired and was sleeping. I'll talk to him tomorrow.”

They pulled the boat up to the shore, Hogsmeade only few hundred feet away, lanterns hanging in the doorways of the shops and houses. She pulled up the cloak of her hood, and followed Flitwick to the east end of the village where a dormitory had been erected to house the tournament's work crews and engineers. There was a sign on the door reading 'Residents Only; No Journalists Allowed'.

“That's new,” Flitwick remarked, before opening the door. At the check-in counter, a very bored receptionist looked up from his crossword, looking ready to shout at them but the words died on his lips. Flitwick smiled congenially, summoning a stool out of the air so he could look over the counter. “Good evening, sir. Would Mr. Weasley be in, per chance?”

The receptionist eyed them both suspiciously.

“Who wants to know?”

Fleur pulled back the hood of her cloak and looked down imperiously at him. There was a spark of recognition in the man's eyes.

“Oh... sorry. Thought you might be reporters. They been bothering Billy-boy all day. I'll get him for you.”

He scribbled a note and tossed it up in the air, where it folded itself into a paper plan and flew up a flight of stairs and down a hallway. A moment later, the eldest Weasley son appeared. It was strange feeling that came over Fleur. Logically, she knew he had saved her life and she should feel extremely grateful for that, but her last memory of him was from before then and the silly squabble she had admittedly started.

He paused on the stairs when he saw her, and smiled just a bit.

“Miss Delacour, I didn't expect you to be up and about so soon. I'd have thought Madam Pomfrey would have kept you strapped to the bed for three days, at least,” he said.

She smiled a bit at that. He was right, the medi-witch had been very reluctant to let her go, and it took a lot of crocodile tears and pleading to spend the night among her friends to convince her.

“It's best not to underestimate a Beauxbaton's champion,” she said.

“I believe that. Are all French witches this stubborn?”

“What do you think?” she challenged.

His expression turned sober.

“I think it would take a lot of stubbornness to claw your way out of a grave as deep as you were in. I'm sorry.”

“Sorry? For what? You saved my life.”

He shook his head. “We should have been prepared. I should have been more prepared. It was an obvious danger that someone could get knocked off their broom and into the lake, but no one was prepared to pull you out. We should have had men in the water already or attached tracking devices to all the champions or portkeys that we could activate if things went wrong. Merlin, we were so-”

She closed the distance between them, and placed her finger over his lips.

“Shhh... It's not your fault. I am here now because of what you did do, not because of what you didn't. Thank you for being there.”

He blinked at her, then suddenly turned red around the ears. He rubbed the back of his head, looking at his shoes in such a boyish way, Fleur wondered what she'd done to fluster the confident man so.

“Er... you're welcome. I'm just glad I could help.”

She sighed forlornly. “This really seems a feeble way to thank someone, now that I'm here. Would you like to have lunch with me tomorrow? My treat.”

He blinked in surprise. “I... yeah, I'd like that, but... won't you get in trouble?”

“Don't worry, tomorrow is a Hogsmeade weekend.”

“That's not what I... oh, forget it. Yes, I'd love to. Madame Puddifoot's, then? If you come at eleven, we can beat the crowds.”

“It's a date,” she agreed, pulled up the hood of her cloak and headed towards the door where Flitwick was pretending not to linger. She turned back to him at the entryway. He was looking bemused, and still just a tad bit pink in the ears. His little boy smile was so endearing, she couldn't help but add, “And Bill, it's Fleur to you.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

McGunny left a note with Granger to give to Potter. He didn't want to get pushy, but he really wanted to talk to him as soon as possible. His Sunday deadline was only part of the reason, but the only one he left with Granger. She'd promised to give it to Harry, but not until he was awake, which probably wasn't going to be until morning.

She was right. He didn't receive a reply to his request until half past nine the next day.

He went to the dueling hall and found the boy just where he said he would be, eating breakfast on the stairs of the dueling platform. It didn't surprise McGunny that the kid was avoiding the Great Hall. It seemed his standard practice to avoid crowds for a few days after an event, and this was a significant one. Few people actually got to see a hero in action, and though McGunny had heard of and guessed at several of his exploits, even he had been left breathless seeing it in real life.

It was strange to see Potter doing something as menial as buttering toast after yesterday.

"Are you hungry?" the Gryffindor asked politely, when he saw him. "I can get the house elves to get you something."

"No, thank you. I've already eaten."

"Sorry I didn't get back to you sooner. Hermione said you were kind of in a rush because of the next issue."

"It's fine. You have to take care of yourself first, and my life is hardly in the balance."

"Mmm..." Potter took a bite of his toast and chewed in thoughtfully. McGunny was eager for answers, but push him. While the younger boy ate, he pulled out a notepad and self inking quill, trying to make it as casual as possible. He wanted the silences between them to be comfortable. It was important for what he wanted to ask of him.

"How do you feel?" he asked at last, a simple question to get things going. Potter shrugged.

"I feel like I normally do. Kind of disappointed that my weekend with my friends isn't going to work out like I hoped, but it's not a big deal. I heard Delacour is doing well, so I'm happy about that."

"What made you decide to rescue her in the first place?"

Potter gave him an embarrassed look. "When she slipped under the water... I just knew no one was going to get to her in time. I figured... I didn't figure anything. I just did it. Looking back on it, I think it was just impatience. The safeties had already taken too long. Bill could have gotten her, but his boat could only go so fast, so I just rushed in without thinking." Potter sighed and drank some of his juice, thinking about what he was going to say. "It was stupid and reckless, what I did, but it worked out. Barely. I could have drowned too. I nearly did."

They talked for nearly an hour about what the first challenge and his views on what had happened. With every word, McGunny felt his admiration for the boy grow, not only for what he had done but for his complete lack of pretentiousness. Potter clearly hadn't expected to succeed in saving Delacour, but he had kept trying on the very slim chance that he could. He had done something, because doing nothing hadn't been an option, and in the end he readily admitted that he played just one part in the girl's rescue. The merpeople and Bill Weasley were given more attention and praise than his own, fumbled efforts.

"After you got out of the lake, Professor Snape took you down into the dungeons. Why?"

Potter looked embarrassed here. "Made me drink a bunch of nasty potions, and lectured me for putting myself in danger. Professor McGonagall was worse. She made me write down twenty reasons why what I did was a bad idea before she let me go to bed... then posted them on the Common Room bulletin board. Merlin, she knows how to make you feel bad about something. Professor Snape can make you feel bad about nothing, but then you just sort of forget about it after ten minutes, but not her... and you're not going to print that part are you?"

McGunny smirked. "What will you give me if I don't?"

The panicked look Potter had made him burst out laughing. "I'm kidding! You can trust anything you say to me in confidence will remain between us."

Potter sighed. "Thanks. I appreciate that. I know a lot of reporters who... well, you know."

Here was McGunny's chance, the opening he had been waiting for. He took a deep breath.

"Yes, I understand why you would be hesitant to trust them, and I appreciate you putting as much faith in me as you have. I've always wanted to be a biographer more than a journalist, and trust is a lot more important to me than it is a lot of my colleagues."

Potter looked at him curiously.

"A biographer? Really? So you're going to go around and ask important people about their lives, and write books about them? How do you know when a person's life is interesting enough to write a book about?"

"Most people's lives are interesting enough to write books about," he explained. "Everyone has interesting moments in their lives. Good things and bad things and strange things happen all the time. The nice thing about books is you can edit all the boring stuff that happens in between. You don't have to be important to have a story worth sharing with others. Some of the best biographies out there are about normal people trying to get by in abnormal situations. With everything that's happened over the last decade, and everything that's happening now... I think there's going to be a lot of stories that need to be told. People are going to need to hear about others in situations as bad as them, and know that they can survive and get over it. That's the point of biographies, you know. It's not just about telling a person's story, it's about sharing an experience. Nothing inspires people more than a true story."

Potter didn't say anything for a long time, just watching him with those piercing green eyes. He looked like he wanted to believe him, so McGunny continued.

"You know... your story could do that."

The Gryffindor started. "My story?"

"Yes. Your story. You've had a lot of experiences I think people could benefit from hearing about."

Shaking his head, Potter said, "That probably isn't a good idea."

"Think about it," McGunny insisted, "There are a lot of people out there who need to believe that their lot in life can change for the better. Kids who are muggleborns or orphans or just don't see any future for themselves. Adults who need to remember how to be adventurous, curious, and compassionate. You came out of nowhere, and look at everything you've managed to accomplish. You could inspire a lot of people."

"Are you asking to write my story?" the Gryffindor asked, his expression disbelieving.

"I..." McGunny hesitated. He didn't want to throw out the idea until he was certain he had Potter sold on it, but he had caught on too quickly and there was no turning back now. "Yes... I wanted to ask you if I could... if you would... tell me your story. Can I be your biographer?"

Potter got up, shaking his head. "No, I'm sorry. I can't do that."

He panicked as he saw the younger boy starting to leave, and got up to chase after him.

"I know I haven't even graduated yet, but I know I could do this. I've sent in some of my articles to universities and newspapers and they've all said I did great work. I-"

The young boy turned back to him, his expression apologetic.

"It's not that. It's not personal. I think you're a great journalist and that you'll be an even better biographer, but I can't tell you everything you want to know... need to know. Too much of what I do involves the Dark Lord, and that's not something that I can or will share with the public. For your own sake, it's better you don't know."

McGunny stood there, sick with disappointment. Potter had turned him away. His reasons were honorable, but it still made him feel ill and somewhat betrayed. Hadn't he proven he could be trusted? Hadn't he shown he was on his side?

He couldn't give up. Not yet.

"Wait!"

Potter stopped at the door, looking back at him. "I'm not going to change my mind."

Not yet, McGunny mentally agreed, but eventually.

"It isn't about that. There's something I overheard, and wanted to warn you about."

Reluctant curiosity slipped across the Gryffindor's face, before it was ruthlessly suppressed. The Ravenclaw fought back a grin.

"Shouldn't you tell a teacher about it then?"

"It's not anything specific enough to report. Not really. I just overheard an argument between Oblitz and Krum a few days ago." Not true, but mentioning Weasley shot his credibility to hell and he did feel what the guy had told him something worth knowing. "We both know Oblitz has it out for you-"

"How did you-"

"I'm good at what I do, Potter. Very good. Krum... I think he'd be just as bad if it weren't for Granger. He's given you the benefit of the doubt because of her, and I think Oblitz got into an argument with him about it. You should probably try to keep some distance from the Durmstang group, if you can. I'm keeping an eye on them, but I don't know if they're up to something yet or not."

Potter nodded, clearly disturbed by the possibility that something might be going on, especially with Hermione's not-boyfriend.

"Thanks... I'll be careful, but I don't think..."

McGunny gave him a reassuring smile. It wouldn't do to freak the kid out. It would back fire on him fantastically if it turned out Oblitz had been pissed off at Krum for a lousy essay.

"You're probably right. Like I said, I'm just going to keep an eye on them. I'll keep you updated if I find out anything. You're their student liaison. It's only right."

"Yeah... thanks... I'm sorry, I couldn't give you what you wanted..."

"It's alright. I understand," he said casually, as if his plans for the year hadn't just been completely derailed. "You know where to find me if you change your mind."

The boy nodded, a bit more uncertain than he had been before, and finally left. McGunny let his smile drop. Things were not going well. He needed to do something to gain Potter's trust, and perhaps find a new approach to the biography business. Clearly, the boy didn't feel he could tell his story without putting them both in danger, so if McGunny wanted his story he was going have to assure him that it was going to be written in complete confidentiality and then find some sort of motivation for Potter to tell a story nobody else would ever hear (at least not until after they were both dead and therefore relatively safe).

Trust first though. Motivations and enticements could come later. Right now he needed to build a relationship of trust between them. They had the beginnings of a friendship, but with little in common and their difference in ages, it would be difficult to maintain a friendship without regular contact of some form. This was where Oblitz would come in handy. There was something clearly wrong with the man (and having read his file, a veritable manual on urban warfare, he could make a pretty good guess on what it was), and he had his sights set on Harry, which provided McGunny the excuse he needed to keep up regular contact. If he should actually happen to find something on the man, that was even better.

He'd have protected Potter (and possibly several other people on the off chance that there was a conspiracy going on), and if he was very lucky, he could convince him to give him the story as a personal favor.

If he was very, very, very lucky.

Book IV:

Chapter 11: Advisors

Harry had plans to meet his friends in Hogsmeade for lunch, but he had to swing by the Dark Lord's office first, like he said he would. He took a circuitous route to the man's private tower to avoid the other students, and was almost successful.

Almost.

He climbed out of a secret passageway hidden behind a tapestry and found himself face to face with Fleur Delacour sitting on a bench, waiting for him.

"I came by Gryffindor Tower earlier," she explained, "But your friends zed you 'ad already left."

"Oh... how did you know I'd be here?"

"You weren't in ze Great Hall for breakfast, zo when I azt Natalie, she zed you were probably 'aving breakfast with Lord Voldemort. I admit, I zought you would be coming from the other direction."

He smiled a bit. She smiled back. They had no idea what to say to each other.

"How are you feeling?" he tried, though she looked as beautiful as ever. In fact, she looked even better that she had. Before, she had seemed rather depressed and mopey, but today she practically glowing.

"I feel good. 'Ow about you? I heard you were stuck in ze lake for an 'our."

He shrugged. "Fine. Snape made be drink a bunch of potions so I wouldn't get sick. Can't have the hero sneezing into the camera lens. It sort of ruins the affect."

Her gaze dropped, and he realized how insensitive that was. It wasn't her fault his weekend was shot to hell. Not really.

"I'm sorry, that didn't come out how I meant."

She shook her head. "It is alright. It wasn't much fun for me either. I just wanted you to know, I appreciate what you did for me. I don't remember ze rescue myzself, but Madam Maxime zed you zaved my life."

Now he ducked his head, shyly. "Not really. I found you, but Bill got you breathing."

"Such a modest chevalier," she said, and leaned forward, kissing him on the cheek. He felt his ears burn, but it still felt... nice. Up close her skin was perfect, her touch soft, her scent was that of lilacs and lavender. "Zank you, 'Arry. I promise I'll find a way of repaying you zomeday."

"You don't have to," he said, still not quite able to look at her directly. Everyone had told him how beautiful she was, but he'd honestly been too busy to notice until now. She tapped him on the nose with her finger, cause him to look at her instinctively. Her smile was playful.

"It is a matter of 'onor. As one chevalier to another, you should understand."

He did. Honor was about behaving in a way that would allow you to respect yourself. At least, that was how Sirius and Remus had described it, and since he respected them, he trusted their judgment on the matter. In this case, that meant repaying those who had done right by you. He nodded.

She turned to go. "Ave fun with your friends, 'Arry."

"See you later, Fleur."

They shared a knowing smile, turned away from each other, and walked in opposite directions.

Harry let out a huff. "Sorry. I don't mean to take it out on you... well, maybe I do. You seem to be benefiting from my ruined weekend, so yes, that is kind of annoying."

The Dark Lord had the audacity to grin at that. "As long as you can curb the sarcasm tomorrow evening, I suppose I'll let it slide. We'll be seeing each other regularly this year, and I'd rather keep things pleasant."

Feeling silly for being such a grouch, the Gryffindor nodded in agreement. There wasn't any point to starting fights with the Dark Lord. The man was his guide through this political mire, and as long as he had his back, Harry knew he could get through it relatively unscathed. As long as no one tried to kill him, of course.

"You're right. Sorry."

Voldemort made a dismissive gesture and walked over to one of his bookcases. "I have something for you. I meant to give it to you yesterday, but it didn't seem appropriate after what had happened."

He pulled a medium sized tome from his collection, and handed it to his protégé. Harry studied it curiously. It was very old, with dark brown leather, and bronze fixtures turned black with age. There was no title on the book, but a abstract rendering of a very pregnant, naked woman was set in bronze on the cover. He ran his fingers over the image. It tingled with magic.

"Is that the Earth Goddess?" he asked, sensing the truth.

"One of her more popular representations, yes. This is The Book of a Thousand Gods. It holds the names and descriptions of exactly one thousand of the most powerful of the pagan gods in Britain, including Ireland and Iceland. At least the most powerful ones there were twelve hundred years ago."

Harry gave him a horrified look. "Don't tell me you expect me to learn all of them."

Voldemort burst out laughing. "Of course not. You're old enough to start thinking about what deities you are going to pay homage to. Gods whose knowledge and skills you desire, whose ideals you respect, and whose protection is the strongest. Skim through each deity. If you find one that interests you, write down their name, and I will try to find more materials on them for you."

It was difficult to know how to feel about the book. On one hand, it was going to play an important role in his life as a pagan, perhaps determining the path his magic would follow. On the other hand, it was a reminder that he didn't have the option of turning away from his current path. From what he had learned from Teacher Brennan and what Voldemort had implied, he was going to need some divine help if he didn't want to wake up one day to find an evil spirit feasting on his liver.

"Thanks."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Viktor walked through Hogsmeade under a Notice-Me-Not charm, sticking to back alleys when he could. If anyone had actually noticed him, he would have said he was avoiding the reporters stalking the town, but truthfully he would have cast the spell on himself even if the reporters weren't there.

He needed to talk to Dumbledore, and he needed to do it alone.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Tom circled the village like a buzzard, keeping track of his prey's every movement. Even under the anti-surveillance charm, he could follow the boy's movements easily. He wasn't going to let him get away.

It had taken him a while to make his decision, but Oblitz's little act of subterfuge had cinched it. The Germans were on the offense, and that meant the situation at Hogwarts had become a lot more dangerous and unpredictable than he had originally thought. Opportunity was the bastard child of chaos, and he was feeling paternal.

If Durmstang was planning an attack, he wanted to be a part of it, and assure that his own goals were realized in the process. The first goal being to kill Voldemort and the second to secure Harry. Krum was perfectly positioned for both of these goals. Krum was a part of the German's plans, he was certain of that. If he managed to kill Voldemort, who was going to reprimand him? And when that dragon was finally woken, he was going to take Harry and escape to Germany. It wouldn't be hard to find an excuse.

Once in Europe, he would hunt down those most likely to oppose him, and kill them before they realized what he was doing. Dumbledore would be the first on his list, but he could think of at least a dozen others who would soon follow. Then he would use Krum's celebrity status as a means to gain supporters, and eventually take back Britain.

Harry would be safely tucked away in Durmstang or Beauxbatons for another three years, which gave Tom some time to figure out what to do with him. He was a clever boy with growing potential that he had no intention of hindering.

If he somehow missed his chance to kill the Dark Lord before leaving, well, he knew his secrets. He'd find a means to destroy him eventually, and if he couldn't do that from Europe he would simply abandon Viktor's body and find another in Britain.

His options were almost limitless.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

McGunny went down to Hogsmeade to sulk. He told his few staff members back at the castle that he wanted to get some interviews from the students about the tournament, but he didn't actually talk to anyone. Potter wasn't being cooperative, and he was admittedly depressed.

He needed somewhere to think, and gather his thoughts. Going somewhere new usually helped to inspire him, and as changed as Hogsmeade was this year, it qualified.

And inspiration came, by mere happenstance, by a door opening out of the corner of his eye just as he passed an alley. The door itself was not particularly interesting, looking as drab as most side doors did with trash bins and empty pallets lining either side of it, and he would have over looked it even being opened if it weren't for the sound of a glass bottle falling over and shattering drawing his attention. He pulled back behind a wall on instinct, and felt silly for it. He peeked back down the alley, hoping no one had seen his skittishness, and it looked empty of people at first glance.

But the door was open, and it was a cool day, and that just struck McGunny as kind of odd. He stared expectantly at the opening, thinking someone was going to step out, but after a few second of concentration he became aware that Viktor Krum was standing in plain sight.

Notice-Me-Not, McGunny realized, and was instantly intrigued. Now why would you need that particular charm, I wonder?

The Durmstang Champion made a quick look around to see if anyone had noticed him, but seeing no one, quickly ducked inside. McGunny made his own brief scan of the area, and followed after him.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Tom mentally cursed when he spotted the school newspaper editor. The alleyway would have been the perfect place to strike, but he couldn't afford witnesses. Particularly, not busybody reporters. At the same time, he couldn't allow McGunny to uncover anything suspicious Krum might be doing and blow the boy's cover. There were still some things that needed to be done before Tom was ready to leave the country.

So when McGunny opened the door to follow Krum, Tom dove in after him, smashing the boy in the back and knocking him down the stairs. The Silencing Charm the Ravenclaw had cast to cover his entry, worked in Tom's favor, muting the slamming of the door behind them and the crash of McGunny's fall. The boy lay in a heap at the bottom of the stairs, and did not move.

Tom fluttered awkwardly in place for a moment, then landed beside him to see if he was alive. McGunny stilled breathed, but was unconscious, which was ever so convenient. A missing person would rouse just as much suspicion as a person with a story.

But now he couldn't turn back. He had to find Krum and take possession of his body before he found McGunny and panicked or McGunny woke up and ran to tell the nearest Sentinel what had happened.

He rotated his head, surveying the situation he had gotten himself into. A single light bulb illuminated the stairs, and gradually faded off into the surround gloom. They were in a large cellar, rows upon rows of shelves stacked with canned and jarred goods, dusty mason jars, boxes of nails, old toys, and empty baskets and layers of dust on the ground. Krum was nowhere in sight.

With a powerful flap of his wings, he took flight, breaking free of the magical silence and moving towards the other end of the cellar. He dropped onto the top corner of a shelf. There was yet another door, cracked open just a bit. A sign was hung on the door, reading 'Furnace', and a warm glow and heat emanating out of it seemed to correspond with that statement.

From inside, Tom could hear voices.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"I'm sorry," Viktor said, staring into the furnace. It was a monstrously large thing, with an ugly leer, and the tendency to belch fire at him if he got too close. The entire room was boiling hot, and he was already starting to sweat. "I just needed to talk to someone. I needed to regain my perspective."

From within the furnace's mouth, the pile of coals and embers glowed, forming a kindly face that you would have missed completely unless you were looking directly at it.

"It's quite alright, Viktor. I'm happy to hear from you, whatever the reason. How is Hogwarts treating you? Have you been learning any interesting things?" the elderly wizard asked conversationally. The boy nearly rolled his eyes, but settled for a snort.

"Hn. I guess you could say dat. I tink I'm learning too many dings, about dis place and dese people, and I don't know vat to do about it. I'm scared for dem. I feel like I'm dragging dem into a var dey don't deserve."

"Few people deserve war," Dumbledore said, "And I don't wish it even on those who do, but a battle is coming. One way or another, Voldemort will find a way, and I pity our enemies as much as our allies when that day comes, but for everyone's sake we cannot fail. We failed in the first war against him, and if we fail a second time there will be suffering on a level the world has never seen."

Viktor shook his head. "But dat isn't vat I see here," he said, his voice filled with despair. "I don't see suffering like you're talking about. Everyone here is looking forward to der future, and dat future doesn't factor in var. They just vant to be vith derr families, go to college, get jobs, fall in love. If everything is as bad as you say, vy isn't everyone here miserable?"

"Aahh..." Dumbledore said, his expression understanding. "You think because you haven't seen it, that it isn't there? That is didn't happen? You know better. You've met refugees before, you've heard their stories. Those children at your school are not cruel, but they are sheltered. Their magical ability has marked them as the elite of Voldemort's society, and they are coddled and protected and nurtured so that they, the most powerful and educated, may re-enforce the regime that they associate with the happiness of their youth. Their good intentions, the preservation of a way of life they've become accustomed to, will be the downfall of hundreds, maybe thousands of others.”

Viktor said nothing, feeling the truth of the elder wizards words. It was true. He had volunteered in the refugee camps, the ghettos, the slums where witches and wizards had fled with only their clothes on their back to escape death or worse to foreign countries unprepared to shelter them. He'd seen the cripples, the widows and orphans, the lone survivors, and each had their tale to tell. Tales of horror, murder, rape, torture, casual cruelty, and desperation. He had seen grown men weep, children curse the world, and women stripped of their kindness and trust.

And those were the survivors, if they could be called that.

He couldn't forget about them. Not now, not when he could help prevent Voldemort's sickness from spreading.

“I am not asking you to hate them,” Dumbledore continued, “Though it will cause you much pain, an open heart is a blessing and I hope you can hold on to that till your dying day. I just want you to remember, what you see is not always truth, and what is truth is not always seen.”

Viktor nodded.

“Yes, I tink I understand. Dank you.”

“You are quite welcome, my boy. Now, tell me how the challenge went? I heard you won. Congratulations!”

The Durmstang Champion smiled just a bit and shook his head.

“Barely. I tink Delacour might have beaten me if it weren't for da accident. Did dey tell you about dat?”

“Yes, I have received extensive reports about what happened with the squid. I hope she is alright?”

“She seemed fine dis morning. She vas lucky Potter vas dere. He saved her life, but just barely.”

“Yes, quite fortunate. I trust Potter got through it no worse for wear?”

“Dere vas some complication in actually getting him out of da lake, but he seems fine. I haven't seen or heard from him since den, though. Da kid is crazy. Brave, but crazy. I'm starting to believe some of da stories I've heard about him.”

“Well, wouldn't that be something?” the old wizard chuckled.

“It vould certainly make for interesting conversa-”

There was a shift of air, the barest brush of cool air against his sweaty neck. Viktor ducked instinctively, his wand practically jumping into his hand, and rolled to the side. Something large flew over his head, and he rolled again.

“Stupify!”

The spell struck true, and there was panicked screech and flurry of feathers, before his target collapsed to the floor weakly. Viktor cast a Lighting Charm to get a better look at what he had hit.

“Viktor? Viktor? Are you all right?” Dumbledore called from the furnace.

“I'm fine. It vas just an owl.”

“An owl, you say? Is anyone else there?”

Viktor peeked outside the furnace room, but saw no one and heard nothing. He cast a quick charm to light the room, but there was still no one in sight. He stepped back inside.

“No, I tink it vas just da bird. It must have been hunting mice down here.”

“Did you see it when you came in?”

"No, I... wait... I think I've seen this owl before."

"Where? Does it belong to someone at the school?"

"I don't know. I don't think so. But I'm pretty sure I've seen it once before, outside the DA&D classroom."

The silence that followed left Viktor increasingly uneasy. Was this owl one that Dumbledore recognized? Some sort of spy or guardian?

"... I want you send it to me," Dumbledore said at last.

"What are you thinking?"

"I doubt it's anything, but we can't afford to be careless. I'll check it over. It should only take a day. Come back tomorrow night, after the dinner. Until then, be extra alert."

"Yes, sir. I'm sending it now."

Viktor pulled a small silver star from his pocket, and placed it on the owl's chest. The bird continued to lay sprawled on the ground, taloned feet groping futilely at the air. He tapped the star with his wand.

"Porticulus."

There was another panicky screech, cut off mid way through as the owl was portkeyed away to Dumbledore's waiting hands. Viktor swept the cellar for any surveillance spells or evidence that someone unauthorized had been down there, but found nothing.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Ron glowered across Madame Pudfoot's at his brother and Fleur laughing over a meal they had barely touched, and wanting to punch one of them. He wasn't entirely sure which one.

“Will you stop that?” Ginny begged, looking mortified. “You’re going to creep people out if you don’t stop watching them like some sort of stalker.”

He turned his glare on her, but she just smiled, completely immune.

“Much better. Hurry up, and eat your ice cream. We can’t be late or we’ll miss the Floo to Madam Malkin’s.”

“Merlin, you’re a nag,” he muttered. “As if I’m going to that hag’s shop and watching you turn Potter into a queer.”

“Dressing in nice clothes does not make someone queer!” Ginny said indignantly.

“Don’t mind him,” Draco said, sounding bored. “Something got his knickers in a twist. Jealous your brother got the girl?”

“Bloody hell, no! It’s disgusting what they’re doing. Contorting together like they’re best friends. Fuck, it makes me sick.”

Hermione gave him a shriveling stare. “I think you mean ‘cavorting’, and what are babbling about? I think they’re cute.”

“You would.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“Well, it’s not like you’re any better. Ever since Viktor showed up, you’ve turned into such a-”

“If you value your life, I would be very careful how you end that sentence,” Harry snapped. “Why shouldn’t we get along with them? They’re foreigners, not lepers.”

“What the hell do leopards have to do with this, Potter? And it’s nothing to do with them being foreigners. They’re competition! Did you forget that in the middle of your hero routine? And you know what? Right now, Delacour is buttering up my stupid brother so she can pump him for information. Just watch, next challenge she’s going to blow everyone else out of the water, and all because she bats her eyes at him and turns his brains to mush.”

There were several eye rolls around the table. “God, Ron,” Clyde said, pointing his spoon at him accusingly, “She’s just thanking Bill for saving her. If she weren’t, then you’d be calling her an ungrateful so-and-so. You’re just being nasty to be nasty.”

But Ron wouldn’t be deterred.

“If she were just being grateful, then why the hell isn’t she over here laughing at Potter’s stupid jokes? He did more than Bill, but she hasn’t even looked this way.”

“Oh, she already thanked me,” Harry said absently. “I got a kiss too.”

Everyone turned to him, eyes wide. “On the cheek! It was just on the cheek,” he promised, a little weirded out. It wasn’t like she’d promised to have his babies or anything.

“Forget it,” Ron snarled, and got up. “You’re all completely missing the point. I can’t talk to you when you’re all being this thick.”

He stormed off, leaving everyone else exasperated or annoyed.

“Well, honestly,” Hermione said, “What is his problem? Why did he come if he just wanted to gripe at us?”

“Because gripping to himself would label him a loon?” Harry offered.

“No,” Ginny sighed, “He just wanted free ice cream. You do realize he left without paying, don’t you?”

“Oh, he’s going to be paying for it,” Draco said, clearly annoyed. He’d have to foot the bill after all, since he’d been the one to invite the little ingrate. “Out of his hide when I catch up to him.”

At least the conversation turned more pleasant after that. They caught up on what everyone had been doing in the last month, gossiped about what other people were doing, and what they all hoped to be doing. There wasn't much talk about what Harry had done the day before, for which he was grateful. After being scolded by Snape, McGonagal, and Hermione, he was sick of discussing it. The few times it was mentioned was in reference to the dinner party and his appointment at Madam Malkin's, which everyone agreed they should accompany him to.

He had originally invited Ginny as his 'fashion consultant', who had been utterly delighted and asked to bring her new French friend, Aimee Anatole. This in turned had resulted in Clyde inviting himself, saying they'd put Harry in a dress if someone wasn't there keep them in check. Hermione asked to come along simply because she didn't feel like wandering Hogsmeade alone, and Draco naturally decided to follow her. They'd all gone to get sweets before heading out, and somehow Ron had ended up there as well. Harry still wasn't sure how.

Ginny's friend, Aimee, a fourth year, was a petite little pixie, but carried herself like she was the biggest, most important person in the room. She greeted Ginny with a hug and a kiss to both cheeks, and even kissed Clyde's cheek when he teasingly asked for one too. Gushing over Harry like he was a puppy, she pushed him inside and hurried him towards the floo.

“Urry! Urry! We 'ave much to do!” she crooned. “Ginerva and I 'ave been waiting for zis chance, and we will not let it pass!”

Harry managed a surprised look at Ginny, who blinked at him innocently as if she had no idea what the other girl was talking about. They squeezed pass the other patrons, Harry smiling awkwardly as complete strangers patted him on the back and raised their drinks to him and shouted things at him like 'to a real bone fide hero' or 'way to go, Potter!' A Sentinel met them at the floo, gave Harry's friends an annoyed look, but let them through at his request.

The shop was empty but for another Sentinel, a tailor, and Madam Malkin herself.

“Welcome back, Mr. Potter!” the woman greeted enthusiastically, coming forward to shake his hand. “It is so good-”

Aimee was too impatient for formalities, however, and wasted no more time. Taking Ginny in one hand, Madam Malkin in another, she took them aside. She pulled out a little book from her robe pocket, enlarged it, and opened it to show the shop matron.

“We were thinking something like this. Clean lines and sharp angles, just a little bit of color, but nothing garish. Simple and classy, with a modern twist,” Aimee said, pointing at the book.

Madam Malkin blinked at the girl, caught off guard by her authoritative behavior. She turned to Harry for some clue as to who or what she was. Harry gave her a sympathetic smile.

“Miss Anatole and Miss Weasley are my fashion advisors. I trust their judgment,” he said, though really he only trusted Ginny's. He didn't know Aimee at all, and had to hope she had some sense, or at least that Ginny wouldn't let her get carried away.

The seamstress turned back to the picture.

“Yes, I think I can do this. Why don't you come this way and select the materials?”

The three disappeared into one of the shop back rooms, and Harry turned back to his friends, wondering if this had been such a good idea. Clyde was the first to say it.

“You're doomed.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Clyde's dismal foretelling hadn't amounted to anything, luckily. There had been some tense moments when Ginny and Aimee had started bickering about accent colors and how sharp of an angle they wanted cut, but luckily Madam Malkin had enough experience to know what would work best and this tailor wasn't nearly as dodgy with a needle as his last one.

The outfit turned out well.

At least, he hoped it did. Everyone had said he looked great, even Clyde, but Harry was still feeling a little nervous as he got ready in front of the mirror in his dorm room. The clothes were different from his usual, even different from his old clothes, and he couldn't tell if they were too plain or too fine for the dinner tonight. He also thought they made him look short and skinny, younger than he would have liked. In other words very much like his skinny, little fourteen year-old self.

"You know, if you don't stop it, I'm going to have to agree with Ron. They turned you into a queer," Clyde said. He was laying on his bed, flipping through a quidditch magazine (or possibly porn, Harry was afraid to ask), while Harry struggled to feel comfortable.

"Oh, shut up. I just... I hate interviews. They all look at you and judge you, and you know what ever they think they'll write down and then thousands of other people are going to think the same thing. I don't want them thinking I look like a dork."

"You look fine."

"I look short."

Clyde burst out laughing. "You are short."

Harry stuck his tongue out at him. There really wasn't any point in delaying things at this point. Voldemort would be at the entrance soon, and he wasn't about ready to try to find something else to wear. He grabbed a cloak, and put it on, not wanting to attract any more attention than necessary and left.

The school champions were already there when he arrived, along with their headmistresses and headmaster. He hesitated when they all turned to him at once, looking at him as if they had never seen him before, or more likely that they were really seeing him for the first time. He squared his shoulders and kept moving forward.

"Good evening," he said, cautiously. Fleur came up to him, smiling cheerfully, and took the corners openings of his cloak and pulled them open. Harry bulked and immediately pulled them closed. "What are you doing?!"

"I just wanted to zee," Fleur laughed. "Aimee zed she dressed you up, but I can't zee anything under this."

He flushed with embarrassment, and frowned up at her, showing how completely unamused he was. "You can see it later."

"Leave him alone, Delacour. He isn't a toy," Viktor growled. Fleur gave him an amused look.

"You're an only child, aren't you?" she asked. His surprised look made her think she'd hit the nail on the head. "If you 'ad younger siblings, you'd understand."

Cedric, who did have younger siblings, chuckled behind his hand. The bickering was interrupted by the Dark Lord, arriving through a secret passageway. He scanned each of the gathered party briefly, before settling on Harry. He beckoned him to his side, and the boy did as instructed. Just as Fleur had done only a minute before, he pulled open Harry's cloak to see his outfit. What was it with people and his wardrobe, the Gryffindor mentally lamented.

"Good," Voldemort said, nodding his approval, before turning his attention to the others. "Is everyone ready?"

Everyone nodded their agreement, and the Dark Lord moved to the giant door, and pounded on it twice. The groan of the door as it was opened was immediately drowned out by the crowds of people outside and the tell-tale flash of lightbulbs. The Dark Lord took Lestranger's arm in his, and lead the way out into the crowd. Sentinels formed a barrier, keeping the reporters from rushing in, and pushed them out of the way as the party made their way to the waiting carriages.

"Mr. Krum, how does it feel to win the first challenge?!"

“Mr. Potter, what made you risk your life to save the Beauxbaton's champion?”

“How are you feeling after your brush with death, Miss Delacour?”

“Have there been any changes in regards to insuring the safety of the champions?”

No one bothered answering the reporters here, but Harry still felt claustrophobic with them crowded around so close, their questions dogging their every step. Beside him, Fleur squeezed his hand, and smiled at him. He felt himself smile back at her, but the flurry of flashes that followed had him flinching and turning away. They climbed into two separate carriages for the brief ride to Hogsmeade. There were reporters waiting for them there, as well, and also more Sentinels to keep them at bay. It all seemed very strange to Harry, who had seen such a thing before, but always outside government buildings or sporting events. It all seemed a bit excessive.

They stopped in front of a large house with a fenced yard. They exited the carriages, and ignored the flurry of questions hurled at them, until at last they reached the inside. An attendant took their cloaks and escorted them into the parlor, where other foreign dignitaries and several more reporters were waiting for them. Harry felt his stomach lurch as he spotted Rita Skeeter, standing out in her electric blue cocktail dress, a few inches too high in the skirt and a few inches too low on her breasts. Like a shark scenting blood, she found her intended target within moments, and stalked towards him with an exaggerated swing in her hips. Her camera man scurried after her.

Harry looked at his watch, and sighed. He only had to get through the next half hour. Voldemort patted him on the shoulder, trying for sympathetic, but naturally came off as amused. The Dark Lord left Harry on his own as he went to talk with a group of important looking people, LeStrange sticking close to him the entire time. He thought about looking for one of the other champions, but decided against it almost immediately. He wasn't going to hide behind them like a little kid. He had done all of this before, probably more often than Cedric and Fleur combined, and Krum would lose respect for him if he showed such weakness. All he could do was brace himself.

“Harry, darling!” Skeeter exclaimed, “You look fabulous! What are you wearing? Baxter & Gimple? Picetti?”

What was it with people and his wardrobe? He floundered for a moment, thinking up a reply. Explaining where exactly his clothes came from seemed... embarrassing, but Ginny would be hurt if he didn't give her proper credit.

“Aimee & Ginerva,” he offered, as if it were a name that fell right in line with the ones she had just mentioned. It worked. Skeeter made an 'oh, of course!' expression, and moved along.

“Do you mind if we get a picture first, and then ask some questions?” she asked, batting her eyes coquettishly. He fought back a grimace, and nodded, hooking his thumbs in his pockets and leaning back a little to give a relaxed look, just like Ginny had shown him.

“Perfect! Now, then, down to business! There has been all sorts of theories floating around about why you went out to rescue the champion of a rival school-”

Harry held up his hand, not wanting to hear what any of those probably ridiculous and insulting theories entailed. “She's a rival, not an enemy. Why shouldn't I have helped her? If it had been Diggory, I would have done the same thing. I just couldn't stand there and let someone die right in front my eyes, or in front of all my friends and classmates. It's a horrible memory to have to live with.”

Skeeter leered, “So you don't think your decision to go risk your life was influenced in any way by the fact that Miss Delacour is part veela?”

He blinked stupidly for a moment, caught completely by surprise. He hadn't realized it before, but Skeeter's revelation made sense. Funny, he hadn't been as affected by her as the rest of house mates were.

"Of course not. Like I said, I would have done it for anyone," he said quickly, before she could latch onto his hesitation as surprise.

"Naturally," she agreed, her voice thick with condescension. "So have you considered how you will have her pay off her life debt?"

He felt his temper rising every second he had to stand near this nosy creature. He needed to get away from her fast, before someone got hurt.

"Miss Delacour... was rescued thanks to the help of several individuals, not just myself. The merpeople protected her from the grindylows and helped me find her, Bill Weasley got her breathing again, and the medi-wizards standing by made sure she would be okay. If I had been the only person trying to save her, she would have died. As far as I'm concerned, she doesn't owe me anything, and I didn't do what I did to get something from her. I helped her because I didn't want someone to die if I could prevent it. I don't know why you're having so much trouble grasping this. It's really a very simple concept."

He abruptly walked away, more quickly than she could follow, and looked for some sort of exit. He found one, or more accurately one found him, in the form Cedric coming up and pulling him aside into the foyer.

"Hey, Harry, can I talk to you for a minute?"

"Yeah, sure," he agreed, a little surprised. While they were on friendly terms, they didn't really hang out together. He wasn't sure what to expect "What is it?"

The Hufflepuff looked a little embarrassed, and fidgeted for a moment, before finally blurting it out.

"I know this is really sudden, but with what happened to Fleur during the challenge, I've been thinking a lot about what would happen if I got hurt and couldn't compete."

"Yeah... okay?"

"I... would you be my second?"

Harry looked at him blankly. "Second what?"

"You know, my second, the person who comes in and finishes for me if I can't. My backup."

"... ummmm.... no?"

Cedric looked honestly surprised. "No? Why not? You'd be perfect for the job!"

"Because I'm fourteen, and wouldn't qualify to compete? Because I've got enough to worry about with classes, club activities, friends, and these god awful social functions? Because I'm sane, and don't want to die by squid or something else equally weird?"

"... Alright, all perfectly good reasons, but this is just a precaution. The chances are-"

"Then it shouldn't matter who else you pick," Harry pointed out. "Just as long as it isn't me."

Cedric gave him a disappointed look. "Are you sure I can't change your mind?"

"Positive, but thanks for asking me first instead of assuming. I really hope you aren't hurt during the challenges."

The older smiled ruefully.

"Me too."

oo
oo

The interviews went fairly well, by Viktor's estimation. All the champions and Harry had been henpecked by the press for thirty minutes, but aside from varying levels of annoyance (Harry's being the most blatant as he made a point to flee everyone who stopped to talk to him within three minutes) they had all gotten through it relatively unscathed.

They had all gathered in the dining room, which must have been modified to accommodate Madam Maxime, with the champions all sitting beside their headmaster or headmistress at one end, and the Dark Lord and other officials at the other. Harry had been placed to the left of Voldemort, which Viktor found rather interesting. The young Gryffindor was quiet for most of the evening, but polite, and friendly enough. Voldemort had whispered something into Harry's ear during the dinner at one point, and the boy had actually laughed.

It left Viktor feeling uneasy.

As had Ambassador Prideux's questions about him owning a cobra, and more importantly Harry's answer.

"I do not own, Inana," he had said, "She is a cobra, a 'Queen of the Nile', not a pet. We helped each other out of a bad situation, and became friends. When I am able and she is ready, I will send her home where she belongs. Until then, we enjoy each other's company. She has a very interesting view of the world."

More and more, he was starting to think of Harry as a victim of his own innocence. The boy obviously had no idea about the dangers that surrounded him, disguised as these dangers were as 'mentors' and 'friends'. At least, that's what Viktor hoped, because he liked the kid, and after seeing him fly to Fleur's rescue he even respected him quite a bit.

He would hate himself if it all turned out to just be an act.

Sneaking back to Hogsmeade after hours turned out to be incredibly simple. Jophery had figured it out within the first two weeks, and was more than happy to point him towards the boat house. The place was charmed so that only a Hogwart's boat could come or go, which was fine if you wanted to keep someone out, but not very helpful at keeping people in.

After that, it was a simple matter to sneak into town and into the secret cellar, and after midnight only a few Sentinels wandered the streets. He crept down the stairs, casting spells to make sure no one had come down since he left and to check for traps, but everything was as he left it. In the furnace room, the fire burned even hotter than it had during the day, leaving him feeling instantly over heated.

"Dumbledore?" he called uncertainly.

"I am here," came the reply from within the furnace. "How are things on your end, Viktor?"

He let out a sigh of relief. "Everything seems normal. Da dinner went as expected. The Dark Lord didn't appear suspicious. Da owl?"

"Is completely normal. I checked it for enchantments, possession, animagical transfiguration, charms... nothing. It's a perfectly normal, rather cranky owl. If it was under any sort of spell, it's gone now. I'm going to send it back to you. If it belongs to someone, it's best we not risk them looking for it. I had it magically purged and sedated, so no one should be able to glean any information from it."

There was a muted pop, and the owl appeared in the middle of the floor. Viktor quickly picked it up and retrieved the silver star, slipping it into his pocket. He'd felt anxious all day without that portkey, even with his emergency one stashed in his boot.

"You best hurry back," Dumbledore said. "We both took far too many chances as it is. Tonks says 'stay safe'"

"Alright. Give my regards to da others."

Viktor hurried out as quickly as caution allowed, but even so, he missed the silent shadow that separated itself from the alley wall and watched him run back towards the lake.

Book IV:

Chapter 12: The Forbidden Land

There was a flood of articles about the first challenge come Monday, and despite Harry's best efforts, he wasn't able to avoid all of them. He had read the Hogwarts Herald out of simple respect for Hermione, and also to see if he could pick up any resentment from McGunny's article since he had turned him down. The editor's article was professional and well-written as always, without a hint of ill will. There was even a little praise in it, not just for Harry, but for all the other champion's performances as well.

It was still embarrassing, especially when the gossip picked up, and he couldn't turn a corner without having groups of people stop talking or start whispering once his back was to them. At least, it was mostly the 'giggly' type of gossip and not the 'sneering' type this time around. It was still annoying, but definitely safer.

The only good thing that came out of the press attention, ironically came from Rita Skeeter's article. The article itself was atrocious, riddled with absurd speculations and romantic drama between Fleur and him. There was, however, one line mentioning Harry 'dressing to impress in his chic new outfit by Amy & Ginevra', that made it all worth while. Ginny had been ecstatic when she saw it, and nearly broken a rib when she hugged him before rushing off to show Aimee, all of her friends, half of her professors, her brothers, and to write a letter about it to her family back home.

It was the first time he felt he had really started paying back her loyalty.

Things were definitely different after the first challenge. The foreign students all treated him differently. Krum wasn't exactly friendlier, but he seemed to have finally decided he could trust Harry, and stopped asking him difficult questions. Jophery asked him to fly for the German quidditch team so that they could finally get someone capable of out flying Viktor. One of the girls even requested he be their date to the Halloween ball.

Fleur teased him constantly.

“My God, you are much too short! Eat your salad!”

“What are we going to do with this wild hair? There isn't a comb in the world that can tame it.”

“Why must you wear these glasses? You have such pretty eyes!”

She was never mean about it, but it was driving him batty, and worse he thought she knew it too. So did Natalie if her smirking was anything to go by. Harry suspected his old girlfriend might actually be putting the Beauxbaton's champion up to it. Three Beauxbaton's girls asked to be his date to the Halloween ball.

He took Ginny.

Halloween was the most the fun Harry had in weeks. There was good food, crazy dancing, contests, and games. There was even a slime ball war (much like a snow ball fight except of course with slime). He still wasn't sure who got him in the back of head, but figured it was an even toss up between Ron and Natalie.

Even Hagrid and Madam Maxime came, and had fun acting like a couple of teenagers.

Classes resumed as normal. In Celtic class, they spent a week building house, so that they could meet out of the cold. The house itself was just a large circular stone wall with wooden doors and windows, a straw thatched roof, a wooden floor, and a large stone fire pit in the center to keep it warm. It was just as cozy in the house they had proudly made themselves (albeit with a lot of magical help), as it was in the willow grove. They studied Samhain, the gods of harvest, and the art of hunting.

Hermione finally figured out the Patronus Charm, and earned Gryffindor the extra points. Draco figured it out shortly after. Harry waited another week before demonstrating his. Oblitz glared at him suspiciously the entire class.

He got better at sword fighting in Dueling Club.

Ron was furious. Draco could still kick both their asses at it.

Harry found himself being dragged to parties and charity events every other weekend. Aimee (properly corrected eventually) & Ginevra were mentioned three more times by the beginning of December. Snape's loathing for him was reaffirmed with every event he had to escort his ward to. Luckily for Harry, he seemed to take most of this loathing out on the hosts rather than the Gryffindor himself. Not including the three completely unfair detentions, which really might have only been due to Snape's laziness. The man hated sorting his storage closet and scrubbing cauldrons. The fact that Harry hated these things as well was entirely beside the point.

Everything fell into a workable routine of work, study, and play. He even managed to work in some free time to himself to write letters to his godfathers and the Reichers, practice his art work, and read through The Book of a Thousand Gods.

Life was good.

And then the second challenge was announced on the first Friday of December.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Impossible," Hermione said, staring disbelieving at the challenge rules. They had been handed out to everyone during first period classes, to prevent them from aiding the champions accidentally or getting themselves into trouble. There was definitely a lot of trouble to get into. "The first challenge someone nearly died with the safeties, and now he wants them to do something even more dangerous without any safeties at all and with no way to help them if they get into trouble? It's insane! Who would agree to this?"

"Miss Granger, you are dangerously close to writing our Lord an apology letter," Professor Toure warned, her expression unforgiving. "And for your information, all three champions have already accepted."

Besides, they are not going in without protection. Each champion will carry a champion's badge, which will allow them to be magically transported in and out of the boundary, and medical personnel will always be on standby if someone comes back injured. Really, this challenge is a lot less dangerous than the last."

"They're hunting a dragon!"

Yes, Harry was having a hard time wrapping this thoughts around that too. He understood people did, in fact, hunt dragons long before they had the benefit of wands, but they were specialists, and even then more died young than retired (which was usually after three dragons. It was a very profitable trade after all). Besides, wasn't it illegal to hunt dragons, now a days?

"A sleeping dragon, Miss Granger. They're not actually going to fight it. Most of the challenge will simply be finding it. It's a test of endurance, not combat skill, and their main opponent will be the weather and the forest, not the dragon itself. Just so everyone understands what is going to happen, I am going to go over it with you," she said, and turned to the announcement to read.

'To win the challenge, a champion must locate the sleeping dragon, slay it, and return to the castle with some part of the dragon as proof. The dragon is located within the Forbidden Forest. A ten square mile area has been blocked off with a special ward that will prevent anyone except those champions with badges from entering or leaving."

Professor Toure now turned her sharp eyes to each of them, insuring that she had their full attention.

"Now, here are the rules, which I expect all of you to respect.'

'Rule #1, only a school champion may hold in their possession a champion's badge. They can not be given or lent to another person, for any reason. Anyone found in possession of a champion's badge, and not themselves a champion, will be severely punished, regardless of age, rank, or station.'

'Rule #2, there is no time limit to the challenge, and a champion may spend unrestricted time searching within the Forbidden Forest, including after hours and during classes. However, if not within the Forbidden Forest, champions are expected to attend classes and keep curfew, and any missed classes can only be made up on their teacher's discretion.'

'Rule #3, a champion may make use of any items within the school to aid them in their quest, including library books, weaponry, brooms, food, etc, but may not accept gifts from other students, teachers, or outside sources. A champion cannot purchase or send for additional resources to aid in the challenge, with the exception of nonmagical clothing. A champion caught breaking this rule will be withheld from searching for three days for each offense and suspended from the challenge after three offenses. The second party will face severe punishment.'

'Now, any questions?'

Several hands shot up, including Harry's. Toure pointed towards him first.

"Isn't it killing dragons illegal in Britain?"

"The hunting of dragons is illegal, yes," she said, "but the Court authorizes the extermination of a dragon that proves a hazard to human settlements. This particular dragon was caught half a mile outside of a wizarding village in Northern Scotland. It destroyed three cottages, killed most of the local livestock, scared away the wild game, and injured several people. It's been relocated twice, but returned both times. It's execution is a bit unorthodox, but inevitable nonetheless."

She pointed to Clyde.

"Can't the champion's just cast a locating charm to find it? It seems kind of a weak challenge."

Toure smiled and turned to Hermione. "Perhaps you could answer that question, Miss Granger?"

Hermione nodded, "Dragon's skins are almost impervious to magic, including locating charms. Unless it happens to be blowing fire while you cast the spell, it won't work."

"Absolutely correct, anyone else?"

The school was buzzing with excitement about the latest challenge all morning, and even Harry could feel himself caught up in the enthusiasm. He held himself in check though, for Hermione's sake. She was obviously upset about the danger, and the fact that all three champions were absent during lunch did nothing to alleviate her worry. When Fleur and Cedric showed up late to dinner, but Viktor did not, she was practically frantic.

"What if something happened to him?" she asked.

Harry tried to reassure her. "He's just still looking, Hermione. Think about it. Fleur and Cedric aren't as used to the cold as he is. To him, it's probably a warm spring evening."

"But the forest-"

"Everything is hibernating. The worst he's going to find is some hungry foxes or wild boar. The really bad stuff is either asleep or deeper in the forest. If he does get into trouble, he has his badge and his wand. He'll be fine."

And he was fine. One sleepless night later, and Viktor was at the breakfast table just long enough to refuel, resupply, reassure Hermione he was fine, and then he was off again. Cedric and Fleur were quick to follow his example.

No one saw much of the champions over the next couple of days. They appeared irregularly at meal times, during classes, or at random times to warm up or rest or eat. Krum was the most rarely seen. He would show up at the castle for only a few minutes at a time during the day to gather food or just to reassure Hermione that he was in fact, alive and well, and wouldn't return to the castle until after midnight and then was out again before dawn. Cedric and Fleur were just as dedicated, but Fleur wasn't used to the cold and had to return to the castle every few hours to defrost. It didn't help that she didn't own very warm clothing, and none of her classmates had anything better to lend her.

In the end it didn't matter, because after a week, none of the champions had found any sign of the dragon. Fleur was the first to realize it was going to take more than blindly wandering around in the forest to find what she wanted, and consequently was spending more and more time in the library than outside.

It didn't take long for Cedric to come to the same conclusion. The rest of Hogwarts soon lost interest when it became obvious that they wouldn't see anything really exciting from them whether they were reading in the library or wandering the forest. Harry had his own problems to deal with.

McGunny had requested to see him.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Is something the matter?" Harry asked, his first thought upon entering the abandoned classroom was that Oblitz had done or said something suspicious. He hadn't heard from McGunny directly for months now, and even the last interview he had done for the Hogwarts' Herald had been done through one of McGunny's underlings. He figured the other boy had accepted his reasons for not wanting a biographer, and was glad for it.

McGunny shook his head, his back turned to him as he wandered further into the classroom.

"No, not really. I'm still keeping my eye on the Durmstang people, but they appear to all be behaving themselves. That isn't what I wanted to talk to you about."

"What is it, then?"

The older boy stopped, and turned back to him. Harry felt the hairs on the back of his neck rise, and his hand twitch for the wand up his sleeve. There wasn't anything threatening in his expression, indeed it was friendly and open, but it wasn't one Harry had ever seen him wear before. At the same time, it was a little too familiar.

"I wanted to ask for your story again."

Harry shook his head. "I told you already why I can't do that."

"Of course, and you were right. There is no way I could write your story for anyone else to read. Not only would it likely violate national secrets, it would reveal personal things you would never feel comfortable with the public knowing. I understand that, and won't ask you to make yourself that vulnerable. I just thought..."

McGunny sighed, and his strange expression slipped away into something Harry recognized. Frustration and the desire to make someone understand. It was the only thing that kept him from running out the door and not looking back.

"I just thought, one day you would want someone to understand you, not just assume that they understand you. One day, you'll find a girl you want to marry and have children, and they'll all hear what the world says about you and that they'll want to know what is true and what isn't, but you won't have the words or the memory to explain it all. Perhaps it will still be too personal to say directly. Either way, you'll have your story that you can't or won't tell, and you might die without anyone ever having truly known you."

Harry said nothing. He could feel McGunny's sincerity behind his words, and it pulled at him like a magical force, urging him to accept his offer. But he couldn't do that.

"And that is what you want?"

"I do. I want to understand. If I can understand you, then perhaps one day what I write will have others understand. Even if it's just one other person. Even if it's never read by anyone else for a thousand years. I believe it will be worth it."

Harry looked away. It was starting to become painful to face that sincerity directly. He was afraid to be overwhelmed by it.

“What do you expect me to do?” Harry asked angrily, hoping passion of some sort would strengthen his will to resist. “I can't tell you, even if I wanted to. If Voldemort found out I told you certain things, both of our lives could be in danger. He's a legilimens, and he's used his ability on me before. None of my secrets are safe from him.”

“I've thought of that.”

Harry looked back at him, and watched as he removed a book from his bag and came forward to show him. It was large, black leather with steel fixtures, and a lock on it like he occasionally saw on books in the restricted section. It did not, however, require a key to open it. The pages were completely blank.

“What is it?”

“It's a Keepsafe Book. It's what witches and wizards write anything they want to keep secret. Book of Shadows, diaries, things like that. You can spell them so that they won't unlock without the blood of a family member, or a secret password, or special key or talisman. If someone forces open the lock, all the writing on the page disappears, and becomes irretrievable or is filled with something else. I had a grandmother who kept a diary that showed cookie recipes instead if you didn't say the proper password.”

“... um... okay, that's neat, but that doesn't really help.”

“I know, but this is my idea. I'm going to give this book to you. Only you will be able to unlock it. Every so often, we'll meet, and we'll have a writing session. I ask questions, you talk, a charmed quill will write what we say. Afterwards, you stick around for a while and do homework or something, and I revise what was written. When I'm done, you take the book with you. If we reach a point where you can't talk about what happened, then I leave you to fill in those parts on your own. So you keep the secrets you have to, and only I will know the rest. It's not like I'm interested solely in your secrets. It's what you do and feel in the quiet moments between rescuing damsels and slaying monsters that I want to know. That's the part that explains who you are and why you do what you do."

Harry had to admit that was a good idea.

"How do I know if I can trust you? Even without the book, do you expect me to just tell you everything about me? I mean, come on."

"I'll take a Confidentiality Oath."

"I have no idea what that is. Is it magical?"

"Yes. Lots of Court officials and doctors have to take it before they talk about a case or treat a patient. I'll never be able to talk about anything you don't give me permission to talk about. It'll be like having a... a therapist."

Harry felt the corner of his mouth twist into a smile at that. He supposed if anyone needed to vent to someone, it was probably him. He dropped it quickly before McGunny interpreted it as a 'yes'.

"I don't know... I mean, I've got enough going on as it is..."

But McGunny already sensed he had gotten over most of Harry's resistance, and wouldn't be stopped now.

"We'll do it over... Sunday dinners... or while you're painting or... or... or just whenever it's convenient. I mean, we'll have to meet regularly. There is so much I want to ask you, and there's no telling what the future will bring. I'm sure that with the political situation you're in right now that a lot of important things are going to be happening in your life, and people are going to misinterpret or even lie about you at every turn. When that starts happening you're going to really need me to write for you, to have someone understand."

Harry tried to grasp the concept of working on something for decades, but couldn't. He understood working at the same job for decades or educating yourself all your life or being married until death, but working on a single thing for that long just didn't quite click in his head.

He thought he would get bored of it or just exhausted. McGunny didn't seem worried about that in the least.

"I still don't know. It's not really my thing," he said.

"Alright, then why don't we just try it out? We'll do three interviews, and if you really don't like it, then we'll stop. Let's give it a try, at least. Please? This is more important to me than you'll ever know"

And that's what worried Harry so much.

"... Alright. Three tries, but if I say no after that, then it's over."

"I promise, Potter... Harry... You're not going to regret this."

Harry didn't have the heart to tell him, he already did.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Fleur was not having a good week. Since the challenge had begun, she had spent a horrible amount of time in an even more horrible forest where it never got above forty degrees, evil dead vegetation tore at her clothes and hair, and she felt watched where ever she went. She'd ruined her nicest boots too. Worse, it had all been for nothing. She hadn't found the dragon or any sign of it. Honestly, she had no idea what to even look for.

Now she was in the library, blessed warm but so far unhelpful. She had researched dragons, hiding spells, finding spells, hunting manuals, tales of dragon slayers, government policies on dragon extermination, but none of them had produced anything remotely helpful. If the dragon had chosen it's own lair, the informations might have been useful, but since it was hidden by wizards, this clearly wasn't the case and she didn't know what to do. All the caves she had found were empty (of dragons at least. There had been a rather startling encounter with a very drowsy bear), and the ground didn't seem disturbed anywhere she searched. Although it was hard to tell in some places. There were a few species of wandering trees that were known for uprooting themselves and moving somewhere else, but if they had moved it hadn't been since summer.

But then, who knew when the dragon had been put in the forest? No one had seen or heard anything around there since school had started.

"Ah, excuse me, Miss Delacour?"

Fleur looked up from her book on Ents (it was worth a shot), and looked over her shoulder. A Gryffindor was standing behind her, roughly the same age as her. He had the shockingly orange hair of a Weasley, but she couldn't recall his first name.

"Yes, Weasley?"

"Sorry to bother you, but um... my brother Bill was wondering if you were available to talk. I'll explain that you're busy if you like. I understand you have more important things-

"That's quite alright. I needed a break anyway."

He seemed startled by her answer, and floundered for a moment as he tried to think what he should do next. "Ah...um..er... he's out in greenhouse number two, not the one with Potter's cobra of course, that's in number three so... yeah, he's not suppose to wander around the school, even though he goes here- I mean went here."

"I hope Hogwarts doesn't let a cobra wander around the halls," she said, feeling her amusement rise with his every flustered word.

"No, no, of course not... well, Nagini used to, but... I meant Bill. Bill isn't supposed to wander around."

"I understand. Will you put my books away for me?"

"S-sure, I can do that."

"Thank you."

She left him flustered, and went down to the entryway, bundled up as best she could against the cold, cast a quick warming charm on herself. Outside the gray sky warned of snow and lots of it, and a hard northern wind threatened a full storm. Even Krum would have to spend the night indoors tonight. She sprinted around the castle as quick as she could, hoping to reach the greenhouse before the warming charm wore off. She didn't quite make it, but the running saved her from the chill, and when she entered the greenhouse she felt immediately overheated.

"Hoo," she sighed, pulling off her cloak. "Bill? Are you here?"

"Over here," he called, coming around an enormous fern. He smiled at her with his little boy smile she was becoming increasingly fond of, and pulled out a box. "Sorry to come by unannounced, but I got something for you."

"For me? Bill, you didn't have to do that!"

His grin turned impish.

"Of course I did. I'm the new safety coordinator. I have to make sure all the champions don't hurt themselves, like say... wandering around the forest with barely any clothes on in the middle of winter."

"I am not naked."

"Might as well be, as much heat as that getup looses. Come on, you'll like it. Well, most of it anyway."

He handed the box out to her, and after a good long moment of just being stubborn, she snatched the box out of his hand and opened it. Inside was a cloak and a pair of boots, dark gray and lined with rabbit fur.

"They're nothing fancy," he said, sheepishly, "but they're durable and warm. They're not magic, so the rules say I can give them to you. Ginny mentioned you didn't seem to have anything appropriate for spelunking in winter, so I thought you might like them."

“Bill, they're perfect! Thank you!”

She hugged him tightly and kissed his cheek. He turned pink, but still managed to keep grinning like a rogue..

“Glad you like them, because you're going to hate me for this one. My mom heard you didn't have anything either, so she sent you something too. Please don't blame me. It was Ginny's fault, I swear,” he said in mock regret, handing her yet another box. He tried to touch it as little as possible, as if there were something particularly nasty inside. She accepted it, more curious now than apprehensive. She opened it...

...and understood his feelings completely. She found herself face to face with perhaps the silliest (if not the ugliest) sweater she had ever seen. It was the same baby blue of Beauxbaton's school emblem, but the color was it's only attractive feature. It was bulky, shapeless, with a giant 'F' stamped across the front of it in golden sequence. Her face must have said it all, because Bill burst out laughing.

“I'm sorry, I really am. She means well, but her fashion sense hasn't evolved since she was in primary school. I don't expect you to wear it, but you can always take it back to France with you. Think of it as a funny souvenir.”

She gave it another considering look. It did look warm, and as long as she wore something over it, no one had to know. Gabrielle would laugh herself silly if she saw her sister wear it, which might just make it worth the embarrassment.

“I like it,” she said.

Bill's jaw practically dropped clean off his face.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Sunday arrived with snow. Lots and lots of snow. It started falling lightly after sunset on Saturday, and gradually grew in strength through the night and into the next day. Even Krum hadn't bothered searching under those conditions, and spent a rare afternoon with Hermione just talking in the library. Cedric and Fleur also visited in the library, but they went looking for ideas to aid their search once the snow let up. Cedric had a few he wanted to try, even though he doubted they would work.

Wanting to try out his ideas at the first available opportunity, he waited only long enough for the snow to ease up just a bit, and then headed out. The sun had just set, and the world was a bluish gray as light slowly drained from the endless white. Cedric trudged through the eight inches of snow to the boundary of the Forbidden Forest. He pulled out his champion's badge, the Hogwarts' coat of arms molded in gold and hanging from a heavy chain around his neck, and held it out before him. Passing through the barrier was like walking through a small waterfall, cool with a feeling of pressure coming down on his head and shoulders. He always checked himself instinctively to see if he was wet, but he never was.

In the forest, it was already deep night. Even without any leaves on the trees, skeletal wooden limbs reached out to block out as much of the sky as possible, casting the land in shadows. Tonight, however, the luminous glow of the snow under the light of his Lumos overpowered even the most stubborn gloom, and soften the darkest shadows into deep blues. He stopped occasionally to look around and admire the dramatic change. It was quite miraculous.

When he was finally deep enough that he could no longer make out the castle, he opened his satchel and pulled out his supplies for his latest experiment. There wasn't much to it. A Smell-n-Seek Hound, little more than a charmed origami dog the size of his hand, and one dragonhide glove. The Smell-n-Seek he had found in craft book for amusing young children, and its reliability was definitely questionable, but since he was searching for a smell instead of a magical signature, he thought it just might work.

If the poor thing didn't dissolve in the snow first.

"Smell," he instructed his charm, and it immediately stiffen in his hand and leaned forward to sniff at the dragonhide glove in the other. It wagged its paper tail to let him now he'd picked up the scent. "Seek."

The charm floated out of his hand and around his head, before drifting off towards the North. Cedric trudged after it, his enthusiasm growing. He may have actually stumbled across something that would work! And it was so ridiculously stupid too!

He grinned to himself, and followed it deeper into forest.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Viktor speared the ground with his enchanted javelin, pulled it out, barely glanced at it's clean wooden tip, took a few more steps, and repeated the process. This had been his hunting technique for the past week. He'd only managed to cover a third of the entire territory, but he wasn't deterred. If anything, he knew he'd find it by Christmas, and he just had to hope the other two didn't think of something better or just get lucky.

The technique he was using wasn't really designed for hunting dragons, although the javelin was known to be at least partially effective against them, but for hunting Wolpertinger*, a type of antlered rabbit the size of small pony that hibernated in underground burrows. There was no point in looking for their lairs with your eyes, as they left no mounds or openings and were usually under a layer of snow. Javelins enchanted to pierce the ground effortlessly, poking through the earth until it came back bloody was the only way to find them. He just had to count on who ever hid the dragon hadn't buried it very deep. His progress was steady for nearly half an hour, when he found something he hadn't been looking for.

A hoof print.

He looked at it curiously, holding up his glowing wand to it. It was the distinct 'U' shape of a horses foot, and as he looked about he spotted several more. There were at least two sets of prints moving along side each other in one direction. His first thought was 'unicorns', but then realized these were much too large. Besides, unicorns could walk on top of snow.

There was no way horses would simply be wandering around the Forbidden Forest on their own. They had to have had riders.

Viktor immediately snuffed out his Lumos, and crouched low to the ground, looking around for any sign of watchers. How long had they been there? Had they seen him and the others? What was their purpose? A dozen ideas ranging from assassins to dragon poachers flitted through his mind. There was only one way to find out.

With only the barest outline of the tracks visible in dark blue of the snow, he kept his body low and began following them North.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The Smell-n-Seek dropped out of the sky like a falling leaf, landing with it's head buried in the snow and it's tail wagging happily. Cedric let out a woop of joy and began to dig where it had landed, shoveling snow out of the way with his hands. He was reached the ground and was ready to bring out his wand to start with digging spells, but what he saw gave him pause. He recast his Light Charm, and pulled up some dead vegetation. He examined it closely, and once he realized what it was he let out a frustrated curse.

“Dammit!”

It was monkshood. Snape had his class brewing Wolfsbane Potion last Thursday. It wasn't the dragon hide the stupid charm had been smelling it was the potion ingredients!

An amused laugh shocked him out of his ire. He spun around with his wand, but saw no one.

“It was a good idea. I admit I thought it might work,” came a familiar voice, heavy on the French accent.

“Fleur? Where are you?” he demanded, still unable to see her, even though her voice was close.

“Up here.” He looked up, and found her hovering above him on a broom. In her gray cloak, she was barely visible against the sky above.

“How long have you been up there?” he demanded angrily. “Were you spying on me?”

“Of course I was. You didn't show up for dinner, so I knew you had to be up to something.”

“How long?”

“Not long. Fifteen? Twenty minutes?” she admitted readily. “I wasn't going to steal your victory if you actually found it, I just wanted to see for myself.”

“Right,” he said skeptically, and started trudging back the way he had come. The snow had started to pick up again, and with Fleur spying on him, he didn't fancy being outside any longer.

“It iz not like it matters anyway, zince you didn't find anyzing,” she pointed out. He glared up at her.

“It matters to me. At least, I know now I'm going to have to watch my back-” he started, but soon realized she wasn't paying him any attention. She was looking in another direction, off into the distance that her high vantage point allowed. “What is it? What's wrong’

“There iz zomezing coming... Cedric, I zink you should get out of zight.”

“What are you playing-”

“Cedric, please.”

There was honest panic in her voice, and joke or not, he decided not to risk it. He turned tail and ran. At least, he tried. The snow was deep, the route filled with obstacles half hidden, and he stumbled frequently.

"They're getting closer," Fleur called, "Climb a tree, you'll be in a better position!"

"Help me, then!"

He went for the most likely tree he could find, a huge old oak with several massive branches, but his gloves made finding a grip cumbersome. Fleur dipped low beside him, grabbing wrist and pulling him with as much strength as she could muster. They made it half way up before a crash and snap of underbrush being disturbed, drew their attention. He ducked as far behind the tree as he could and she shot upwards on her broom, hoping they hadn't been spotted.

"Viktor?" Fleur whispered, as a figure bolted beneath her.

It was, in fact, Viktor, but he wasn't alone. He was running, his wand held out before him to create a magical, obstacle free path as he moved on top of the snow, but his pursuers were close behind. Her first impression was that Viktor was being chased by men on horseback, but even in the darkening wood she knew that wasn't right. It took her a long, confused moment, before she realized they were centaurs.

And they were shooting at Viktor. She couldn't see the arrows themselves, but she could see the boy ducking them and branches shift from the impact. She didn't understand why he hadn't just portkeyed away already, but knew there had to be something wrong. Had he lost it? Had it been taken from him?

She withdrew her wand and aimed it below. "Expelliarmus!" she shouted, and spell rocket downwards, smashing through tree branches and exploding in the snow before them. Both centaurs veered, splitting into different directions. They shouted something to each other, and one continued to pursue Viktor while the other aimed his bow towards her. "Stupify!" she tried, but he ducked behind a patch of trees. She tried to follow his movements, but he disappeared.

She scanned below her frantically, seeing nothing. An arrow came at her, and she twisted so that it only caught a loose bit of cloak. She cried out in surprise, and the broom shot up per her body's instinct to retreat. It was a mistake, she hadn't had time to look where she was going, and ended up tangled in the branches of a tree. Another arrow shot passed her, dangerously close to her chest.

Frightened and angry, she screamed out a fire curse, hardly bothering to aim and watched in satisfaction as it exploded, knocking the centaur off its feet and into a tree. Seizing her chance, she began to untangle herself, intent on going after the other centaur. Cedric still had his champion's badge and could portkey away if he got into trouble, but Viktor obviously needed help.

She was so busy pulling the last of her cloak from the tangle that she didn't notice when the centaur got to its feet and gathered up its bow. He took aim and pulled back his arrow.

"FLEUR! MOVE!"

Dropping fast, she turned to the origin of the voice, and found Cedric dangerously exposed. He had his wand out, but had lost his footing and only one hand was keeping him from a fifteen foot drop. Their eyes met for just a fraction of a second, and then he looked ahead.

The arrow caught him square in the chest. He jerked at the impact, then looked down slowly to see the shaft sticking out of him. He didn't move even a fraction after that, but his hand loosed around the supporting branch and he fell...

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry knew he should have been inside, studying or playing with his friends, nice and warm by the fire and early to bed for a school the next day. He should have been, but it was a full moon. Even hidden by the snow and the clouds, he could feel Her and knew she would not let him sleep tonight. He was restless and giddy, and couldn't think of anyone to share it with except perhaps the Weasley twins, who were nowhere to be found (and neither was Jophery suspiciously enough). So he wandered the grounds, all but invisible in his Baluvian cloak and magic boots, exploring his world transformed.

His nocturnal eyes missed nothing. Every falling snowflake, every distant light, every curve of his white, glowing world.

He was glad he had decided to stay out for so long too. If he hadn't been wandering, he never would have seen the explosion inside the forbidden forest. He was quite convinced at that moment that someone had woken up the dragon, and that would have been a terrible thing to have missed.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Medi-wizard Keigle had to say his latest assignment was by far the easiest he had ever had. All he had to do was sit around the cozy little cottage that had been erected near the boundary of the wards to the Forbidden Forest. He'd been doing it for over a week without incident.

It was rather like a vacation. The views outside his window were quite lovely, he caught up on some of his reading, got to wear bunny slippers all day, and the Hogwart's house elves took care of all his meals, cleaning, and chores.

Then, on a night where he wouldn't have thought champions foolish enough to even dare a search, he was pulled from his dinner by a woman screaming. He'd grabbed his medical bag, not bothering with his cloak or boots, and rushed out to see what had happened. One look at the boy, barely conscious and covered in blood, and he knew his vacation was over.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry followed them back to the castle, guided more by curiosity than concern. The moon was fat and content, and there was little that was going to keep him from enjoying it. He wasn't going to get in their way though. He was very careful to make sure they didn't notice him.

He followed them all the way to the castle, through the hallways, and up the stairs. Cedric floated stiffly in the air, eyes wide and frightened, hand to his bloody chest. Fleur pushed his body along as fast as she could, the medi-wizard muttering spells and shoving pins into chest, careful to avoid the hand over his patient's heart.

There weren't many people in the hall, but Harry kept to the shadows and secret passages anyway, slipping past even those few gawkers they happened upon, making a game of it. He went completely unseen all the way to the infirmary, where he hesitated for a moment. It would definitely be a lot harder to go unnoticed once inside, and Cedric obviously needed some serious care. Should he really risk distracting them?

Then he figured if Fleur didn't distract them, it was unlikely they would even notice him. He slipped inside. A privacy screen had already been pulled up, so no one even saw him enter or find himself a quiet corner to watch their silhouettes against the screen and listen. They provided a very helpful narrative.

"Careful, careful, we can't risk any further damage to the heart," he heard Pomfrey urge.

"I know. It'll be fine. Are you still with us, Mr. Diggory?"

There was a pained moan, followed by a strangled scream.

"Got it! Miss Delacour, get this to Professor Snape and inform of what has happened. He'll be able to use it to create an antidote to the poison later. For now, tell him we need a stasis potion if he has any, otherwise we'll have to send for it at St. Mungo's, and I don't know if he's going to last that long. Hurry, hurry!"

Fleur rushed out from behind the screen, covered in blood, clutching something wrapped in a white handkerchief. She didn't notice him at all as she left, but then he doubted she would notice anything until she had her mysterious item safely in Snape's hands. He removed his cloak and gloves, and moved closer.

He could smell the blood now. How much could Cedric possibly have left inside him?

“Stay awake, Diggory!” the medi-wizard snapped, “Don't you dare close your eyes! You just have to stay awake, and you'll be fine. Diggory? Diggory!”

There was a harsh sound of a slap, and a sharp, painful cry.

“Enough of that! Stay awake or I'll start breaking your fingers,” he threatened.

That really isn't fair, Harry thought. Cedric needed help, not more pain. He slipped around the privacy screen, surveying the damage. A memory rose up instantly, spiking through his giddy dissociation. Sirius had looked so much like this that day. Prone, pale, and dying.

Even as the pain rose up, it began to ebb away. He couldn't summon the tears to heal this one. He didn't have the love, and at the moment he lacked even the compassion. He couldn't heal, but... he might be able to do something else.

Neither Pomfrey nor the medi-wizard even realized he was there until he stepped up to the bed and placed his hand over Cedric's. Both jumped away in surprise and fright, dropping their equipment in their retreat.

“Potter! What are you doing?! Get out of here at once!” Pomfrey screamed at him, but he ignored her. They had stripped Cedric down to the waist, exposing his bare chest and their ghastly efforts to save him. Pins, large nasty pins like those at Madam Malkin's used to hold cloth in place, stuck out of the boy's chest in the rough shape of a circle around his heart. The wet hand beneath his, held some sort of moss over the wound for equally mysterious purposes. Harry suspected it was to fight the poison.

“Hey.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Cedric stared half lidded at this newest presence, familiar but inappropriate to the situation. Why was Harry there? He couldn't quite bring himself to speak. "You've gone and made a mess of yourself. It's not as fun as people make it out to be, is it?"

Cedric shook his head, ever so slightly. The Gryffindor was quite right.

"Are you mad! GET OUT!" he heard Pomfrey shouting, her voice muffled as if underwater, though he could hear the other perfectly.

"Don't worry. I wouldn't lecture you if you weren't going to live to learn your lesson," Harry assured him.

"Mr. Potter if you don't step away right this minute, I will be forced to move you!"

"You're starting to feel stronger already, aren't you?"

"Stu-" Pomfrey began, but it was cut off by the sounds of a struggle, and then a man spoke. "No, don't! Look! Look at what he's doing!"

They were barely comprehensible, so Cedric ignored them, and simply nodded at the other, feeling his strength return even as he spoke.

"It doesn't hurt anymore, does it?"

And pain started to recede, leaving him feeling heavy as if he were laying in a bathtub while the water drained. All that was left, was the heat on his hand where Harry laid his own, slowing sinking deeper into his body. He blinked at him in confusion. "No, it doesn't. What's wrong with your eyes? They're all... shiny."

"You're dreaming. This is just a dream. They're fixing you up while you sleep. That's why you aren't hurting."

"...But I can feel your hand. It's hot. I feel the heat filling up my chest."

"Potion side effects. Nothing more. If you were awake, wouldn't you be scared? Would I even be here?"

Cedric looked side to side, as much as his position would allow, his vision still too blurry to make out much of anything except two people just out of his periphery and Harry standing over him, starkly vivid.

"I'm dying right now, aren't I?"

"Yes," Harry agreed. "But you won't die. Not tonight."

"Are you an angel?"

The smile grew to full out grin, making the vision before him a frightening thing. But who knew? Maybe that was how angel's were suppose to look.

"Yes, I'll be an angel for you tonight. I'll protect you from the dark places."

"Viktor. What about Viktor? He's still out there. I don't know if they caught him yet, but I don't think he can escape. Will you protect him, too?"

"Of course. I am a Wælcyrrie*. I am where ever a warrior falls."

"Oh..." Cedric said, as if that explained everything. He relaxed back against his pallet. "Why do you look like Harry?"

More horrible grinning.

"How do you know he doesn't look like me? Maybe he's my cousin."

That made even more sense to the half delusional boy, and the Wælcyrrie laughed, sending searing hot spikes of strength through his entire body. He let out a groan, grabbing its wrist, and attempting to pull its hand away, but it was immovable.

"Potter!"

The Wælcyrrie turned, smiling fiendishly at the newest arrival. To scare it away, was Cedric's first thought.

The Hufflepuff looked to Harry for reassurance.

"I won't let him poison you either."

Satisfied, Cedric drank it quickly. His arm didn't even make back down before he suddenly stilled, his body caught in the tableau of a grimace. His role complete for the night, Harry pulled his hand away. It didn't get far. Snape snatched it up, then dropped it again, recoiling from the saturation of magic there. He glared at Harry.

"Go to my office. I want an explanation when I get back there. You will not leave until I say so."

"Okay," Harry said agreeably, and turned to go. There wasn't anything left here to amuse himself with anyway. Or at least, that what he thought until, out of the corner of his eye, he spotted the remains of Cedric's cloak and shirt.

Resting on top of the pile was something shiny.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

By the time Harry reached Gryffindor tower, news of Cedric's death (everyone was quite convinced he was dead and he didn't bother to stop and correct them) had spread, and everyone gathered in the common room to bounce ideas off each other in the place of actual facts. No one paid him any mind as he squeezed pass the masses. They had seen his odd comings and goings before, and there were more interesting things to discuss for once.

He was careful to keep his hood pulled low and his bloody hand hidden.

The dorm room was deserted, and he lingered only long enough to wash his hands and pack his school satchel with supplies. It was while he was looking for an extra pair of socks under the bed, when he found something... not entirely unexpected. His searching fingers closed around cool, smooth wood, and he pulled it out.

Gryffindor's sword sat in hands, thrumming with excitement and ready for battle.

“Not exactly what I was looking for,” Harry mused to himself. “But it might come in handy.”

oo
oo

Anglo-Saxon word for Valkyrie. Yes, I know Harry isn't a woman and suggesting he'll protect a warrior from death is contradictory to the definition. Convincing Cedric of this despite the contradictions, is what Moon-crazy Harry finds so funny. And yes, Cedric would know what a Wælcyrie is, for the same reason everyone else knows about angels and Buddha and Hercules. It's just one of those cultural things that shows up in stories and historical references and such.

A real, fake creature. Like an American Jackalope. It's a running joke in places like Bavaria. Wikipedia it.

Book IV:

Chapter 13: The Forbidden Land II

The snow had picked up, and even with his perfect night vision, Harry found himself disoriented in the dizzying fall. He didn't mind. It was sort of fun. Besides, the enchanted ring on his watch insured he never became too lost. His glasses, the spares he wore at night to hide his night shine, had been transfigured into goggles to keep the snow out of his eyes. His fur cloak and boots made the cold tolerable.

He wondered if Snape realized he had run off yet, and if he realized where he had gone. The potion's master would figure it out eventually, and he wished he could see his expression when he did. Or Voldemort's. That might be interesting too. In a scary, swimming with sharks kind of way. His musings accompanied him all the way to the barrier, which he didn't notice until he walked right into it, nose first. Thankfully, he hadn't been in a hurry when he hit it.

It took a few moments to dig out the champion's badge and a few more to figure out how it worked, and finally he managed to push his way inside. He shivered at the feel of the barrier passing over his skin. He put the badge away and pulled out his watch again.

"Viktor," he said, and observed as the minute and second hands reoriented themselves. He followed it north.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It took Snape exactly twenty six minutes to realize Harry had taken Diggory's badge. Twenty-five of those minutes he had been legitimately distracted assessing Diggory's condition and receiving a summary of what little the medi-wizard knew about how he'd come into such a state.

It took twelve minutes to confirm that Harry wasn't in the castle, and another three minutes to reach Voldemort's office.

The Dark Lord had been there most nights for the last few weeks, though he might be anywhere in the country during the day. Snape wasn't about to ask for an explanation for this, but he thought tonight might have something to do with it. Had the man set this all up? He couldn't fathom the reasons, but when it came to his master that was hardly uncommon.

He entered the office. Delacour was there already, drinking something she probably shouldn't to calm her nerves. To her credit, she wasn't crying or hysterical, she just didn't seem comfortable with sitting still. Voldemort was behind his desk, writing out something. He looked up at Snape as he entered.

"I expected you sooner. Was there a complication with Mr. Diggory?"

Snape looked at him squarely, trying to figure out if the Dark Lord wasn't aware of the entire situation already.

"... No, Diggory is in stasis. He'll keep until St. Mungo's can come and get him. There's no telling if his heart is salvageable though. Centaur poisons are impressive, even by my standards."

Voldemort nodded. "Hearts are easy enough to replace."

He turned to Delacour and gave her a reassuring smile. "Do not worry, my dear. He will receive the finest of care. Britain is indebted to you for bring our champion to safety."

She managed a shy, relieved smile. Snape was more than happy to ruin it.

"There are a few more urgent matters I must discuss with you."

"Of course. Viktor must be recovered at once. I have sent for Morgan and a team of Sentinels. With Diggory unable to compete, the badge will allow anyone to use it. They'll find him and bring these renegades under control within the hour."

Snape grimaced. Well, at least he knew Potter's part in the story hadn't been planned.

“About that...”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It took him almost an hour to find Viktor. Even with his compass, he couldn't tell how far the other boy was, and it turned out to be nearly a mile and a half. An easy walking distance normally, but the mounting blizzard made it much less so. He was very glad he had such an excellent pair of boots.

Not just because they were warm either.

They were also very silent, which, along with his Baluvian cloak, was perhaps the only reason he was able to get so close to Viktor without getting shot. The Durmstang champion laid inside a cave near a small fire, seemingly unconscious. Two armed centaurs stood at the mouth of the cave, their backs to the fire, peering out into the blinding snow for enemies. Staring at them, Harry could see they were both in bad shape.

The younger of them was injured, partially burned on the right side of his equine body and there was a gash on his arm. Clearly, he had met the brunt of the other champion's retaliation. They were both thin. Alarmingly thin. Their equine ribs were easily visible, and their cheeks and eyes were sunken.

“We do not murder children,” said the elder, uninjured one, not looking at the other. “What you did was inexcusable.”

“Children do not blow up people,” the other said darkly. “They are the reason we are going to die in this place. I would have my vengeance.”

The elder said nothing for a moment, turning his eyes upwards to a sky of endless gray and white.

“It is a wicked moon tonight. It guides your mind to wicked thoughts.”

“She resents that remark.”

Two arrows whizzed by Harry, neither coming even close to hitting him. He flicked his wand and both their bows flew out of their hands and into the snow. Now that they were unarmed, he pulled back his hood and removed his goggles. The younger tried to locate his weapon, but the elder merely look at him. He didn't look nearly as surprised as he should have.

“Hello,” Harry said, smiling pleasantly, “Do you make it a habit of shooting every wizard you come across? I honestly thought centaurs were one of the less aggressive races.”

The younger centaur stopped searching, and turned to him, glaring hatefully.

“You mock us? After all you have done, you have the gall to-”

His companion held up his hand, signaling him to be silent. Harry tilted his head curiously.

“I have never seen you before,” the elder said, “But the stars have spoken of you.”

“Do you hear the stars?” Harry asked.

“Yes. We hear the stars and the planets,” he said, then looked to his companion disapprovingly, “If we listen carefully.”

“I only hear the moon,” Harry admitted, “And she's more than I can handle, but she is not wicked. Not really... I'm Harry, by the way. Or did the stars already tell you that?”

“They call you by a different name, Ghihalmelan. I am Firenze.”

Harry nodded and turned to the younger expectantly, but he just crossed his arms and glowered.

“What do you want?”

Harry smiled. "I want Viktor. My friend pretending to be unconscious over there. You can stop now."

The prone figure looked up, and glared at him. Or tried to. There was a gash on his head, and he didn't seem able to focus on anything.

"And I want to know why you tried to kill Cedric. What did he ever do to you?"

The younger centaur snorted and stomped his foot, his glare utterly hateful.

"We are trapped in this place, isolated from our herd, from food and shelter so that we will die slowly of starvation and exposure, and you wonder why we are upset?!"

"Ulaithur," Firenze warned, then turned to Harry. "We want out of this barrier. We were trapped here, and do not know why. When we saw the other wizards and witch, we kept ourselves hidden and tried to determine your purposes. We don't know what you are looking for, but the talismans you wear seemed the only means of escape. We managed to take this ones," he pointed to Viktor, "but he ran away before we could make him tell us how it worked. We gave chase. The other boy and girl tried to stop us. Even after we caught him, it didn't help. The talisman doesn't work for us."

"Why didn't you just ask them for help? This is just an accident. They must have put up the barrier without realizing you were here."

"Like we said, we didn't know your purposes, but you obviously didn't want anyone else finding what they were looking for."

Harry thought about it, and decided their story made perfect sense. It was all a big, rather violent misunderstanding. They were desperate, not malicious. He sighed.

"The Dark Lord will be angry..." he explained. "You interrupted a very important tournament, and nearly killed our champion. I don't know what he will do to you if he finds you, but death will probably be the least of your worries."

Firenze nodded, and looked up again.

"The moon is bad... but the stars are in our favor."

"The moon is not bad," Harry insisted. "I would not be here if She were. I will take all of you out of the barrier. You will be able to go where ever you like from there."

"Why should we trust you?" Ulaither snarled, hooves pawing the earth in agitation.

"If I wanted to hurt you, I could have done it before you even knew I was here," Harry pointed out. "Besides, what else can you do?"

The centaur looked like he had swallowed something foul. Harry was exasperated to find that he reminded him of Ron. At least, he didn't say anything else. The centaurs gathered up their scant supplies, and Firenze allowed the still disoriented Viktor onto his back, which only seemed to deepen Ulaither's hatred for the wizards. Viktor was weak and disoriented from the blow to his head, and cold was finally starting to seep into him as they left the fire behind. Twice they had to stop when the boy lost his grip and slid from Firenze's back, Harry being the only thing keeping him from hitting the ground both times.

Harry convinced Firenze to help him take Viktor to the Sleuw's house. It was close to the unbarriered part of the Forbidden Forest, and would be a safe place to part ways for all of them. It was two miles Southeast, and another hour and half in deepening snow. Even Harry, high on the moon's magic, was starting to tire as they struggled through the storm. He couldn't imagine what the centaurs were feeling, for though they held a steady pace, they had to be worse off than him. They hadn't eaten in who knew how long? Days at least, and one of them was injured while the other carried another person. Despite what they had done, Harry found himself admiring them.

He found the barrier when he smacked into it...again.

"I hate it when that happens," he muttered, and pulled the talisman out. "I'm not sure if this will take all of us across at once. I'll walk Firenze across first, then Viktor, then Ulaither."

He helped Viktor down and set him beside the barrier, casting a quick warming charm on him.

"Hey," he said, shaking the older boy gently, "Stay awake or you'll get hypothermia."

Tiredly, Viktor forced his eyes open. "Potter?"

"Yep?"

"Yur crazy."

Harry laughed, loud and hard, and then went to Firenze. He held out his hand but Firenze shook his head.

"Among my people, you offer your left hand to your family as a sign of affection and the right to your friends as a sign of trust."

"And to strangers?"

"We do not offer our hands." He held out his right hand, and Harry graciously took it in his and lead him through the barrier. It was much harder to move through it together than it had been alone, and the force of it nearly pulled them both to the ground. They were left shaking and gasping as they pulled free of it.

Harry went back for Viktor. It was hard to say whether it was easier or harder to pull the older boy through than it was Firenze, as he was already tired and Viktor was leaning on him heavily. Firenze took him from Harry, and the Gryffindor stumbled back across for Ulaither. The younger centaur was shifting and pawing at the ground anxiously, unable to hold still. Panting hard and exhausted, Harry held out his hand for the final trip.

Ulaither suddenly went very still.

Harry, who had been bent over to catch his breath, saw his entire equine body tense and looked up. The look in the centaur's eyes gave everything away. Harry recoiled, but Ulaither caught his arm on retreat and pulled him closer to catch his throat with the free hand.

"Ulaither! Stop!" Firenze commanded, but he was helpless to stop anything from the other side of the barrier. The younger centaur tossed Harry to the ground, tearing the talisman from his neck as he went. He reared up on his hind quarters and let out a cry of triumph. Harry scrambled away, his wand lost somewhere in the snow. Ulaither turned to Harry, perhaps to complete his vengeance and kill him, but found the boy had pulled a sword from his cloak, so he merely gloated instead.

"I hope you enjoy your stay as much as we did, though I doubt a mere human like you will even survive the night," he sneered, and forced his way through the barrier. Firenze was there to greet him with a fist to the head. Ulaither stumbled back, but found his footing and reared up to strike back. Harry watched in horrified fascination as their hooves tore at one another even as their fist punched and wrestled in the animalistic savagery.

Ulaither broke away first, but he still had the talisman and rather than surrender it, he ran. Firenze started to give chase.

"Firenze! No, let him go!"

The elder centaur pulled up short, and turned back to him. Harry shook his head.

"People know where I am. They'll come looking for me eventually, but Viktor isn't going to last long out here. Take him to the Sleuw's and then go home. I'll be fine."

"Harry..." Viktor said, tiredly, "He has my talisman too. I can't come back."

"Fleur still has hers. She can bring me back. Go, before you fall asleep again."

Viktor protested, but Firenze grabbed him and tossed him across his back. He turned back to Harry before he left.

“The moon is wicked tonight, Ghihalmelan, but she desires something other than your death. I hope the stars will align so that we might meet again under better circumstances.”

“Until then, my friend,” Harry called back, and searched for his lost wand. Firenze knew where to go, but he still needed to find shelter and start a fire. He was hungry too, but he would have to do without. It hadn't been in his plans to be stuck outside all night and the only food he had was some candy to snack on. He should save it for later.

He glanced back, but Firenze and Viktor could no longer be seen through the curtain of snow. He looked down at the Sword of Gryffindor.

“You came in handy after all.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Fleur did not know Professor Snape very well, and she hadn't been particularly impressed with him when she had her first class with him. He knew what he was doing, but his teaching technique seemed crass and his appearance altogether uncleanly (well, honestly it was just his hair that looked unclean but that was more than enough). Standing in his presence as he systematically replaced every layer of her clothing with combat gear and informed her of her 'mission', she knew she had seriously underestimated him.

“The barrier is designed to be indestructible from the outside, but simple enough to bring down from within. The barrier is maintained by six keystones, if any one of them is destroyed part of the barrier will fail. You will destroy one of them and our Sentinels will take care of the rest.”

He began loosening and tightening her armor so the pieces moved smoothly without getting caught on each other.

"The centaurs are dangerous, particularly at night. Their vision is better, and they are experts with crossbows and concealment. This armor will protect you from their arrows, unless they manage to shoot you in the face."

She chose to ignore that last statement.

"And what about 'Arry and Viktor?"

"Potter can leave any time he wants to. He has a badge. Krum apparently lost or damaged his and can't. The only way he's leaving is if he finds Potter or you destroy the keystone."

"And if zey are dead?"

He gave her a blank look. "If they teach necromancy at Beauxbaton's, then I only ask that you use your discretion before raising them."

She gave a huff, and walked out of the Dueling Hall closet, and stopped. There was a crowd of students hanging out around the back doors, and they were all looking at her expectantly. She steeled herself and stalked forward, Snape following behind her.

Jophery was there and first to speak up.

"Vat's going on, Delacour? Vat happened to Diggory? Vere's Viktor?"

"I really don't 'ave time for zis right now," she said, pushing passed him and into the crowd that started to pull back as Snape came up behind her. She had to stop again however, when confronted by the Weasley twins, looking surprisingly menacing when they weren't smiling.

"Then how about telling us where Potter is? We can't find him anywhere and his cloak is missing."

A surprised murmur drifted through the crowd. Snape moved ahead, facing off against them and their intolerable quick-wittedness.

“Mr. Krum is where he usually is when he isn't in the castle and Diggory has had an unfortunate accident. I wasn't aware Potter was roaming this evening, but if does not return to his dormitory before curfew than I guarantee you will find him in detention tomorrow night,” he sneered. “As will the rest of you, if you are not back in your respective houses in exactly,” he checked his watch. “Six minutes. I recommend you hurry. This week's detention is cleaning out the spider webs in the sixth tower.”

There was a collective shudder in the crowd. They had all heard stories about the sixth tower. It was supposedly cursed and infested with thousands of spiders. You couldn't see six inches ahead of you with all the cobwebs in the way. And it hadn't been cleaned out since the search for the acromantula. Most of the crowd quickly scurried off. The Weasley twins and Jophery weren't so easily dissuaded.

They glared at the potions master and Fleur, who met their gaze firm and steady before moving on. It would have all ended at that, but Pansy Parkinson came running down the hall.

“Professor! Professor!” she wheezed, hurrying up to him.

“What is it?”

“It's- It's Krum! He's back. That hairy giant just hauled him in. He's a mess!”

Fleur and he shared a quick glance at each other, before turning back to her.

“Where is he now?”

“The Great Hall. Hagrid just set him in front of the fire and went to go get the nurse.”

“Idiot,” Snape curse under his breath. “He should have just taken him straight to the infirmary. Who's with him?”

“McGunny,” she said scornfully, more than happy to make the situation sound as boxed up as she could so she would appear smarter for having noticed. “And Professor Flitwick and McGonagall.”

The students around them were very quickly moving off and Snape seriously doubted it was to get to their dorm rooms. Scowling fiercely, he headed towards the Great Hall to see what could be learned.

He was quite pleased to see that several teachers had arrived and were already ordering the students out of the Great Hall and to their beds. A few were lingering stubbornly, including McGunny and several of his reporters, but they too were being herded away. He squeezed in with Fleur, and made their way to the great fireplace. Viktor was there, and he did indeed look a mess. His cloak and boots had been pulled off, and he was wrapped in a blanket. His skin was pale, his hair wet, and he was shaking. A towel pressed to the side of his face, obscuring his expression. There were splashes of red against the white terry cloth.

“Viktor!” Fleur said, rushing to his side, finding an opening on the floor beside McGonogall. He looked at her hazily, and managed a weak smile.

“Hey.”

“He has a concussion, so he's disoriented,” McGonogall explained. “But he doesn't appear to be seriously injured.”

“What do you know so far?” Snape asked her. Her expression became distinctly unfriendly, but she answered.

“He was attacked by centaurs. They took his talisman before he could escape and then captured him. Then he tells me Potter came and talked to them, and convinced them to let him go. I think that's what he said. He's not making a lot of sense. Hagrid, however, confirmed that there was at least one centaur. He handed Mr. Krum over to Hagrid when he met him on patrol.”

“Patrol?”

"In case you haven't noticed, we're in the middle of a blizzard," she said icily. "Very easy for someone to get lost in. He took one of his dogs to patrol along the barrier in case anyone came out and needed help. It seems his idea had merit."

"Indeed. Well, that is one less thing to worry about. Did Potter show up?"

Her eyes widened.

"Don't tell me Harry really did go into that place and rescue another champion?"

"That would make all three, if he has. Hopefully, he's got it out of his system now."

"Three? How did he save Diggory?"

"Later. Did Potter turn up?"

She hesitated. "I haven't seen him, but then..." she looked cautiously at Viktor and Fleur. "It's that time of the month. I didn't expect to see him at all after sunset."

"Zat time of ze month?" Fleur asked curiously. Snape gave her the look she was quickly associating with sarcasm.

"Yes, I suppose there's no hiding it now. Potter's actually a girl..."

She scowled at him. "Excuse me for noticing zat you are both talking weird."

"He has a monthly project for one of his classes that requires him to be up most of the night. That's all," McGonogall assured her, awarding Snape a warning glare. "I'll check with Professor Brennan and the Tower just to be sure."

"You do that. In the meantime, Miss Delacour, you will go ahead with the original plan. Even if the danger has passed, the Sentinels must still investigate the attacks."

"You're sending her out in this weather? After everything that's happened?"

"It is her decision. If she doesn't want to go, she doesn't have to."

Everyone was suddenly looking at her, but she was looking up at Viktor, whose expression had become so miserable.

"I couldn't do anything," he said. "I couldn't save myself and couldn't protect him either, and he didn't even ask it of me. He just smiled and said he'd be fine and walked off. He wasn't scared at all. I think he's gone mad."

"No, he's always been like that," Snape muttered.

"Don't worry, I'll find him," she promised, and got up to go. It was now past eleven, and the night was long and her task would be difficult in this weather. She strode out of the Great Hall, and of all people to have avoided the teachers, it should be Natalie. Her expression was tight with restrained emotion, but Fleur could see it in every line of her face.

"It's Harry, isn't it?" she said, as if she already knew the answer. "He's gotten himself into trouble again, hasn't he?"

Fleur said nothing, but Natalie cursed as if she'd answered.

"That idiot. That stupid... he always does this... God dammit, what is wrong with him?" she snarled, and then just stalked away. It was the most baffling thing Fleur had ever seen the other girl do, and Natalie was a baffling person in general. Could Natalie and Potter...?

She pushed the thought aside. It was irrelevant for now. She had to make sure he was alive before she started wondering at his love life.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry managed to find shelter in a hollowed out hill, eroded at some point by a flood. It was smaller than the centaur's cave, but that was just as well. There was less space that needed to be heated. He had enlarged the spare cloak he had packed (just in case Viktor had needed something warm and dry), and hung it over the entrance to keep out the wind and keep in the warm, and his Everheating Fire Spell would burn for hours even with only a few soaking wet twigs.

It was good to be magical.

After that, he was too exhausted and hungry to do anything else but curl up inside his cloak and watch the fire. Dawn was still hours away, and the moon was still giddy and laughing in his ears. He smiled a bit and chuckled sleepily. He had never slept during a full moon since that summer, but he thought he might achieve it this time. It had indeed been an interesting night.

He was going to get thirty lashes for this, which wasn't really funny, except that he probably going to give Snape a sore arm. All of his friends were probably beating their heads against the wall and lamenting, 'not again!' He really was hopeless, but that was okay. He had his honor and his regrets were few.

He wasn't going die here, at least. Once the storm was over, Fleur would find him and no doubt take him home. It was just a matter of time.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Fleur found him in twenty minutes. Despite Snape's instructions, she wanted to make sure that Harry was alright first. The snow had started to lessen, but the temperature had dropped and the wind was picking up. She was convinced he would be half dead when she found him, so it was a pleasant surprise to find that he was in fact fully alive and had found himself a shelter. She certainly didn't mind sharing it with him.

He was fast asleep, and didn't so much as stir as she made the place more comfortable. Snape wasn't a nice man, but he was a practical one and hadn't expected her to complete her task until after the storm (which made her wonder if he hadn't sent her knowing perfectly well she would attempt to find Harry first). As such, he had provided her with abundant supplies in a convenient carry all Bottomless Bag. She pulled out two sleeping mats, blankets, and pillows and rolled them out beside Harry. Then rolled Harry onto one.

He didn't really wake up, but shifted into a more comfortable position and grumbled, "Go sleep in your own bed, Luna." That gave her pause, and she wondered for a moment if that were some sort of nickname for Natalie or perhaps the reason Natalie always seemed angry with him.

She cast a protection spell on the entrance of the cave, and climbed into her own sleeping mat beside him. Tomorrow, they would have plenty of time to talk and plan, but for now all either of them really needed or wanted was sleep.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Gryffindor was sleepless that night. McGonogall had checked the common room twice (mostly to make sure the Weasley twins hadn't snuck out) and found it filled with students each time. She didn't have the heart to tell them to go to bed. They may not have known Harry's habit of wandering the halls during the full moon, but tonight, when both Diggory and Krum had been attacked, they were all very aware that he wasn't with them now.

She understood how they felt, and though there would be a lot of tired faces and short tempers in the morning, she would over look it this once. In a way, it was comforting. She couldn't bring herself to sleep either. That boy would be the death of her. He was worse than all the Marauders and young Snape, Lucius, and Narcissa put together... in a room with weapons, potions ingredients, and gum.

Speaking of Snape...

"What are you doing here?" she blurted out, before she could stop herself. He gave her an annoyed... more annoyed than usual... look, and took a sip of his tea. Slowly. He had a skill for making people feel foolish, but she had long ago developed immunity. "You know what I mean. Even you sleep more than four hours a night."

"Really, last I heard I apparently don't sleep at all, and survive on revival potions. It's why I'm so cranky all the time, you know," he said idly, and took another sip. She wasn't impressed.

"I'm immune to your Slytherin wit, Snape, so you can drop it."

"And I'm not your student anymore, Professor, so you can bite me."

She snorted, and retrieved a cup from the pantry and then helped herself to his kettle. There was just enough left for one cup. He must have been there for quite some time. She gave him a considering look, taking a sip. It wasn't the school's tea, which was, alas, one of its few failings. This tea was actually good.

He must have noticed her expression (and been very tired), because he offered an explanation.

"A Christmas present from Vesper. We both had a deep loathing of the school's Earl Grey... or mop water... or whatever the house elves try to pass off as tea."

Oh, Vesper. Poor, poor Vesper. The staff all still talked of her, remembered her fondly. Her strange love for Snape had been a topic of many colorful conversations, and to this day no one could agree on whether her fiancée had loved her back. McGonogall hadn't believe he was capable of it anymore... hadn't, at least, until this moment. He had sounded... fond when he spoke of her.

What was he doing up anyway?

"I wonder what she would have thought of all this," he said offhandedly, without prompt. He was either very tired or he had drunk something other than tea earlier, she thought. He was never this talkative. "I bet she would have started a fight with our... with my master. Then gone and done something insane and rescued him. God Almighty, they could have already been related."

He rubbed his forehead as if in pain, but his tone still had that same fondness in it. Her world tilted, ever so slightly. She set down her tea and quickly took a seat before lost her balance.

Snape had cared about Vesper. And more importantly, he did care about Harry. The sad thing was it was so incredibly obvious. Yes, they bickered and lamented the other's existence, but who did Harry go to when he needed guidance? She was rather sad to admit it wasn't her, but definitely relieved that it wasn't usually Voldemort. And Snape, didn't he always know what Harry was up to? Didn't he come to his rescue when ever he got in over his head?

If Snape didn't care, would he be up here at three in the morning, waiting for word of the boy?

"She was a remarkable woman," McGonogall said, trying to hide the quiver in her voice. "He certainly could have benefited from her guidance."

"And she could have benefited from his dumb luck," he said bitterly, but continued on in his usual reserve. "I'll never find another woman of that caliber. It's incredible that I should have even known two. I don't know how I'm going to settle for anyone else after them. We'll make each other miserable for sure."

She felt another wave of shock. He intended to get married? As she understood it, he hadn't been interested in it until Vesper had proposed to him.

"You want a wife?"

He gave her a wicked smirk. "I'm not that crazy. I want children, preferably legitimate ones, which unfortunately requires a significant legal other."

Who was this man?

"You look surprised."

"You hate children."

"I hate other people's children. I'm told it makes a difference when they're your own. Besides, if loving children had anything to do with it, you'd have popped out a dozen by now."

And why the hell was she talking to him? They hadn't talked... ever really. He had arrived at Hogwarts a scared, intelligent, lonely little boy. They had never said anything to each other not in reference to schoolwork or his most recent fight with the Marauders. He had left school an angry, intelligent, ambitious young man. She had never heard of him again, let alone spoken of him until he came back. He had returned a jaded revolutionist, disenchanted with his own cause. She had hated him for that, knowing he must have been among those who had murdered friends and students of hers for reasons he didn't even believe in. Nothing in his behavior suggested contrition, and after all these years she had never forgiven him.

She still didn't. She couldn't. But...

"I pity your future offspring."

His smirked widened. "Me too."

'And I pity you,' she thought to herself. 'I hate you for what you've done, and I pity you for whatever made you this way. I never thought of you as lonely until now.'

"At least you'll have some practice with Potter," she said.

He made a face, and she burst out laughing. She hadn't seen that face since she'd made him pair with James Potter in seventh year transfiguration. How strange that this man should be acting as the guardian to his fiercest enemy's child. Or perhaps it was appropriate. That child was Lily's too. Perhaps it explained their relationship. An old hatred for the father mixed in with the old love for the mother. He must be as confused and conflicted as she felt right now.

It still didn't explain Harry though.

But then, when it came to being mysterious and surprising, that child could give an old pro like Dumbledore a run for his money.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“This is starting to get ridiculous,” Voldemort thought to himself standing out on the turret of the tower. He had no real business being up there. It was late, cold, and frankly dangerous (for anyone other than himself) to be out in the storm. He needed somewhere to think though, and his office felt stifling tonight.

He had intended to talk with Harry this evening, keep the boy company as they waited out the night. It seemed he had missed his chance, and that was rather irksome in more ways than ones. He didn't mind making plans around whatever mischief Harry got himself into, but it was another matter altogether to break plans because of him.

The moon madness had been funny to begin with, with no real harm apparent, but if it continued to lead to such an absence of judgment, something would have to be done. Harry got into enough trouble when he wasn't looking for it.

This could all be easily manipulated into his favor, but people were going to start to wonder why Harry was allowed to get into these situations in the first place. Certainly, responsible guardians didn't let their children wander around in the middle of the night or negotiate political situations with dangerous magical beasts. This was very close-minded in his opinion, but people were often unreasonable when it came to their offspring or even other people's offspring.

He wondered what it was like when people had a dozen children with the expectation that they wouldn't all live to adulthood. If it had all remained that way he rather thought the wizarding world would have a lot less stupid people, and the ministry wouldn't have been necessary (he was convinced it was only invented to protect the stupid witches and wizards from their own silliness, but of course it eventually was infected itself by it).

If he were still capable of having children, he would have been sure to raise them the old fashion way, but the closest thing he had was Harry, and who knew if there would ever be anyone else with as much potential? With no children of his own, Harry would have to carry on the Slytherin line and the gift of parseltongue, while simultaneously serving as his lord as protege, companion, and prince. He had to be careful with him.

Even if testing his limits was so much fun.

It was time that Harry called on a little divine protection. The Earth favored them both, but while he had the benefit of carrying her cause for the next thousand years, Harry's position was more tenuous. Or perhaps transcendental would be a more accurate term. At any moment, She might decide Harry would serve her better as something other than Harry, and reclaim his body and his memories so that his spirit might take some other form and then who Voldemort have to talk to?

So Harry needed protection from a lesser, but strongly influential god. No god would directly defy the Mother, but She was less inclined to interfere with a person under the management of one of her Children.

The sooner Harry found such a deity the better. He needed all the protection he could get.

Ooo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Book IV:

Chapter 14: The Forbidden Land III

"This isn't your fault," Hermione insisted, glaring across the infirmary at Viktor. Madam Pomfrey and the medi-wizard were supervising Diggory's move from Hogwarts to Hogsmeade, where he could be floored to St. Mungo's, and she had snuck into the infirmary to talk to the Durmstang champion for a while before she had to go to class. It wasn't turning out how she had hoped. He was in a rare, petulant mood and as much as she could sympathize with his frustration, she wasn't going to endorse it. It was her friend out there, after all. She had more to lose than pride.

"He's dere, so I could be here," he pointed out, "And he might be dead..."

"Don't be ridiculous," she snapped. "I know him a lot better than you, and he's come out of a lot worse situations than this. He's... designed for adversity."

He turned to her, but she was turned away now, staring out the foggy windows at the forest. The snow had finally stopped, and the gray stretch of trees was clearly visible under the rising sun. If one looked close enough, they could make out the various paths to and from that barren wasteland of trees that had been made in the night. Hermione tried to guess which ones were Harry's, and most of the paths she decided on ran all over the place from the lake to the fields to the castle to the forest. She could make out Cedric's too, the very faintest hint of red shining through the snow. Viktor's wasn't as clear, but she could tell where the centaur must have been carrying him towards the Sleuw's. Even now a handful of Sentinels could be seen walking along the perimeter of the barrier, looking through the snow for evidence.

Last night must have truly been horrible, and she didn't know what news the day would bring. Harry had always survived, but not always unscathed. His luck was too patchy for her comfort.

"Cedric said somezing like dat. Dat doing da impossible is just vat he does. Vhy is dat?" he said, his voice challenging.

She looked back at him, her expression impatient.

"I don't know."

He snorted. "Don't know? Or von't say?"

"What is that suppose to mean?"

"Ever since I came here, dere are all dese vild stories about him and dis feeling dat he's important, but no one really knows anyzing. Vhy is he Voldemort's student? How does he get into all dis trouble? And last night... dere vas somezing vong vith him."

"Viktor, you had a concussion and weren't thinking-"

"No! I know vat I saw. He vas mad. His eyes vere strange. He shouldn't have even been dere! How did he get Diggory's badge? Vhy?"

"To save your ungrateful self!" she snapped at him, and turned to leave. "I'm not discussing this with you, now. Harry is my friend and I'm not going to talk about him behind his back. If you want answers you'll have to wait till he gets back to ask him yourself."

"Vait!"

She turned back and glared at him. "I know you're frustrated with being stuck waiting here while Harry goes off to save the world. Welcome to the club! Meetings are Tuesdays and Fridays. See you there!"

She stormed out, slamming the door behind her, leaving him feeling stupid and even more frustrated. And more than a little like a jerk. She was right. He was being ungrateful and paranoid, but... it was weird. In more ways than one last night had been strange, dream-like even. He needed reasons. Logic, motivations, explanations, even if it was just his mind playing tricks on him. There was nothing to be satisfied with this 'because that's just how it is' attitude everyone here had adopted.

Was Harry good? Wicked? Mad? Mentally ill? If he was, why was everyone covering for him? Why such loyalty and respect? Did it have anything to do with the Dark Lord? What did that mean for the future, when war finally erupted between their countries? Did it mean anything at all in the scheme of things?

He wanted to ask Dumbledore all these things, but even more he wanted to ask Harry himself. To go into that forest and drag him out, sit him down, and demand his answers.

Therein lay the problem, of course. He couldn't do anything. He couldn't go into the forest without his badge, he couldn't have dragged Harry out even if he did, and it was sort of stupid to demand answers with an impenetrable barrier between them. He couldn't even thank him properly like this.

And wasn't that stupid?

Wanting to interrogate him and thank him at the same time. God, he needed to get out of this castle.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Arry... 'Arry...”

Harry blinked sleepily, squinting up at the blurry thing above him. The smell of lavender and lilacs drifted into his awareness.

“Fleur?”

“Shhh... 'ere, Professor Snape zed you might need zese,” she whispered, replacing his glasses with another pair. His vision cleared, and he could see her amused expression and her very bad case of bed head. He looked around, and found things as he feared. So it hadn't been a dream, but when had Fleur gotten there? He found a sleeping palate beside him, and felt heat bloom in his ears as he realized she had been sleeping so close, and that if he had rolled over he would have been on top of her.

“Come on, you must 'urry if you want to zee zem,” she urged quietly, tugging him to his feet. He followed obediently, trying to be as quiet as she seemed intent on being. He eased his way around their fire, now merely a stubbornly glowing smolder of ash, over their satchels and Fleur's broom, and to the entrance of the cave.

“Shhh,” she reiterated, holding up her finger. “You look on zat side, I will look 'ere.”

His first thought was that Firenze had come back with the champion's badge to lead him out, and Fleur intended to attack him not realizing he wasn't really their enemy. Looking outside, however, showed no Firenze, or really anything at all but a lot of white.

“I don't see...”

“Sshhh! Zere, zere!” she insisted, pointing towards his right. He looked again, and saw nothi-

“Oh...” he gasped.

It was difficult to see them clearly against the snow, but as they moved their silhouettes passed over the gray lines of trees like white shadows. Harry had seen a unicorn only once before, when Hagrid had shown him one at the medical bestiary. That creature had been magnificent as it was, but out here in their element they took his breath away.

There was an entire herd, over a dozen, frolicking about like puppies. They didn't sink into the snow like logic demanded, but lingered on top of it, until they decided to roll into it or throw down one of their playmates. Only the stallion, slender and elegant as the rest but nearly twice as large, remained stoic and alert to their surroundings amidst the youthful play. It only took a minute or so for him realize they were there, and his large blue eyes fell on them. There was no cry of alarm, just a shake of his slender head and an annoyed snort.

The rest of the herd cease their play and stood, turning to look at what had their leader's attention.

Harry couldn't breath with so many of them focused on him. He sensed their magic, the pureness of it, so steeped in the most loving aspect of the Earth's power. Their presence here was a gift from her, spontaneously given.

The leader broke into a sprint and disappeared, his herd following him deeper into the forest.

And just as spontaneously taken away.

He let out a sigh, able to breath once again. He turned to Fleur, and felt his breath catch again. The light that slipped through the opening shone down on her, making her appear to glow. Or had it been the sight of the unicorns? As beautiful as she was, he had never seen her as lovely now with that expression of loving, adoration and longing as she watched them disappear.

He quickly looked away, and hoped she hadn't noticed him ogling her.

"Ahem... Ah... when did you get here?" he started, turning back into the cave, where it was warmer. It was also darker so she would be less likely to notice him blushing, as he pretended to prod the fire back to life with another twig.

"Last night... early morning? You zlept right through my arrival, so I let you be. Zer wasn't anyzing to do until it was bright enough."

"Like now?"

"In a bit. Breakfast first, and zome anzers if you please."

He flinched at the thought. What to say? He couldn't give her reasons he didn't know himself. It was like being drunk (he had just little experience with that thanks to Snape), without the benefit of memory loss. He remembered everything he'd done and said and felt, but as far as his thoughts were concerned he was as clueless as everyone else.

She didn't push right away, but let him build up the fire and collect his thoughts, and even left him to cook after she had presented him with eggs, bacon, and a skillet from her bag courtesy of some very thoughtful house elves.

But once they were settle to eat, she started in on him.

“Zo... 'ow did you get Cedric's badge?”

He kept his eyes very carefully trained on his eggs, just in case they rose up to kill him, you know.

“I saw you both after the attack and followed you to the infirmary. You ran right by me. After I found out what happened, I waited till everyone was distracted and took it.”

“Ow did you find out? Not even the medi-wizard knew what 'ad 'appened.”

He thought thought the bacon was starting to look particularly mutinous, and bit it in half before it would instigate a rebellion. He chewed it slowly to make a point to the rest of breakfast. It wasn't a stall tactic, despite what anyone else might have thought.

“Cedric told me.”

“Cedric was 'ardly conscious.”

“Cedric told me,” he reiterated, but didn't elaborate on. “I went to find Viktor. I promised Cedric I would look after him.”

Which was true, even if it wasn't the motivation for his misadventure, it certainly sounded better than 'it seemed like a good idea at the time'.

“How is he?”

She sighed. "Aggravated, I imagine. I know you like to zave people, but being zaved iz 'ard on one's pride. Ezpecially when you are rescued by a little boy, no matter 'ow cute."

He ducked his head in embarrassment.

"And 'ow did you manage to convince zem to let Viktor go?"

"They weren't bad people... at least Firenze wasn't and maybe Ulaither was just pushed too far, but they were stuck in the barrier for days, maybe weeks. They were starving and desperate. All they wanted was to go home, so when I offered to take them out of the barrier they didn't put up a fight. Not until Ulaither finally snapped, anyway. Firenze tried to stop him, but he ran away with the badge and I got stuck."

"Hhmm..." she said, and looked at him thoughtfully. He ate his breakfast slowly, hoping she'd get bored of studying him before he finished eating and ran out of excuses to look at her directly. "I'm sure zere iz more to zis, but I will let it go for now. Ze important thing iz to get you out of 'ere as zoon as pozible."

"Do you have a plan?"

"Do I look like a boy? Of course I 'ave a plan. We are going to find a keystone zat supports ze barrier and destroy it. The barrier will come down, and zen you will be able to leave. Very zimple."

That did indeed sound very simple, so he knew there had to be a catch.

"And you know where the keystones are?"

She lifted a regal brow. "Yes. I 'ave a map."

"How easy will it be destroy these keystones?"

"Very. Zey are eggs."

"Eggs?"

“Ze dragon's eggs. Zey are using ze eggs to channel ze dragon's own magic to make ze barrier. Very clever.”

He thought about that, trying to imagine how such a design worked, but had only the barest notion. He didn't like the idea of destroying an egg though. They were already going to kill the mother, why kill her offspring as well? Hagrid would have happily raised them in her place.

“Is there any we can destroy the barrier without harming an egg? Like move it somewhere to disrupt the magical flow? Break the magical connection somehow?”

She looked at him curiously for a moment, and then smiled indulgently.

“Do not worry, we will not be killing any babies. 'Alf ze eggs are infertile and don't even 'ave a fetus. Just yoke. Ze baby dragons eat zem when zey are born. Ze map shows which is which.”

He sighed in relief and nodded to her. “It's a good plan. I'll get ready.”

“Good, good. Roll up ze zeeping mats while you are at it, will you? I don't intend to come back 'ere.”

“Why not? It'd be a better place to take a break than at the castle. You know, while you're hunting the dragon?”

She gave him sly smile. “Ah, but ze map, you zee, it does not only show ze eggs. It show ze dragon too. No more 'unting for me.”

He gaped at her. Surely, this challenge was null at this point? What with the centaur attack, Cedric at death's door, and yes, his own reckless interference. She laughed at his expression.

“I might not get full points, but I will definitely get enough to close ze point gap with ze ozers.”

He shook his head. She was weird, or maybe just French, but either way there was no reason to tell her exactly how twisted that sounded.

As long as she didn't break into maniacal laughter he thought he might still be safe.

“Well, congratulations, I guess. Lets hope that the third challenge isn't canceled, what with Cedric unable to compete and all.”

She frowned, not liking the thought at all. They had gone through a lot in this tournament, and as much as she hated it she wanted to see it through to the end. She didn't believe in leaving things half done. She didn't believe that other's should either.

“Let us 'ope 'e recovers quickly.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“He hasn't shown up yet. I checked the tower and the infirmary, but no one's seen him. Delacour hasn't shown up either.”

“They moved Diggory to St. Mungo's this morning. He was under a stasis spell. It must have been really bad.”

“There are Sentinels at the barrier, but none went inside. I don't think they can take it down themselves or it's going to take a while.”

McGunny nodded at the three reporters. They had been sent to gather information, along with several others, and were the first to return. They didn't have much information, but they practically confirmed his suspicions. Something very bad had happened in the forest, and Diggory had almost died. Potter had somehow gotten Diggory's badge and gone into the Forbidden Forest, and possibly saved Viktor or at least helped in his escape. Delacour had gone after Harry. Neither had come back yet. The hows, whats, and whys of the situation weren't as clear to him.

“Well done. Let's get to the Great Hall. They'll have to make announcement soon and that's as likely a place as any.”

They nodded, and moved out like faithful soldiers to follow his orders. He felt a dark satisfaction in their obedience, accompanied by a sharp pain behind his eyes. He grimaced and had to stop.

“Are you alright, McGunny?” Delby, his sports writer, asked. He managed a grim smile for him and the others who had turned to see what was the matter.

“Headache. I was up all night, and I’m feeling it now. I’ll be fine after I’ve had some tea.”

That was a true and misleading statement. He had been up all night and he did have a headache, but he had been having headaches off and on for over a month and tea wasn’t going to help them. He thought it might be stress, but that wasn’t something he was going to reveal to his staff. They had to believe in his strength, and admitting that his role took a toll would hurt more than just him.

They continued on to the Great Hall, and split off to their respective seats. The Hall began to fill. The owls dropped off their usual deliveries of newspapers and letters. He ate a bagel distractedly as he scanned his edition of Wizards Weekly, but there was nothing in reference to what had happened at Hogwarts. He looked over at the Gryffindor’s table periodically, but Harry’s spot remained noticeably vacant. The Champion’s absences were glaringly obvious as well.

“Students of Hogwarts-”

He had been so distracted looking at the empty seats, he hadn’t realized that Lestrage had taken the podium to address everyone there. He scrambled to retrieve his notepad and quill from his satchel, as she continued.

“No doubt many of you have become aware that events have taken place last night that appear concerning and strange. I am here to inform you what has had happened and to assure you that it is under control,” she continued, looking completely sincere, and yet completely untrustworthy at the same time. Perhaps it was just because everyone already knew her reputation.

“While in search of the sleeping dragon within the Forbidden Forest, all three champions came under attack by a group of centaurs. During the attack, Cedric Diggory was severely injured. Miss Delacour was able to evacuate him to the medi-wizard's station. He has been stabilized and moved to St. Mungos, and is expected to make a full recovery...”

There was a collective sigh of relief at the Hufflepuff table. She went on for another ten minutes, explaining in a very sugar coated way what had happened. Somewhere in the middle of it, however, Voldemort had arrived and sat himself at the teacher's table. She paused, but he gestured for her to continue, even as he turned to talk quietly with Snape. McGunny wasn't sure what Lestrangle said after that, because his attention was solely riveted on the Dark Lord.

It's his fault. He wanted this to happen. He wants to kill them all.

His headache was worsening, but his rising hatred was smothering the pain. It was definitely Voldemort's fault. Weren't all these deadly challenges his ideas? His designs? Could all these 'accidents' truly be coincidental? Maybe they could have, but not Harry's role in stopping them. How could he have been so conveniently placed each and every time their lives were in danger?

A realization came on him then, horrible but suddenly, overwhelmingly obvious.

Voldemort was trying to kill the champions, and Harry knew and was trying to stop him.

It made perfect sense. Killing the foreign champions and making it look like an accident would incite Germany and France, while the Dark Lord twisted the incident into a regrettable mistake among the British. Killing Diggory would only reinforce the idea of it all being unintentional or perhaps even one of the other champion's fault. Tensions would rise, and it would only take a small incident to start a war.

That was what Voldemort wanted after all. The papers might have called the building of a 'British Assembly of Cultural Preservation' and stockpiling of goods acts of job creation and market regulation, but he knew how to read between the lines. The Dark Lord was building an army and gathering supplies for an invasion.

Harry had to know. As much time as he spent with Voldemort, he must have figured it out or even been told, and now was trying to prevent it. The evil monster couldn't punish Harry for it, not yet. Not with everyone looking at him as a hero, and watching his every move. So instead, Voldemort continued to elevate Harry's heroism in the eyes of the people instead.

It would make his death so much more outrageous, especially when the Dark Lord found some way to lay the blame on the foreigners.

That had to be it. It would explain why Harry always seemed to be in the right place at the right time, why he so readily moved into danger, and why he guarded his reasons so closely. Hadn't he said it himself? 'I can't tell you, even if I wanted to. If Voldemort found out I told you certain things, both of our lives could be in danger.'

Harry knew Voldemort was capable of killing him, and had been trying to protect McGunny. But now what? Did he know his life was already endangered? He had to. Maybe the stolen badge was really a cover, and Harry had escaped. But no, Viktor had already said Potter had rescued him and been caught in the barrier.

"... Mr. Potter is quite safe, and will hopefully be returning to the castle by this afternoon. In the meantime, classes will resume as normal. Good day."

McGunny blinked and forced himself to turn to Lestrage, but the headmistress was already leaving and Voldemort was following her. He turned to his notepad, surprised he had actually been writing what she was saying. He couldn't even remember her speaking. Skimming his notes, he caught on to what was happening. Delacour was bringing down the barrier to rescue Harry, and the ramifications of the night's events would be evaluated and discussed with the foreign ambassadors before it was decided if the tournament would resume or not.

McGunny already knew it would, and once it did, Harry and the other champion's lives would all be in danger again. But what could he do? Facing off against Voldemort directly was out of the question. Perhaps if he told the ambassadors they could help Harry? Maybe... Why hadn't Harry tried that?

Probably couldn't. Secrecy spells or contracts or something. McGunny would have to ask for it on Harry's behalf.

Which would be treason.

His headache was growing, pounding on his temple like a hammer and threatening to overwhelm him. He couldn't think like this. He needed a Headache Relief Potion, and a few hours to think things through.

"Are you alright?" someone asked him. He looked bleakly over the speaker and shook his head.

"I'm going to the infirmary."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"It should be 'ere."

Harry stopped and looked back at Fleur, who was looking down at her map. Trekking through knee deep snow wasn't as fun as he remembered it being from last night. Of course, neither was blood or people trying to kill him when the moon wasn't full. He was going to have to do something about that when he got back.

They were in a small clearing, surrounded on all sides by sprigs of sapling bent nearly in half under the weight of snow. There was nothing special about the area, but if there was some sort of sign of the keystone then it was well buried.

"Where?"

She frowned thoughtfully, and started walking in a large circle. She tightened the circle until it was about a meter wide and finally stopped.

“Zome where in zis zircle. Under ze ground.”

They both got out their wands and started casting their own digging spells. Snow went flying and after a while so did dead plants and then dirt in hard frozen chunks. They worked at it for nearly ten minutes before they had to stop, tired from the repetitious movements of the spell. Their hole was only about half a foot.

They looked at each other.

“I don't suppose you know how deep it's buried?”

“... zix feet?”

“Oh come on!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

She slept deep and had for a long time now, but there was no reason to stir. She felt neither hunger nor thirst, and her clutch remained safe around her with nothing to threaten them. In her dreams she was warm and content, and on those rare occasions she felt inclined to awaken the awareness of a biting cold began to seep into her consciousness and sent her retreating back to the realm of dreams. There was no reason to face such a thing when their lives were not endangered.

Until their lives were endangered.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

They gave up on the digging spells after an hour, when they finally reached soil that wasn't frozen. Fleur found a shovel in her Bottomless Bag, and they took turns digging. The work was hard and dirty. It kept them warm until they stopped and the cold air cooled their sweat slick bodies, and left them shivering. It only got harder as they got deeper, having to fling dirt higher in order to keep it out of the hole.

At some point, Harry started to laugh.

“What iz zo funny?” Fleur asked, confused that he would find amusement in their current situation.

“I was just thinking... you're going to have to dig up a dragon by yourself. Good luck with that.”

She huffed. “I won't dig up ze entire zing!”

“You might have to, if you want to find the head. What if they buried it upside down? Or with its head under its leg? All I'm saying is, I don't envy you. Not at all.”

She kicked a clog of dirt at him, which did very little considering he was already covered in dirt. He continued to work and he was just about ready to give Fleur her turn, when his shovel dug in and a strange cracking sound gave him pause.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

She tensed as something unpleasant and painful course through her body in one violent thump, then stilled. In the aftermath, there was no pain but a great uneasiness had settled over her. She did not feel safe any longer. Reaching out with her senses she anxiously checked on her brood, feeling their magic pulse in time with hers. Lovingly, she wrapped each one in her magic to comfort them and comfort herself in their wellbeing. She knew some of these eggs were empty of life, but they were very much a part of her and she treasured them until the very moment her brood devoured them and made that magic apart of themselves.

She checked each one, and with each one found unharmed she started to relax. Until she came upon the last. There was something wrong.

She stirred.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

They squeezed into the hole together, digging the egg out with their bare hands until at last it was free. They could barely hold it, even with their gloves on, it was burning hot. They tossed it out of the hole and into some snow, and by the time they had climbed out the snow around it had melted around it in a perfect circle.

It was large, but smaller than Harry thought it would be, and hard and leathery at once. The shell was vaguely pink with brown spots, and a large crack on one end where Harry suspected he had hit it with his shovel. They both stared down at it curiously for a long moment, waiting to catch their breath from their labor.

“Congratulations... it's a girl,” Harry joked. Fleur chuckled. “So how do you want to do this? It seems kind of disrespectful to smash it with a shovel.”

“Dangerous too. You felt 'ow 'ot it iz on ze outzide, 'ow 'ot on ze inzide do you zink it iz? If we zmashed it we could get burned.”

Harry frowned. He hadn't even thought of that.

“So no exploding spells and fire or freezing spells probably wouldn't work... Oh! I know!” He went over to their supplies and rummaged through it until he found Gryffindor's sword. “I'll cut it open.”

“Ah, zat should work. Just be careful.”

He unsheathed the blade and took a moment to admire it. Now that he was taking swordsmanship lessons in Dueling Club, he had a better appreciation for the blade. He already knew it was sharp, and magically powerful, but now he knew it was also exceptionally light and well-balanced in a way that only magic wielded by someone or something very skilled would be able to create. The sheath was more precious to him, however. It was a gift from his godfathers, and one that showed they respected him as a fighter as well as their godson.

Fleur made an impatient sound. "Yes, it iz very big and imprezive. Are you done fondling it?"

He burned with embarrassment. Honestly, her mind was dirtier than his! The egg remained where it was, its heat causing steam rise up like smoke. The blade cut through the as if it were paper, slicing it cleanly in half.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Another spike of pain and she felt the death of her egg as keenly as if it were herself being cut in two. She opened her eyes and threw back her massive spiny head to scream out her rage and pain, throwing back mud and water and ice with her violent awakening. She roared into the freezing cold air, until her anger over came her pain and spat out great swaths of fire, setting the surrounding trees alight.

Her tail and wings smashed the surrounding ice to pieces as she clawed her way out of the embankment, shaking free the remnants of the stream that had hidden her resting place. As she reached level ground, she let out another trumpeting roar.

Her egg was destroyed, and her sanctuary defiled. She could not rest again until the threat had been dealt with and her eggs were safe. She was perfectly capable of running, but the trees were too thick and her enemy was no doubt fleeing already, so flight was the only option. With a powerful swiped of her tail she smashed the trees around her into splinters, and with in moments she had cleared enough space to spread her wings. From there it was but a few powerful flaps of her massive wings and she was in the air, flying to meet the slayer of her egg.

And kill it.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The egg fell apart, the pinkish orange yoke poured out, and set the dry grass beneath it on fire. For just an instant the sky swirled with color, like the surface of a soap bubble, before it burst. A sharp burst of wind signaled the fall of the barrier. Neither of them really noticed.

They were both too distracted by the frightening sound of a very, very angry dragon.

“Oh... Snape did not mention zat would 'appen,” Fleur said, rather stunned. “At least I won't 'ave to dig it up.”

Harry, who had experience with this sort of unexpected turn of events, recovered faster.

“Do you have any brooms in your bag?” he asked, sheathing his sword and slipping it into his belt. He stalked over to her bag and tore it open, and began rummaging through it. He pulled things out and tossing them aside, looking deeper and deeper, but it was hopeless looking for things that way. The bag really was bottomless. “How much junk is in this thing?”

She pushed him aside, stuck her hand inside and pulled out a broom instantly and tossed it to him. She reached in to find another, but came up empty.

“Zat's ze only one,” she lamented. “Should we 'ide?”

“And be trapped? She'll find us. She knows what we did. Get on the boom, we're going to make a run for it.”

“I don't-”

Another roar rang through the air, closer than before. The dragon was moving fast, and Fleur needed no further convincing. She got onto the broom behind Harry and wrapped her arms around his waist.

“Go!”

He shot straight into the air, and she tightened her hold as the icy wind nipped at the exposed skin of her ears and face. He flew in a tight circle trying to find the dragon, but it proved unnecessary. It was heading straight for them. Fleur didn't even have time to gasp at the sheer size of it, before Harry had turned the broom in the opposite direction and fled.

"Get to ze castle!" she cried, her voice barely discernible in the roaring wind.

"It's too dangerous! Someone could get hurt!"

"If we don't we could get dead! It iz a castle, it's dezigned to fend off dragons," she reasoned. He grit his teeth and silently conceded, because while he might be able to out fly a dragon by himself, he definitely couldn't with another person.

She was gaining on them, and she was gaining fast.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape was not happy with the world. He hadn't slept at all, wanting to be ready just in case Potter or Delacour showed up needing antidotes from centaur poisons or just to be the first to ream Potter out for being reckless and stupid again. Neither student had turned up, but McGonogall had. Ugh. He must have been more tired than he thought given the things he had said. It had made for a very awkward breakfast atmosphere.

To top it off, even his Slytherins were conspiring to irritate the hell out of him.

"Do you think they're dead?" someone whispered.

"Maybe... I bet Delacour is," replied another.

"Why not Potter?"

"Cause he's a freak like that."

“Parkinson,” he snapped. “Pay attention to what you are brewing, or you'll be testing the end result.”

The girl had the decency to look embarrassed, especially when several people giggled at her expense. For once, Cypher wasn't one of them. She was paying very little attention to what she was doing or anything else for that matter, but at least she was smart enough to let Draco handle the actual potion making. Hermione was making an effort to concentrate, but taking out her frustration on her potions ingredients wasn't doing her any favors.

He went back to grading his papers, annoyed with himself for not getting them done last night, and tried to ignore the continued gossip. Naturally, something else had to go wrong that morning.

Buuuuwwaaaaannggg...

Snape's papers flew out of his hands, and not a few students jumped in fright, knocking over or dropping their ingredients everywhere.

Buuuuwwaaaaannggg...

The class settled, looking around themselves stupidly for the source of the odd sound. It seemed to come from every direction, from the very walls themselves. It took a moment for Snape to identify the sound and when he did, he felt the blood run cold.

Buuuuwwaaaaannggg...

“What the hell did Potter do now?” Draco said, looking more than a little amused. Snape resisted the urge to go up and slap him upside the head. After all, if his godson really knew what that alarm signaled, perhaps he wouldn't be so glib. He could hope anyway.

For now though, the best thing to do was keep the students calm and exactly where they were. When he had first taken his Hogwarts orientation as professor, he still remembered the safety documentary saying that the dungeons were the safest place to be during a dragon attack. They also were the best place to be in case of a tornado, and honestly he had thought he would experience the second long before he ever did the first.

Buuuuwwaaaaannggg...

"Ignore it," he instructed. "It's nothing you should concern yourselves with."

Reluctantly, everyone turned back to their work.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Buuuuwwaaaaannggg...

Viktor woke with a jolt, throwing aside his blankets and scrambling to his feet.

"It's the dragon."

He spun around, blindly groping for the wand that wasn't on him. McGunny stood by a window, looking at him blankly. Beside him another bed, ruffled from use, and a school bag. The Ravenclaw must have been there for quite some time, yet Viktor couldn't recall when he had arrived.

Buuuuwwaaaaannggg...

"Vat? Vat about the dragon?"

"It's awake. It must have awoken when the barrier came down," he said coolly. "You need to hurry."

Buuuuwwaaaaannggg...

Viktor opened to ask 'For what', but then he realized. The dragon was awake. That meant something had happened, something had gone wrong and Fleur and Harry were in danger. He scrambled to dress and find his wand, ignoring McGunny's unwavering stare. The other boy didn't say a word until Viktor was half way to the door.

"When you're done," he called. "come back and see me. Harry is still going to need your help after this."

Again Viktor began to ask 'For what?', but another chime of the alarm alerted him to his more urgent task. Once he was gone, McGunny turned back to the window, watching the distant form of Harry flying closer and closer.

Buuuuwwaaaaannggg...

"I would appreciate you not dying today, my friend," he said softly, "You still owe me a story."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Buuuuwwaaaaannggg...

"Move quickly, but do not run!" McGonogall instructed, moving her class towards the dungeons. Her group soon caught up with Flitwick's class, and both teachers fell in line with each other.

Nearly Headless Nick floated above them.

"Isn't this exciting?" he said cheerfully, "I haven't been through one of these in centuries. Used to have them almost once a month when I was a boy."

Buuuuwwaaaaannggg...

"Ooohh... that sound still gives me chills."

The professors shared a look.

"Don't look at me," Flitwick said, "He's your House's ghost."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Arry! Dive!”

He didn't question Fleur's frantic command, pointing his broom down into the inner courtyard. Fire rushed over their heads, followed by six tons of muscle, teeth, and claws focused only on their demise. The dragon flew passed, and Harry took the opportunity to fly into the covered walkway and out of sight.

“What should we do?” he asked, trembling from the the close call. “I didn't think she would follow us into the school.”

“Why not? Dragons are infamous for taking over castles,” she pointed out, trying to sound unconcerned even though she was shaking just as hard.

“I thought you said castles were designed to keep dragon's out!”

“Zey are! Zey just aren't designed to keep zem away!”

The dragon suddenly landed onto the awning of the walkway, smashing part of it in. She let out a deafening roar and slapped her tail angrily on the courtyard, sending clods of earth and rock flying. Fleur tightened her grip around Harry, and if he hadn't stopped breathing before hand he wouldn't have been able to now. They didn't dare speak or even move from their hiding spot as the beast snarled and sniffed, slowly hunting them down.

Harry knew it wouldn't take the dragon long to find them, but he couldn't just fly out into the open. They were so close to it that either the tail or the teeth would kill them before they could get away. Carefully, he began to fly his broom backwards, silently moving it towards the entryway to a western corridor.

The dragon suddenly stopped sniffing. Harry instinctively stopped as well. In his ear, Fleur's breath, already loud and fast, quickened.

“Harry,” she whispered. “Our shadow.”

He gasped, realizing they were already outed, spun his broom around and bolted for it. A massive spiny tail came at them from the side, smashing through a column and barely missing them. They flew through the doorway, too fast for so little room and hit a wall with the sides of their bodies. The dragon's snout followed them through, snapping its dagger-like teeth close enough for them to catch the spittle.

"Fulmenio!" Fleur shouted, flinging out her wand. An bolt of light flew out at the dragon, and hit it square in its open mouth. The dragon pulled back in surprise, tearing apart the door way with her plated head. Harry pushed the broom forward to escape.

Another angry roar, and the entry way they had just left was suddenly filled with fire, and it rushed up either end of the hall, knocking out windows and setting tapestries ablaze. He pushed the broom faster, taking the first available turn and let the flames speed pass them.

Voldemort is going to kill me for that, Harry lamented, then realized he probably wasn't going to live long enough to have to face the dark wizard at this point. His choice in turns was unfortunate, because now he was in a heavily windowed corridor looking into the courtyard. And what a marvelous view he had of the dragon tearing at the still burning mortar. The castle was already beginning to repel the attack, smothering the flames and pushing the stones back into the place, but the dragon's destructive rage was winning out. He needed a plan and fast.

"Fleur, can you apparate?"

"What?"

"Do you know how to apparate?!"

"Not in ze castle! It's warded!"

"If I take you past the castle grounds can you apparate?"

"I... I won't leave you!"

"You'd be doing me a favor! Once your off the broom I can definitely out fly it!"

'Definitely' was a little strong, but he was fairly certain he could.

“No! It iz too dangerous. We should just move deeper into ze castle or ze dungeons. Ze Zentinels will be 'ere any- 'ARRY!”

Their choice was taken from them by six tons of death blasting through stone and glass, damn near crushing them. They were throw aside violently, knocked from the broom and sent rolling across the corridor until each hit the wall. Dazedly, they tried to reorient themselves and stumbled to their feet. The dragon was also disoriented, and in the confusion Harry snatched up the broom and Fleur and slipped through the impromptu opening.

Their take off was shaky at best, but their destination was clear. They moved towards the lake as quickly as they could, striving for as much distance between them and their would-be assassin as they could.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort strode briskly towards the castle entrance, making a point to cross through the still smoldering courtyard on his way. The castle was steadily reassembling itself, but the damage was still obvious. Bricks pulled themselves together imperfectly, parts of them ground into powder and burnt wooden frames of the windows barely held themselves together, let alone any glass that hadn't been shattered or melted.

It was quite impressive, Voldemort admitted to himself, but he wished the dragon's power could have been exercised on something more deserving. Like Durmstang's boat or Madam Pudifoot's. At least he had some ideas on how to further fortify the castle against external attacks, which he would have Lestrangle implement during the summer.

He'd make Harry help, he decided, as punishment for this entire fiasco. If he survived.

The Dark Lord exited the castle keep and looked around. He could see a dozen Sentinels he had posted around the barrier running towards the lake, ready and willing to face this latest threat, but they would be too late. They hadn't thought to carry brooms and apparating wasn't possible

Harry and Delacour were half way across the lake, another mile from the anti-apparition boundary, and dragon had already caught up to them. They could not out fly their pursuer, and were forced to get clever. Harry was flying as low as he dared and turning sharply, forcing the dragon to fly higher and make wider turns or risk losing its updraft and send it crashing into the ice. The flames were much harder to dodge, but Delacour proved her worth by casting Shield Spell after Shield Spell and a few attack spells just to keep the dragon cautious.

They were still losing. Their magic or their luck would run out long before the dragon's rage did, and they were getting no closer to the boundary now.

Voldemort closed his eyes and took a deep breath, ready to exert some very interesting magic, but a noise behind him drew his attention and he spun around instinctively, his wand jumping into his hand. Krum's wand found its owner's hand just as quickly, and the two found themselves facing each other in equally defensive positions. Voldemort scowled.

"You should be inside with the others," he said darkly, feeling more than a little distrustful. What was this child doing sneaking up behind him? Then he noted there was a broom in Krum's hand.

"I should be killing da dragon. Isn't dat da challenge?" he snapped back, his voice thick with accusation.

Voldemort arched his brow, then relaxed. He smirked, and pointed out towards the lake where his protégé and Delacour fought for their lives. "Then by all means, you better hurry. The Beauxbaton's girl has a head start on you."

The Durmstang Champion's furious expression made Voldemort chuckle, and for a moment the Dark Lord thought the child would have the audacity to attempt to hex him. But no, Krum was in a hurry, and ran passed him, barely clear of him when he jumped on his broom and sped out towards the lake.

Voldemort took another deep breath, gathering his magic, then held it. Krum had just challenged him, which was the first interesting thing he had seen the champion do since he had arrived. He wanted to see how far the boy's bravado would take him. If things got out of hand, he would intercede, but wanted to test this one's strength first.

Especially if there was a chance they might meet on the battle field.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry made another sharp turn, nearly dragged off his broom as Fleur struggled to keep her balance with one arm around him and the other waving widely. A mace like tail swung pass them, skimming the ice. The dragon lost some of her balance and wavered clumsily in the air, until a few power flaps of its wings brought it higher and she steadied..

"That was close," he huffed, taking the opportunity to move further across the lake.

"Faster!" she begged breathlessly, fear and exhaustion leading her steadily towards desperation.

"I can't. No unless you want to get off and run," he snapped back, fear and exhaustion leading him steadily towards irritability. It proved a mistake on both their parts, for the second and half they had focused on each other, they had taken their attention off the dragon. She reasserted her significance in their concentration by nearly dropping on top of them. Her legs on either side of him and a tail swinging behind, he could only move forward, and risk the teeth and fire. They slipped out from underneath her with all their limbs, but she caught the bristles of their broom in her mouth and flung them.

The broom snapped, and Fleur fell off the back while Harry was tossed further away. He landed on his side, and even with all the snow to cushion him, the pain was incredible. It ran the entire length of his arm, before the intensity of it faded into total numbness. His glasses were lost, but there was blood leaking into his eyes so it didn't matter any way.

"Ahh..." he moaned, and forced himself to sit up. "Fleur?"

"Run!" she screamed, but it was impossible. He didn't even know if he could stand.

An angry snarl reminded him of the danger, and he forced himself to his feet, stumbling away from the dark fuzzy mass of maternal rage. The dragon had landed, or crashed really in her attempts to catch them, and partially broken through the ice. The back half of her body had slipped beneath the water, while her arms and wings and head struggled to pull her out again. The ice was thick, but she was heavy and having already broken it she was struggling to find a patch that would support her weight.

She was close enough that even Harry's addled wits knew he was still in danger.

He stumbled over the hem of his cloak as he attempted to flee and fell, unable to stand again for the pain and dizziness that over came him. The dragon noticed him again. She continued to struggle, but now she struggled towards him, snapping at him and tearing away the ice he was collapsed on.

"ARRY!"

The dragon grew impatient and drew back her head, her chest filling with fire. Harry laid there frozen, his thoughts of fire flitting through his mind.

His little room the Dursley's, his painting bursting into flames and Dudley wrestling the cursed bedsheets.

Voldemort standing by the fire place during Christmas break, grinning at him wickedly. 'Want to see something interesting?' He shoved his hand into the fire and pulled out a piece of it, a perfect sphere of flames hovering above his open palm.

Writing in his journal, the candle on his desk flickering for no reason.

Teacher Brennan and the others sitting around the fire pit, stirring up the flames with a poke. "The body is composed of earth, but life is made from fire..."

He closed his eyes tight, expecting indescribably pain and then...

"Fragorio!"

There was explosion, a wave of heat, and inhuman screech of pain.

He opened his eyes again. He could not see any better, but he knew that voice.

"Viktor!"

Fleur was suddenly beside him, forcing him to his feet and pulling him away.

"Move, you fool!"

"Congelo!"

Fleur hesitated, then shoved him forward, forcing him to stumble away on his own.

"Go! Keep going!"

"What are you...?"

She had already turned back towards the fight, however, and begun waving her wand.

"Congelo!"

Viktor repeated the spell, then Fleur, and then Viktor again. Each moving round and round the dragon moving in as close as they dared, as it snarled and snapped and blew fire at them. The ice around it began to thicken, but rather than try to climb onto it the dragon was now trying to escape it, as it began to form around her claws and wings, sticking them to the ice and holding her there so that she couldn't move. Every time she turned to melt ice growing on one part of her body with her fire, the wizard and witch summoned ice somewhere else.

The ice was slowly winning, and so were they. Slowly, ever so slowly, the dragon began to weaken and slow, her enraged cries turning instead to panicked shrieks as the ice climbed over her, until only her head remained free courtesy of her flaming breath. Even that was slowly being taken away. She could no longer expand her chest to breath deep. She could barely breath at all.

Her cries fell into pitiable whimpers. Harry's heart clenched.

“Stop!”

Fleur and Viktor broke off the spell. There was a moment of silence, but for the dragon's long suffering groan.

“It can not live,” Viktor said. “If it lives, it vill come for you again. Dey remember der grudges until dey die.”

“I know but...”

“It iz awful, but we can't stop. It will only make it worse for 'er.”

Harry nodded, “I know, but... not like this. It's too horrible. I... I can make it quick.”

He turned back towards the dragon, and forced himself to move as quickly towards her as he could, intent on not prolonging her suffering or allow his feelings to runaway with his resolve. His left arm was useless, hanging limply from its socket, but his right was still good and he used it to withdraw the Sword of Gryffindor from its sheath. He didn't know if dragons had any sense of dignity or pride, but if they did he hoped the death he offered her was one she would find befitting.

Her moaning had subsided into calm shallow breaths, even as his own sped up as he approached her. This close beside her, even with his lousy vision, he could see her yellow eyes and the myriad of emotions drifting across her reptilian face. Hate. Resignation. Regret. Ice was still forming and gradually moved up to cover even her eyes. At least, she wouldn't see it coming, even though she obviously knew it was.

"I'm sorry," he said, and slid the blade home.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort sighed in relief, regathering his scattered magic back into him. Now that the dragon was at peace, he no longer needed to supplement the champions' Freezing Spells with his own magic. Hopefully, none of them had noticed him do it. He didn't like the idea of the foreigners knowing he had this particular talent. There weren't very many wizards who could send their magic over a mile in such a subtle manner, and for certain less publicly acceptable actions this was a useful skill.

It was a necessary risk, however. The two of them would not have been enough to over power the dragon, and Harry was in no state to help them even if he knew the spell.

Still, he hadn't anticipated Harry making the final blow. It sent a shiver down his spine thinking about it. The potential power behind such an act. The slaying of a dragon was no small thing after all, and he fully intended for his pupil to take full advantage of it.

After his punishment, of course.

Book IV

Chapter 15:

For once the Reicher household did not wake to the usual morning chaos that Robert now associated with two little girls who could not tell the difference between 'wake up' and 'wake up when you feel like it' and a private school that didn't care to explain it to them. There was no frantic searches for socks that matched, homework assignments, or barrettes, no races to the bathroom and wrestling matches for the mirror, no whining about breakfast, their teacher, or each other, and no negotiations about what would or would not be packed in their lunch boxes (there was no way Kyle would let his girls eat anything that was served off an assembly line no matter how much Robert complained their ridiculous tuition included it).

On this particular morning, it was the first day of the holiday break, and Robert was quite happy to enjoy the company of his daughters still happily in their pjs, giggling over their green Christmas tree shaped pancakes and Kyle and his endless (and somewhat obnoxious) holiday cheer. His own work was at a standstill as the Court of Legal Affairs and the Court of Licenses, Registrations, and Permits was bogged down with last second cases and end of the year paperwork, and his own projects were on hold until paperwork could all be filed.

So he was looking forward to nothing more exciting or eventful happening than was typical of this time of year (which was rather eventful with two young daughters intent on catching one of Santa's spying elves and Kyle's insistence that they each have at least a half a dozen sugar cookies throughout the day). This was perhaps why he wasn't prepared to open his newspaper to find Harry Potter sitting on top of the corpse of very BIG, very DEAD dragon, and dropped his coffee in his straight into his lap.

"OUCH! DAMMIT!" he shouted, and jumped to his feet.

"Robert!" Kyle glared at him, and pointed to Morgana, looking scandalized, and Alyssa, who looked ready to burst out laughing.

“Sorry,” he muttered, and grabbed himself a towel.

“What happened anyway? Are we being invaded by orcs?” his husband inquired, looking amused now that the profanity had passed.

“No... dragons this time. No worries, Prince Harry dealt with them.”

There was a predictable squeal of delight, and the girls abandoned their pancakes in favor of his newspaper and even Kyle came over to see what the latest news was about. Splashed across the front page was Harry and the dragon, plus another older boy and girl and the headline was practically screaming 'Harry Potter Slays Dragon As New Hogwarts Champion'. Their prince certainly didn't look particularly happy about the whole affair, looking rather beat up but still somehow more impressive for it. The sword was a nice touch.

The article read like a cheap adventure story, throwing out images of a speedy chase and a life or death battle. There was only a sentence or two mentioning a dislocated shoulder and a concussion, and nothing dedicated to the fact that a fourteen year old was nearly set on fire and eaten for no good reason at all. There was a little speculation on how precisely Harry had become the champion and what had happened to the last one and how the dragon got out of the warded boundary, but to the adults it was obvious that what little was said was romanticized drivel. They smiled and 'oohed' and 'awwed' with their little girls, who couldn't be expected to understand what Harry had just faced, but when they went off to play 'Harry vs the Dragon', they sat down together to say what they really thought.

“Kyle, I'm starting to have serious doubts about the Dark Lord as a parental figure.”

“It's a pity the adoption papers you submitted weren't approved.”

Robert blinked. “What? When did I fill out those?”

“It was in that pile of school forms you signed last year.”

“... You sneak! You said those were permission slips for dance lessons!”

“They were... at least half of them!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

He went out to Hagrid's house (he had been given the cabin the medi-wizard had stayed in during the second challenge for the remainder of his stay as thanks for finding and bring Viktor safely back to Hogwarts) after dinner, but before dueling club practice. He wasn't looking forward to the meeting, but he needed to get away from everyone and Hagrid was the least likely to congratulate him for killing the dragon. Of course, that meant he probably wasn't going to have a particularly pleasant visit.

The little house had a much larger door than Harry remembered, and that was obviously necessary, but it did nothing to ease his anxiety as it loomed over him. He tapped it softly, unrealistically afraid it would fall on top of him, and squash him flat. There was a loud baying bark at the door, followed by a booming 'down boy!' and scratching at the door. Harry very much hoped that was really only a dog, and a normal one at that. He was well aware of Hagrid's eccentricity when it came to pets.

The man swung open the door, looking around curiously until they landed on Harry. His expression was completely blank for just a moment, and then his eyes narrowed.

“What you be want'n then?”

Harry flinched. He had expected this. Hagrid had been outraged by the whole idea of the second challenge, and Harry's participation and conclusion of it wasn't going to endear him to the man. It didn't make the rejection hurt any less.

“I... I needed to talk to you... about something,” he said, staring down at his shoes. There was a tense silence, and Harry was almost certain Hagrid was going to close the door in his face.

“Fine. Come in then, yer lett'n out all the warm air.”

Hagrid moved away from the door, and he cautiously followed the giant man inside. Hagrid hadn't wasted time making the little house his own. The furniture had all been enlarged (by who, he hadn't the foggiest as he had never seen Hagrid with a wand) and rough wooden items and furs predominated the decor. An enormous black wrinkly dog regarded him balefully from beside the fireplace.

"So what ya want to say?"

Harry turned back to Hagrid who now had his back turned to him, fussing with a tea kettle.

"Um... it's about... ah, well... I talked to Bill this morning. Bill Weasley, you know? Is chief of safety and-"

"I know Bill," he said curtly.

"Oh, right, of course you do. Well, he was saying with the barrier broken down, the stasis spells the dragon eggs are under are starting to wear off, and they're going to need to be taken care off. I thought... I mentioned to him that you might be interested. I told him you have experience with... spirited animals. He said I should ask you."

Hagrid went very still, which wasn't particularly safe since he had just little a match to light the stove and seemed to have forgotten about it. Forgot about it until burned his fingers. He grumbled a curse, suckled his scalded finger. Then he looked back to Harry, who was relieved to see he didn't look angry anymore. Just exasperated.

"Why'd you do it, lad? Wh'd you kill er? She jus wanted to be lef alone to care fer er little'un's."

Harry looked up him helplessly.

"I didn't go into that forest to start a fight with her. I would happily have let her sleep forever, but things happened. A lot of things happened really fast, and I had to make a decision. I didn't want to hurt her, but I didn't want to die either. And she would have killed me and Fleur, and who knows who else? I'm sorry any of it happened.

This stupid game. My stupid decisions. You have no idea how much I regret all of it.”

Hagrid let out a heavy sigh and sat himself in his chair, tea forgotten. He ran his hands through his hair and his beard, struggling to think of what to say. He still wasn't happy with what had happened, but he didn't blame Harry. Perhaps he never had. He was sort of awkward when it came to being angry.

“So...” the giant man said after a long moment. “How many eggs we talk'n bout?”

Harry smiled cautiously.

“Three alive, two empty.”

“Yikes. They'll be fight'n over their share the moment they hatch.”

Harry grinned.

“I'm sure you can handle it. Although, you might need to fire proof your house... and your beard.”

oo
oo

“I am sorry, I was being such a jerkyesterday,” Viktor said as he escorted Hermione from the Great Hall to the Dueling Hall. She didn't honestly need an escort with her brother trailing behind them with his unpleasant redheaded friend, but he hadn't had much time to talk with her since their fight yesterday and he didn't know if she was still mad at him. She didn't look mad. She was smiling in her usual, coy way.

“I'm sorry too. We were both frustrated and upset, and took it out on each other. I know you just wanted to understand what was happening, but I didn't have any answers and that just made things worse. Lets just forget about it,” she said, and he was perfectly happily to do just that. “Thank you, by the way, for going out to rescue Harry and Fleur. Harry is trying to downplay the danger he was in to make be feel better, but I know he would have died if you hadn't shown up. You really are a hero."

He hadn't thought of anything that happened yesterday as 'good' except for the part where everyone survived. The situation should never had happened, there were so many careless mistakes by everyone, and he still had more questions than answers. He had his fair share of accolades from the youngest first year to the German Ambassdor to Voldemort (gag) himself, but it wasn't until Hermione had thanked him for saving her friend, and not just for killing the dragon, that he felt any sort of pride for what he had accomplished.

"Just... I vas just returning da favor," he said, and then mentally flinched. That was not a very heroic thing to say. Luckily, he was saved from floundering for a better response. They had reached the Dueling Hall and stopped, and just as it looked as if Hermione might just lean forward to kiss him on the cheek (he had never once kissed him on the mouth and he was starting to wonder why*), her brother and his friend came up behind them and escorted her straight through the door.

"We'll take it from here," Draco said, his smile stiff and unfriendly. "Don't want to be late."

"Draco!"

Ron gave him a particularly nasty glare, and slammed the door shut behind them. Viktor stared at the door for a long moment, baffled and somewhat amused. Honestly, how could Hermione's 'big brother' be so much less mature than his sister? For that matter, what was that other kid's problem?

He gave a mental shrug and headed off to the Hogwarts' Herald office to find McGunny. The boy had warned him of Harry's continued peril even after the dragon, and that made Viktor suspect the other boy knew something about the strange events that had been happening. More than anything, Viktor wanted clear answers.

He had only been by the newspaper office once or twice, usually accompanied by Hermione, and right then it was even more frantically busy than before and he hadn't realized that was possible. The staff all ignored him as he entered, bent over their typewriters in deep concentration or running back and forth between the printing press, McGunny's office, and various reporters. He snagged one of the photographers dashing toward's McGunny's office. The boy blinked up at him.

"Hermione's not here," he said.

"I am not here to see her. I'm here to see McGunny."

"Oh... I'll tell him you're here."

Viktor let him go and he dashed the rest of the way into the office. A moment later he returned.

"He'll see you. Go on in."

Viktor did. The door snapped shut behind him and the first thing out of McGunny's mouth was an anti-spying spell cast on the entire office. It startled him a lot more than it should have. McGunny's office was tiny, with barely enough room to walk around his old teacher's desk, but unlike the rest of the main office it was tidy and neat, with all the papers carefully filled away or sitting in mail slots. The first issue of the Hogwart's Herald was hung on the wall, each article had been snipped out and hung in its own custom frame so that the entirety of it came together as a misshapen jigsaw.

"I'm glad you came," McGunny said, although there was nothing particularly happy about his expression. "But next time a little more discretion would be appreciated."

"Vat do you know about Harry?"

"Right to the point. Good. We only have about ten minutes before they start to wonder what we're doing. And to answer your questions, I know a lot about Harry and the true purpose behind this tournament, and even a little bit about you."

Viktor scowled, already impatient with the runaround.

"Then say it."

McGunny didn't for a moment, either to prove who was in charge or to organize his thoughts, he didn't know and didn't care. He wanted answers now.

"Voldemort intends to kill you."

The words sent a jolt up his spine. He couldn't say anything, and after a long moment, McGunny continued, highlighting the Dark Lord's plot to murder the champions and instigate a war, and of Harry's desperate attempts to stop it, and the risk he had obtained in doing so. As each event that occurred from the moment of his arrive unfolded from this new point of view, it all started to fall together into something terrifying.

"And Harry's strange behavior when he went into the forest?"

McGunny hesitated there, but after checking his watch, continued.

"He has a condition. I'm not sure of the specifics, but the full moon triggers a sort of madness. I believe it's from the Dark Lord performing some sort of magical experiments on him. He didn't behave this way until he came back from summer vacation, and I know for a fact he spent part of that time under the Dark Lord's care."

"Voldemort experiments on him?" he asked, horrified by the prospect. He had seen nothing in Harry's behavior to suggest there was such a heinous form of abuse, but it did make an awful sort of sense.

"I think so. I can't be positive. My belief is it revolves around some sort of immunity to Lycanthrosis. You have been told about his godfathers?"

Viktor nodded hesitantly. He had been told, but hadn't really believed it. So that was true as well?

"He's spent the last two summers with them, and they guarded him most of last year. It would make a sort of sense, but again I can't be positive. He's never hurt anyone though, and the teachers are aware of it and don't seem concerned. But enough of that, I didn't tell you all of this to satisfy your curiosity."

"How do you know any of this to begin with?"

McGunny gave him a bland look. "It's what I do, and I'm very good at it. For instance, I know that Durmstang's intentions for being here are no more pure than the Dark Lord's reasons for inviting you."

Viktor stiffened. What did he know? His thoughts jumped to the strange owl that night in the Hogsmeade cellar, and he wondered if McGunny might not some how be responsible.

The Ravenclaw put his hand into his pocket, pulled something out, and held it out to him. It was a small silver star. More importantly, it was Viktor's portkey. Immediately, he searched for it in his robe and found it. He looked at McGunny quizzically.

"Oh, so you have another. I got this one out of your boot while you were resting in the infirmary. I think I'll keep this one then."

"How did you-"

"It's what I do, Viktor. Like I said, I'm good at it. But we only have another minute or two left, so lets get to the heart of the matter. I want you to take Harry back to Germany."

"Vat?! Vat are you talking about?"

"Harry put himself in great danger to protect you and the peace between our countries. You owe it to him to take him with you somewhere safe. France, Germany, Timbaktu, it doesn't matter, as long as the Dark lord can not reach him."

"I... I don't have dat authority."

"But Ambassador Schwartzmann does. Ask him. I bet he would do it for the chance to remind the world exactly what sort of monster Britain's ruler is."

Viktor thought for a moment, and realized that was true. McGunny had thought this through extremely well, which made him wonder...

"Why? Why are you doing dis? If you vere found out you could be tried for treason."

McGunny didn't answer him though, merely stood up from his desk, and canceled the anti-spying charm.

"That's all the time I'm afraid I can spare for now. Come back later with a response to my questions and we can continue the interview from there."

"Vat are you-"

The door burst open and a reporter hurled herself inside, though she halted as soon as she saw Viktor.

"Oh, sorry! I didn't mean to intrude!"

McGunny shook his head. "That's alright. We're done here. Any luck reaching Diggory's family?"

"I don't know if they got the letter or not, they haven't sent a reply. They must be swamped with sympathy letters though-"

Viktor stalked out, knowing he wouldn't get anymore answers today. Perhaps that was for the best, because he had far too more answers than he knew what to do with. Heaven and Earth, what was he going to do? It was all awful and terrifying, and in some ways fantastic. Voldemort was the devil, manipulating everyone including his own countrymen. Harry was a victim, trying to be the hero, but he needed the sort of help Viktor would gladly extend if he could.

Perhaps he could convince Hermione to come too, if she knew both her best friend and the one who loved her would remain by her side. What would bind her to this place? Hermione loved this school and her education and perhaps her foster brother, but what could she do with it all once she graduated? She had been adopted by purebloods, but was a muggleborn herself, leaving her stuck between two different class prejudices and with slim prospects for careers or relationships. In Europe, someone of her talents and beauty would be accepted and appreciated in almost any field.

He was getting ahead of himself though and he couldn't afford to do that. He had to talk with Ambassador Schwartzmann to warn him and see if this rescue attempt was even possible, before he even thought about broaching the subject with Hermione. He should probably talk to Dumbledore too, but he was afraid to return to the cellar. Did McGunny know about it? If McGunny had figured out this much, couldn't someone else have as well?

One step at a time he decided. He needed to talk to the ambassador first.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The dragon was killed on Monday. Harry made it till Wednesday before the other shoe dropped. The first warning came in Potion's class, when he received a detention from Snape to make up for the potion's work he had missed and the two missing essays. As he was walking out the door at the end, Snape stopped him for a moment.

"Don't make plans for this afternoon."

He received no elaboration, and wasn't going to push it. He hadn't gotten a caning yet and he wasn't about to remind the potions master of that fact. He hoped that wasn't what this afternoon was about. Classes dragged on, and he counted the minutes. When they were done, he baled out of hanging out with his friends, citing his mountain of homework he was behind on and the exams the next day. He didn't think they believed him, as he had been using that excuse since he had returned to the castle. It wasn't his habit to share his depression.

The library was his refuge. Most people took one look at his mountain of books and took the hint, and he really did have a lot of school work to catch up on. He got through one of his potion's essays and his reading for Celtic class, when McGonagall came looking for him.

"All alone, Mr. Potter?"

He looked up at her, smiled wanly and gestured towards his books.

"Just playing catch up."

She regarded speculatively, then seemed to remember why she was there.

"Lord Voldemort is waiting for you in the castle keep. He said you should dress warmly."

"Did he say what this is all about?"

"No, but I wouldn't keep him waiting. I already sent your friend Clyde for your cloak and gloves. Go, I'll collect your books."

He nodded. "Thanks, Professor."

Clyde met him at the bottom of the stairs with his scarf, gloves, and his warm black cloak (his Baluvian one was being cleaned by the house elves and had yet to be returned). They shared a disparaging look.

"I don't suppose you'll actually come back in one piece for once?" Clyde asked.

"If he meant to kill me, he would have done it already. Don't tell Hermione about this, okay? She'll just worry."

His friend shook his head. "If she asks I'm going to tell her. Being lied to hurts worse than worrying. Give her a little bit more credit."

Harry ducked his head, ashamed. He really was getting carried away in his lies. He used to only do it because he had to, and now Clyde had just pointed out that he was doing to avoid hurting people, which was a self-deluding lie in itself.

"Yeah, you're right. Sorry. See you at dinner, then, I hope."

"I'll save you a potato. With cheese and bacon..."

Harry grinned at him. So Clyde had remembered his favorite food? That was strangely touching.

"Thanks."

Voldemort was waiting for him just where McGonagall had said he would be, and across the bridge, Harry could see the Dark Lord's black car. It was the first Harry had seen him since Monday, and then it had only been a brief glance through the open door of the infirmary, where Madam Pomfrey had been preparing to pop his arm back into his socket. It was strange that they should meet so long after the fact, but the man must have been busy cleaning up the entire mess.

"You look tired, Harry."

"Too much homework. Where are we going?"

Voldemort turned and led him out to the car. Victoria was there in her chauffeur's uniform, holding open the back door for them and looking worried. That wasn't a good sign. He gave her a reassuring smile as he climbed into the back seat with the Dark Lord. Chief Sentinel Morgan was there as well, which made Harry suspect this was an official matter rather than a personal one between Teacher and Pupil.

"We need your help with something, Harry, in order to wrap up this entire messy business," Voldemort said, once they had all settled comfortably. "Our foreign visitors have agreed to overlook your blatant violation of the Tournament regulations due to the extenuating circumstances. It helps that Diggory listed you as his second in the event that anything happened to him."

Harry frowned. "I was still registered as his second? I turned him down though."

"I minor technicality I neglected to mention."

That made Harry smile just a bit, until he realized what he was just been told.

“Wait a minute, you mean I'm the Hogwart's champion now? How does that work? I'm not old enough!”

Voldemort smirked. “That rule only applies to selections made by the Goblet of Fire. Selections are a personal choice by the Champion and can include anyone. Admittedly, that is an oversight on my part. It would have made things quite awkward if Diggory had chosen the captain of the Chudley Cannons or Newton Settlebeek*. It worked out in our favor this time.”

Harry sighed. The year had just gotten that much more difficult.

“That's what you get for interfering in things that are none of your business,” Voldemort said, unsympathetically. Harry shrugged. That was very true.

“This last one wasn't entirely my fault.”

“Which is the only reason I haven't crucioed you. As things stand I will let your training for the third challenge be punishment enough. You will report to Professor Snape every Saturday morning and whenever else he tells you to until the end of the year.”

Harry grimaced but nodded. Honestly, it didn't sound that bad. He wasn't expecting to have fun, but he suspected it would be more productive than his own self training for Dueling Club. Not that he was going to let anyone think his time spent with Snape was anything but a cruel and heinous punishment. Particularly not Voldemort.

“I'll do my best.”

“You better.”

“And the nutty behavior during the full moon? I don't suppose you have a solution for that?”

"I have a few thoughts on the matter, but I'll discuss those with you alone when return to the castle."

Harry snuck a peek over at Morgan, who was so quiet and still it was easy to forget he was there. Morgan looked back steadily, but there were no clues to figuring out what they were all going to do in his blank face.

"If all of this is settled already, then what are we doing out here?" he asked, looking out the window. They didn't really seem to be going anywhere. Instead of taking the road to Hogsmeade, they were now driving along the edge of the Forbidden Forest without any road in sight. The day was unreasonably warm and sunny for the season, and the snow from the weekend blizzard was wet and slushy.

"You'll see. We're almost there."

After a few minutes, the car turned and entered the forest through the slimmest of openings in the trees. The forest here was different than what it had been in the barrier. Here everything came and went as it pleased, and there was air of foreboding at a level beyond what Harry had previously experienced. He was starting to become nervous.

The ground was without a path and even the charmed car was having trouble giving them a smooth ride. It shook and jerked randomly for a few more minutes, until they entered a clearing and smoothed out again. Harry looked out and felt his heart jump into his throat.

This was definitely their destination.

Some thirty to forty Sentinels encircled the clearing, some facing out into woods to watch for danger, but most of them facing a small herd of centaurs gathered together in the middle. There were a little over twenty, but half of them were too young to be considered adults and seven of them were mares, one an old man, and the rest strapping but clearly overwhelmed stallions. Among the stallions he recognized Firenze and Ulaithur.

He turned back to Voldemort and Morgan, who were staring back at him, but neither's expressions had changed. The car came to a stop, and Victoria opened the door for them. They climbed out. The centaurs all turned towards them, seeming to know who their fate rested with. A Sentinel came over to meet them.

"Is this all of them?" Morgan asked.

"Most of them. I think half a dozen mares got away, but it didn't seem worth the effort to go after them. You said we were looking for stallions, yeah?"

Morgan didn't reply, instead turning to Harry.

"Do you recognize the ones who attacked the champions?"

"What?" Harry turned to Voldemort who stared at him expectantly.

"We must put this to rest. Diggory's parents and the people of Britain demand justice, and for that someone must be punished. Now tell us, who here is responsible for Diggory's near death."

Harry could only blink at him in horror, then stare out at the centaurs. They were all terrified, particularly the children, and more than a few were injured and bleeding. Firenze stood at the edge of the herd, positioning himself between the foals and the Sentinels. Ulaithur had a mare tucked protectively under his arm and she in turn held a wobbly legged colt. Harry was careful not to let his gaze linger on any of them.

"No. I don't see them. They were probably bachelors without a herd."

"Harry," Voldemort admonished. "I know you are lying. We found a crossbow in a cave around where Krum was kept. The arrow and the poison on it both match the arrow used to shoot Diggory. The crossbow was also engraved with the herdmark of this herd. We did not make a mistake. One more time, who is responsible?"

Harry looked down at his shoes rather than the centaurs.

"What are you going to do to him?"

“Kill him of course. He tried and very nearly succeeded in trying to kill not just one wizard child but four. How could you possibly justify defending him, Harry? He deserves to be punished.”

“So do you, I don't see you with a wand pointed at your head.”

“Crucio!”

Harry collapsed under the pain of the curse, and screamed. It only lasted a few seconds, but that was long enough to leave him gasping and boneless in the snow. A hard cold hand fisted in his hair and pulled him up to his knees, forcing him to look back at the centaurs, who were looking as horrified for him as he did for them.

“This isn't the time for your stubborn games, Harry. Tell me who shot Diggory or I'll kill every stallion, mare, and foal here just to be sure.”

“You're a monster,” he hissed in parseltongue, “You're only worried about covering your own mistakes.”

Voldemort sneered. “Don't get self-righteous. A child-murderer deserves to die, and you're letting your own weakness get in the way of that.”

“He nearly died because of what you did. He wasn't thinking clearly. It's not like the situation will ever repeat itself.”

“I'm not pandering to your asinine notions of right and wrong,” Voldemort continued in English. “You have to till the count of three or they are all dead, and you have the blood of the innocent as well as the guilty on your conscious. One...”

“Wait!”

“Two...”

Harry looked back towards the centaurs, his gaze immediately finding Ulatithur, who seemed to suddenly understand what was happening and detached himself from his mare.

“Thr-”

“Here!” Ulaither shouted, stepping forward. The gathered Sentinels all swung their wands towards him, stopping him in his tracks. He glared at all of them, before he turned his eyes to the Dark Lord. “I am the one you are looking for.”

Voldemort stared back at him evenly, then turned to Harry. “Is this the one?”

The boy closed his eyes and nodded. “Yes.”

The Dark Lord turned to Ulaithur. “There were two of you.”

“I was the only one who fired a bow to kill. He tried to stop me. He is not at fault.”

“Who is the other?”

Ulaithur said nothing. Voldemort turned to Harry. “I want them both.”

Harry glared up at him hatefully. “I doubt you care about the other's innocence, but Viktor will. If you kill the centaur that carried him to safety, this whole stupid thing will blow up in your face.”

Voldemort's eyes hardened, and Harry flinched back in preparation for another crucio or even a good old fashioned back hand, but instead received a demeaning little pat on the head.

“Much better. Manipulation is more affective than preaching, isn't it?” Voldemort pulled away and addressed his Sentinels. “Take him, scatter the rest.”

The Sentinels moved in, conjuring ropes and whips. The ones with ropes surrounded Ulaithur, who moved forward to meet them, while those with whips began to crack them threateningly, driving the rest of the heard back and forcing them to break off one by one in different directions. Ulaithur's mare cried out and reached out to her mate, but a Sentinel intercepted her with a savage strike to her stomach with his whip. She screamed, and Ulaithur who hadn't moved to resisted at all as they steadily started to tie him with ropes, spun around, pulling Sentinels off their feet as he went. The Sentinel who had struck the mare didn't even have time to scream as two massive hooves came down on him, stomping him into the ground with a sickening crunch.

“Run, Natiyana! Take Umari and run!” was all Ulaithur managed to get out before a half dozen stunning spells threw him to the ground.

“Ulaithur!” she cried out in anguish, but moved back to her colt, who stood too frightened and shocked to move as his whole world began to unravel before his eyes. She took him by the shoulders and pulled him away, reluctantly, snarling and kicking her hooved feet at any who dared approach, threatening a death as horrible as their compatriot's.

Harry watched them go, overwhelmed by it all. By death, by the tearing apart of a family, by the ruthless casualness with which these people's lives were being destroyed. As the herd disappeared into the trees, and Ulaithur was finally portkeyed away, Harry turned to the Dark Lord who was watching him curiously.

“I hate you.”

Voldemort snorted. “Don't be so melodramatic.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“General! I wasn't expecting you,” the young sergeant said, then remembered himself, and stepped briskly into a salute.

“That is the thing about surprise inspections, they're a surprise. At ease,” Lucius said with wave of his hand. They were in London headquarters, set in a courtyard surrounded on all sides by high walls. Some fifty wizards and witches (one barely distinguishable from the other in their unisex uniforms) practiced drills, learning to move together fluidly and break apart fluidly and come back together again. “I wanted to see how the advance guard is progressing.”

“Very good, sir,” he said, and gestured out onto the courtyard. “Their running drills now on how to keep organized even when they have to duck and cover. We suspect it will be good practice when we're fighting in actual cities.”

Lucius nodded and watched the drill for a while, noting the ease of their movements, the coordination. This was very unlike the days when he was a Death Eater, where every man and woman was in it for themselves and if you lived or died it was do to your own ability and not the ability of your partner.

He would always prefer the old method better, but for simple common stock like this, thoughtlessly obeying the command of the superior intellect of the group was probably best.

“Very good. But put them through narrow obstacle courses. There are a lot of narrow streets in the old cities.”

The Sergeant saluted. “Yes, sir!”

Lucius walked away, he still had twelve other units he wanted to inspect and then he would have to prepare for a holiday party at one of his associates' home. Gilderoy Lockhart, was not by any means one of Lucius' favorite people, but what he lacked in intelligence, wit, and insight, he made up for in usefulness and unquestioning self importance. The man was a fool, but he was a handsome fool who looked good in a uniform and could quite charmingly convince most other fools that the military might some how make them equally good looking and successful. Lockhart was at the heart of the Brass Cult recruitment campaign, which so far had been widely successful, and Lucius was willing to put up with a few hours of his company every couple of weeks if he kept the ranks full and the public admiring.

With nothing more concerning than controlling his temper long enough not to strangle his future host, he made his way to his next stop, not realizing he carried on him a hidden passenger who was carefully taking note of everything seen and heard for an enemy that wasn't yet an enemy. And his little observer was gathering enough information to expose the resources and training of every level of command of Britain's forces from its chief commander to the lowliest recruit.

And if Germany had its way, it would be having a nice long chat with Lucius' BUG very soon.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"You really should know better," Voldemort said as Victoria drove them away from the now empty clearing. Morgan was not with them, and really Harry wished the Dark Lord wasn't there either at the moment. He was angry and disgusted and scared by everything that had happened, and wanted nothing more than to be alone and somewhere he felt safe. Voldemort wasn't being at all helpful. "I can't have you acting defiantly in front of my Sentinels. It sends the wrong message. If a child could get away with such arrogance, then they would assume they could as well. It would get tedious correcting them all one-by-one."

"Mm."

There was a long silence, and Harry kept his eyes glued to the window, hoping that was the end of their conversation.

"You can't stay mad at me forever."

"Maybe not, but I'm sure I can for more than fifteen minutes," he snipped, still not looking at him.

"Touché. But when the heat of the moment has cooled, I hope you will understand that everything that happened here was necessary."

"When the heat of the moment has cooled, then so will Ulaithur's corpse and I will have yet another thing to hate you for."

"He tried to kill you. He tried to kill your friends, and I guarantee he felt no regret for that. You saw how quickly he killed that Sentinel, yet I hear no outrage for his demise. That man may also have had a wife and child, parents and siblings, friends and neighbors."

Harry grit his teeth. "I know that, but we shouldn't have ever come here. This isn't our territory. We started the fight, and then we got angry when they fought back? It's arrogant and stupid, and you're so damn intent on making sure it looks good that you don't even care about that. You don't care about those centaurs, or about Diggory or that Sentinel. It's just a twisted game to you, and you've dragged me into it."

"Ah," Voldemort said, as if he understood, but Harry doubted that he really did. Chances were he was incapable of that sort of empathy. It wasn't even his fault. Harry had seen his soul before, seen how magic held it together, and knew certain parts of it were still missing. Parts that would make it impossible for him to understand the full range of human emotions or bond in the same way others did. It was sad, but right now all Harry felt was resentment and frustration. He was too angry for pity right now. They rode the rest of the way to the castle in silence, but when the car finally pulled up the keep, Voldemort spoke again.

"I know this all must seem unbearably cruel to you, but I assure you in the scheme of things it is best for Britain. To rule this land, I was made to be able to make these decision which someone of a kinder disposition would find spiritually crippling. You understand better than anyone that this is my purpose, handed down to me from the Earth herself. I am not going to change. Not for you or anyone else. I am incapable. You understand that as well. However, you also have a destiny, and it is linked to mine, how pleasantly or painfully that destiny unravels itself will depend greatly on your ability to overlook the more savage aspects of my rule and appreciate the generosity I can and do extend to you. I do not expect you not to be angry, but I do expect you accept me as I am and to obey me as your ruler and your teacher."

Harry listened as the car door was opened on the other side and then shut. A moment later, Victoria opened his door and Voldemort was standing right in front of it, staring down at him with his cold red eyes. The Dark Lord extend his hand to Harry, leaving the Gryffindor to make his decision then and there.

Harry stared blankly at it for a long time, weighing his choices and what they would represent now and in the future. In the end, he really didn't see any other option. He reached out and accepted his hand. Voldemort's hand closed around his, and Harry jerked away instinctively, but could no longer break free. He was firmly, but carefully, pulled from the car.

"A wise choice. Come, I have a bit of generosity to extend in lieu of my cruelty."

Voldemort walked him into the castle, still gripping his hand. Harry struggled after him, his stride shorter and still weak from the crucio and his own turbulent emotions. There were not a lot of people in the halls, but the few that were stared at them shamelessly as they passed, more than a little baffled. He felt his ears burn and tried to take back his hand, but the Dark Lord wouldn't let go.

They finally arrived at the office, where Voldemort released him and walked over to his desk. On top of it was a chest, about the size of Harry's school trunk, made of dark lacquered wood and decorated with glyphs and runes in solid gold. Voldemort ran his hand over the top of the box, closed his eyes and sighed, then looked to Harry.

"Do you know what is inside here."

Should I? Harry wanted to snap, but settled for shaking his head.

"The heart of the dragon, whole and perfect. A vessel of undiluted power just waiting to be opened, which is your right as the one who slew it."

Harry couldn't think of what to say, it was too unexpected after everything else. It was a generous gift indeed as a dragon's heart was worth well over five hundred gallons, but one earned through killing. He didn't know how he should feel about it. He was too filled with emotion over other things.

"I... thank you," he tried uncertainly, "But how... what am I to do with it... precisely?"

Voldemort sighed, a bit disappointed by his apprentice's lack of excitement.

“A small part of it, you will eat, raw. It is good for the health of your heart, lungs, and liver and it is said to extend one's health by twenty years. It also helps to strengthen your magical core. The rest of it you will use as a sacrifice to the god or goddess of your choice, to gain both their favor and their protection. Choose wisely, and you may be granted the ability to push aside your moon madness and protect yourself against the malignant magics of spirits and fae.”

Harry's eyes widened. Oh, bollocks! He hadn't a clue which deity to choose! He had been so busy with other things, he'd barely skimmed a few pages of The Book of a Thousand Gods. Voldemort took one look at him and seemed to understand. He sighed.

“It seems you work best when under pressure. You have until the Winter Solstice to pick your god and prepare your altar. Teacher Brennan will assist you in the actual ritual, as I will be Ireland. Go. You haven't much time.”

Harry left, but once free of the office he collapsed to his knees, and found himself shaking uncontrollably. His heart began to pound and his breathing became erratic.

Too much, too much. Too much to handle now at this moment. Too much blood on his hands, too many mistakes, too many decisions. He couldn't breathe. He could only sit there, leaning against the wall, trying not to faint as his world began crushing down on him.

Merlin, he was going to die from thinking too much.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

In case, you're wondering, Hermione can't kiss Viktor on the mouth due to a Chastity Contract. Snape mentioned it before. If she did kiss Viktor, he'd have the rather unpleasant experience of a severe rash... on and in his mouth. It's a method to discourage rape as well as consensual infidelity and underage sex and 'snogging'.

A wizarding world movie star, yes they have movies although not as prevalent as with muggles, who specializes in action films. Like Jet Li, Jean Claude Van Dame, or Arnold Schwarzenegger in the muggle world. Imagine any of these people playing in the Triwizard Tournament. I did and kept laughing all day at random moments.

Book IV:

Chapter 16: Treason

"Relax," McGunny said, appearing out of nowhere to sit beside Harry. He pushed him further against the wall for more support. "You are having a panic attack. Cup your hands over your mouth and breath slowly."

Harry did as he said, but he felt even more smothered than before and almost immediately pulled his hands away again. McGunny grabbed his hands and put them back.

"You're hyperventilating. You have too much oxygen not too little. Keep them there."

This time he did as he was told, the older boy's authoritative voice was so much easier to follow than his own hopelessly scattered thoughts. It helped that he kept commanding him, 'Breath slower', 'Look at me', 'You'll be fine in a minute'. And gradually, he could breath on his own again, his limbs still trembled but he could think clearly. Which meant he realized how ridiculous he was acting.

"Don't..." he tried, but his throat closed up on him and he looked away.

"Don't what?" McGunny asked, his voice still as commanding as before.

"Don't tell anyone... please."

"... You should at least see the nurse. This could happen again."

"No! She'll tell... if it's about me, she'll tell Voldemort or Snape, and I can't... I can't be..."

"Calm down, you're going give yourself another fit. I won't tell any one. I promise."

Harry nodded his thanks, and slowly got to his feet. McGunny kept a hand on his arm to hold him steady but let go when Harry moved away from him. His thoughts began to organize themselves, and he realized there was something wrong with the situation.

“What are you doing here?”

“I heard Voldemort had come and got you and that you came back looking ill. I was worried. Something bad happened, didn't it?”

Harry looked away. “Yeah.”

“Come on, we both better get out of here.”

They walked away, heading no where in particular but taking the least used route to do so.

“Do you want to talk about it?” McGunny said after awhile. Harry shook his head.

“Not right now... maybe after dinner I can...”

“We could talk about something else. Something that doesn't have anything to do with the tournament.”

“You mean, like for the biography?”

“Sure, maybe now would be a good time. You did promise me three sessions and it's been three weeks already.”

Harry ducked his head guiltily. It was true, he hadn't spared much time for McGunny, and as busy as the Ravenclaw seemed to be he hadn't felt rude in doing so. He was being polite, he had quite happily lied to himself. He really needed to stop doing that.

“Okay.”

They found themselves an empty classroom and transfigured some old desks into an overstuffed reading chair and a small sofa. Harry curled himself onto the sofa, while McGunny sat in the chair with the KeepSafe book and the magic quill. It smacked of muggled therapy, but Harry was careful not to laugh. After the panic attack, McGunny would probably skip Madam Pomfrey and take him straight to St. Mungo's.

"Is there anything specific you would like to tell me about yourself or some event in your life?" McGunny began. Harry shook his head. He wouldn't even know where to begin. "Then you don't mind if I just start things off?"

Harry shook his head again.

"Alright. Would you tell me... what was life like before you knew you were a wizard?"

"Before I was...? I don't know what you mean."

"You lived in Germany for half your life, believing you weren't magical in the least. What was that like for you? What was school like? Were your parents close? Did you have any friends there?"

Harry thought for a moment. It had been a very long time since he had thought of his life in Germany, except for a few random moments of nostalgia when he visited the Durmstang students or when Christmas rolled around.

"I was happy. I lived in Cologne with both my parents, in this tiny little studio, and we didn't have car so we had to walked everywhere."

"What was the studio like?"

"We used curtains in the place of walls so there wasn't any privacy for anything except the bathroom which was minuscule. And we had big, big windows, like warehouses sometimes have, to let in light. That's why they say they got the place. All that light to do their art in, and a view of the entire neighborhood..."

Once he got started, Harry found he couldn't stop, the memories came out in perfect detail. He talked about the noise from the little cars honking at each other as they passed on too narrow streets, the daily drama of Claudia, the neighbor next door who had more lovers than she had common sense, and how the planes rattled the entire studio when they flew overhead.

He talked of the walks to school, his mother's hand in his, and walks to the market and to the park and to the museums and to tiny little stores where everything is made by hand right in front of you. He talked about his father's inability to follow a manual and the half a dozen mishaps with the kitchen sink, Harry's first bike, and the cassette player.

He talked about football games, school plays, sledding, his first and last goldfish, art lessons, and a dozen other tiny things, of places seen, of lessons learned, and the inexplicable moments that just stuck with him. And when he had run out of things to talk about before it all ended in a moment of pointless violence, he just sort of trailed off. He looked to McGunny, who was leaning on one arm, just looking at him, smiling a bit amusedly.

"For someone who didn't think he'd get anything out of this, you certainly displayed a lot of enthusiasm."

Harry turned away, pulling out his watch to hide his embarrassment. "How long have I been talking?"

He read his watch and gaped.

"Impossible."

"Isn't that your specialty?"

"I'm sorry. I promised you an interview and all I did was rambling about nothing."

"Quite the contrary, you paint a beautiful and vivid picture. You must have loved that place very much."

Harry nodded, smiling a bit as he recalled it. Life wasn't perfect, but looking back on it, it was the happiest and most care free time of his life. He hadn't been special to anyone but his parents, who were the only people who really matter at the time, and acts of heroism were acted out with swords made from cardboard and the dragons were dangerous only in his imagination.

“Do you think you would ever like to return there?” McGunny asked.

“To Cologne?” Harry asked.

“Yes, to Germany in general perhaps.”

“Maybe... yes. I want to return someday. I've wondered what it's like now. The studio would be gone, the Dursley's sold it, but the neighborhood probably isn't that different. I'd like to lay some flowers on my parents' graves, at the very least.”

“Maybe you'll have the chance here soon. Relations between Germany and Britain seem to have improved over the last year.”

“I hope so. I really do.”

He let out a yawn, and rubbed his eyes. He was tired, physically and emotionally. The interview had served as a good distraction, but he needed to rest. He had exams tomorrow and essays, but there was no point in doing them when he knew he wouldn't remember a single thing and truthfully it seemed pretty trivial in comparison with other things he had to deal with. This once, he would let it go and hope for the best.

“I'm going to bed.”

McGunny nodded. “That is a good idea.” He snatched the enchanted quill from the page, where it had continue to write everything they were saying, and closed the book. “Here.” He handed the book to him, which Harry accepted. It was surprisingly lite, but still sturdy in his hands.

“Thanks for... well, everything pretty much covers it.”

The Ravenclaw gave him a business-like smile. “Think of it as a down payment.”

"I'd rather think of it as you being my friend."

McGunny blinked at him, stunned. Friend? So suddenly? It wasn't something Harry had ever offered lightly. Those few he had, he kept close, but no one could figure out how he chose them. McGunny had secretly hoped for it, but hadn't counted on it. After all, he had approached him not as a friend but as a scholar. But that was Harry. How he chose his friendships and his loyalties was as strange and mysterious as everything else about him.

"I... I would like that."

The younger boy nodded. "Goodnight then. And good luck with exams* tomorrow."

"You as well."

And Harry left for Gryffindor tower, while McGunny sat there and ruminated over what had just happened. A delightful turn of events, and he would be enjoying it immensely if it weren't for his god awful headache.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"You are excused from exams, Mr. Potter," Professor Vector said, handing him a hall pass. Everyone turned to him, but none were as surprised as Harry himself.

"What?"

"As the new school champion you are exempt from exams. No one told you?"

Harry's expression clearly said that no one had, and a few people broke out into snickers, even as other glared at him jealously. The announcement had been made during dinner the previous night, but he had missed it, talking with McGunny and was rather glad that he had. It was bad enough trying get to his bed with his entire house congratulating him and cheering him and just generally sucking out all the energy he had left in him. Hermione, his angel, had been the one to send the Weasley twins, his devils, to escort him to his dorm. He couldn't remember what happened after he'd collapsed onto his bed, but his boots were by his trunk, his glasses on his bedside table, and a blanket had been thrown over him when Clyde woke him up the next morning.

"Well, you can always take the exam if you want to," Vector offered cheerfully, causing even more giggles.

"Er... no thanks."

"That's what I thought. Here's your hall pass, though I doubt anyone is going to stop you. Enjoy the day."

"... while you still can," someone called from the back, and everyone laughed, except of course for Hermione.

"That isn't funny!"

It sort of was, Harry thought, in macabre sort of way. He shrugged it off, took his pass, gathered his things, and headed towards the library. This was one thing off the list of a hundred and twenty-seven he didn't have to worry about, and he wasn't going to question it. He still had the other hundred and twenty-six things left to do.

At the library, he received yet another surprise from Madam Pince. As he entered, she looked up from a stack of books she was checking back in as if she were expecting him.

"Headmistress Lestrangle sent your pass already. I just need you to read and sign the Risks and Responsibilities form and I can give you a key."

"I'm sorry?"

She looked him for a long moment, to see if he was being intentionally daft.

"No one told you?"

"It seems to have slipped everyone's mind. Now, what are you talking about?"

"You've been granted access to the Restricted Section."

"Oh."

The day was just full of surprises, and not knowing what to do about it at the moment, he decide to leave it be. He accepted the release form to go over later, and went in search of comfortable place to read. It didn't take long, as there was no one to compete with for seating. He settled in an overstuffed chair in direct sunlight, brought out The Book of a Thousand Gods from his bag, and started where he had left off. Exactly two pages from where he had started. Each god had exactly one page dedicated to them, which made his current progress rather sad.

A'achua. Goddess of Butterflies.

No.

Ababanon. God of Elm Trees.

Eh.

Adsullata. Goddess of Underground Springs.

Better. Slightly. Kind of.

Five pages done. Only nine hundred and ninety-five to go. He let out a huff. He should have taken that stupid Arithmancy exam.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

He was woken from a deep slumber by a hand gently shaking his shoulder, and he blinked blearily up at McGonagall who was looking at him with more than a little amusement. He looked at his lap to see how far he had gotten.

Cait'wain. God of Adolescent Girls.

God? What was He doing with all those adolescent girls?

"Sorry to disturb you, but you have visitors," the Transfiguration teacher said. This sounded rather dubious to Harry, and he must not have hidden his thoughts well enough for she noticed. "I think you'll like these ones. I promise no one from the press will be stepping into this castle any time soon."

"Then who? I don't really know a lot of people outside of the castle," he said, putting away his book. With any luck his visitors would turn into an adequate distraction.

"I am not entirely sure who they are, but since they are a part of your approved mailing list I assume you are on good terms with them. Their last names are Reicher, two men and two young girls."

Harry nearly dropped his bag. This was a surprise! He certainly wasn't expecting them to travel all the way from London to Scotland just to say hi.

"Perhaps you would like to get out of the castle for a while, and go down to Hogsmeade for lunch," she offered.

"Can I? I mean, it isn't even a Hogsmeade weekend..."

She gave a dismissive shrug. "You'll be under the supervision of two adults." There was a lot about the situation that made him think she was breaking at least half a dozen rules for him, and he was reminded that she was in fact a Gryffindor, and not just his teacher.

The Reichers had been placed in a room near the castle entrance designated as a waiting room, with lots of stuffy chairs, extra portraits, twenty year old magazines, and a few children's toys that Alyssa and Morgana were happily ignoring in favor of pestering their fathers about castles and Harry and dragons. They ran up to him the moment he arrived, and surprised him by stopping to curtsy before they jumped all over him. He shook hands with Robert and Kyle, made small pleasantries, and then conceded to the girl's pleas to go out.

"Please, tell us about the dragon! Was it scary? Did it breath fire at you?" Morgana asked as they took to the road. It was sunny, without wind, and unusually warm still so they had all agreed to walk to Hogsmeade, hoping it would take away some of the girls' excess energy.

"Yes. Very scary. She blew fire all over the place. Set part of the castle on fire," Harry said idly. "Her tail was worse though. Covered in spines and one swing could have sent an elephant flying."

This unexpected detail set off a whole new set of fantasies and set off after Alyssa, who squealed and ran ahead to escape her. When they were far enough away, Robert set his hand on his shoulder to gain his attention.

"Are you alright?"

Harry gave him a wry smile. "Yes. Why? Did I lose a limb and everyone neglect to mention it to me?" He made a show of counting all his fingers and touching his ears and nose to make sure everything was still there. Kyle bopped him upside the head.

"That's not what we meant. It's hard to believe, I know, but lawyers and even their dashing assistants, know a thing or two about people put into extremely stressful situations. It can cause problems that have nothing to do with the body."

Harry thought about his panic attack and the latest rounds of nightmares robbing him of sleep, but didn't see the point in telling them about it. What could they do? They weren't psychologists, and after today who knew when he would see them again? In any event, they weren't ready to hear about the centaurs or his religious quandaries.

"Don't worry about it. I've already talked with the school councilor. They're making sure I don't go crazy."

Of course, the school didn't actually have a councilor but they didn't need to know that. He was talking to McGunny who seemed to have some inkling of what he was doing. Push came to shove, he could talk to Pomfrey and get some calming draughts and anti-anxiety potions. Come to think of it, he could probably make those himself.

"That's good," Robert said skeptically. "But if you need to talk..."

"I'll show up on your doorstep completely unannounced. I promise."

"We'll hold you to that," Kyle said, and that was the end of the conversation, because Alyssa had run back to them and jumped into Harry's arms for protection. He hefted her onto his back and pulled out an imaginary sword and pointed it at Morgana, who was still growling and roaring at them like a dragon.

"Cease, foul beast!" Harry cried out dramatically, "Thou shalt not harm thy fair damsel!"

He charged after her and Morgana turned and ran away, laughing while Alyssa giggled into his ear. The trip to Hogsmeade was a pleasant change of routine. The entire village was decked out in Christmas decorations, and with the new dormitories and houses there were many more people and many more decorations and festivities than usual. Dozens of people stopped to wave hello to Harry, including Ambassador Schwartzmann, who was taking a stroll, and a Sentinel, who asked for his autograph. No one seemed to quite know what to make of Harry's companions, but since they seemed to be there by Harry's own inclination, no one questioned them.

The Three Broomsticks was busy, but Madam Rosemerta got them all a seat immediately and was at her most charming, going so far as to give them all some complimentary chocolate mint cookies and a free round of drinks. It was vaguely awkward for Harry, but Robert and Kyle made jokes about similar incidents they'd had while working for loftier clients, and some of their stories were down right hilarious.

They talked and talked, and when food arrived they talked between bites of foods (and in Harry's case used his potpie as a handy demonstration of basic dissection techniques that would come in handy in potion's class, which Morgana and Alyssa were less than pleased to discover was even worse than they had heard), and talked some more, ordered a round of drinks, talked, took turns to the loo, ordered desert, talked more quietly as the girls began to nod off, and finally said their goodbyes in whispered tones as Robert and Kyle hoisted up one daughter each and made their way to the floo. Harry checked his watch and found they had spent almost four hours together.

He made his way back to the castle, feeling a sense of privilege being welcomed to spend the afternoon in the company of a family so thoroughly loved by one another that all the complimentary cookies and handshakes in the world would never compare to it. His thoughts turned to Voldemort, as they frequently did lately, and he felt a strange mix of anger and pity. The Dark Lord did not care about people like the Reichers, and would as casually and callously have destroyed them as he did Ulaithur and his family. The reason for that was because he was missing a part of himself that allowed him to empathize or even appreciate the special bonds that composed any relationship that wasn't steeped in personal ambition.

Voldemort was an incomplete being.

This conclusion struck him suddenly and powerfully, dancing around in his head as he made his way back to the castle alone.

He's incomplete.

Incomplete.

What was he missing? Why? How? And it stuck with him for several minutes before it made a sudden leap to the real question he needed to be asking himself.

What did he need to do to make him complete?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Viktor found McGunny after semester exams were over. It wasn't the Durmstang champion's way of being considerate of the other boy's academic pursuits, but merely the longest he could delay giving him an answer. He didn't know if McGunny was taking the train home like almost everybody else or not, and two weeks was pushing his luck if he were.

"For a spy, you really aren't very discreet. Anyone could have seen you there and wondered what you were up to," McGunny said as Viktor stepped out from behind a pillar. The champion didn't dignify him with a reply.

"I have spoken with him. He is willing to help... if you can prove that help is necessary. That shouldn't be difficult for someone with your supposed skill."

McGunny's expression was bland. He wasn't rising to meet his antagonism. "It won't be. His medical records should have more than enough evidence to prove abuse and extreme personal danger. Pomfrey's filing cabinet is no Gringotts."

Viktor didn't recognize the reference, but he got the point.

"Even though I say he'll help... I think I should add he'll only help if it doesn't interfere with the prime directive. We're not here to start a fight, believe it or not."

McGunny's expression remained bland, but Viktor didn't think he believed him.

"I understand. It shouldn't take long for the Dark Lord's true intentions to rear their ugly heads."

"And what are you going to do now? He has offered to help you as well, if you want it."

The Ravenclaw shook his head. "I'm not Potter. I have family here vulnerable to the Dark Lord if my treason is discovered. Once I give you the proof you need, we will not speak of this again. I'm leaving it in your hands."

Viktor nodded. That he could understand, and it made his complete manipulation of Viktor and his country somewhat more forgivable. They walked away from each other, neither looking back.

oo
oo

“What a horrifying and fabulous idea.”

Harry sat across the fire from Brennan, their handmade lodge was almost half a mile from the castle and a few extra silencing spells insured their privacy. He clutched The Book of a Thousand Gods, anxiously waiting for the man's answer. The idea he had formed on the road remained firmly planted in his mind, and no amount of distraction, be it friends, homework, or his many troubles were enough to dislodge it for even a moment. Even the many known and unknown dangers that surrounded it, dangers to himself and to others, could make abandon the thought.

“Is it possible?” he asked the old man. “Is there any way?”

“If you are looking for a specific ritual, then no. If you're looking for a specific god, I know just the one. Here, give me the book.”

Harry came around the fire, and sat beside him, handing him the book. Brennan opened it and flipped through it briefly before settling on one page. He pointed out a name and handed it back to him.

“Her. She is the one you need.”

Harry read, and the more he read the more confused he became. He looked up at Brennan.

“I don't understand... how can She help?”

“She is one of the very strongest goddesses you will ever encounter, and She is far less likely to do you wrong than Her male counterpart. If She cannot help you Herself, than there will be some other god or goddess in Her retinue that can.”

“But there is no ritual...”

“The ritual can be created by anyone, so long as it incorporates the four basic elements of a ritual. The Protection, simply put the preparation needed to protect the supplicant from disruption by human or inhuman interference, the Call, the part of the ritual designated to gain the attention of the specific god or goddess and make it known that your offering is dedicated to them only, the Sacrifice or Offering, which is self explanatory, and the Request, which should also be fairly obvious. It would not be difficult to do this, but whether She would accept your request is the problem.”

“You don't think the dragon's heart will be enough?”

“More than enough, but even She can not defy the Earth. If the Earth will not allow it, it cannot be done.”

“And the Earth would not allow this...”

Brennan let out a sad little laugh, and lifted his hands in supplication to some unseen thing. “She may. For all we know, this idea is really Her idea, and we are therefore obligated to carry it out.”

“Is there any way to know?” the Gryffindor asked, feeling his frustration and uncertainty mounting. He had come to Brennan because he had to. He had neither the skill nor the knowledge to carry out this task on his own, but rather than simplifying matters, the old man only seemed to complicate them.

“She will find a means to stop us if we are in the wrong. The ritual will fail. An interruption will occur. There will be some sort of sign.”

Harry nodded, and they fell into a long silence, staring into the fire together.

“There are other dangers,” Harry said at last. “If we're discovered... what we intend to do to him would be considered an attack on Britain's ruler. Treason, whether we succeed or not. They won't simply throw us to the werewolves.”

"Torture," Brennan agreed, "Then death if we're lucky, Askaban if we're not. If this works, I will consider it well worth the price, but I am an old man, and my time in this body is limited. You on the other hand, have your entire life ahead of you. A future that is bright and full of promise."

Harry shook his head. "Not if things stay as they are... Voldemort... he'll... I don't know. I just feel like if he continues as he has... I'll go completely mad. I'm part way there already."

A comforting hand landed on his shoulder, and Brennan gave him a reassuring smile.

"I will help you, and am most honored to be allowed the opportunity. I will do some research tonight and complete an outline for the ritual. Come back tomorrow after the other students have boarded the train, and we can begin a protection circle and gather supplies for the altar. If anyone asks who you picked try not to answer, but if pushed tell them you have selected Condatis, a powerful water god."

Harry nodded. A course had been set, and now there was nothing to do but let it carry him along. He should have felt relieved, but he felt even more anxious than before. Was he wrong? Did it matter? This was self preservation at its most bizarre.

Weakly, he thanked Brennan, and left the lodge. The sky had turned gray, and the days were settling back into winter, cold and dreary. He stood for a long time just outside of the door, always just hair's breadth from turning back and telling Brennan he had changed his mind. A sudden icy wind enveloped him, causing him to cringe and pull up the hood of his cloak. The wind didn't die down, and he found himself making a sprint for the castle and the shelter it provided.

It wasn't until he was safely and warmly inside, that he realized he could have more easily just have turned around and gone back inside the lodge. He hadn't thought of that though. Hadn't thought of turning back to find sanctuary, rather he had gone forward.

Perhaps that was the sign Brennan had been talking about.

Or maybe it was an ill portent of things to come.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Ooh.”

“Dare I ask?”

“Don't worry, I will not make you buy it for me,” Fleur reassured him, smiling mischievously. They were making their way through the upper class section of one of London's finer shopping districts, on a 'not-date', filling their Christmas shopping list quota. She had been given permission to visit London for a day on the condition that she took someone who knew the city so she wouldn't get lost. Bill had been handily available. He had gotten what he needed within the first hour and between two shops, but Fleur viewed shopping as a cultural immersion and would not be rushed.

They visited bakeries, novelty shops, antique shops, clothing stores, sporting goods stores, a weapon's smith, two galleries, and where now passing through a street dedicated solely to jewelry. The one that had caught her eye specialized in restored jewelry five hundred years or older, and their display was quite impressive. Manikins dressed as princesses and pagan warriors adorned in massive pieces of golden jewelry, Celtic knots, ancient crests, and ancient scenes of hunts and battles, wound their way around bodies in regal sophistication which would otherwise seem garish by modern fashion.

“It iz funny,” Fleur said, “Paris is considered ze 'ight of fashion nowadays, but I would give my left foot for any one of zese pieces.”

“I think they'd settle for half your bank account,” Bill laughed. “I know these people. I worked to remove curses on their stuff before. They fund university expeditions to Ireland and Scotland to unearth old burial mounds, and rob the dead. The universities keep the corpses and pottery, but they get to keep anything really valuable.”

“Zat iz awful.”

“Yeah, but I doubt they'll be in business much longer. The Dark Lord is already proposing a ban on the practice.”

“No, I mean zat it iz awful zat you would burst my romantic bubble. You are a boor.”

Bill looked scandalized.

“Moi? A bore? Well excuse me, but it's harder than is sounds rustling up dragons and centaur assassination plots. They're all very busy during the holiday season you know. We had to book the last ones six months in advance!”

She giggled, and wrapped herself around his arm. They continued down the street until the jewelry stores gave way to more novel stores, like the rare plants store and an exotic apparel shop. They wandered into a rare books store, and were greeted by what appeared to be a librarian who had more money than fashion sense.

“Welcome, welcome! I am Bernard Wittlesmith, the owner of this establishment,” he greeted them, removing his purple artist's cap from his bald head. “Now which of you is interested in purchasing a book?”

Bill shrugged and gestured towards Fleur. He honestly didn't know why she had chosen this particular shop. There were several other book stores they had skipped altogether with a wider selection and probably cheaper prices as well, but then she probably had a lot more experience with fancier shops like these than he did.

“I was 'oping you 'ad some books on 'Ogwarts,” she said, smiling at him in her most charming way. “And perhaps ze Forbidden Forest.”

“Ah! You must be Fleur Delacour! I have read about your exploits in the paper. It is an honor to meet you,” he exclaimed happily, and reached out to shake her hand.

“You are too kind.”

“Not at all. Please wait here just a moment, I have just the book for you!”

He scuttled off and disappeared behind a row of shelves. He hummed to himself as he went, and when his humming was no longer audible, they both turned to each other. Bill was annoyed.

“Isn't it the customer's decision what they buy?”

She shrugged. She was used to strange shop owners. The best shops tended to have eccentrics running them, and it was often best to let them do what they did. They had a special magic of their own that could not be understood by anyone else.

Ten minutes later, Wittlesmith returned with not one, but two books. He handed the smaller one to her first. It was dark purple and titled in gold print. It wasn't about Hogwarts or the Forbidden Forest, instead it seemed to be about...

“The Fall of the British Monarchy'?”

“Excellent book. It has a little of everything. Ambitious men and women, knights and princesses and nobodies turned somebodies, love, betrayal, honor, battles, political intrigue, prophecy... just lots and lots of things. You'll love it.”

“Hmm...” She admitted, she was intrigued. It helped that when she opened it, the first things she saw was a young woman, a Queen it appeared, dressed in armor and carrying a sword. She looked back at him. “I'll take it. What about zat other one?”

“This one? This one I would like to ask you to deliver to Mr. Harold James Potter. I'll give you a ten percent discount on your book if you do.”

“He ordered a book from here?” Bill asked, immediately suspicious.

“If I wanted to take orders I would have become an employee rather than an owner. I don't do orders. I tried to send this book out to him months ago, but it kept being returned without being received. Security measures, I suppose.”

Bill's suspicions rose considerably. “They are there for a reason and we're not going to go around them for someone we don't know anything about.”

“Yes, yes, that's all very practical. But this is important. He needs this book.”

“Let me examine it first,” Bill said, holding out his hand. Wittlesmith looked reluctant, but as he realized this was the only way to get what he wanted, he relinquished the book. Twenty-three spells later, even the eldest Weasley child had to admit it appeared nothing more than a very simple albeit boring book. The bookkeeper, seeing that he was finally done, snatched it back, and all but hissed at him, then gave it to Fleur. She looked it over.

“‘Encyclopedia of Centaurian Prophecy Techniques and Philosophies: Volume 3 The Celestial Naming System.’ What about volume 1 and 2?”

“He doesn't require volume 1 and 2. Only 3. Now then, if you'll come with me, you can pay and I can wrap up your parcels.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

For all the anguish filled days that crawled by, the arrival of the Solstice seemed to come out of nowhere for Harry. Excused from exams, he had more time to himself and his thoughts than he was comfortable with, and when at last he reunited with his friends at mealtimes and the end of the day, he couldn't push away his pointless worrying. This seemed to make his friends worry about him, and he had guilt to deal with as well.

There was a distance forming between them, particularly he and Hermione, and it had been for quite some time he realized. Where once they would have spent hours talking to each other or going on small adventures, now there were long silences and forced smiles.

Harry grieved it, but he didn't have enough of himself left to spare to re-affirm it. Not enough time. Not enough energy. If things turned ugly after tonight it would all be pointless anyway. She had made him promise to talk to her when she came back from the holidays, but didn't honestly know if what he could or even should tell her when she did.

McGunny was starting to take over her role, and that was frightening, because as much as he liked the boy, he didn't trust him or care for him like he did her. They had another interview after coming back from seeing their classmates off at the Hogwart's express. Harry had skipped over the death of his parents, still not ready to face that, and his life with his relatives, that was too humiliating in many ways, and went right to the night he had come back to the Dursley's and found Snape waiting for him and his stay at WYRA. He had dug out his first wizarding book for the occasion, the pages between filled with sketches of those boys he had met. The sketches weren't nearly as good as he remembered them, but they did bring to mind those days of disorientation as he adjusted to the idea of being a wizard.

He felt as disoriented now as he had then. His world was shifting, but he didn't know how or in what ways it would change. Forward was the only way to go, and he marched with the determination of a soldier to the lodge house, where Brennan was waiting for him.

The previous day they had laid down the wards that would protect them, runes painted in a mixture of ashes and wine on the walls, and burned sage in the fire pit, which left the entire place uniquely fragrant. That morning he had gone into the woods to cut down a young holly tree that had been bent and broken by the harsh winter wind and the weight of too much snow, and brought back the pieces to build an altar Brennan used his magic to weave the goddess' special symbol, a bull and a dog bowing to each other, into a swatch of cloth, so that the bright gold thread shown clearly against the green silk.

When he walked through the door at sunset, it looked completely unfamiliar. He remembered the runes, and the beginnings of the altar, but the atmosphere was different. The altar had been completed, the silk cloth laid over the holly shrine, a bushel of wheat, a scattering of apples, and some walnuts, had been strung around it in a circle, and there were pitchers of milk, wine, and honey on the right. A sword, a scythe, and spear rested on the left. The fire in the pit was enormous, and if it weren't for magic it would have set the entire place on fire. The chest containing the dragon's heart rested on top of the altar.

Brennan was dressed in robes of white with no shoes, a staff similar to the one he had seen Voldemort carry to the werewolf colony was in his hand, and a line of ash was smeared across his forehead. They looked to one another briefly, but nothing was said. They both knew their parts.

Harry removed his shoes, socks, and cloak and set them aside. The fire insured it was warm enough for him not to be cold, but even a little too warm. Brennan stood by the altar, a bowl in his hand, and when Harry approached him, he dipped his thumb into it, took it out, and ran a line across his boy's forehead. Harry could feel and smell the ash against his skin.

“Are you ready, my Pupil?”

No, he wasn't. He would never be ready for this. Not in a thousand years. But his tongue spoke the opposite of what his mind was screaming.

“Yes.”

Brennan stepped back, and he stepped forward, then knelt before the altar, closed his eyes and began to pray.

“Madris*, Goddess of the Scythe, of the Field, of the Chalice and the Blade*, I call to you and beg thy indulgence...”

He continued on for several minutes, calling out Madris' many names and euphemism, praising her, cajoling her, begging her attention. Slowly, the air began to thicken with magic. The fire grew larger, roaring like a lion and turned bright yellow with licks of blue. The urns holding the wine, milk, and honey burst, and the walnuts all snapped open like popping corn.

He had Her attention.

oo
oo

Voldemort stood at the peak of the hill, staring down into the glen where Druids in white robes gathered to perform their sacred rites by torchlight. He was not welcome there, and in his way he respected them, so he did not demand it. They were not honoring the gods or goddess that were his patrons anyway.

He turned back to the hill, where a horde of fae were already celebrating, dancing and drunk, and chasing their females in and out of the invisible hollows. They were not his folk, but they were mediums to those he honored, so he tolerated their antics as they mucked about the shrines he had created, eating and drinking the offerings.

They offered him their own drinks, winter wine and winter meade, smelling sweet and warm and he was tempted. They offered him their food, spiced apples, honey glazed meat, breads soft and hot and he was tempted. Women, naked and pale as death, touches his cheek with blue tinted finger tips, chilling his skin and boiling his blood and he was tempted. Hobgoblins, the wild kin of the more familiar banking goblins, offered him weapons the likes of which would put Gryffindor's to shame and he was tempted.

Their purpose was to tempt him after all, but he wisely refrained from partaking of any of their offerings. He would become one of them, a fairy folk, bound to the ephemeral aspects of nature, vulgar and beautiful at once. They would make him a king, a general to their Oberon, or some master among the Unseelie Court if he let them, but his ambitions remained with wizards.

Gently, but sternly, he turned them all away, fixing the shrines and refilling the offerings with wave after wave of his wand. They would continue to destroy his shrines, but that was their right, and come morning the offerings they had tempted him with tonight would be left on the shrines, and he would gather them up without fear of becoming one of them. The food would not taste as good nor the drink, and the women would be gone altogether, but the weapons and the other gifts would still be there, as powerful as ever and rightfully his.

“Do you feel Them stirring, Lord Wizard?” a nymph crooned in his ear, delicately touching his hair, his cheek, his lips. Her brilliant red hair stood out against her white skin like blood, her gray eyes were clouded with drink and desire, desire she directed solely at him. “Andraste and Toutatis and Ogmios* and Madris, all reaching out to you. Can you feel them touch you? Feel them touch you like I do?”

He smiled grimly, and took her hands, pulling them away. She was a delight, but not for him, and it was only her words he would allow himself to take interest in, not her desires.

“Who is Madris? Not one of mine,” he said, knowing the first three gods well, as they were some of those he had built his shrines to. The last one was not familiar to him, at least not by that name.

She scowled petulantly as he pulled her hands away, and was even more dissatisfied when her affections were turned aside for inquires. Like a spoiled child she pouted and retributed with sullen snappishness.

“Great sorcerer! Hah! Does not even know when a Goddess means to kill him! Great fool instead, me thinks!” she snarled and tore away from him. His strength was great, but hers was greater and she escaped. He went after her, to demand an explanation, but the crowd was thick and here no one moved aside for him.

He cursed under his breath and went in search of a crone.

oo
oo

Harry had been in the presence of gods before, but each was unique. The Earth left him overwhelmed, open, and without boundaries. The Moon left him fearless, energetic, and uninhibited. The Storm God made him feel formless, pulled in by and a part of a great rush that could not be destroyed except by its own exhaustion.

Madris made him feel like a Master.

Master of what, he didn't entirely understand, but he felt an undeniable strength and protectiveness that was, as of yet, directed at no one and nothing. He felt the power to build up his world with his own hands, nurture it with perfect tenderness of a mother and protect it with a dragon's savagery. The self-doubt and confusion of the last few days melted away, leaving him with an absolute certainty that his course was true.

He opened the chest, and inside rested the dragon's heart, bloody and plump as if it had only been removed moments ago. The heart was still warm as he pulled it out, and he waited briefly, expectantly, to see if it wouldn't start beating in his hands. It did not move, but being nearly ten pounds and slippery, he was challenged enough keeping his grip. He carried it like an infant, cradled in his arms, towards the fire.

"Madris, Queen of a Hundred Gods, Ruler of the Hearth, I bring an offering of flesh and magic to honor thee. Please accept this tribute from your humble servant."

Taking the heart in both hands, he gently tossed it into the roaring fire. His hands were still stretched out to it when the magic dispersed into the air, igniting it all in blue flames. The force of it shoved the flames into his lungs, and threw him to the ground. Behind him, the shrine was set alight and Brennan let out a cry of surprised terror.

Harry laid on the floor, staring up at the dance of flames above him, watching it set the roof on fire. He, himself, felt little pain. The fire that touched his skin and filled him inside was like the touch of slightly too hot water, strangely pleasant and slightly painful at the same time. Slowly, he breathed out the magic, and with it came his wish, bathed with so much intention and passion that it could leave nothing to misinterpretation.

Consciousness began to slip away from him, but he kept his mind open long enough to sense the retreat of the goddess, bearing away the spell that would likely change his world forever.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The crone he found wasn't as old or as ugly as he would have liked (the older and uglier a crone the wiser she was, at least when it came to the fae), being only a few centuries and having more than five teeth and both eyes, but she told him what he needed to know without the annoying tendency to speak in riddles first.

"Madris isn't coming to kill you. She just wants to give you something," she said, then took a bite of cheese he had given her in payment. It was sour, but that was the preferred flavor for those of her ilk.

Voldemort felt relieved. He doubted the Earth would allow him to die, but that didn't mean She wouldn't let him suffer. She did not coddle Her children, even those important to Her.

"A gift?" he asked, because sometimes gods gave him less pleasant things, like warnings or tasks or rotted gnome heads (although that last one could have just been a Goodfellow*, who despite their names really weren't very good at all).

She continued to chew her cheese slowly, savoring it, and didn't speak until she was done.

"Yes... of course, it will likely kill you, so I understand how Firwyne might have been confused."

He tried to ask what he was to be given and how to refuse it, but it was too late. A horde of new fairies suddenly landed in the clearing, signaling the arrival of their patroness, Madris, and though the other folk welcomed these new arrivals with much enthusiasm, Voldemort felt a deep sense of dread come over him.

The fairy horde split up, carrying their food and drink among their fellow revelers and playing their pipes and their strings to replace the drunken musicians, and as they scatter their goddess was revealed from the crowd. She was beautiful, as goddesses tended to be, but in an older more regal way than the fertility or love goddesses he was more familiar with, with hair black as ink and skin darkened by sun, and draped all in a purple tunic with a sword strapped to her side. Beside Her stood a boy god, naked with a face the same as Hers, and a white hound with red ears leashed in His hand. Voldemort didn't know what to make of Her. She was not a nature goddess, no single element composed Her being, but he did not recognize Her from the pantheon of warrior gods and goddesses nor those associated with fertility.

She turned to him, and he rose to meet Her. There was no point in trying to run away. That was why She had brought the boy god with the dog. A spirit dog would find him anywhere. The boy would find the dog anywhere.

He bowed to her respectfully. She tilted Her head in acknowledgement.

"I have something for you," she said. Her voice was that of authority. Not military or social authority, but maternal authority. A Goddess of Mothers, maybe?

"Would you take offense if I refused it? I'm told this gift will likely kill me," he asked, trying to sound polite. Gods could be reasoned with more often than not, if one were respectful about it. As long as love or revenge wasn't involved at least.

"It doesn't matter," She said. "It is the dearest wish of one of my Children for you to have it."

She lifted her hand, and he stepped away. He found himself stopped by the boy child, His hand rested on his leg, cherubic face smiling sweetly at him even as He stole the use of his limbs. Madris' hand found his chest. Something wet and red was in Her hand and she gently pushed it into him.

His eyes widen. The thing She had shoved into him was beating, like a heart, but rather than blood it pumped magic, excruciatingly painful magic, tearing at his own magical core. He started to tremble, and when the boy god removed his hand, he fell to the ground. Gritting his teeth, he snarled out a call to his own gods, offering a reward of blood if they would but pull out the poison She had sown, but none appeared. She was more powerful than Them, or perhaps They lacked Her skill. He had never offered prayer to a god of healing before.

He tried to expel it with his own magic, but the thing welcomed it, weaving itself into his power, making them one and the same, infecting him so thoroughly he would have to tear out all his own magic to be rid of it. Pointless, because then he would be dead anyway.

He clawed at his chest, where the pain was the sharpest, as if it were snapping a rib with every steady beat, but there was nothing to grab hold of. Then the blood came up, and he vomited it out onto the ground. Fairy folk, still quite happily enjoying themselves, skittered away but then moved back in to taunt him. This wouldn't have happened if he were one of them, they laughed and he was offered some wine. He lifted his head just long enough to spit blood into it, and snarl his defiance.

Their offer was useless now. He had already been infected with her wicked spell. He turned to her, to make her an offer, but she was already shaking her head in anticipation of what he would say.

"It is useless. The deed is done," She said, and walked away, Her son and His dog following obediently behind Her. Blood was coming from other places now. His nose, his ears, possibly other orifices he didn't want to contemplate, and with every new bleed came a new origin of suffering.

He hissed and snarled, trying to climb back to his feet, to walk it off, to defy fate, but his body betrayed him, refusing to do little more than twitch and spasm. The more jovial of the fae just laughed and kept offering him things he wasn't even physically able to accept, while the less savory kin gathered up his toxic blood for evil purposes.

For nearly an hour, he fought against the pain and the foreign magical intrusion, focusing on the glory he had been promised and revenge he would exact for this humiliation, but magic greater than his won out and tore him from the world into a dark and quiet place.

Mid-term exams, include final exams for single semester courses such as European History of Magic, and also regular exams for two semester courses that always seem to have exams at that time. I hate those.

The 'Chalice and the Blade' are rip offs from The Di Vinci Code representing womanhood and manhood, but it was such a damn good symbolism I stole it, and shamelessly, because I'm a fanfiction writer and that what we do. Mwa ha ha.

A Goodfellow, such as Robin Goodfellow a.k.a Puck as seen in Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, are fairly harmless breed of satyr-like fae but take delight in scaring and tricking people. They're also commonly known for stealing babies to make into fairies and replacing them with Changelings, but then most fairies and fae breeds do that. Goodfellows are just particularly good at getting through magical protections to do it.

Book IV:

Chapter 17:

Harry woke up in his bed, which was not the place he remembered leaving consciousness. That was probably a good thing, since that particular place had been set on fire last he recalled. However, all was not right here either, mostly due to the fact that Snape was scowling down at him like he knew Harry was a budding arsonist. He blinked sleepily, closed his eyes again, hoping he was simply dreaming.

"Potter, wake up. Are you dying?" the potion's master demanded, shaking him awake again.

Harry groaned, and rolled away from him. "Yee~eesss, now let me die in peace."

"If only. Get up, we're going to Dublin." Harry was tired enough that he thought he might be able to ignore him for a good ten minutes, but also tired enough that he didn't realize that was a bad idea. His warm blankets were snatched away, and not waiting for him to come to his senses, Snape muttered a spell so that Harry's clothes jumped out of his trunk and hurled themselves at him, including a change of underwear and his rather heavy boots.

"Agh! Alright, fine! I'm getting up, just knock it off!"

Thank Merlin, no one else was there to see him get a face full of skivvies. Snape smirked and strode away, leaving Harry to dress. The sky was still dark outside, and his bedside lamp flared to life as he climbed out of bed. He was still bone tired, and desperately wanted sleep, but he forced himself through his morning routine. Slowly, his mind began to start waking up, even though his body remained sluggish and uncooperative.

He remembered his spell, in the middle of brushing his teeth and nearly choked on his toothbrush. Earth, Sun, and Sky what happened? What had he done? He hadn't a clue what his spell would do, only that it was too late to stop it.

They were going to Dublin. That was what Snape had said. That was in Ireland, where Voldemort said he would be for the Solstice.

Well, shit.

He could only hope that because it was only the snarky potions master that came and got him and not a platoon of Sentinels, nothing too horrible had happened. Or at least, that no one suspected him of being responsible.

He found Snape waiting for him in the Gryffindor common room, staring out a window and deep in thought.

"Has something happened?" Harry asked reluctantly, afraid to know the answer, afraid to think asking would make him look guilty. Snape turned to him, looking him up and down, making the him even more uncomfortable.

"The Dark Lord was attacked last night, and might be dying. He has demanded our presence immediately."

Harry's eyes widened and he reached out to the nearest wall, incredulity stealing away what strength the exhaustion hadn't. Impossible. That wasn't the purpose of the spell. It wasn't suppose to hurt him.

Even though he had known it probably would to some extent.

"Dying?" His voice was so weak, it would have been inaudible if the common room weren't so overwhelmingly quiet already. For once, Snape didn't mock him for it, merely nodded.

"It is not for certain yet, but you need to be prepared for that possible eventuality. Come, we need to hurry."

The older man turned to lead the way to the exit, his massive strides forcing Harry to scramble after him to keep up. The castle was dark and Harry disoriented, unable to grasp that the same night he had summoned a Goddess he would face the consequences of his actions. His wand was up his sleeve, more out of habit than practicality, as he didn't even have the energy or the concentration to cast so much as a simple lighting spell.

Lestrangle was waiting for them both at the entrance, her expression tight with irritation and worry.

"What took you so long?" she snapped.

"Potter sleeps like the dead," Snape muttered back and moved right passed her towards the door. She glared at him briefly, but the majority of her vitriol was reserved for Harry. He didn't look at her, instead following Snape closely. He was far too vulnerable to feel comfortable alone with her, but he couldn't afford to let her know how much. Especially not now.

Voldemort's black car was parked outside, and in addition to Victoria there were over a dozen heavily armored Sentinels standing around with brooms and wands in hand. Victoria's face was ashen as she opened the door for them, even in the feeble light of the torches. She was terrified, and when he caught her gaze he knew it wasn't entirely for herself that she feared.

Another surprise awaited him inside the car. Lucius Malfoy was there, his back to the driver's seat, looking dangerous in a uniform vaguely reminiscent of a Sentinel or a Brass Cult Cadet. His uniform was black, close cut to highlight the body of a man who hadn't let a life of luxury destroy his military physique. The buttons and fixings were gold, and the half dozen medals he wore at his breast were modeled after fearsome things: skulls, serpents, blades.

Harry had the rather dubious privilege of sitting directly across from him. Lucius gave him one, long assessing look, as if determining the chances of getting away with strangling him right then and there. Snape caught him..

"For Merlin's sake, Lucius, he's not your competition. Knock it off."

This earned the potions master a glare from everyone, but he ignored them completely. After that, no one said anything. They each stared out their own window, lost in thoughts and schemes and worries of their own. This could be the end of the world as they knew it.

For better or worse.

oo
oo

There were Sentinels at the door when Viktor got up that morning. At the sight of them, he nearly panicked and blasted them both, but luckily Jophery had been with him and grabbed his arm before he did anything so foolish.

“Vat is dis?” his friend asked congenially, to the nearest Sentinel, a middle aged woman with a scar on her lip. She gave him a half-hearted shrug.

“Orders. A Red Alert has been posted, meaning every available Sentinel and Brass Cult recruit is being called to every Red Facility in Britain. Hogwarts is a Red Facility. Number 27, no less.”

“Red Facility?” Viktor prodded.

“Strategic attack appoint. Government buildings, supply warehouses, private residences of Court Officials,... Hogwarts has had several attacks over the last couple of years so it's 27, even if most of the students are safely at home.”

Viktor and Jophery shared a concerned look.

“So vy is dere a Red Alert? Has somezing happened?”

Here, the woman seemed a bit reluctant. “Nothing you need to worry about. You just need to stay in the castle until it's over. Hardly a imposition in this weather. Now go on, I'm sure you boys have other things to do.”

They walked away, casting brief glances to see if the Sentinels were looking at them suspiciously or were preparing to follow. The Sentinels paid them no mind, turning to each other instead for conversation.

“Vat do you zink?” Jophery asked once they were out of ear shot. Viktor just shook his head. There was no way to know what was going on.

“I’ll try vriting Hermione if ve don’t hear anything more dis morning. Her foster father is a commander in ze Brass Cult, she might know somezing.”

They didn’t speak on the subject again once they reached the Great Hall, where they encountered other Sentinels scouting the corridors. They tried again to glean some information from them, but again they were told it was just a safety precaution and not to worry about it. Other students arrived for breakfast, equally confused and unhelpful about what was happening. Having no where else to go, Viktor remained in the Great Hall after breakfast, playing card games with his classmates as he waited for some new information to re-emerge. It came with Fleur, who had been in and out of the Great Hall several times that morning already.

“Ave you zeen, 'Arry?” she asked. Viktor suddenly realized he had not, even though he knew Harry was spending the holidays at the school.

“No.”

She frowned. “No one 'as. I noticed 'e didn’t come down zis morning, zo I went to is dorm, but 'e iz not zere. Ze other Gryffindors 'ave not zeen 'im eizer. I tried ze library and Dueling 'All too. Nozing.”

“Vill help you look,” Jophery said. “But lets find a teacher first. Dey would know if he is suppose to be here or not.”

Finding a teacher took almost as much work as finding Harry, but they did at last locate McGonagall speaking with a Sentinel near the castle entrance. Their discussion looked extremely heated, but they broke it off immediately when they saw them approach. She gave them a cautious look.

"Is something the matter?" she asked.

"I would like to know dat myself," Jophery quipped, but Viktor elbowed him in the shoulder before he said anything else..

"Ve vere vondering where Harry vas. He hasn't shown up for breakfast and no vone has seen him."

"... and because of all the extra security you were worried?" she guessed. "No need. Mr. Potter is on an errand with Professor Snape. They should be back sometime this afternoon."

Fleur let out a sigh of relief. "Zank goodness. Please, Professor, do you know what all zis-" she gestured at the Sentinel, "- iz about? It iz very zudden."

She gave a sympathetic smile, but shook her head. "I am afraid I am as much in the dark as you are. Anything I told you would be mere speculation, and that's worse than useless."

They split up after that, Fleur to her rooms, Jophery to amuse himself by exploring the castle, and Viktor to write a letter to Hermione. He nearly made it to the owlry with his missive, when he met someone along the way that gave him pause.

"I zought you said you vould never approach me again."

McGunny ignored that. "I just got back from the infirmary. It's worse than I thought."

He handed Viktor a roll of papers, which he opened and skimmed through and immediately felt the blood drain from his face. It was Harry's medical records. There were records of beatings, of crucios, a broken bones, magical exhaustion, cuts, a life-threatening poisoning, Blue Pox, and a condition resulting from an unknown Dark Arts ritual that left the boy with permanent physical and mental abnormalities. He looked to McGunny, and by the tension around his eyes, Viktor could tell he was as outraged by this as he himself was.

"That's just what we have records of. There is no telling how many injuries he's self treated or were covered up by Snape."

"You zink Snape is involved in dis?"

"He's aware of it, at the very least. He's Voldemort's man and Harry's guardian. I can't see how he wouldn't know."

Viktor nodded. It wasn't unreasonable. What little he knew of Snape suggested he wouldn't be adverse to hurting a child if the Dark Lord commanded it or perhaps even if he didn't. He had a mean streak a mile wide.

"I don't suppose you know vat's going on vith all za Sentinels?"

"The Red Alert? No... I..." he started, then shook his head. "I'm looking into it."

"Vould you mind telling me ven you find somezing?"

"I will if it's relevant, otherwise you're on your own," McGunny said, and walked away, having nothing else to say. Viktor glared at his back, but didn't push the matter. Two could play this game. He continued on his way to the owlry to send out his letter.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry fell asleep in the car. Despite all his worries, his guilt, and his company, he was still tired and the car was quiet. He woke up when the car stopped, as everyone moved to get up and stepped out. The sun was just starting to rise, the dark silhouette of a castle and slanting rooves against a bright pink and golden sky.

The moment Harry's feet touched the Irish soil, he felt his magic stir, the fine hairs on his arms and neck stood on end.

"Come on," Snape said, regaining his attention. They had stopped in front of a large building made of red brick and white columns, a bronze statue of a medi-wizard patching up a man who looked like he'd gone a few rounds with a troll and lost badly. A plaque by the door, read 'St. Victivius Hospital for Magical Maladies'. A hospital?

Harry's mind boggled at the thought. Did anyone here really think a hospital was going to have what the Dark Lord needed? Any medi-wizard worth their salt would realize within five minutes that Voldemort's body resembled a human's body about as much as it did a wheel of cheese. It was just stupid.

Or desperate.

A line of Sentinels and Brass Cult soldiers lines the walkway and the hall and all the entrance ways, ramrod straight and saluting Lucius as he passed them. Harry trailed behind the party, wanting very much to turn around and leave, and the closer they seemed to draw to their destination the stronger his reluctance became. A nurse, looking terribly nervous and even more tired than Harry, led them through the maze of corridors that seemed to define a hospital to a single corridor. Every hall leading to it had been filled with guards, but this hall was completely empty. They all gave the nurse a suspicious look, and she looked ready to cry.

"He really really doesn't like people around him when he's unwell," she lamented, and scurried off.

They all gave each other a questioning look, then the Slytherins came together in a rare display of cooperation and turned to Harry.

"You go first. He likes you," Lucius said.

"Oh, screw you, Captain Courageous," Harry snapped.

The Malfoy patriarch drew himself out and looked ready to snarl out a command, but a small explosion down the hall drew their attentions. A half second later, a man, his hair and clothes smoking, bolted out the door as if his life depended on it, which it probably did.

"Don't touch me, you filth! Leech! Hashhh ssshnicth sssil wesssk!"

Harry actually blushed at the remainder of Voldemort's parseltongue insult. He had no idea a wand could be used for that.

"He seems pretty feisty for being on his death bed," Snape noted.

Lestrangle hissed at him, "Show some respect!"

Despite his defiance to Lucius, Harry did in fact 'go first'. Slowly, uncertainly, he made his way down the hall, terrified of what he might have done to the other man and that he might know it. He stopped a short distance from the door, half off its hinges from when the medi-wizard had been thrown out.

"My Lord?" he called, "May I come in?"

There was a moment of silence, then. "Enter."

Cautiously, he peeked his head inside first. Voldemort reclined in a small hospital bed, defiantly propped upright against his pillows, his hand still clutched his wand as if daring anyone to tear it from his cold, dead hands. And he did look very near dead. His skin was pale and sweat slick, reminding Harry of cave salamanders turned white in the darkness. In contrast, his eyes were blood shot, not helped by the fact that his eyes were already red to begin with. And he was bleeding. Not badly, but it trickled from his eyes, his nose, the corners of his mouth. His hands were smeared with it.

It was what Harry thought a vampire might look like if it were to die from a disease. Voldemort seemed to sense his thoughts and grinned, his teeth pink with still more blood.

"I hate to tell you this, but you don't look much better," Voldemort chuckled darkly. It was pitched just a little too high, indicative of the pain he was still suffering and the strain he he felt trying to hide it. What had he done to him?

"What a scary thought," Harry said, feebly trying to smile back, and came into the room.

There were sitting chairs in the room, but they had all been destroyed, and he was feeling too timid to draw attention to this fact by actually fixing one. Voldemort's red eyes tracked him closely. He stopped at the foot of his bed, afraid to approach any closer.

"I will not die," Voldemort informed him, studying his reaction. Harry nodded, but he didn't feel relieved. The Dark Lord might not die, but that didn't mean he would return to what he had been. That had been the point of the ritual, but this couldn't have been farther from what he had wanted.

"Is there anything I can do?" he asked, because he had to. He caused this, and he needed to know he could fix it somehow.

"My gods could do nothing for me, what do you think you can do?" the Dark Lord hissed.

"I don't know... but I do know your gods aren't the sort you turn to for healing."

Voldemort's expression smoothed, and he rested further back into his pillows. Something of his former smugness returned. "True. While we're on the subject of gods, how did your sacrifice go? Was your god pleased with your gift?"

Harry felt a spike of fear. Dare he say Her name? Would he know Her and what Harry had Her do? But he couldn't not answer. It was a surer sign of guilt than anything else.

"Ah... I... I don't know. I think She burned down the lodge house."

Voldemort chuckled. "Perhaps She mistook the whole thing for Her shrine. They can be rather presumptuous."

That was a very good possibility. Harry quickly tried to change the subject before it got any further into the fact he might have killed or crippled his own mentor.

"How did this happen? Can anything be done?"

Voldemort ignored the question, and flung out his wand. Harry flinched. He ignored that too, and simply began fixing up the room. It appeared whatever was wrong with him hadn't affected his magic any.

"No, or if there is, no one here has the skills for it. Why the bloody hell they don't hire some half-blooded elven folk in an Irish * hospital is beyond me. I've already sent for Diana, Fenrir's little moon goddess. If I don't have a cure, I will at least have answers. This was done with old magic. Who ever it was used the Solstice as a means to boost their power, just as we did. I think I will have them explain the entire ritual to me in detailed before I have them boiled alive."

Harry's mouth went very dry. Voldemort saw his expression, but luckily misinterpreted it.

"Do you feel sympathy for everyone?" he asked, annoyed. "I suppose you have forgotten that you hate me already?"

The Gryffindor floundered for a reply and caught himself twice from blurting out something incriminating, and finally settled on, "I have not!"

And stalked out. Voldemort called after him.
"Send in Malfoy while your out there."

He was shaking as he left, and he couldn't hide it from the other Slytherins. Their reproving stares were palpable, but he didn't care. He had gone first, knowing what he knew, and he still he had gone first.

"Your turn," he said to Malfoy, and then just kept walking. To keep Snape from stopping him he added, "I'll be in the car."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Hermione received Viktor's letter shortly after lunch. She was alone with Draco in the mansion, their father having left before they woke up that morning and their mother leaving immediately after she had woken them for breakfast with instructions not to leave the house.

They were both more than a little unnerved to find two Brass Cult cadets at both the foyer and in the kitchen, but Dobby had reassured them they were there per the Malfoy patriarch's orders.

"Who is it from?" Draco asked, looking up from the game of chess they had been playing.

"Viktor," she said, her expression softening ever so slightly. Her brother scowled.

"What does he want?"

She opened the letter and skimmed through, her expression gradually darkening.

"There are Sentinels at the school, as well. They've been told we're under a Red Alert. Why didn't mother mention that before she left?"

Draco frowned thoughtfully. "I don't know. Maybe she didn't want us to worry. Does it say anything else?"

She read through the rest of the letter, and by the time she was done Draco could tell there was definitely something troubling her.

"What?"

She looked at him, uncertainly. "He says that he was told both Uncle Severus and Harry left the castle together on an errand."

"So?"

"Draco, the castle is on lock-down. Uncle Severus can't leave the castle without a Court exemption, and neither can Harry. They never would have gotten one so quickly if it were just an errand. I think they both may have been summoned."

"What? Like by the Dark Lord?"

"I don't know who else would have the authority or the inclination to summon them both."

"Very good, my dear. It appears sending you to Hogwarts wasn't a complete waste of money," drawled an arrogant voice from the doorway. They both spun around to see Malfoy Sr. standing behind them, his black uniform making him even more imposing than usual.

"W-welcome home," Hermione managed, setting aside the letter and hoping he would forget about it. It was futile. He ignored her greeting completely, and snatched up the letter. Skimming through it, his face remained arrogant and condescending, and she felt her cheeks burn. When he was done, he folded the letter, and placed it in his pocket.

"Your little tryst with Mr. Krum is over. You will not write to him, speak to him, or so much as look at him from now on. Is that clear?" he said evenly, addressing her with all the familiarity and affection he did his house elves. Her heart constricted. He wasn't ever suppose to know. When ever he found something or someone she cared about, he tried to take it away from her. The only exceptions had been Draco (who could hardly be sent away), Hogwarts (Narcissa had demanded her husband to let her attend), and Harry (who was a political morsel Lucius wasn't stupid enough to throw away just yet). Now he wanted to take away Viktor, but she wasn't ready to let him go without a fight.

"He is only a friend. You have made very sure that I can't have anything more than that from anyone," she said, adopting an air of arrogant sophistication. The more emotion she showed, the worse he would make it for her, and she had become adept at maintaining this mask in front of him.

"This isn't a negotiation."

"Come now, father. This is unreasonable. He's my friend too, and I make sure they are never alone together. It will hardly hurt her reputation," Draco jumped in, lying easily. He despised Viktor, but what he despised more was his father tormenting his sister, and when it came to choosing sides on that particular battlefield he knew where his loyalty lay.

"You will also avoid him," Lucius snapped, his previous reserve disappearing in an instant. Both children flinched away. That had been unexpected. He never yelled at Draco unless he was genuinely worried about him. He recovered quickly, but it was too late. Both were wondering what was going on, because now it was obvious this didn't just have to do with preserving Hermione's honor. "Mr. Krum and his associates are currently under investigation for attacking the Dark Lord. I will not have my children associating with potential criminals."

"Attacking the... are you serious? Someone attacked the Dark Lord?" Draco said, as if it were the most incredible thing he had ever heard. It probably was. "That's why we're under a Red Alert? Is it serious?"

Lucius seemed to consider the matter, and grimaced.

"He is not going to die... but he is not well. This is a matter of national security, so neither of you will repeat it to anyone else. The Foreign visitors are officially under investigation and you will stay out of the way. Is that understood?"

They both nodded, and for the moment he had to be satisfied with that.

"I must return to London to organize my men in order to help keep the peace once the news is finally released. Businesses have all been closed today in the expectation of riots, but we are prepared to handle the situation. I have spoken with your godfather, and he will be coming to stay here until the matter is settled as I won't be able to return for some time and your mother will be out more often than not."

"Is he bringing Harry, then?" Draco asked, knowing it was better if he asked rather than Hermione. His father tended to clam up when she tried questioning him. His father looked annoyed.

"He will. Draco, you will be responsible for him. If he gets into trouble, you will be the one to pay for it."

This didn't make the Malfoy heir too happy, but in a way it was a compliment. It was Lucius' way of saying he was confident enough of his abilities to entrust him with this responsibility. Or something like that. He nodded.

“Good. They will arrive this evening. Make sure they are made comfortable.”

With that, he left to do what he had originally come to do. It was true that the foreigners were under investigation, but then so were nearly two dozen other factions per the Dark Lord's orders. Lucius could not help but allow his respect for the man to grow. He had spoken with him for nearly an hour, and it was perfectly clear that he was in excruciating pain, but he still had control of his thoughts and his magic, as he outlined his plans and suspicions. Lucius would organize the army in case this assassination attempt was the forerunner of a larger attack, and even if the fear turned out to be unfounded they would have a clearer understanding of their army's strengths and weaknesses. Only a few Sentinels and Court officials would be used to keep track of possible suspects, while the Dark Lord worked his own magic to discover the culprits. What exactly was wrong with Voldemort was anyone's guess, as the man didn't know himself and refused to let any of the doctors examine him. Lucius admired his paranoid secrecy too.

With things settled on the home front, he went to his office to gather some things and leave additional instructions with the house elves, confident that his orders would be obeyed by servant and child alike.

He completely forgot, in his usual disregard for muggleborns, that Hermione was a Gryffindor.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

McGunny felt sick. Worse than sick, in fact. He felt as if he were dying. The headache potion he had taken as an excuse to be in the infirmary, was useless. He had managed to sneak into Pomfrey's files and make copies of Harry's record, and then deliver them to Krum, but now he felt too exhausted to move. His thoughts were scattered and slow, his limbs sluggish, and a fever left him swimming in his own sweat. He climbed into his bed, buried himself in his blankets, and prayed he wouldn't die as he drifted to sleep.

Almost an hour later, Tom opened his bright green eyes and got to work.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry said nothing on the drive back to the castle. Part of it was the presence of Lestrage, but mostly he didn't want to acknowledge the white elephant. He listened as Lucius and Snape discussed his staying at the Malfoy Estate until they could be certain the danger had passed and Lestrage sneered at them both, but he had nothing to add to the conversation. He didn't want to lie, but anything honest that came out of him at this point would lead to them killing him where he sat.

He fell asleep again at some point, and when he woke up Lucius was gone.

"How long have I slept?" he asked, turning to Snape who was already studying him.

"Apparently, not long enough. Go back to sleep."

Still tired, he decided to comply and closed his eyes. Before he was truly asleep again, however, he heard Lestrage address the potions master.

"Today, I'll have to mark my calendar as the day Snivelus Snape finally resorted to molly-coddling. He's made you weak."

There was a moment of silence, and then.

"You do realize the irony of you saying that he has made me weak. After all, you traveled all this way, but in the end you were the only one the Dark Lord didn't call upon."

She let out an evil hiss, but to Harry's parseltongue ears what he heard was 'there is water up my mouse' and barely managed to keep himself from smiling. Remembering that at any moment the Dark Lord might find out the truth and boil him alive helped.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Hermione told Draco she was going to go take a bath before their guests arrived and not to disturb her. In Hermione-speak this was translated as a polite 'I need to be alone so I can vent all my feelings without anyone watching so could you bugger off for a while?' This gave Hermione approximately two hours to do what she needed to do. Sneaking out of the Malfoy mansion and passed the guards was simple enough with Dobby's help, as was apparating to Hogsmeade. Getting from Hogsmeade to the castle without being noticed was a bit trickier, but once there Draco's broom proved invaluable in getting her straight into Gryffindor tower. She ended up in the seventh year boys' room, but luckily none of them were there for the holiday. The rest of the tower appeared empty as well, and passing Harry's bed revealed his trunk still sitting at the end, which meant Snape and Harry probably hadn't arrived yet or at least weren't ready to leave for Malfoy manor.

She went to her room and created a charmed note, then sent it soaring. She couldn't afford to be recognized as she wandered the halls, so she would need Viktor to come to her. However, if he were under surveillance, neither of them could afford the note being intercepted. She had to get clever.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Colin Creevey received something of a surprise while he was developing pictures for the next edition of The Hogwarts' Herald, when a paper airplane flew straight into his developing solution. He fished it out with his gloved hand and read it.

Colin. Get this to Viktor Krum, swiftly.

There was no signature and he didn't recognize the writing, but the writer obviously knew who he was and that he was staying at Hogwarts for the holiday. Why they wanted him to play messenger boy, he had no idea. Should he comply? For that matter, why was he getting a note to Krum that only said he had to get a note to Krum?

Well, it was an adventure, he supposed, and he was a Gryffindor. So he finished up with his pictures, hung them up to dry, and went in search of Durmstang's champion.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Getting weird notes delivered to him by Creevey was not the strangest thing to happen to him that day, but it was the most suspicious, particularly when Creevey had no answer as to where it came from or what it meant. The young Gryffindor looked genuinely disappointed when Viktor said he didn't know either and sent him away. After a few minutes, he finally decided it had to be McGunny again. Perhaps he had learned something relevant, but didn't want to risk contacting him directly again.

A Revealing charm caused the letters to rearrange themselves.

k mlt

Viktor. Get to history Class now. Y

uif

He cast a few few spells to check for spies and to prevent himself from being noticed and went to find Professor Toure's classroom. He saw no one on the way there and no one when he arrived. For a moment he thought he had been the victim of a prank, yet once he left the class he found Hermione standing in front of him. She nearly had him jumping out of his skin.

“Viktor.”

“Hermione? Vat are you doing here?”

She looked around as if she expected someone was following her, and pushed him back into the classroom.

"Viktor, you have to tell me right now, and be completely honest, did you or anyone from Durmstang attack Voldemort last night?"

He blinked at her stupidly, then shook his head.

"Vat? Vat are you talking about?"

"You swear you didn't know?!" she demanded, her voice cracking, her entire expression strained.

"I swear I didn't know he was attacked until you just said it! Is dat vat all dese Sentinels are here for? Is a war starting?"

She let out a shaky breath, relief washing through her. She shook her head.

"I don't know. The Dark Lord was hurt, but I don't know how or how badly. Lucius says you and everyone else in your party is being investigated for the attack. He said I couldn't reply to your letter or even speak to you, but I had to know for myself. You swear you had nothing to do with it?"

"I sveal. I sveal on de blood of my ancestors, I had nothing to do with it and don't know who did."

She nodded. "I believe you. Oh Viktor, I don't know what to do. I don't know what you should do. I don't think you're guilty, but I don't know if that will be enough. I think Lucius wants you to be guilty, and with the Dark Lord hospitalized he may have the power to manipulate it so it looks that way. If you tried to leave now though, it could make things worse."

Viktor said nothing for a long moment, and as Hermione watched him she saw a sort of resolve come over him. She had seen similar looks on Harry, and knew enough to be scared.

"Hermione, there's something I need to tell you."

Tom stepped away from the classroom door. So, his elder half was attacked and weakened? That was good. Very good, except for the fact he wasn't in any position to take advantage of it. He didn't even know where the other was.

Should he abandon his plan and come up with a new one?

[illegible]

"Yes?" he replied curtly.

"I..." his words died. He didn't have the courage to speak them. He didn't have the strength for the kind of confrontation it would cause. "Never mind."

"Are you ill, Potter?"

Harry looked up at him, but the man was watching the road to make sure neither of them wandered through one of hundreds of sloshy pools that littered their course.

"No. I'm just tired."

There was a thoughtful moment of silence.

"Does it take a lot of your magic... to do what you do..."

"You mean... the rituals?"

"Yes."

"... Depends on the ritual. Sometimes I feel really strong afterwards. Other times, I can barely move. This last one... it was hard."

They walked a little further in silence, and then, out of the blue, and out of character, Snape said, "He's going to be fine. You're both going to be just fine."

Harry stiffened under his hands, and suddenly stopped moving. His bright green eyes found Snape's black ones, and there was such maelstrom of emotions there that the man couldn't identify even one. Was it hope? Horror? Disbelief? Anger? He couldn't tell, and if tried legilimens to find out, he was sure his own mind would be bashed to pieces. Then Harry turned away, and just nodded.

"I hope so."

They continued up the road towards the castle.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

From Voldemort's office, Tom watched the road as Snape and Harry slowly made their way to the castle. Their timing was perfect. He had just finished his letter. Turnis was waiting impatiently on the Dark Lord's desk, shuffling from foot to foot. Tom had chosen him specifically, know he was the most talented of the Hogwart's owls.

“Take this...” he said, tying the letter to the bird's leg. “... to Lucius Malfoy.”

And with that, he opened a window and the owl flew through it before the creepy boy simply tossed him out. He flew straight to Hogsmeade, and if he had been a less experienced bird he would have simply followed the railroad tracks from there straight to London, but instead he flew straight to the Sentinel's station and through the window, which, like with most wizarding building, popped open just long enough to let him in.

A young Sentinel was monitoring the coming and goings of their floo (official Court floos were the only ones that worked during a Red Alert and were strictly regulated), and gave him an annoyed glance. There had been almost fifty Sentinels and a dozen Brass Culties that had come in through his particular floo and he was having a hell of a time keeping track of it all without dealing with the mail as well.

He stomped over to it, and took a peek at the letter on it's leg. What he saw made him pale. The envelope was black and on it there was a large golden V. It was an official letter from the Dark Lord himself. But how? Last he had been told the Dark Lord recovering from injuries somewhere... but then, perhaps he had returned to the castle without anyone knowing? Hogwarts was the man's home away from home after all. He looked the letter over and cast a few charms to see if it was legit. It checked out, and more importantly it was addressed to Chief Commander Malfoy.

No way in hell was he going to be held responsible for holding up the Dark Lord's instructions to the commander of the entire British army.

“Fine,” he muttered and tossed some floo powder into the fire place. It immediately changed color. “Go on then.”

Turnis flew past him, straight into the fire. He did not like floos, but he liked flying in winter even less and this was certainly the most expedient route. A bit of floundering and a lot of soot later, and he was spat out straight into Lucius Malfoy's office. And immediately was hit by a Stunning Hex.

He really hated wizards.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. Ireland is thick with Fairy Folk. In my universe, Ireland was basically pulled out of the sea specifically by the Fae so they could live on it and claim the land their own. People eventually moved in, and gradually so did wizards, but it's a very dangerous place for them. If a witch or wizard isn't careful and doesn't protect themselves or their children well enough, they can get snatched away or cursed or killed by Fae who are still the dominant race. Mixed-bloods are common, usually conceived through trickery or rape, and are persecuted as untrustworthy, unstable, and even evil but in other ways greatly admired for their power and often times for their beauty and charm.

Book IV:

Chapter 18:

Lucius stared down at the owl currently trying to right itself on his office floor. It was not one he recognized, though even if he had he would still have stunned it. Owls did not come into his office. They dropped their letters off with his secretaries or some random lieutenant, who in turn checked his mail (without opening it) for curses, jinxes, poisons, portkeys, and various other potential hazards.

Now was not the time for his security to become spotty.

“Cooper!”

His office door swung open, and slightly chubby little lieutenant rushed inside, simultaneously saluting and looking for danger.

“Sir!”

“This thing just came through my floo. My restricted floo. Find out who sent it.”

“Yes, sir!”

And like the lemming that he was, Cooper went straight to the fire place, cast a back-tracking spell, and threw himself inside without thought to the potential danger he had jumped straight into. Lucius sneered.

“Moron.”

He cast a few more spells on the bird, to see if it posed a threat, but it was perfectly ordinary owl with a less than ordinary letter. More spells, and he was getting quite bored of casting them at this point, and finally he snatched up the letter. Now wasn't this a curiosity? It was definitely written on Voldemort's personal stationary, but the Dark Lord had no reason to write him after their meeting. Who would have access to it, or even know how to use it? It was rumored you couldn't even write on it without special ink made of Dark Lord's own blood.

The handwriting was not Voldemort's and did not even make an attempt to disguise itself as such. Quite the contrary it was written to conceal identity, little more than well spelled out chicken scratch. What it lacked in elegance it made up for in content. After the first three sentences, he was spurred into action.

"Nixon!"

Another lieutenant lemming shot into the room as briskly as the first.

"Si-"

"Get me a physician."

"Are you ill-"

"Now!"

oo
oo

"This place reeks ," Greyback grumbled as he stalked into Voldemort's room. He was agitated, being summoned like some sort of pet dog from his forest and his pack, but he knew the situation was too grave for him to stand on pride. It didn't make him any happier about it though. "And you look like shit."

Voldemort managed a sickly grin, shining white teeth bared against his presumption. He had finally stopped bleeding an hour ago, but he knew the werewolf couldn't smell it over the sinus burning stink of antiseptic. There was no need to inform the dog just how sick his master had truly been, or perhaps might still be.

"Poor baby," he mocked, reclining as if on a chaise rather than a hospital bed. "Did you not get your nap today?"

Greyback let out a warning growl, but it did nothing against the dark wizard. The alpha gave up with an annoyed snort and walked to the nearest window. Diana, who had remained hidden behind his massive bulk came to the Dark Lord's bedside. She was dressed completely in white rabbit furs, her curly brown hair held up in white bone pins, rough and magnificent all at once. They stared at each other for a long moment, no need for words between them just yet. He didn't need to speak for her to know his questions.

"It is quite remarkable..." Diana said at last, "I have never seen a spell like this before, but then... I've never seen a soul as damaged as yours before either."

"What do you see?" he asked, barely restraining his impatience. He could not rush her if she didn't want to be rushed, but he could hope for her indulgence. She tilted her head from side to side, looking him up and down.

"You are... stable now."

"I know I am not going to die, but-"

"Not your body. Your flesh is meaningless. You are complete... more so anyway."

He still didn't understand what she meant, and his frustration was growing. He was tired and still in pain, bed ridden and anxious about letting Lucius run his country. If his body was still broken then what was she talking about?

"What precisely was done to me, who is responsible, and can it be fixed is all I want to know."

Diana's blank expression suddenly became vaguely amused.

"Fixed? Too late, it's already been done. Your soul has been mended."

Voldemort's frustration melted away into disbelief. Impossible. The Earth would never allow such a thing. He had been made incomplete for a reason and sacrificed too much for it simply to be undone. Who would do it? Who would have the capability? His first thought was Dumbledore, the old coot was loony enough to try something so indirectly devastating, but then he realized the man didn't have the capability to summon a goddess at that level of power. He had turned from the Old Magics a long time ago. A druid of some kind must have been responsible, perhaps even one of those he had seen in the glen?

"Who?"

Diana's amusement melted away, and she said nothing. Unease crawled into Voldemort's gut.

"Who?"

She looked towards Greyback, who was looking at her just as expectantly.

"He did not mean you harm."

The Dark Lord felt his world tilt. No... it was inconceivable. Harry would never have raised a hand against him, out of fear or respect or a warped sense of attachment or even patriotism, and if he had the will he didn't have the means. He was just a child, fourteen, and his skills and knowledge were rudimentary at best, not even near the level necessary to summon a goddess such as Madris, whatever sort of goddess she was, and certainly not without hurting himself.

But...

Diana did say Harry hadn't meant to harm him, that the spell had been intended to heal his soul. It was a reckless and naive, and a very Gryffindor thing to do. Brennan had been there though, surely he would have stopped... now he was being naive if he didn't think the man wouldn't go along with such a plot or even come up with it himself. Harry had to have had some sort of idea of what he was doing since he was one who would have sacrificed the dragon's heart and requested the spell, but was he truly aware of the consequences? Brennan had to have designed the ritual, so perhaps he had tricked Harry or neglected to mention the dangers? Did it even matter? What right did that boy have to meddle in the very essence of his being?

And he had lied to him. He had stood right beside him, and had the audacity to ask what he could do to make it better, when he should have been on his hands and knees begging forgiveness.

Anger and betrayal began to simmer in his gut, his magic stirring under his skin felt like pins and needles, the only form of release being to hex someone. There were two meddling wizards that came to mind.

“Do not be hasty.”

His red eyes flashed to Diana, but even he wasn't foolish enough to lash out against her. Not the Daughter of the Moon, and certainly not with Greyback tense and ready to defend them.

“He has betrayed me...”

“You deserved to be betrayed. Were you not the first to meddle in another's soul?”

“He made that decision himself.”

“You made the situation in which the decision had to be made, and there were instances even before that. Even now you force his hand.”

“I never tried to kill him!”

“Nor he you, but you are both guilty of carelessness. As things stand, you are equals in this regard.”

To Voldemort that was hardly the case. He had protected Harry as best he could, nurtured him, taught him powerful magics, and taken him into his confidence, and how had he been repaid? Had magic carelessly cast against him. Magic that changed him in a way he had never asked for or wanted and which very nearly killed him more effectively than any curse sent his way before it. Did this little mock-goddess really think things even between them?

He was ready to argue his case, but Lucius' sudden appearance forced him to stay his tongue.

“My Lord!”

“What is it?!” he snapped, his dark magic pulsing with irritation and barely contained rage, making the Malfoy patriarch flinch away.

“I-I have uncovered a plot, My Lord. A plot orchestrated by the Germans.”

Voldemort was still irritated, but it was far easier to deal with wizards than it was with goddesses, and turned his full attention to the other man.

“Details?” he asked, refining his voice to something more welcoming.

Lucius pulled a vile out of his pocket, and after an awkward moment of trying to move around Diana without touching her or coming in between her and a glowering Greyback, managed to get close enough to hand it to his master. Voldemort took it. The vile was empty but for a tiny insect, wiggling its legs, uselessly trying to climb up the slick glass prison.

“What is it?”

“It's some sort of surveillance insect. This one was pulled out of the flesh behind my left ear.”

Voldemort looked up at him quickly, understanding perfectly what sort of trouble they could be in if any number of Lucius' duties had been uncovered.

“It's worse. I have reason to believe I am not the only who has been infected with one of these things. They were delivered during the first challenge of the Triwizard Tournament, when several important and minor officials, yourself included, were exposed to them. I am having my men draw up the guest list for that day, and track down everyone in attendance for an emergency examination. I've contacted Coventry College for an entomologist to uncover exactly what these things are and how they work.”

“Good, but how did you uncover all this?”

Here Lucius' expression became closed, and Voldemort knew he was revealing something he had grave suspicions about. He reached into his robes and pulled out a letter, written on familiar black paper and gold ink.

“I received this about an hour ago. An owl came through my restricted floo caring it. When I sent one of my men through the floo to track down its origins, they returned few minutes later and said it came from Hogsmeade. It is likely the owl's origins is from Hogwarts as well, and the materials here were taken from your office.”

“Snape? Lestrage?”

“Maybe, but I doubt either would bother to conceal their identity. We can't afford to guess at this point. I have already sent two squadrons of Culties and two squadrons of Sentinels to Hogsmeade to capture the suspects, one set of each for the village and the school, but I can't order the arrest of foreign dignitaries without your approval.”

“You have it. I want them all alive for interrogation, unless the resistance becomes too violent. Detain the French dignitaries as well, and every man, woman, and child in the castle. I want to know where this letter came from and how long this information was kept hidden.”

“As you command, my Lord!”

Lucius turned sharply to go, eager to begin the first steps of a long awaited war. If the letter was truthful, and the Germans really had intended to illegally spy on them, they would be more than justified to retaliate and no other country would try to interfere. Germany was the first step to claiming Europe.

“And Lucius...”

He stopped sharply, tensing.

“... I want you to find Harry. I will need to speak with him as quickly as possible.”

There was threat in Voldemort's words, but whether it was directed at him or at Potter, Lucius was unable to discern.

oo
oo

“Oh Merlin...” She slowly sank into a nearby chair, unable to believe what she was hearing. Viktor was a spy? Harry was in danger? From Voldemort and not Dumbledore? “I don't believe you. It's impossible. Harry would have told me.”

Viktor shook his head. “Even if it put you danger? Vat if he can't talk about it? Zere are a lot of vays to force silence.”

Hermione's expression twisted in anguish, thinking on it now she knew things hadn't been right with Harry since the first challenge. She had assumed it was stress, and it probably was, but had that stress been a result of his increased publicity and school work or the anxiety of knowing too many secrets and trying to keep people safe?

“You don't have any proof.”

“I do,” he insisted, relentless in his pursuit to make her understand. “I have copies of his medical records. Zey are a nightmare.”

“A lot of that is from being attacked by Moody or accidents.”

“Dere's a lot of it dat's completely unexplained and vorse zere are some notes dat lead me to believe he vas being experimented on.”

Hermione's hand flew to her mouth, but it wasn't enough to muffle the whimper that escaped. Horrible images sprang into her mind, pieces of nightmares she'd had from overhearing Lucius and his cronies speak of the war, and interposed was Harry's face, determined and kind and suffering it all as quietly as he could. Tears formed and fell, even the possibility of it being true was too heartbreaking.

“No...”

He knelt down in front of her, taking her fisted hands into his, and looked up at her beseechingly.

“Listen to me,” he begged, “I am going to try and take him out of here, to somevere he can be safe and happy. I vant to know if... vould.... vould come vith us?”

“What are you talking about?”

“Do you vant to come too? To Germany? To Europe? Zere is so much zere for someone like you, Hermione. You can go to school anyvere you vant, vork anyvere you vant, date and marry anyone you vant, travel, and study, and just live how ever you like. Please, come vith me. Dis place vill tear you down before it lets you free.”

Hermione could feel her heart begin to race. Was he really asking her this? To run away with him? Well, him and Harry, but to run away nonetheless? To some unknown place where she knew no one and didn't even speak the language? Abandoning her brother and Narcissa and almost all of her friends and country?

“I can't... This is my home.”

“You can have better home,” he pleaded, but she shook her head, her tears falling even harder.

“That's not how it works, Viktor. This isn't a perfect place, but this is where my heart is. I can't just abandon it, and I don't think Harry could either. Have you even asked him?”

“I...”

Well, shit. He had forgotten to do that. He hadn't wanted to even ask Harry until he knew he could actually take him to Germany, and then Harry had all but disappeared. There simply hadn't been any opportunity to ask.

"I'll ask him when he returns. As soon as I see him, I promise. Please, don't give up on the idea just yet? If he agrees, won't you at least consider it?"

She looked at him so sadly that when she opened her mouth he knew whatever she said, she wasn't going to change her mind. Hermione was a kind and loyal person, be it to friend or country, and she would not simply abandon it. He felt like a fool for ever thinking she would.

"Viktor!"

Viktor and Hermione's wands were both in their hands and ready for attack at the first sound of intrusion, but both were taken back by McGunny's sudden appearance. The Ravenclaw was deathly pale and sweating heavily, as if he had suffered under Cruciatus. He looked taken back when he saw Hermione there, but not so much by her wand.

"Granger, what are you... forget it. It's not important," he said, and turned to Viktor. "You have to get Harry and get out of here, RIGHT NOW!"

"What are you-"

"They know. They know, and they're going to arrest you and everyone else, unless you can get out of here now."

Viktor and Hermione shared a panicked look. He had to try at least once more.

"Please come with me..."

"I'm sorry, Viktor, I can't!"

"Somnebus!"

Hermione went limp, slumping bonelessly over her desk. Viktor snarled at McGunny, but he snarled right back.

"You don't have time for this! You have minutes at the most. Do you understand that you could die if you stay any longer? That all of your friends could die?"

Viktor turned away, down at Hermione fast asleep and helpless. She was beautiful, her expression serene and her eyelashes glittering with her tears. Should he just take her with him now? This would likely be the last time she would ever be presented with opportunity again. Could he let her turn it away without truly knowing what she was losing?

"Come on, damn you!" McGunny shouted, breaking him from his trance. "I'll make sure she gets out safely, so just come on already?!"

Viktor let out a scream of frustration, physically throwing one of the desks across the room before storming towards the door. He couldn't force this decision on Hermione. It was her decision and she would never forgive him if took it away from her. So he ran, his heart grieving with every step he took, but he knew what he had to do. He had to get his classmates and Harry out safely.

"How did they find out? How do you even know about it?"

McGunny shook his head, his entire body trembling, and it was amazing he could even stay upright let alone run. Viktor had never seen McGunny anything other than cool and composed, and annoying as that was this was definitely worse. The other boy had seen something or done something traumatizing to end up in such a state.

"I have sources. Old classmates who joined the Court or who have parents there. We like to keep track of what really happens behind closed doors. The alert is over an hour old. They're just positioning themselves to catch you all unaware. No, wait, there are Sentinels down there. They don't know what's happening yet, but I can't afford for them to spot us together. We'll take a secret passage."

They ducked into the shadow of a column which turned out to be a hidden corridor with narrow stone steps leading to the upper levels.

"My friends-"

"Are all in their dormitory. They got tired of being gawked at by the Sentinels. You have to get Harry before you get the others."

"Vere is he?"

"He just returned. He's in his dorm."

They exited the passage two corridors from Gryffindor Tower, and McGunny looked both ways before speaking.

"I can't go any further. If I'm caught, I'm dead. Just go to the tower and get him. The password for the portrait is 'Tannenbaum'."

"Fine. You go back and make sure Hermione gets out of here safely, or so help me I'll find you and all ze sources in ze world von't keep you safe, do you understand?"

"Whatever. Just go!"

Viktor ran the rest of the way to Gryffindor Tower, barely taking time to make sure no one was behind or ahead of him. The Fat Lady was in her portrait gossiping with the Shepherdess, and barely so much as rolled her eyes as he bit out the password, and pulled it open. The common room was empty and leading from it were two sets of stairs. He tried to recall which one was the girls and which was boys, knowing if Hogwarts was anything like Durmstang there would be an alarm in the girl's dorm. He made his best guess, and took the left, jumping the stairs three at a time. When he heard voices he stopped. There were two and one of them definitely wasn't Harry.

"I didn't want that to happen. He nearly died!" Harry was shouting.

"But he did not, and you have what you wanted," another voice, this one older but not one Viktor recognized.

"He's going to kill me."

"You knew that might happen too."

“Oh Madris, what am I going to do?”

“That's a good start. The gods are surprisingly generous to those who pray to them, and she was particularly generous last night.”

“This isn't funny. I don't know what to do.”

Viktor wasn't exactly sure what he was hearing, but it was highly suspicious. Harry had obviously done something last night, and he was in trouble... well, they were both in trouble right now, and he didn't have the time to wait for either of them to sort things out. They both had to get out of there and quick.

He stepped through the doorway and into the room. Harry turned to him, his eyes widening with terror. Beside him was a man Viktor only vaguely recognized a teacher, gray haired and dressed in white robes, the only sign of his surprise his silence. At least, they seemed too startled to have hurled a hex at him.

“Harry, I'm leaving for Germany. Right now. Do you want to come?”

The Gryffindor simply stood there like a stunned deer.

“If someone is trying to hurt you, don't you think you should come with me? To Germany? We can protect you there.”

Harry blinked. “Huh?”

Brennan let out a small laugh. “Well, there you go. Prayers really do work. Come on, I'll shrink your trunk, you grab your schoolbag.”

The boy only looked more lost, and Viktor certainly didn't envy him. He was feeling confused himself, and he had expected this to happen eventually.

“Wait! What is going on? Why are you leaving? Why do you want me to come along?”

“Reducio!,” Brennan went on about his task, the most prepared of all them it seemed.

“The Dark Lord is going to come here and arrest me and all of my classmates if we don't leave here soon, and I need to know right now whether you want to come with me to Germany or not.”

Harry just blinked at him again, and Viktor despaired of him ever reaching a decision. They were both spared the act, but Brennan who pointed his wand at Harry.

“Imperio!”

Viktor flinched away at the spell, his own wand raised to ward off the perceived attack, but Brennan was already pocketing his wand again. He turned to Viktor, his expression grave.

“It is too much to ask a child to give up everything and everyone they have ever known in an instant. As an adult and as his teacher, I am making the decision for him. To save his life and possibly his very soul, I am entrusting him to you Mr. Krum and your associates. I will tell no one what I have witnessed here, but I recommend you hurry,” then he turned to Harry, who was staring dazedly out into space. Placing the shrunken trunk in Harry's robe and his school bag over his shoulder, he continued, “Follow Krum, do as he tells you until you are safe, then wake up.”

Viktor's first instinct was to argue, but he really didn't know how much time he had left. He headed for the door.

“Come on, follow me.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

McGunny stared down at Hermione's unconscious form for a long time, alien feelings of hatred and disgust fighting to regain control over him. He couldn't let it happen again. Already, he had put the lives of dozens of people at risk including someone who had come to trust him and called him friend. Insanity wasn't the issue. He was well read, he knew the basics of abnormal psychology; split personality disorder, schizophrenia, sleep walking... and knew none of these fit.

Something was inside him, and it was trying to take him over. A spirit? A demon? He had never taken metaphysics, and incidents of possession were so rare he had not thought it relevant to read up on. What ever it was it was smart and powerful, and had been oh so subtle until it had seized control a few hours ago. It was exhausted now, but how long before it regained its strength?

So much damage had been done already, and now he felt murder in his veins whenever he looked to Hermione. He didn't dare touch her for fear that his hand might slip and he'd strangle her. He couldn't leave her here either, as that might have the same result if anyone found her and believed she had warned Viktor. Or if she were interrogated, the Court and the Dark Lord would learn of his involvement and come for him.

Kill it. That's the only logical solution. We can make it look like Viktor did it. Used and discarded it like the muggleborn trash it is.

McGunny snorted, and muttered aloud, "Logical? Like making up convenient excuses to have Harry kidnapped? Like feeding me paranoid delusions so I'd go along with it? Go away, whatever you are. Go torment some other fool."

He moved away from Hermione and headed for the exit.

Where are you going?

"To get Snape. I can get him to take care of her. He's her godfather, he won't let anything happen to her."

You're stupid if you think that's true. He'll sell her out in an instant, just like he did Harry.

McGunny paused in the doorway. "Don't call him 'Harry', you parasite. He isn't your friend."

There was an amused chuckle that made the back of his neck itch.

Obliviate it. Save yourself, at least.

He honestly didn't even know what he meant, but it sounded painful. There was another annoying chuckle.

And you call yourself a Ravenclaw? It means 'erase her memory'.

"I don't know that spell."

I know... so we know.

And there it was. The words, the wand movement, the effects, and effectiveness of the spell, all there as clearly as if he had known it all along.

"How did you do that?"

Do it, and I'll tell you how.

"Why should I trust you? For all I know this spell will kill her."

I need your cooperation more than I need it dead. I am proposing a truce.

"To hell with you! This is my body."

And you can have it, but I am not leaving until I have a place to go. Give me what I want... or I'll find the means to take it.

"I'll kill us both before I let you control me!"

He spun around, looking for any sort of weapon he could find. He had never considered himself particularly brave or tolerant of pain, but if necessary he thought he might be able to inflict it on himself, perhaps just enough to convince the thing inside him that he was serious.

Don't be such a melodramatic Gryffindor. Obliviate it, and then let us negotiate. You're a logical person and I am not unreasonable. I am certain we can find a compromise.

He turned back to Hermione, uncertainly. She lay there helplessly, but instead of violence he felt only severe irritation. It had given up trying to take control and kill the girl, which meant he still retained enough will to over power it. He just needed to figure out how to get it out of him, and that required time... which he was running out of.

“Fine. Don't try anything fishy or I'll... I'll obliviate us both!”

The chuckle of before burst out into all out laughter.

oo
oo

“Stupify!” Viktor shouted, flinging out his wand. The spell was a direct hit and the first Sentinel fell to the ground, but the second Sentinel's reflexes were faster than Viktor's recovery time.

“Stupify.”

The second Sentinel fell to his knees. The Durmstang champion looked behind him at Harry, who remained as blank faced as before but his wand was up and ready. Was he waking up already? He had told the boy to follow him, not help subdue the guards. He waited a moment, but the boy just stood there and stared off into space.

“Come on.” He entered his common room and the boy followed obediently behind him. Inside, all of the boys and even some of the girls seemed to be gathered, talking excitedly to each other about something. Everyone turned when they stepped into the room, and Jophery pulled away from the group address.

“Did you hear? Oblitz says the Dark Lord was att-”

“Everyone has exactly one minute to get what they need. We've been found out. We're leaving NOW!”

“Wait- what? Fuck! You heard him! Let's go! Is anyone missing?”

“Elsa and Sabrina are in their own room. I'll get them!” one boy shouted, and rushed out.

“I'll get your trunk! ” another called after him. “Reducto!”

“Oblitz isn't here!”

“He can handle himself.”

“But who'll manage the ship? Does the Ambassador even know?”

“Worry about yourselves first. Is everyone ready?”

“Shit, where's Hugo? Here kitty, kitty.”

“I have him... where's my rat?”

“What's Potter doing here? What's wrong with him?”

“Forget it! Time's up!” Viktor ordered, and their chaos dissolved as quickly as it had formed, and they fell into two perfect lines and followed Viktor out into the hall, wand in one hand, brooms in the other, and all their belongings carefully stored in the folds of their robes.. “Jophery, take care of Harry.”

“On it.” Jophery broke ranks to herd Harry along behind the others. There was obviously some sort of spellwork done on him, but he didn't have time to question it or risk taking it off, or even question why exactly they were taking the boy with them. Judging by the unconscious Sentinels and the pace at which Viktor was leading them towards the tower, they had already run out of time. Cautiously, he peeked behind them, expecting men and women in black robes and leather to come bursting out into the hall, shouting at them to stop.

It was ironic then the first sign of resistance wasn't from behind, but from within. As they made their way up the tower stairs, Harry suddenly stopped. Jophery nearly fell on top of him.

“What is it?” he asked, but Harry said nothing and his face remained blank.

“Jophery! Hurry up!”

“Coming!”

A little more nudging and the Gryffindor started moving again, albeit with some sort of reluctance. Was he waking up? If he didn't want to come willingly, should he just leave him here? Viktor would kill him, but what was Viktor up to anyway?

They reached the top of the turret and exited out into the cold, open air. Winter wind whipping at them. Everyone remained towards the center as Viktor went to the edge to check for danger.

“Shit. They're starting to surround the school. Fifty at least. Wait for my word and we'll all make a fly for it. Spread out as soon as you're in the air and keep high. When we land, keep alert. They may have already sent some people ahead to secure the ship. Understand?”

“Yes!” they all barked in unison.

“Yes,” Harry said evenly right after, earning him an unnerved look from the others, who still had no idea what was going on.

“Harry, ride with Jophery.”

“Yes.”

Jophery didn't like the situation. If he put the smaller boy in front of him, he'd have a harder time maneuvering but if he put him in back, he was afraid he'd fall off the back. There was nothing for it. They didn't have time to figure out something better.

“You're riding at my back. Hold on tight and move as my body does. Don't try keeping balanced, that's my job. Understand?”

“Yes.”

“That's what I like about you, Harry. You're a real go-getter.”

“Hurry up, Jophery!”

“Yes, mum. On we go, my little baby monkey.”

It was an awkward fit. The boy fit against his back just fine, but there was nowhere for either of them to tuck up their legs. And since he hadn't planned on flying today, he hadn't worn a cup. Erk. At least the grip on his back seemed firm.

“Alright, now!”

Everyone moved forward in a burst of speed, except for Jophery, who opted to fly straight up first making them a harder target even though he knew he'd be the slowest and largest, and then hurried after the others. They had all gotten far ahead of them, but angling the broom down again gained them enough speed to close the distance. Behind them they could hear the faint sounds of shouting, but the cold wind swallow up most of it. They made it to the edge of the lake before they were fired upon.

Streaks of red and yellow shot out at them, and everyone began to spread out for more room to dodge. A large white streak shot right in front of Jophery and exploded in a blinding light, shooting sparks at them. There were screams of surprise and one of pain and then fear. Jophery was blind but unhurt, and unable to see ahead of him, he moved straight upwards again. There was another scream and it sounded as if someone had fallen.

“Wingardium leviosa!” Jophery nearly dropped out of the sky himself when he heard the spell shouted right behind him.

“You awake back there?” he called, still unable to open his eyes to look behind him, but he could feel one of the boy's arms had left his waist and must have been holding his wand. Around them now, he could hear counter curses and blocking spells being thrown up by his classmates, and the occasional sizzle and snap of spells going off too close to him. It sound as if they were falling behind again.

“I got her! Keep going!” he heard Viktor shout. “Harry, fly for Jophery. He can't see.”

The arm returned, but both the hands shifted from his waist to the broom handle, and the broom shot forward as if from a cannon. His own hands flew to the handle to steady himself, the fear of flying very fast and very blind causing him to shout.

“AAAAAAaaaahhhhhhhh!!!! OH SHIT CAN YOU EVEN SEE BACK THERE?!!”

And suddenly they started to slow, and he gradually forced his watery eyes to open to star-speckled reality. The Durmstang ship stood before them, a looming refuge of heavily warded wood and steel and magic. They dropped onto the deck, and Jophery's wand was immediately in hand, prepared for enemies. No one immediately jumped out to stop them. Of course, if anyone had tried to board beside its listed passengers, they likely would have been killed or deposited into one of the tiny cells below deck.

Speaking of which... Jophery had only taken a few steps, when there was a loud 'click'. He spun around to see Harry falling through a trapdoor. He couldn't even reach it in time to stop it from closing again.

“Harry? Harry? Are you alright? Don't worry, I'll get you out of there in a minute. Just sit tight.”

“Move out of the way!”

The warning didn't come quite quick enough. He managed to move aside a bit, but still caught one of his landing classmates in the shoulder, knocking them both over. All around him, others were only just catching up. How fast had Harry moved them?

“Get the wounded below deck!” Viktor shouted, “Ten of you stay out here and put up the strongest shields you can. The rest of you prep the ship!”

“What about the Ambassador and Oblitz and the others?!” Elsa shouted.

"If they're not captured already, they'll be able to portkey into the cargo hold, but only if we can get this boat far enough from the castle's wards, so hurry it up! Move, move, move!"

Everyone sprinted into action, the defense party casting shield spells and reflection spells around as much of the ship's massive bulk as they could while the others pulled up the anchor and lowered the sails and unfroze the rudder. Viktor found Jophery on his way to the pilot cabin.

"Where's Harry?"

"The ship tossed him in the brig."

"Good, he'll be safe there for now. Did he wake up?."

"I don't know. What is going on? Why the hell are we kidnapping him to begin with?"

"We're not kidnapping, we're- forget it. If we live I'll tell you all about it. Get below deck and check on the wounded"

"Aye-aye, Captain!"

He sharp, mocking salute, he slipped below deck. Although the exterior of the ship was dark and foreboding, the inside was bright and warmly lit with light colored woods and off white paint, portraits of ships and sea creatures hung on the walls, their subject matters moving about from sea to painted sea. The infirmary was at the end of the hall, and once inside Jophery went to work assessing the damage.

He was by no-means a medi-wizard, but if there was one thing that Jophery excelled at it was patching up his friends after duels and quidditch matches. And truthfully, he'd seen worse than what he was seeing now. He just hadn't seen so much of it at once.

The infirmary itself looked like any other cabin, except with six pallets instead of four bunkbeds, and large cabinet of medical supplies and books. Usually it smelled like wormwood, but now it smelled like blood and burnt flesh. There were six boys and one Sabrina, and she was definitely the worst off. If he were to guess he would identify her as the one who had been knocked from her broom. The right side of her robes had been burned clean off from arm to shoulder and partway down her side, and what remained was black and blistered skin. She had already passed out from the pain.

The others were minor gashes and bumps, which he treated with the store of antiseptics, salves, potions, gauze, and the odd doo-hicky he could work but not pronounce. With the simple cases taken care of, he turned his attention to Sabrina. If he was quick and careful, he might save her from permanent scars. With medication manuals on potions and counter-curse texts, he sorted out a course of action and went to work. In the midst of his deep concentration and the utter silence of the infirmary, he took for granted that they were in the middle of a life and death battle, and it wasn't until he felt the ship shift beneath him and begin to sink that he realized they were escaping.

They had done it.

The ship began to rock, and he jumped to Sabrina's side to secure her from rolling off the table. Things hadn't even settled yet when more patients arrived.

"Jophery! I've three more for you!" someone called, before shoving the door open and dragging in an unconscious person. Two others limped in on their accord. It was getting crowded.

"Alright, anyone who thinks they can rest comfortably in their own room, get out. Unless you want to help, then by all means stay!"

A few shuffled out, but even only a few minutes passed before even more shuffled in. It seemed at least half of his classmates had been hurt in some way. He worked as quickly as possible, but he was more than a little overwhelmed.

At least news circulated quickly. They had managed to submerge the ship below the ice and were moving it out through the lochs and towards the ocean. Viktor was manning the helm, but mostly letting the ship sail itself. Within ten minutes they had moved out of range of the castle wards, and those not actively helping to secure the ship waited anxiously near the cargo hold for those with portkeys to make their appearance... or their enemies so that they could blast them to pieces.

Twenty minutes after they moved out of the wards, Oblitz portkeyed in. He was a bit singed in the corner of his robes, and covered in blood but none of it appeared to be his own. He paid no one any mind and went immediately to find Viktor. A few minutes later Schwartzmann appeared, completely unfazed, but his aide was screaming hysterically, and had to be stunned to keep him from hurting himself or anyone else. After four hours, another aide made it through... but he died before they could even get him to the infirmary. Jophery was secretly relieved. The man had obviously been tortured, and whatever had been done hadn't been something he could fix or even understand.

And then he remembered Harry was still in the brig.

Oooo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Book IV:

Chapter 19: Voyage

“What is going on, Lucius?”

The Brass Cult General turned away from the lake where the Durmstang ship had disappeared beneath the ice. Sentinels and Brass Culties hovered over the broken ice, trying to track the direction it was heading. It was impossible. The ice was too thick and the tracking charms had bounced off the shields encompassing the ship. There were three lochs leading into this lake, and any of them would eventually lead into the sea. Even if he set his sentinels to guard all three, they probably wouldn't be able to find them.

If it all wasn't such a damn nuisance, Lucius might actually have been impressed with the Durmstrang students' ingenuity and foresight.

Severus had finally shown up, quicker than expected with all of the security now swarming the castle, and didn't look pleased.

“The Germans have escaped,” Lucius said blandly.

“Yes, I noticed that. Why precisely are they escaping? We're they some how responsible for the Dark Lord's condition?” he asked, his impatience blatantly obvious. Lucius was in a bad enough mood, that he saw no reason to indulge him.

“Maybe. Probably. That's not why I'm here.”

“Do I have ask you a questions for every answer I want? Do you really want to waste both our time with that?”

“I received a letter informing me the Germans were spies, and there was enough evidence presented to convince both myself and the Dark Lord. Obviously, the information was legitimate,” he said, then began walking back towards the castle. He still had men there who would need instructions for the arrest of the French students and Madam Maxime. Snape followed him. “I'll be honest, though, Potter caught me off guard. I hadn't expected him to be involved in this scheme."

Snape tensed, but he was disappointingly inexpressive.

"Now what are you talking about?"

"He is with them. I thought he had been captured at first, but then he helped fight off my men and rescued one of the little saboteurs. Somehow they must have convinced him to join their cause. And after all our Lord has done for him. The little ingrate."

Snape said nothing, and when Lucius looked back at him he was surprised by how pale he had become. And for Snape, who was pale to begin with, that was something.

"Are you alright, my friend?"

For a moment the potions master said nothing, and it wasn't until they entered the castle that he finally shook his head. "No, I am not. Potter was my responsibility. If he had thoughts of defecting I should have noticed, but his moods and behaviors have been so erratic lately with the tournament I hadn't thought anything suspicious about it."

"Yes, well, I fear I am in a worse position than you. Lord Voldemort seemed to know Potter was up to something last I spoke to him. He ordered me to take him into custody with the rest of the Germans. Now, I'm sorry, but we'll have to discuss this later. I have to try and salvage this whole mess."

Lucius moved away to the Great Hall. Snape wasn't sorry to see him go. His mind was buzzing with this latest information, and fear was starting to sink its fangs into him. He needed to find a quiet place to think everything through before he faced Lucius or the Dark Lord or even Bellatrix.

He headed towards his private quarters. There were Sentinels searching the dungeons, which was rather foolish, since at least half of them would likely be hopelessly lost before they were through, but no one stopped him.

His rooms would be exactly as he had left them, which seemed the only thing at the moment that hadn't changed. Harry, his ward, had run away after supposedly conspiring against Britain... that sounded completely ridiculous. The boy wouldn't have run away. He loved his friends, his school, his godfathers, and possibly even cared for Lord Voldemort, though why Snape hadn't the foggiest. Yet, Lucius had said even the Dark Lord had suspected his defection. Should he believe him?

"Aminitas," he muttered, the door to his room popped open noiselessly to allow him entry and immediately closed behind him. His wand jumped into his hand. It appeared he had assumed too quickly that even his rooms could provide him sanctuary. Someone was there.

His living room was exactly the same, dark furniture and glinting silver in the candlelight, but he sensed a presence amongst the shadows and after all these years he knew to trust his instincts.

"Come out with your hands in the air, or I will kill just to be safe."

"Please, don't fire," came a familiar, feminine voice. "I swear I only hid because I thought you might be a Sentinel."

"Hermione? What are you doing here?"

She moved out from the shadows of a book case, her notice-me-not spell slipping away from her like a discarded cloak. Head-to-toe she looked the frightened rabbit, pale and shivering and large eyes wet with tears. He lowered his wand. What was happening now?

"I'm so sorry, Uncle Severus, I swear I am, but I had to come. I had to ask him myself. Please, please, don't tell Lucius I'm here. He'll kill me."

He could tell she truly believed that, and he suspected she was right, or at least that Lucius might find some way to shove his failure to catch the Germans and Harry on to Hermione, and let the Dark Lord find a suitably deadly punishment. He shuddered at the thought.

"Calm down. I won't tell Lucius if you tell me what happened and why you are here. If I sense even a single falsehood, by lie or omission, I will drag you before your foster father myself, is that understood?"

She nodded, sniffled, and wrung her hands nervously. He wondered if she had come to confront Harry about his defection. Had that been what brought her so quickly? If she had answers, he wanted them.

"Go sit down. I will make us some tea."

"But if I'm found-"

"The only reason you managed to get into my rooms is because I have given you the passwords and set my wards to accept you and Draco. Anyone else, and that includes Lucius, who tried to enter uninvited would find themselves in a rather nasty little room on the other side of the dungeons. If you're honest, I will find the means to take you home undetected. Now is not the time. The school is swarming with his men."

She nodded, but didn't look any less nervous. He thought she must be as nervous to be noticed missing from home as she was about being found here, and decided he should probably make this quick. He set a kettle on the stove and added some chamomile tea to the water, thinking of how he should conduct his interrogation before leaving it all and entering the living room. He found Hermione anxiously chewing her thumbnail.

He sat directly across from her, and crossed his arms.

"Firstly, is your brother here?"

"No! He doesn't even know I left the house... at least he didn't. He might have noticed I'm gone by now."

He nodded. Good. Draco's lack of involvement was one less thing to worry about.

“Now, tell me, from the very beginning how you ended up here and what exactly you have done.”

“I... It started when I got a letter from Viktor...”

She told him everything. The letter, Lucius' threat, her escape to Hogwarts, and confronting Viktor, his confession of being a spy, his invitation to leave. He stopped her briefly to asked, “Did he extend this offer to Harry?”

She was silent for a long moment, then said, “He hadn't offered, but he said he would. He said... he said the Dark Lord was experimenting on Harry...” Here she wiped the tears from her eyes, and sniffled again before she could continue, “... and he wanted to take him somewhere safe. But he hadn't asked yet.”

So Lucius had been wrong. There was no conspiracy. That or Krum had lied to her.

He gestured for her to continue, and she went on to tell him about denying his offer and then being hit with a spell. Here she seemed a bit confused. She didn't remember Viktor casting the spell, but she also knew no one else had been with them up to that point. The next thing she knew she woke up on the floor of the classroom. She had tried to sneak out again, but found there were Sentinels everywhere. She was afraid, and ran into the dungeons and hid in Severus' rooms. And that was when he had found her.

“Did he find out?” she asked when she was done. “Did he find out about me coming to find Viktor? Is that why all those people are out there?”

“No-” The kettle in the kitchen began to whistle, and he stood and when to take care of it. He came back with one cup of tea for her only, as he didn't want anything deadening is wits at this point. She took a few tentative sips, and watched him expectantly, waiting for him to continue.

“No. He found out your friend Krum was a spy and ordered a raid. You may be relieved to know that as far as I can tell, both he and his classmates all escaped.”

She was definitely relieved, if the tension flowing out of her was anything to by.

“... You will be less pleased to know that they took Potter with them.”

Luckily, he had the foresight to levitate her tea cup before she dropped it on herself.

“...No...”

He sighed. He still didn't know the truth about Harry, and perhaps that was less important than what was going be done about it. Harry was practically a prince in the eyes of Britain, and to have him runaway or be kidnapped... he had no idea what might happen, but war seemed mixed in there somewhere.

In the meantime, he had to figure out what he was going to do about his misadventurous goddaughter before she picked up Harry's bad habits.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Are we under arrest?” Fleur demanded, snapping at Lucius Malfoy who stood blocking the door, staring down at her imperiously. She, along with her headmistress and classmates, had all been herded into their common room at wand point by some of the very same witches and wizards who had been telling them not worry only half an hour ago. Their wands had also been taken, and that was by the far the greatest violation they had performed so far.

“No, my dear, not yet,” he said, as if it were inevitable that they would be.

“What iz all zis about?” Madam Maxime said evenly, doing a stunning job appearing unaffected by the whole ordeal. Commander Malfoy gave her a polite nod, but it came off as mocking.

“We have uncovered a plot to kill Lord Voldemort and sabotage our country's defense infrastructure. It appears this plot originates from Hogwarts itself, no less. I am sure you understand why I must be extremely cautious. Several conspirators have already escaped and taken one of our students with them already.”

Fleur and the headmistress turned to one another, sharing looks of mutual concern, before turning back to Malfoy.

“I 'ope none of your people were 'urt, Commander,” Madam Maxime said, “and zat you recover your student quickly and unharmed. My students and I will do anyzing zat we can to assist you. May I ask who it was zat was taken?”

The man's smile was utterly serpentine, a little too wide and with eyes stone cold.

“On behalf of the people of Britain, I extend our appreciation for your concern and even more so your cooperation. Mr. Potter was... taken. Rest assured we will exercise every possible resource to bring him home. If you don't mind, I'd like to have some of my people ask all of you some questions. It maybe that you unwittingly came across some information that will help us and of course, clear you of any wrong doing.”

There was a moment of utter silence.

“... Very well,” Madam Maxime conceded.

“Excellent. Any volunteers?”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“I don't see why we should let him out,” Oblitz grumbled, as he followed Ambassador Schwartzmann below deck, Krum following at his heels. "I'd feel a lot safer if he remained where he was. Won't do him any harm either."

Schwartzmann shook his head.

"Absolutely not. Herr Potter is our guest, not our prisoner. It's bad enough that we left him here as long as we have."

Viktor felt a pang of guilt at that. He had been so busy trying to run the ship, he had assumed Jophery would take care of Harry, forgetting that Jophery would be even busier than himself. His guilt only grew worse as they entered the underbelly of the ship, and the air cooled so that their breath misted in the air. It had been hours since they had launched the ship, and he couldn't even begin to imagine how betrayed and terrified Harry might be feeling right then.

The hallways were dark and narrow below deck, as gloomy as any dungeon. There were six cells, each one numbered. The numbers above each cell two through six were glowing white. Cell one glowed red. Schwartzmann knocked.

"Herr Potter, this is Ambassador Schwartzmann. I've come to let you out. Please step away from the door."

Oblitz tapped his shoulder. "Perhaps I should go first... in case he's a bit upset."

"And greet him with a Stunning Hex? I don't think so."

"I should go in first," Viktor said. "I'm the one he's most familiar with."

"That is probably a good idea," the ambassador agreed.

There wasn't enough room to switch positions so the two adults moved a little further down the hall to give him some room.

"It's Viktor, Harry. Hold on just a second," he called, and unlocked the door. Carefully, he pushed it open. The cell was tiny, only four by five feet, with nothing but straw and a bucket by way of comforts.

Harry had tucked himself into tight little ball in the far corner, his black cloak wrapped tightly around him to fight the cold. Bright green eyes watched him cautiously.

“Harry.” He knelt before the frightened boy and gently placed a hand on his shoulder. “I’m sorry. The ship’s defense system didn’t recognize you, so you were sent here. In the chaos of escape, I completely forgot about you. I am very sorry. Come with me. I’ll get you something warm to eat and drink, and find a room for you to sleep in.”

Harry’s wide eyes remained fixed on him, but it wasn’t distrust he saw in them, but disbelief and outrage.

“Viktor... what have you done?”

oo
oo

There were riots in London, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Coventry, and Edinburgh that afternoon when news broke that the Dark Lord had been hospitalized and the Germans had fled, the papers passing their escape off as a confession of guilt. Harry’s defection hadn’t been released to the press yet, as much to prevent further outrage as the fact that everyone lacked any real information about why he ran. The Brass Cult had been dispatch to aid the overwhelmed Sentinels with crowd disbursement and arrests, testing their mettle against British citizens rather than foreign invaders for their first engagement. There had been looting, fires, assaults, and nearly a dozen deaths.

Lucius desperately wished he could be at any one of those rioting cities, rather than standing in subdued little Hogsmeade as the Dark Lord arrived. His physical recovery was remarkable, his foul mood was more pervasive than ever.

Voldemort stepped through the floo, pale as death and just as sinister in his black robes and glowing red eyes. The soldiers guarding the floo all flinched away from him, and Lucius didn’t blame them one bit. The Dark Lord glanced briefly at Lucius, then moved passed him without saying a word. There was a carriage waiting for him just outside, but he ignored it in favor of a one the Sentinel's horses, immediately spurring it into a hard gallop. Lucius was forced into a rather undignified rush to find a horse of his own and chase after the man. He had been summoned with that glance, and he was already in enough trouble as it was without making his master wait.

They both abandoned their horses at the castle keep, and made their way towards Voldemort's office.

"Where is Morgan?" the Dark Lord asked, his voice clipped.

"London. He and his men are protecting the Court offices from rioters."

"Severus?"

"On his way. He left earlier to check on my son and foster daughter, and to ask them if they had noticed anything odd in Potter's behavior lately."

"What have you learned so far?"

"All of the Germans were in on it. Every single one, including the students. They were very well prepared to escape in an emergency. Nothing important was left in their rooms, and they carried at least two portkeys on themselves at all times. We've tried using the portkeys of the suspects we captured, but they won't activate for anyone but their owners. We sent the body of one of our prisoners on ahead. As a message."

"The French dignitaries?"

"So far, nothing, but I haven't employed the more... effective methods. I wanted to wait for your approval first."

"Denied. They weren't involved, and persecuting them would be counterproductive. Right now we have the political benefit of being the victimized country, but it won't mean anything if we torture uninvolved bystanders. When we're done here, cut them loose."

Lucius wanted to argue, pointing out they could simply blame both countries, and take credit for capturing the French, while the cowardly Germans ran away, abandoning their allies. He didn't dare protest though. His Master's tempter was already short.

They stepped into the Dark Lord's office.

“Crucio!”

Lucius fell to the floor, clenching his teeth against the agony that ripped through him, but he couldn't smother his moan. It seemed to last for eternity, but then it always had.

“You failed Lucius. You failed miserably. If it weren't for that anonymous letter, they would have succeeded in taking away knowledge of our entire military force! As it is, they've almost all escaped, and with my protégé no less! Crucio!”

This time he couldn't clamp his teeth shut fast enough, and pain forced him to cry out.

“Oh, do shut up. Harry didn't make such a racket when he was a First Year. Crucio!”

He clenched his teeth again, pride aching almost as much as his body. At last it stopped, but he didn't dare climb to his feet, knowing his Master might take it as a sign of defiance and start up all over again. He didn't even know if he had the strength to rise. It had been a long time since he had to endure this particular punishment.

There was a knock at the door. Afraid to let anyone see him so reduced, Lucius forced himself to rise with wobbly legs, half expecting another curse. Voldemort ignored him entirely, his attention focused on one of the baubles on his desk, checking to see who had disturbed them.

“Get out. Come back when Severus has arrived. And send for Morgan.”

“Yes, my Lord,” he said, bowing stiffly.

His worst fear was that it was Lestrage at the door, there to gloat and further enrage Voldemort against him with exaggerations of his failure, but his fear was unfounded. Instead he found a man in white robes, one he didn't recognize. He regarded him coolly for a moment, but the man's sole focus was on the Dark Lord. He left without being acknowledged.

Brennan turned to Voldemort, lifting a brow.

"I see even with a complete soul you are still quite monstrous. A pity."

"You have a lot of nerve to mock me, the one who is going to kill you."

Brennan shrugged. "I knew this was inevitable once I had made my decision to go through with it."

"So you came to me on your own accord. No denials? No excuses?"

"Do I need an excuse? Did you not provoke this with every act of murder, torment, and cruelty?"

"When have I ever been cruel to you, Brennan? Have I ever been anything other than indulgent and generous?" he asked, staring over his locked fingers, his red eyes burning with accusation.

"And there is where you lack your basic humanity, believing that justice is only sought by the victim of a crime. Empathy for a victim, hatred for an injustice on principle, and love were all things you never did understand, and at least one of them will be your undoing. Unless you learn of course. You are capable of it now."

"You fool... do you think it makes any difference? That I might somehow weaken or die? Or did you think this stunt would suddenly make me a kinder, gentler person? A firm scolding and some cookies and milk when we were all done? My hatred is as strong as ever and if anything you have made me more powerful. Worse than your betrayal and your stupidity however is the fact you deluded my pupil into going along with this futile mission."

Brennan chuckled at that.

"It's funny that you should say that... it was his idea after all. Not the killing you part, of course, that was just wishful thinking on my part."

"He was naïve, and I will delight in relieving him of that particular failing when he returns. You, however, knew exactly what you were doing."

Voldemort stood, drawing his wand. Brennan watched him quietly, folding his hands in his lap and waiting. This wasn't how he wanted to go, but he could face it with some level of peace. He had sworn on his teacher's grave that he would see Tom Riddle complete or see him dead, and though it had taken nearly fifty years it was finally done. The rest was up to time and Voldemort himself.

"Oh, no you don't. This isn't going to end with a simple Killing Curse," the Dark Lord growled. "You made me bleed. I intend to return the favor. Serpensortia!"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"What the hell were you thinking?" Harry shouted, his angry voice filling the tiny cabin, amplified by its inability to escape through the Silencing Charm he had erected over the space. "We held out our hand to you and you accept it with a knife hidden behind your back? How could you possibly justify that?"

Viktor scowled. This wasn't how he pictured things turning out. Harry was suppose to be grateful he was rescued, not fuming mad about the whole spying bit. He was being ridiculous.

"We had to know. We didn't come to start a fight, be we had to know what the Dark Lord's real intentions are, not we he says they are."

"That's bollocks! You wanted the information so you could go to war!"

"In case he started one! And you know he's perfectly capable of it! He's been building a formal army for the last year and raised taxes twice in the last three! He's been preparing for war. He wants it."

"But you started it, Viktor. Spin it all you want, but you struck the first blow."

Viktor fumed under the accusation. How could Harry be so closed-minded? Hadn't he seen the evidence himself first hand of what Voldemort's intentions were, and he still he had the nerve to wag his finger at them. Germany wasn't prepared for war, not like the Dark Lord. They had needed the information their mission would have provided, a way to fight smarter when they couldn't fighter harder.

"For someone who was just rescued from death," he ground out, "You sure are damn critical of the people who saved you."

That shut Harry up fast. In fact, it looked like he had swallowed Viktor's words and they settled badly in his stomach. He looked ill, and he turned away from Viktor to stare out the porthole. Beyond it he could see schools of shimmering silver fish dash by his window before they disappeared into the murky gloom of ocean. Or were they in the Channel by now?

"... Those are two different things."

There was guilt in Harry's expression now, and Viktor was suddenly reminded of what he had overheard in the Gryffindor dormitory. Everything had been so chaotic he hadn't had time to think of it before.

"I didn't want that to happen. He nearly died!"

"But he did not, and you have what you wanted,"

"He's going to kill me."

"You knew that might happen too."

"Oh Merlin, you did it," Viktor blurted, realizing now exactly what they had been talking about. "You're the one who attacked the Dark Lord! Jesus, Harry are you really snarking at me for a little surveillance after that?"

"I didn't attack him," he said, but it sounded weak, a plea to be believed rather than a demand for it. "It was an accident. The magic... it didn't do what I thought it would... well it did, but Brennan never told me that it would hurt him!"

"What did you do, Harry?" Because it was inconceivable that the boy before him, small and kind and so very young could possibly have come closer to killing the Dark Lord than anyone else since his rise to power. The fact that the Gryffindor actually looked guilty about it was mind-boggling.

"You wouldn't understand. It's not the sort of thing they teach you in school or in books. I shouldn't have messed with it. I didn't understand it either."

"Dark Arts?"

Harry shook his head but didn't elaborate. He moved to the farthest bed and sat down, his previous anger slipping away as he dropped his head into his hands.

"Please... you can't tell anyone about this. Not Jophery or Oblitz, but especially not Ambassador Schwartzmann."

"Why not? Harry, do you realize what you've done? You've done what most people thought were impossible. You proved the Dark Lord isn't invulnerable. You'll be hailed a hero."

The words did nothing to comfort Harry, and in fact his expression only became more pained.

"A hero? For what? He's not...he wasn't my enemy. He was my mentor and my teacher... my friend. He could be cruel and selfish, but what I did was reckless and selfish too. I nearly killed my friend, Viktor, and if you tell anyone they might try to make me do it again."

The older boy was stunned into silence, and slowly he sat down on the bunk across from Harry, trying to grasp at everything that was being said. Harry had the power to kill the Dark Lord, and he was right that if it was discovered he could do this others might try and force him. Force him to rid the world of murdering warmonger and tyrant... to make Harry a murderer in the process.

"Does the Dark Lord know this?" he asked.

"... I don't know. If he doesn't yet, he probably will soon."

"If you don't kill him, he'll kill you. He can't risk letting you run free with that kind of ability."

Harry shook his head. "Please, don't tell anyone. You owe me this, Viktor."

"I've already repaid that life debt," he said stiffly, the opportunity Harry presented was not something he wanted to so easily slip by, even as his insides squirmed at the moral implications of it.

"Yes," Harry bit out, and Viktor flinched at the venom behind. "... and stole my will away to do it."

"That was the old man..."

"You could have ended that spell at any time. You took me away from everything and everyone I cared about without so much as a by-your-leave.. My home, my family, my friends, all gone, and now you want to force me to help you kill someone? I'd rather die than let you turn me into your assassin."

"He's a monster, and he's going to kill you!" he snarled back, jumping to his feet.

Harry looked away.

“Just don't tell anyone. Whatever I choose to do, I deserve to be able to make that decision myself. Please Viktor. You said you did this to help me. Prove it.”

The older boy clenched his fists and his teeth, trying to reign in control of his frustration. Why was he defending the Dark Lord? Why was he going out of his way to protect that monster, after everything he had done and would do? He didn't understand, especially when he knew Harry wasn't a coward.

“Fine...” he bit out, “But one of these days you're going tell me why.”

He stalked out of the tiny cabin, slamming the door behind him.

Left alone, Harry fell back onto his bunk. It had been less than one day, and he had managed to nearly kill the ruler of wizarding Britain, been kidnapped by German spies, escaped almost certain death and also everyone and everything that held meaning in his life, and was now heading to another country and another school and another life completely.

How was he supposed to feel about that?

At the moment, all he felt was tired. He tried to think of what his life would be like. He tried to think of Durmstang, the massive fortress in a frozen wasteland, but his mind drifted to Hogwarts during Christmas time, snow balls fights with the Weasley twins, and Elsbeth. He tried to think of life with a foster family in the country... but ended up with memories of summers with Snape, snipping at one another all the time and random visits from Hermione and Draco. Life with a foster family in the city... he thought of the Reichers, gathered together in the family room, reading story books to Alyssa and Morgana, Kyle reading the newspaper over Robert's shoulder.

Finally he gave up on predicting his future, and wondered what everyone was doing right now. How many people even knew he was missing? Snape and Voldemort definitely would. Did they know about him nearly killing the Dark Lord, or had they passed the blame off onto Viktor and his cohorts? Did they hate him now, thinking he ran away with the enemy? McGunny would also know, but he didn't honestly know the Ravenclaw well enough to know how he would react. Hermione... she had to know by now too, and she would have told Draco.

Everyone else... they would hear of it through the papers. No doubt they'd be screaming bloody murder, calling him a traitor and a coward and maybe even an attempted murderer. He was so stupid! Hadn't he promised he would be there for them the way they had been there for him? He'd broken that promise, to himself and to them and for what? To make the cruelest, most arrogant, and inhuman man in the world...

Less cruel. Less conceited. More human.

He sighed. He couldn't regret that. He didn't know if it would work, but what if it did? How many lives would be spared by sudden moments of compassion? How much suffering avoided with the ability to empathize? He didn't expect to be forgiven, but at least he knew Voldemort was capable of forgiveness.

Then again, if he never saw the man again, would it really matter?

Finding the answer to that was way too depressing. Things were out of his control right now, so he'd take advantage of that and try to stop worrying or thinking in general. He kicked off his boots, stripped down to his pants and undershirt and slipped beneath the covers of the bed he had been sitting on. He closed his eyes, cleared his thoughts, and listened to the soft creaks and groans of the ship and the muffled putter of footsteps in the hall. As sleep began to descend upon him, a new sound came to him, a familiar ticking sound. He reached into his pocket, and pulled out his watch. Even in the low light of the cabin, he could clearly see the Hogwarts' coat of arms. Impulsively, he flipped it open.

To Harry

Hope this keeps you on time and on track

-Hermione

If only.

Gently, he closed it and hugged it to his chest, squeezing his eyes shut. It couldn't be over. Not without so much as a goodbye. Not again.

He didn't know how or when, but some day he would see his friends and his godfathers again. If he had to slay another dragon and make another sacrifice to Madris to make it so, he would. She was the Goddess of the Hearth, of home and family, and with her favor he knew it was possible.

"Please," he prayed, "Look after them, keep them safe for me, until I can find my way back to them. Please, look after them, keep them safe for me, until I can find my way back to them. Please, look after them..."

He repeated his prayer, over and over again until at last he fell asleep.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape re-entered Hogwarts with a sigh of relief. He had safely smuggled his goddaughter out of the castle in his luggage and taken her home, and no one the wiser. Even Draco didn't seem to realize his sister had been missing, but he did seem suspicious when she barely reacted to the news that Harry had been taken by the Durmstang students. Snape thought he probably shouldn't have added quite so much chamomile to her tea. The foster siblings would likely argue about her oddness while he was away, but whether she decided to trust Draco with her secret or not he would leave up to her.

Now he just had a Dark Lord to contend with.

Fun.

"You took your sweet time," Lucius muttered, appearing beside him from seemingly out of no where. He was unusually pale, and Snape watched him from the corner of his eye carefully, trying to see if his hands were shaking from the after affects of a pain curse or if he had been subjected to some other form of torture.

"The children were understandably upset. It took some time to reassure them," he said, not sounding or really feeling the least bit guilty.

"Reassure them of what? Potter ran away. The world isn't ending."

"He didn't run away."

"I was there. He helped them escape. He was with them. He ran away."

Snape said nothing more. He didn't have any evidence to present to the contrary that wasn't self-incrementing and even if he did Lucius would only call him a fool for believing it.

"Commander!"

They both turned to see a young Brass Cultie scurrying towards them. He stopped only long enough to salute.

"What is it?" Lucius demanded impatiently.

"Sir, Chief Sentinel Morgan has arrived and is heading for Lord Voldemort's office."

"Dismissed."

The cadet hurried off again to do whatever it was every other soldier was doing in lieu of a battle that was never finished.

"Come with me. Our Lord has requested our presence once you arrived."

That didn't sound particularly promising, but the potion's master had no say in the matter. He followed Lucius to the highest tower and into the Dark Lord's domain. He had expected Morgan to be there, but he hadn't factored in Professor Brennan.

What was left of him, anyway.

Even Lucius looked taken back by the sheer amount of blood. Every step they took made the carpet squish beneath their feet, and they dared not touch any wall or surface for the lines of sticky redness that stripped the entire room. The only part that made the man at all recognizable was the tiny patches of clean white robes the hints of beard beneath the gore.

Snape took a deep breath, and turned the Dark Lord sitting quietly at his desk, writing rapidly on some plain white (and red speckled) parchment. One side of his face was splashed with blood, but he didn't appear to notice it, and continued as if the body was nothing more than an extra piece of furniture.

He felt a well of pity for Brennan, whose crime he couldn't imagine warranted such a fate, but most of that pity was overshadowed with the very real fear that he might be facing a similar fate himself. Potter had been his responsibility after all.

"He tried to kill me," Voldemort said by way of greeting, not looking up from his parchment. "They both did."

"My Lord?"

"Professor Brennan and Harry," he clarified. "They performed a ritual, the result of which you saw this morning."

Lucius and Snape shared a look of surprise. Neither of them had conceived of Harry being responsible. Aware, possibly, but not responsible. It was completely out of character. They looked to Morgan, but he remained as blank faced as ever, taking it all in. Voldemort continued.

"He came straight to my office to confess. Very upright of him, if I do say so myself. Saved me the trouble of tracking him down. It is a pity Harry couldn't be so obliging."

Snape felt his heart sink at the thought. If Harry had not escaped, it could have been his blood staining Snape's boots. It still might.

Suddenly, Hermione's revelation that Harry didn't know about Germany's plot seemed completely irrelevant.

"What would you have of us, my Lord?" Lucius said, cautiously. Voldemort appeared much calmer after having exerted his vengeance on Brennan, but a calm Dark Lord was craftier and therefore harder to predict than an angry one. He set down his quill and sat back in his chair, looking at his three loyal servants.

"I have been thinking... it seems a waste to simply kill Harry just yet. Especially when he's set up such a wonderful opportunity to exploit his popularity for the good of Britain."

Severus didn't have a clue what he meant, but a part of him eased. Assassinating Lily's son didn't seem to be a part of the Dark Lord's immediate plans.

"I think it would be best if we leave out dear Harry's betrayal when addressing the public. All they need to know is that Harry was taken against his will by Durmstrang after their failed attempt to kill me."

It suddenly clicked for Severus, and he felt a twinge of admiration for the cleverness of his master's plan.

"So when the Germans attempt to rationalize their illegal investigation to the nations of Europe, they will also have to justify attempted murder and kidnapping. The people of Britain, who love Potter as their own personal prince, will be outraged and practically demand we go to war with Germany."

"Yes," Voldemort said, smiling darkly.

"But if Harry tells the Germans what he has done..." Lucius started, then realized the most obvious solution. "We can say he is being forced to lie by his kidnappers. After all, who would believe a child capable of trying to assassinate the ruler of Britain?"

"Yes."

"We'll have to demand his safe return," the potions master continued. "If they refuse we'll use it to further our cause and incite anger against them by both Britain and the other nations. France is already fond of him for saving Delacour, and even the German public might become suspicious of their own ministry's agenda. If they return Potter..."

Here, Snape couldn't conceive of what would happen. He would definitely be punished, but how? He couldn't be killed or the public would question it, and torture would likewise be obvious. He looked to Voldemort, who was staring directly at him now, measuring his reactions. Snape felt an inkling of fear. Did the Dark Lord suspect his loyalty might some how lean in Harry's favor?

"I made him a prince, my student, my..." Voldemort faltered here, his eyes sliding shut as his expression turned to a grimace, the closest to true pain they had seen since that morning. After a moment, he opened his eyes again and continued., "If he is returned... he will suffer as my slave until the day his usefulness to me ends."

Well... that was better than being killed instantly... maybe... hopefully.

"In the mean time," Voldemort said, his tone changing with the topic to something less sinister. "Severus, I don't know what Lucius told you already, but we received an anonymous tip about the German's scheme in the form of a letter originating from my office."

Snape frowned. "I was not made aware of this."

"Lucius will give you the full details as he was the one to initially receive it. I want you to track down who in the school sent it. It shouldn't be too difficult with the limited number of students and teachers who were actually present at the time."

"It will be done, my Lord."

He turned to carry out his orders, barely believing that he was getting out of there with all as parts. Lucius was had actually managed to escape out the door, before Voldemort called him back.

"Oh, before I forget, Severus..."

The potions master froze, his hopes of escape dashed. Reluctantly, he turned around.

“...in regards to keeping track of my protégé, you have greatly disappointed me. Crucio.”

Optimism really was for idiots.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

It took two days to sail around Britain, during which Harry spent most of his time primarily trying to sleep and watching fish swimming passed his cabin window. Viktor or Jophery usually came to deliver his meals and tried to engage him in conversation, but it was awkward at best and just plain frustrating more often than not. Schwartzmann too had come to talk to him about what he should expect when he arrived in Germany and the process of granting him political asylum. He was told political asylum was granted to those who were being persecuted, and if he had any readily available evidence of being mistreated or a specific event he was willing to describe under veritaserum, it would make the process much quicker. The idea of it left Harry feeling unclean.

There were dozens of incidents he could describe where he had been threatened, hurt, manipulated, and harassed, but as far as he was concerned that wasn't Schwartzmann's or Germany's business. He wasn't a victim. He had fought back, the result of which was his being forced to flee. As long as Voldemort lived, he thought of things as even between them, slandering the other's name wasn't the sort of petty game he wanted to play. He had to tell them something though, and he wasn't entirely sure what would satisfy their definition of 'persecution'. He told Schwartzmann to give him time to think it over.

As much as he tried to sleep, he found true rest elusive. His dreams were plagued with nightmares of being hunted by Voldemort, of Voldemort killing his friends, of his friends accusing him of being a traitor. Late at night, when the other three boys he shared the cabin with were fast asleep and his nightmares had woken him, he would open his watch and lay it beside him, listening to it ticking away through the night and thought of home.

On the final morning aboard the ship, Viktor came to wake him.

"Viktor?" he asked sleepily, as the older boy gently shook him awake. It had been a bad night, and he must have only drifted back to sleep an hour or so ago. Nevertheless, he put on his glasses and sat up.

"We are almost to Durmstrang. Some of the other guys pitched in to get you something suitable to wear. Most of what you have won't be warm enough, but your fur cloak should work and your boots if you wear an extra pair of socks." He placed a folded pile of clothes in Harry's lap. "Come to the galley when you're dressed."

"Okay. Thanks."

The clothes were a typical Durmstrang uniform, which was just about as warm as full winter ensemble back at Hogwarts. It was light brown and militaristic, stuffed with goose down and lined in wolf fur. It was also too big in the shoulders and too long in the pants. He put on his boots, and carried his cloak in his arms on his way to the galley.

He tensed when he saw Oblitz coming towards him. Harry hadn't seen the man since he had been taken from the cell, but that had been more than enough time to figure out that the Dark Arts' professor thought of him as the enemy amongst them and would happily have thrown him off the ship and straight into the mouth of a hungry shark if he'd had his way.

"Potter," he snapped.

"Professor."

Oblitz stepped closer, invading his personal space so that he might loom over him. Harry recognized it as an intimidation tactic, and forced himself not to back up and to look directly up into the man's eyes. Eyes that narrowed angrily at his defiance.

"You may have the others fooled, but I know what you really are. You won't be able to hide behind Krum and Schwartzmann forever. Once in the school, you will be in my territory," he growled.

That was indeed a bit scary, but nearly as much as the man thought it was and Harry let him know it. He glared right back at him.

"I have faced murders, madmen, werewolves, grindylows, a dragon, and monsters you've probably never even heard of. I have had tea with the Dark Lord himself, and stood toe-to-toe with his Death Eaters, and lived with Severus bloody Snape for the last two years. If you honestly think you could intimidate me then you need to go back to school for a little more educating. Now if you'll excuse me..."

He stepped around him, but Oblitz lashed out and grabbed his arm in an iron grip. Harry flinched, then glared up at the man, who glared back just as fiercely.

"Beasts and wizards are not the same thing, and standing beside a wizard is a lot different than standing against them."

Harry's grabbed Oblitz's wrist with his free hand and squeezed. The man grimaced, tried to maintain his own grip, but ultimately failed as Harry tore his hand free. Harry leaned in close, Oblitz grimaced but held his ground. He had made the mistake of grabbing Harry with his wand hand and now had nothing to defend himself with.

"It is the exact same thing where I come from."

He shoved the man away, and watched as he backed away, his eyes glaring pure hatred at him. It was a display of an uncommon strength on Harry's part, and one he had not had to use since he had held Larousse's lifeless body on the castle roof. How far it extended, he had never tested, but he suspected it came and went as necessity dictated, as yet another form of wandless magic. Apparently, it had been necessary now. He wondered if Durmstrang would be any different from Hogwarts in regards to the inordinate number of people who wanted to kill him.

In the galley, he found Viktor and several other boys having breakfast. They all looked up to greet him as he sat down.

“We'll arrive in about an hour. The Minster of Magic will probably be there to greet us, along with some aurors. They'll want to ask you some questions, and they might get a bit... intense, but don't worry. You're protected under the Turner Act, which means they can't send you back to Britain if you request asylum,” Viktor stated, the undertone being that he should be careful, and not just because of his secret.

“What can they do?”

“Since you're a minor? Not much. They have to have a legal guardian present or the permission of a legal guardian in order to interrogate you, which you don't have yet and since you have committed no crime they can't hold you for more than twenty-four hours. The worst they can do is drag their heels with the foster care process, which doesn't mean anything since you'll be at Durmstrang anyway. Listen, I don't want you to worry about it. I just wanted you to be aware of your rights.”

“Which are what exactly?”

Jophery threw in his own view on things. “They can't send you back to Britain. They can't threaten you with much of anything but twenty four hours of boredom. You're entitled to an education per governmental law, as well as food, shelter, clothes, and basic health care until you are the age of majority and then you can get a job and pay the government back with a twenty percent income tax over the next one hundred years. Sucks, I know, but there it is.”

“... I think I can live with that,” Harry said, because frankly it seemed he didn't have any other choice.

Ooo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Book IV:

Chapter 20: Distant Lands

As far as travel went, magical ship was one of the best, aside from the magical car. It was smooth, quiet, and aside from being rather dark under the water, generally a pleasant atmosphere. Surfacing, however, was one of the most nauseating experiences not related to poisoning Harry had the misfortune of experiencing, not unlike riding a fast moving elevator for way too long.

“Oh hell,” he groaned, leaning back against the wall. He was sitting on his bunk, like the rest of his roommates, holding onto the edge of their beds to keep their balance as the ship crashed through several feet of ice and then landed heavily on top of it.

“Don't you dare spew, Potter,” the largest boy in the room threatened. “I'm not meeting the Minister of Magic smelling like your vomit.”

“Your objections are noted. I'll take them under consideration,” he sniped back. Really he was in an all around bad mood. He was tired, depressed, anxious, and now sea sick. The only thing that could make the day any worse was the possible interrogation by some German aurors once he was on dry land.

“All hands on deck!” rang through the ship, and everyone got up and put on their cloaks and gloves and went out into the hall, lining up with everyone else there. Viktor and Jophery were up ahead with the ambassador and the rest of the adults, and gave him a nod.

The door leading out onto the deck was opened, and a blast of icy wind rushed into cabin, popping his ears and biting his nose with its chill. Instantly, Harry started to shiver.

“Just wait,” the boy behind him said. “It gets worse.”

Swell.

They filed out onto the deck, and Harry quickly learned that the boy had been right. It was frigid cold, hovering well below freezing and with a nasty wind. It was near blinding white, stretching the entire length of the lake and eating away at the edges of the sky, so only the lightest shade of blue shown directly above them. They had broken through the ice near what had to be the shore. The lake itself rested inside of a crater, surrounded on all sides by towers peaks of snow capped rock. As far as Harry could see there was no way in or out that could have been connected to the sea, but that was the sort of magic Harry was familiar with. At the nearest shore was a road, black and shiny with melted snow, winding its way further up the stone walls of the crater, and at the very top Harry could see Durmstrang.

The fortress was black and glassy and composed of hundreds of thin towers and walkways and floating buttresses, a dark fairytale castle made entirely out of obsidian glass. It stood in stark relief, its size and grandeur in perfect silhouette against the surrounding white. The only sign it was not merely an elaborate two-dimensional shadow was the faint glow of light that could be seen emanating from inside, hinting at the dozens of different structures that composed the fortress.

“Wow,” Harry breathed out. He had never thought he would ever see a place that rivaled Hogwarts in beauty or magnificence, but this certainly came close.

No one wanted to stay out in the cold any more than Harry, so they worked quickly to lower the gang plank and get everyone off the ship and onto the road. The road itself was warm, and Harry could feel the heat of it rising up into his cloak, fighting against the surrounding arctic chill. There was a line of carriages waiting for them, pulled by animals with white hair so thick Harry couldn't tell if they were equine or bovine or something else altogether. They squeezed in six to a carriage, glad for the extra body heat rather than annoyed, and the beasts guided themselves up the steep sloping road to Durmstrang.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Welcome home!”

There was a thundering rush of applause, and Harry felt himself flinch away. The entire party had been dropped off in the stables which was connected to the castle itself and Oblitz had lead them straight to what must have been Durmstang's equivalent to the Great Hall. It was an amphitheater, divided by four sets of stairs and twelve tiers of tables and chairs from floor to ceiling, every railing and table leg and chair back decorated with medieval representations of the fiercest beasts and monsters. The ceiling was slightly domed and fully mirrored, making the hundreds of floating candles above them appear like thousands.

The amphitheater was full to overflowing with students, and government officials, and reporters who were flashing their cameras unceasingly. Harry turned away from reporters and tried to ignore the speech from what was probably the Minister of Magic, and looked to his future classmates, trying to get a feel for what life was going to be like there.

They were mostly boys he noted, with short cropped hair and serious faces. The girls looked the same, their long hair pulled back into tight braids or buns and nothing soft or particularly feminine about their expressions. They did look genuinely pleased that their classmates had returned safely, but he felt his heart sink at the lack of variation.

“- and we extend our hospitality to Herr Potter, who at great personal risk aided our Champion and all of Durmstrang in returning home safely.”

At the mention of his name, he turned to the minister even as the other students burst into another round of applause. He got a full face of camera flash for his effort. Someone put their hand on his arm, and he turned to see a man he didn't recognize in some sort of dark gray uniform. Harry thought he must be a German auror.

“I'm Auror Grantz. If you would come with me, please?” he asked politely, but his hand was all firm authority. It made Harry nervous.

“Is something wrong?”

“No, you just need to be debriefed and sign some papers. Legalities and what not.”

“... Okay.”

He felt a little better when other students began to follow other aurors, but not much. His situation was not the same as theirs and everyone there knew it. They left the amphitheater and moved deeper into the school. The entire fortress seemed to be made of obsidian like material, and as they made their way through the halls, Harry could see vague shapes and lights through the walls, but rather than reveal anything it made everything that much more mysterious. What was that moving there? Was that a person or a suit of armor? Why was that room completely dark when the rest had at least one candle?

The amphitheater had been warm, as warm as Hogwarts in winter at least, but the hallways seemed to hover just above freezing. The echo of their footsteps against the high vaulted ceiling and a constant chill gave the place an air of abandonment despite the presence of people.

Mausoleum, Harry decided, it was like a beautiful mausoleum where people were very quiet and serious when they visited.

Or maybe he just missed home.

“Where are we going, sir?” Harry asked, after nearly four minutes of walking and no destination in sight.

“Here.” Grantz pointed at a door, large and adorned with bronze fixture like everything else. He opened it and stepped inside. Harry made a mental note of his wand being securely up his sleeve, and cautiously followed behind him. There was a medi-witch with gray hair and a bony face inside, along with a much younger assistant standing by her.

“Good day, Herr Potter,” she said pleasantly, her tone kindly despite her prickly expression.

“Good day to you, Madam?”

“Madam Wells. I'm going to perform a routine examination and ask you a few health related questions, if that is alright.”

Harry wasn't entirely sure that it was. The last routine examination he'd had was when he was ten, which had been bad enough when he didn't have anything to hide. But then, what would she do if he said no? She seemed to sense his hesitation.

“It is all strictly confidential,” she assured him. “The only people who will have access to this information will be yourself and your personal physician, who just happens to be me.”

Harry nodded, but turned a questioning look to the auror standing nearby. He took the hint as well.

“I'll just wait outside.”

“Thank you.”

He was glad for the his cooperation, because the first thing they did was have him take off his clothes. The room was warm, but it was embarrassing and intimidating having two people hover over him with their instruments and their questions. It didn't help that they seemed particularly interested in his moon tattoo.

“Is this scar from a curse?” she asked, pulling out a small orb from her medical satchel. The orb was clouded white, but it turned dark blue when she placed it near his mark. “That's strange. It's never done that before. Never dark blue at least.”

“What does that mean? Dark blue?” he asked, to avoid her first question more than out of curiosity. He knew what the tattoo meant.

“It's saturated in magic, but not regular wizarding magic. Curse scars usually turn it red or black. Tell me, have you had any run ins with fairies?”

“Not that I know of.”

“Do you remember where you got this?”

“ ... ”

“It's alright, you can tell me.”

“... I'd rather not...” ... because I don't know that I can trust you. “It doesn't hurt.”

“That's not the same as being harmless. If this is the result of a dark spell, there are any number of things it could be doing to you, physically, mentally, or magically. It would be best to remove it if at all possible.”

Harry shook his head, placing his hand protectively over the mark. It had caused him a great deal of trouble, but it was tied into his body and soul and he couldn't risk anyone tampering with it. “Leave it alone. It's not a curse.”

He wasn't going to tell her what it was though. Unless she was a pagan herself, she would never understand the difference between a goddess' blessing and a Dark Arts spell. With power of this sort, it was often hard to tell the difference. She looked ready to argue, but he cut her off.

“Can I get dressed now?”

She sighed, but nodded. He scurried back into his clothes. She gave him some paperwork to fill out, some potions to help fight off pneumonia (a necessity in Durmstang) and ordered him to eat more red meat and whole grains to help bulk up, but said he was otherwise in perfect health.

She called the auror back in, who escorted Harry to yet another room, where additional paperwork waited for him to fill out and sign. Most of it had to do with either his admission into Durmstrang and his previous course work or his application for political asylum. It was the other forms that left him hesitant.

They were written in tiny print, but were several pages long by themselves, the only legible sections were the places where it asked for his signature. Having had bad experiences with magically binding contracts, he set them aside for last.

"What are these?" he asked Grantz, once the regular forms were out of the way. The auror shrugged.

"I don't know. I've never done a political asylum case before. Most of them were done before I ever graduated from the academy."

Harry cast a quick charm on his glasses so he could actually read the tiny gray print, and as he did he understood that they had definitely wanted him to sign without reading them. They were waivers. Waivers of his rights of asylum, of medical privacy, of his civil rights for interrogation purposes. He looked back to the auror, but the man didn't seem to think anything was wrong.

Harry tore the waivers in half. Grantz looked vaguely amused.

"That bad, huh? I wondered if Seibligg wouldn't try something."

"Why?"

The man shrugged. "The minister is in a tight spot. He is up for re-election this fall, and since he is pretty much responsible for provoking a fight with the Dark Lord, he needs a way to justify it or he might find himself the scapegoat for the next electoral candidate. Your his best option? Everyone knows you were the closest person the Dark Lord has to an heir, but you still ran away. If he can get you to vouch for his decisions, then he stands a good chance at re-elections. It helps that you're pretty popular over here after you helped save Krum's life. Getting your support can only help him, but if you don't cooperate he has no legal recourse."

"So he can't make me?"

"... I don't know. I am sure he can make you damn uncomfortable if you don't."

Harry sighed and ran a hand through his hair. He had hoped that, at the very least, he had left his life of politics behind in Britain. Yet here it was dogging his every move, only here he had few allies to call upon.

"You're awfully forthcoming about all of this," he said.

Grantz shrugged.

"I voted for the other guy."

Harry smiled at that. "I'll keep that secret, at least."

"I'd appreciate it."

They dragged their feet for as long as possible, chatting about Quidditch mostly, but were eventually interrupted by a prim little witch summoning them to meet the Minister of Magic. She didn't look happy to find Harry had torn up some of his paperwork.

"That was uncalled for," she chided.

"That goes both ways, lady."

She huffed, and stalked ahead. She lead them to one of the towers, up a ridiculous number of tightly winding stairs. It opened up into solarium, surrounded by exotic ferns and large tropical flowers, and dome of glass held up by metal cage. It reminded Harry of the the indoor exhibits at the zoo he used to go to as a child.

The Minister sat directly in the center of the room, a small garden table with a coffee set placed on it, seeming to admire his surroundings. Six of his aids and two guards stood out of the way, waiting to fulfill his smallest whim. Harry hadn't gotten a good look at him before, but he was struck at how... unimpressive he looked in comparison to Voldemort. For one, he was a little short and on the hefty side, and he held an air of perpetual disinterest and boredom like some spoiled aristocrat. Very unlike the Dark Lord who looked ready for anything, ready to fight, ready to negotiate, ready lead a nation, and ready to enjoy a moment to himself.

And he really needed to stop comparing this place with home.

And to stop calling it home, since it wasn't anymore.

“Good day, Herr Potter.

“Good day, Minister Seibligg.”

“Have a seat,” he offered, gesturing to the only other chair available, directly across from him. Harry did as suggested. The witch that had escorted them, came up and whispered something in the minister's ear that he couldn't hear, but could guess at by the frown on the man's face. When she finally moved away to join the others, the minister turned to him.

“Do you doubt my hospitality, Herr Potter?”

There was an accusation in his tone, but Harry knew it for a manipulation. He was good at spotting them these days. The minister was expecting him to want to be helpful and polite as any guest should. He either hadn't been informed or forgotten that Harry hadn't chosen to come here.

“I do when you try cheap tricks like you did with the paperwork... and the medi-witch. What did she tell you?”

He honestly didn't know if the medi-witch had been set up to betray his confidence or not, but this seemed like a good time to find out. The minister's eyes regarded him appraisingly, and he looked him over like something new and shiny whose worth he had underestimated. His slow smile left Harry feeling unclean in ways, Voldemort's leering never had.

“Interesting things. Of course, your school medical records were far more informative. Tampering in some of the more interesting Dark Arts, have we?”

Harry tensed. When had they gotten those? Had Viktor taken them? Why hadn't he said anything? He forced himself to lean back in his chair.

"Wouldn't you like to know?"

"I most certainly would. I'd like to know every little dark secret that dark man taught you behind closed doors. Every dark thing he did in front of you, to you, for you in lurid detail. However, that would probably take a few days, so I would be satisfied with a brief outline of two or three of his more heinous acts."

Bile rose up in his throat, the feeling of uncleanness spread. The minister was a sicko freak, and worse he was a sicko freak who seemed to feel confident enough unload his perversion on him, a fourteen year old boy with no where to go. This could go very bad, very quickly.

"You would be disappointed," Harry said evenly, looking away from him and up at the blue sky above them. "The only thing he ever taught me was how to defend myself... from a variety of unsavory and powerful things."

A bluff, but he hoped the man believed it.

"Except for himself," the minister said knowingly.

"No... but I've learned a thing or two on my own."

The man chuckled darkly. "You're a fascinating young man, Herr Potter. I can see why Lord Voldemort took such an... interest in you. You're versatile. Charming when you want to be, ruthless when you must be, and you don't back down. I could use someone like you in my service."

"No."

"I'm giving you a choice now, but don't think I can't make you, help me. You undoubtedly have more than your fair share of Britain's national secrets and secrets about the Dark Lord himself just swimming around in your head, and I need it. Our mission failed to give the necessary information we needed, and war with Britain is inevitable now. You can either cooperate and earn the gratitude of both myself and Germany... or I can make your life a living hell and take what I want.”

“No.”

Now more than ever Harry was unwilling to give up his secrets. It wasn't just about him and Voldemort anymore, it was about Britain. If it was true that Germany was going to war with his home country he wouldn't help them do it. If anything he gave up lead to any of his friends or classmates being hurt or killed, he wouldn't be able to live with himself.

“I can charge you with spying you know. Lock you away in some little concrete box with no light and only a hole to shit in.”

Harry stood up. “This isn't Britain. You're not a dictator. You are held accountable by your voters for what you do, and I am told they like me more than you at the moment. Isn't it about time for your re-election, Minister Seibligg?”

Harry didn't look at the man. He didn't think he could stand making eye contact with him without gagging or without his fear giving him away. It was a struggle to keep from running out of the room and his presence, but he had to control himself. His hold on the situation was as tenuous as spider silk, and all the man had to do was order any one of his aids or guards to stop him and Harry couldn't afford to defend himself unless things became truly desperate. What if the minister accused Harry of attacking him? What if he really were accused of being a spy?

The long tense silence that hung in the air was broken by an abrupt round of clapping. Harry couldn't hold back his initial flinch.

“Bravo, Herr Potter, bravo. Very well done. You got me. I can't do anything to you... not yet, but wait for it. When people start to die, they are going to demand your cooperation. Your publicity will make you a target for their frustration, and the longer you dilly-dally the more they will take out their anger on you.”

Harry swallowed thickly. Was that true? He was vulnerable and he knew it, but could the man only be bluffing in an attempt to force his hand? Yes, but he could just as easily telling the truth.

Sensing his uncertainty, the minister continued.

“You have until July 1st. It would be better for you if you just gave in now, and worked to gain yourself a little more-”

“Why July 1st?” he interrupted, not wanting to hear the rest.

“That's the date given on Voldemort's ultimatum.”

“What ultimatum?”

Here Seibligg tone became congenial.

“The ultimatum to the German public to have me turned over to him to be tried and executed or face his considerable wraith. ”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The Weasley farm house spelled like cinnamon, and for that alone, Draco was willing to overlook the fact that it was little more than a dilapidated shack out in the boonies. It was everything his own home was not. Small, crowded, and warm. He might very well have gone his entire life without ever realizing it existed if it were not for Hermione dragging him and Uncle Severus there on New Year's Eve, the day all the Weasley siblings gathered together at their ancestral home to celebrate with their blood family.

The entire Malfoy line was probably rolling in their graves, and if his father knew exactly where they were he probably would have sent all three of them to join his ancestors.

The entire Weasley family, sans the still imprisoned Arthur Weasley of course, plus their aunt and cousin, were gathered around the table. Those who couldn't find a chair, sat on the available counter tops or on the nearby stairs or leaned in a doorway. Snape was with Molly Weasley, playing the polite guest and keeping himself from boredom by helping her peel vegetables, although there was an underlying tension between them that was hard to miss. No one was speaking. For Draco, it was all too surreal.

"Someone say something," he bit out at last, tired of the quiet and tired of their blank faces.

"I don't believe it. Why would they do that?" Ginny said first, her expression twisted into fear and anger and confusion all at once. "He even saved Krum. Why would they kidnap him?"

Percy chipped in. "Well, he is the Dark Lord's protégé. As far as hostages go, he's ideal."

"So, they might send him back once the Durmstang students get back home safely?" Ginny said hopefully.

"More likely in exchange for the prisoners father did manage to catch," Draco said.

Charlie shook his head. "They won't just send him back. He's the only source of valuable information they have on the Dark Lord."

"They won't hurt him, will they?" Ginny asked. There was a silence, which was surprisingly enough broken by Snape.

"They will not hurt him. According to my sources, the papers are reporting Potter as being 'rescued', not kidnapped, which makes good explanations for torture a little bit hard to come by."

"Rescued?" Fred laughed humorlessly. "Who do they think they're kidding?"

Ron rolled his eyes. "You give him too much credit. I bet he went with them willingly. He probably even asked them."

“What the fuck Ron?”

“Watch your language, Fred! And mind your words, Ronald,” Molly warned from the kitchen, pointing her peeling knife right at the both of them.

“I'm just saying,” the youngest son protested, “... Merlin, you think he'd want to stick around after all the shi- stuff he's been through? Every other week he's in the infirmary, his foster mother gets killed right in front of him, his ex-girlfriend treats him like the plague, he's stuck at the beck and call of the Dark Lord, and he's got summers with Snape to look forward to ... no offense, Professor.”

“Detention the Monday you get back.”

“I'm just saying... hey, maybe he saw a way out and he took it.”

“He wouldn't have done that,” Hermione said. “He wouldn't have left everything. His life wasn't perfect, but he wouldn't have run away.”

Ron shrugged. “Everyone has their breaking point. Being roped into a life or death tournament was probably his.”

Bill shook his head and sighed. “That doesn't matter now. The tournament is canceled. I had to break the magical contract myself, and it was an ugly one. That could actually be the reason they took him. Both Krum and Harry would have died if we hadn't destroyed the contract before the end of the school year. The Dark Lord probably would have been fine with offing Krum, but Harry is another matter altogether.”

“That's right... I am sorry to hear about Fleur,” Molly said, sounding genuinely regretful. “I would have loved to have met her before she had to go home.”

“Yeah...”

Ron snorted. He still was no fan of Fleur Delacour or his brother's infatuation with her, even now that she was being sent back to France with the rest of her classmates and political representatives. There was an awkward silence.

“Do you think,” Ginny said at last, “That he could get back on his own? I mean, escape from Germany and get back to Britain? Or maybe the Dark Lord could mount a rescue mission?”

There were mixed expressions of hope and skepticism. In truth, though they were all worried for Harry in varying degrees and wanted him to be returned safely and unharmed, they were also avoiding a more serious issue than Harry's disappearance.

Britain was now in a cold war with Germany, and at any moment it could erupt into a full scale war. Preparations were already being made for the rationing of supplies, and papers were already listing precautionary measures to defending home and family, a call for the extension of the Brass Cult's authority in assisting national defense and local law enforcement, and rumors of a curfew to come into affect as early as mid-spring.

They were young, but they remembered enough to know sorrow and the heartache a war would bring. It had torn apart their country, widowed and orphaned friends and neighbors, and left them poverty ridden for nearly six years afterwards. They didn't want to face it again, but it seemed their was no way for them to avoid it. As afraid as the nation was of war, they were equally outraged by how they had been treated.

Snape in particular didn't want to get involved. Unlike the others, he had been a soldier, an assassin, and he might still be called upon yet again by his master to perform those tasks which still sometimes woke him up at night in a cold sweat.

He also didn't want Harry to return. He didn't delve too deeply in his reasoning for this, only accepted that he dreaded the possibility of the boy caught in his master's cold, merciless hands. He would feel the same way for any child caught in such a situation he figured. Years of teaching had made him soft.

“Mr. Potter,” he said, “Will no doubt make the most of his situation. I recommend all of you doing the same.”

There was a depressed silence, until after a moment Draco looked up. “...Since the tournament is canceled does this mean Quidditch season is back on again?”

“Draco!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Durmstrang was not Hogwarts, and the days that followed Harry's enrollment were wrought with rude awakenings and prolonged disorientation. The easy academic atmosphere he was used to was replaced with extreme discipline and barely controlled aggression. Everyone followed a tight schedule, waking up at five in the morning, eating at six, study hall from six-thirty to eight and then classes until one, followed by lunch, and then another two hours of study hall. By three thirty no-one could stand another minutes of books, and everyone usually dispersed to exert their energy on the variety of sports the fortress offered. It was too cold to play outside, but the school provided a variety of enormous empty rooms and corridors in which to play, including a quidditch pitch and pool twice as large any Harry had ever seen.

Dinner was at six-thirty, afterwards they had until nine to perform the variety of chores Harry had been used to leaving to the house elves. Laundry was a major one. He had learned the hard way to be careful to remember where he washed his school uniform in the student laundry room. He had accidentally run off with someone else's once and hadn't realized it until the next morning when he got dressed and discovered he had shrunk three inches. Ironing was tedious. Polishing his boots had never even occurred to him until his dorm captain had snapped at him about it. And every day the list seemed to grow.

Lights out was at nine. Harry didn't sleep well, the sound of wind against the windows gave him bad dreams of ice demons calling him out into the wasteland beyond the glassy fortress walls. And on those rare nights the air was still, he dreamed he was drowning, pulled down into the cold darkness by things unseen.

This routine repeated itself six days out of the week. There were no weekend visits to local villages, no dances or balls, and no special events except for the monthly quidditch matches between the school's four teams. There were also no houses and no point system, and whoever you ended up studying with or rooming with was a product of chance rather than personality. The only things that separated any of the students was grade level and gender.

The girls studied, ate, roomed, and played sports by themselves. The only time a girl and boy might meet was in passing on the way to class or on Sundays. Sundays were their own, and Harry coveted them fiercely.

What Durmstang lacked in flexibility, it made up for in novelty. Harry had never encountered a place like it, and he spent his Sundays exploring. At first glance the entire fortress seemed uniformly colored, changing from black, to gray, to dark grayish-blue, and back to gray and black again as the sun rose and set, but Harry found splashes of color in the most peculiar of places. The bathrooms on the highest floor of the Eastern wing were tiled in dark red and orange glass so that when sun hit just right the room looked as if it were on fire. The corridor on the lowest floor of the Southern end had stain glass windows of a Norwegian Ridgeback stretched out across a grassy meadow, its emerald skin reflected against the walls and the floor, shifting as the sun moved and the dragon changed its position to get more comfortable. The astronomy tower was alive with illusions of stars and planets and galaxies, whirling around the room in sparkling masses of every shape and size.

Harry hunted the school for these little treasures, taking his sketchbook with him where ever he went. It was the first time he had drawn anything in months.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"It's not that bad," Viktor said, his expression disapproving as he watched Harry sulk over his dinner. He had been given soup... again, for failing to follow some rule or other. Un-shined boots or doodling in study hall or something equally trivial. It was a first year's error, and understandable really, but Harry was taking it too personally.

"I haven't had anything but soup in three days," Harry sighed. "It wasn't even my fault. How was I suppose to know the West wing was restricted for teachers?"

"It was in your student manual..."

"It's over a hundred pages long! Besides, I was trying to get away from the Oblitz's snoop squad." At this, Harry threw a mutinous look over his shoulder, and several boys a few tiers up the amphitheater quickly turned away. "Is there a rule in there about follow people around?"

"... there is... but that's for boys following girls around."

"Think if I accused one of them of being gay it would work in my favor?"

"Harry," Viktor warned.

"Viktor," he sniped back, tossing his spoon into his bowl. He ran a hand through his hair, his short hair. They'd cut it, like everyone else's, but his hair was unmanagable and the only thing they had accomplished was making the nap of his neck look a little more tidy. They had gotten him his own uniform and boots too, the sort he had to iron and polish every night in the castle's absence of house elves. A five in the morning wake up call and a nine o'clock lights out were other things he was still struggling to adjust to.

"Sorry..." he said after a moment. "I'm just tired."

Viktor nodded. He understood where Harry was coming from. Every first year went through the same period of adjustment and homesickness, and Harry was facing other things that were weighing on his mind. After a week, a little crabbiness was hardly unexpected.

"It's fine. How is your homework coming?"

Harry shrugged. "Alright. Trying to figure out what ingredients the potion's master is talking about is giving me a headache, but it's nothing I can't handle."

"They're not giving you any grief, are they?"

"Not really. Frau Jetter treats me like I'll implode her head if she looks at me directly, and Herr Von Wargon seems to think I was taught history of magic by a nitwit and acts surprised whenever I answer correctly, but it's nothing I can't handle. Of course, I think I avoided serious injury electing to go into Curse Breaking instead of Dark Arts class."

The older boy grimaced. The entire school knew the Dark Arts professor had it out for Potter, and lines were being drawn to keep out of their way. Aside from Viktor and Jophery and a few of the older students who had been in Britain, everyone tended to avoid one Harry Potter, refugee and virtual unknown. Some seemed to believe Harry really was a spy, like those who followed him around in shifts, relentless in their pursuit to protect the school from him. Most just didn't want to be caught in between them. Harry already had a reputation from the Tri-wizard tournament that everyone was cautious about testing it. Oblitz was an old danger they were familiar with.

"You should join a quidditch team. The reserves, at least. The exercise helps fight off the fatigue."

"I'll think about it. I don't know if I can handle anything else at the moment." If anything, Viktor thought Harry had an over abundance of free time. It wasn't uncommon to find him sitting alone in the library, scribbling in his sketchpad or wandering around the fortress, but Viktor wasn't going to push it. The former Gryffindor was still upset with him, even if he didn't say it directly, he blamed him for taking him away from his home. Worse, Harry was too afraid to chase him away. He had no one else to turn to at Durmstrang.

"Hey! Look what my dad sent me! We're infamous!" Jophery said, coming out of nowhere, to sit beside Harry. He had a newspaper in his hand, which he proudly displayed to them. On the cover in giant letters flashed;

Durmstrang Student Rescues Rescuer!

There was a picture at the bottom with Harry looking around the very same hall they were eating in, Viktor near by looking directly at the minister. The younger boy blushed. He looked like a lost little kid next to Viktor, which was no doubt their intention.

"Dare I ask?" Harry said, about as enthusiastic to read a German newspaper as he was a British one.

"You dare, you know you do," Jophery laughed. "It's not too bad. Just loads about how you rescued Viktor from centaurs and he rescues you from a creepy Dark Lord. Apparently, you're both best of friends, which I have to say I resent. I saw him first."

Viktor sighed.

"But I'm in there too! Look- 'The rescue was an organized and well orchestrated effort by all of the students. Viktor Krum lead all the students to safety, while Jophery Hughes flew Potter himself to the sanctuary of the ship, and everyone- blah blah saved the ship from being blow up by angry Sentinels blah."

Harry shook his head, chuckling even though he didn't find it the least bit funny. He had heard the stories circulating around the school, and while he still had some serious misgivings about being imperio-ed and the German plot to spy on Britain, he wasn't going shout it out to anyone. Especially not after his talk with Minister Spieligg. It was so damn frustrating not to be able to say it out right.

"I would have thought this was old news by now," Harry said, instead.

"Oh, it is. This printed the day after we got back. Dad's finally run out of people he can show it off too."

That caught Harry's attention. The paper was from the beginning of this entire fiasco. It might still have the information he needed about Voldemort's ultimatum.

"Can I borrow it?"

Jophery looked a bit surprised, but just shrugged and handed it over to him. "Sure. Not like everyone here doesn't know how fabulous I am already."

Viktor smacked him upside the head. Harry took his newspaper and wandered off, as the two started to quibble over something or other. As he expected, some of the other students from before got up to follow him. He waited until he was in the Eastern end of the castle, just outside of the teacher's corridor and briefly out of sight before he cast the Sticking Charm Fred and George had taught him on the floor, then hurried around another corner to wait.

Sure enough the sound of footsteps abruptly halting and then a series of non-magical curses. He smirked to himself and hurried on to the Quidditch Pitch. The Quidditch Pitch was similar to the Hogwart's pitch except enclosed in a giant dome. It was sunny and open, and the closest to 'outside' any of them got until summer break. It was also deserted during lunch, which left him just ten minutes to find what he was looking for.

He didn't have to look far. There was a brief reference to the Ultimatum in the headline, but the real information came on page three.

"... with the students and their guest safely behind the Durmstrang fortress, the Dark Lord of Britain appears more desperate than before, launching his threats not against the students but the Minister of Magic himself, stating that if he does not hand over those responsible for the mission and his former protégé Harold Potter to the British Authorities, he will take violent and extreme actions against both Minister and Germany itself.'

“We will not be intimidated by terroristic threats, not from a foreign dictator or anyone else. We will protect our children, and that includes young Potter, from the heavy hand of tyrants...”

Harry stopped and took a deep breath.

“He wants me back...” he thought. “But for what?”

He found out two days later, when Jophery brought him yet another article, this one four days old.

Britain Accuses Durmstrang of Kidnapping!

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Morgana skulked into the living room, tossed herself onto the couch and let out an enormous sigh. Robert looked up from his ledger just as Alyssa followed her sister's example and slumped into a chair with a dramatic flair. He looked around in hopes of finding Kyle, who usually handled the girls' little melodramas. Alas, he was at the grocer's, he remembered. He tried ignoring them.

There was another loud sigh, shortly there after echoed by the younger.

He tried to calculate the cost of the mortgage and whether they should make a smaller payment in lieu of of yet another overdone Christmas.

Another sigh. Another echo.

“Is something the matter?” he ventured, not looking up from his ledger.

“Papa...” Morgana said, “Do you think Prince Harry will ever come back?”

Here Robert had to fight against a sigh of his own. They had learned of Harry's kidnapping the day after Christmas from Wizing Weekly, and like so many others had been outraged and terrified for him. They had to keep their calm with the children though, reassuring them that their prince would be fine. He was just on another amazing adventure. Kidnapped by pirates in a great black ship, but he was clever and brave and would escape or defeat them or teach them the error of their ways.

When the children were at school though, he talked with Kyle about what might really happen to Harry and what that meant for the rest of them. All they knew at the moment was that Harry was at Durmstrang Institute, an enchanted fortress perched atop a mountain in a place cursed with perpetual snow and cold. The school was as secure as any prison, and no one came or went without passing through a gauntlet of security checks and wards, creating such a hassle that the students couldn't even return home for the holidays.

Harry could not be rescued so long as he was there, and the more time that passed the more damage that could be done. He was the Dark Lord's protégé, after all. He would be interrogated and for someone as brave and loyal as Harry they would have to employ more severe tactics to gain any results. It gave him nightmares to think about it. He refused to give his daughters nightmares by telling them the truth.

“Of course. Do you doubt him?”

“No...” her tone contrary to her words. “But... he's been gone a long time. What if he likes it where he is?”

Robert looked up and smiled at her.

“Likes it there? You do know they kidnapped him and stuck him in an ice fortress. What is there to like about that?”

She twiddled her thumbs, thinking about it, still unconvinced.

“But it's a really nice fortress, isn't it? That's what Joel says. It's like Hogwarts, only it's made out of crystals and everyone wears furs and they're really good at quidditch. Harry likes quidditch.”

“Yes, Harry likes quidditch, and I'm sure the Durmstrang knights and ladies are all trying very hard to convince him to stay and become one of them, but I know that he won't. Durmstrang isn't his kingdom. He'll come home to protect his homeland.”

Morgana fell silent and considered this, and finally nodded.

“Yeah, he wouldn't leave us. His daddy's the king, so he has to help protect us.”

Robert nearly choked at the mere notion of Voldemort being anyone's 'daddy' let alone Harry's, however similar their appearances might be. Alyssa turned out to be more skeptical.

“But...” the littlest Reicher began, “Why did they take him away? He's not their prince. It was a bad thing to do.”

He nodded. “Yes, it was very bad. It's wrong to steal, especially people.”

“So why did they?”

He had to think about that. Telling them he had been taken so they could torture him for information just wasn't going to cut it.

“They were jealous. Durmstrang doesn't have any princes, only knights and ladies and a very stupid Minister, so they decided to steal ours.”

Alyssa huffed at the notion. “That's dumb.”

He shrugged. “People do dumb things sometimes. We just have to wait for them to realize their mistake. It may take a long time, but Prince Harry will find his way home eventually.”

“He better. My birthday is coming up and he promised he'd come. I even told Joel, but he said I was lying.”

“No worries, poppet, I'm sure he'll be back by then,” he assured her, but inside he ached.

What would he do when her birthday came and there was no Harry? Would she finally realize things were much worse than he had told her? Alyssa already seemed to suspect, but she trusted him. He was digging himself into a hole with these fairy tales, and it just kept getting deeper.

But he still he refused to give them nightmares.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"Where were you when the Durmstrang students fled?" Snape asked, his tone deceptively bored as he stared across his desk at Horace McGunny, who was also looking deceptively bored right back at him.

"I was in my room, sleeping. I wasn't feeling well."

"Why not the nurses office?"

"I didn't want to spend my ENTIRE holiday break in the infirmary just because I drank too much hot chocolate. No offense, but Madam Pomfrey is a bit of an alarmist."

"Was anyone there to confirm you were there?"

"Maybe. Some of the time at least. Colin came and woke me up."

Snape nodded, and wrote a note on his parchment. McGunny watched him, and subtly leaned forward.

"Can I ask what this is all about?"

"Information gathering for the case against Durmstrang. If you recall anything that sticks out in your mind, now would be the time say it."

"Why not a Sentinel? It's their job, isn't it?"

Snape's expression hardened, twisting his parchment out of reading range. "A Sentinel doesn't know the students of Hogwarts like I do. Underestimating you would be a serious mistake."

The Ravenclaw settled back into his chair and looked away, warned and chastise all at once. He rubbed his hands against his robes, the only sign of how nervous he really was to be stuck in Snape's office completely alone.

"I can't think of anything relevant. They kept to themselves, except for Harry but he was also their liaison, so I can't even begin to guess if they planned to take Harry or if it was just a matter of opportunity."

"It was planned," Snape said, but didn't elaborate. "One more question. Do you know where the Dark Lord's office is?"

McGunny tensed. "Why?"

Black eyes narrowed.

The boy relented and nodded. "Yes. I've been by there once or twice."

"What could possibly have led you to that particular section of the castle? Surely not to question the Dark Lord."

"No. I followed Harry there once. I wanted to ask him some questions for an article."

"Did you ever go inside?"

"No. I don't even know how Harry got inside and I never asked. Why?"

"You keep calling him Harry."

There was sudden deep and pervading silence, and Snape stared intently at the Ravenclaw's blank face and clenched fists.

"Am I not allowed to call him that?"

"It does seem inappropriate. The first name is usually reserved for friends and family, which I wasn't aware of you being either."

"We're friends."

"Also inappropriate. You run the school newspaper, and Mr. Potter is regularly featured. Isn't a certain level of professional detachment required in order to remain objective?"

"What are you implying, Professor?"

"Obviously, I'm implying that you're behaving inappropriately."

McGunny eyes widened..

"Sir?"

"You are dismissed."

Confused and somewhat flustered, McGunny stood and hurried out. Snape watched him go, his eyes like a hawk following his every move until he had disappeared. Once the boy was gone, he opened one of the drawers of his desk and pulled out a list of names. On it was everyone who had been in the castle the day the Durmstrang students fled, including all the foreigners and Harry himself. All the Beaubaxton students and headmistress and teacher's names had been crossed out, along with most of the students and Minerva McGonagall's. Beside McGunny's name he placed a little star.

The boy had been his most likely candidate so far. The Hogwarts' Herald editor and chief had a veritable legion of information gatherers and was himself highly resourceful and motivated. That he knew nothing or had no legitimate theories about what happened was highly suspect, and finding a way to enter the Dark Lord's office did not seem like such a mean feat with enough time and some inside information.

Like from Harry. Harry who apparently was friends with him, and never told anyone.

The only other name with a star beside it on the list was that of the infamous Gryffindor himself. Snape didn't understand the logic entirely, but Harry had access to Voldemort's office and it wasn't impossible that he may have uncovered the German's plot. Could he have sent that warning as a sort of apology for trying to kill the Dark Lord?

It was a theory full of holes, and he didn't put much stock in it. McGunny seemed more likely, but even that theory was pretty weak. His motivations were equally unclear. In fact, the more time he spent investigating the less convinced he was of the involvement of anyone in the castle. It was only a Hogwarts owl that had them concluding it was from Hogwarts. The paper could have come from any number of the Dark Lord's offices, the bird itself could have been stolen and used for the sole purpose of misleading investigators. The tipster obviously didn't want his or her identity known.

It wasn't the sort of answer he could give the Dark Lord and still walk away in one piece.

"Potter, I'm not sure how, but I know this entire thing is your fault."

oo
oo

The full moon rose over Durmstrang, the first of the New Year and in the new life of Harry Potter. Strange energy welled up in him slowly, like a tide, washing away his fear and his uncertainty as the night settled over the school. It was as strong as ever. Madris had done nothing to lessen the Moon's influence over him, but then he had never asked her to. There hadn't been time or opportunity.

"Are you alright?" Jophery asked, eying him oddly. They were gathered in the amphitheater, eating dinner. For once, Harry had managed to earn something other than soup to eat, noodles and cream sauce with marble bread on the side, but he hadn't touched it except to move it around on his plate.

“Great,” Harry said, his tone skating the edge of a snarl. “How are you?”

For once the full moon had not brought giddiness or detachment, but instead a powerful aggression he was struggling every second to contain. He was angry, the angriest he had been since his argument with Viktor on the ship, but now his inhibitions were failing and if he didn't find someplace to vent he knew he would end up hurting someone. In an hour two, when the moon was at its zenith, he doubted he would care.

“Great,” Jophery replied a bit more uncertainly. “... Has something happened?”

Harry gave him a look.

“... I mean aside from the obvious.”

“No.”

“... Then why aren't you wearing your glasses?”

Because I left the set I use for the full moon in my nightstand at Hogwarts, he thought testily, but didn't say. He was still aware of the students behind him, watching his every move and listening to his every word.

“New spell I'm trying.”

“Oh.”

An awkward silence fell. Harry made an attempt at his dinner but quickly gave up. Food wouldn't satisfy him right now.

“Harry.”

He looked up to see Viktor. The older boy tensed, recognizing the look in Harry's eyes as the affects of the supposed curse he had read about and experienced first hand.

“What?”

“The Ministry sent someone to speak with you about your living arrangements for the summer.”

“They couldn't have just sent a letter?”

“ ... ”

“Fine.” Harry got up, abandoning his food to follow after him. He made a point to cast a glare over his shoulder at the boys who looked ready to get up and follow, warning without a word how bad of an idea that would be with his sharp green eyes alone. Wisely, they reseated themselves. They moved through the cold hallways, Viktor pulling his cloak tight around him while Harry let his own billow open, unaffected. The sconces had been lit for the evening, making the interior of the castle glow like the inside of a lantern, firelight reflecting off of the glassy walls.

They moved to the higher floors, up tightly winding stairs and down through corridors where the ceiling rose several stories above them and chandeliers coated in candle tallow dripped down like stalactites from some ancient cave. They were near the Headmaster's office now, a place Harry had only seen once, but they turned right before they reached it and entered one of the many domed rooms of Durmstrang. The room was filled with trophies and plaques, some of them centuries old and others only a few months. Plaques covered every inch of the walls, but additional columns and display cases had been erected randomly around the room to accommodate the extra wards, turning the space into a forest of magical acknowledgments, shadows all around and unseen things lurking behind the cover of steel and glass and wood.

The setting was ominous, but Harry felt more at ease in this vaguely sylvan atmosphere, where his senses acclimated to things most wizards would never know. Viktor, who had said nothing and hadn't looked back at him since leaving the amphitheater, finally turned around to face him. He was silent for a moment, his tense expression telling Harry that he must be wondering at the torchlight reflecting off his eyes like the night shine of some nocturnal animal.

"You've seen it before," Harry reminded him, smirking at the older boy's obvious nervousness.

"He's waiting for you at the center," was all Viktor said before turning back around and leaving. Harry felt a suspicion rise in him at his retreat, and he drew his wand and took a circuitous route towards the center, carefully muffling his footsteps as he approached.

The center of the trophy room had kept a twenty foot diameter free of obstruction, allowing for a moderately sized circular table at its center, a small tea set on top of it. An elderly wizard sat there, his robes a garish blue with neon stars and moons dotting it all over and a long gray beard reaching down to his knees. Harry was used to odd fashions among wizards, but usually they were civilians. Court and Ministry witches and wizards had always been fairly conservative.

The wizard cleared his throat and took a sip of tea, then slowly turned his entire body towards his observer. His eyes were bright blue and twinkled behind his wire-rim glasses.

"Hello, Mr. Potter," the old wizard greeted in perfect English, his accent swallow in the gentle rasp of his age. "It is a pleasure to finally meet you. Would you care to join me for some tea?"

"I'm fine where I am," he said, feeling the beginnings of a game coming on. This wizard had instincts. He was interested in testing them against his own. He pulled back a little further into the column forest and began to circle. The old wizard turned back to his tea set, but he followed Harry with his eyes.

"Are you sure? I have lemon drops."

"Mother taught me not to accept candy from strangers."

"Yes, I suppose Lily would never skip over such an important lesson."

Harry paused. The wizard's eyes remained fixed on him, though Harry knew the shadows too deep to actually see him.

"You knew my mother?"

"And your father. Your godfathers, as well."

"You seem to know a lot of people, but I'm afraid I don't know you." He turned and began walking back in the direction he had come. The ruse did not work, the man still followed his movements perfectly.

"Ah, my apologies. My name is Albus Dumbledore, an old friend of your family."

Harry drew a sharp breath and instinctively drew even further back. This was Dumbledore? He did not fit the mental picture he had made of him. In his mind's eye, Dumbledore was similar to Voldemort, tall and regal with vitality that belied his years, ready to face dangerous enemies and conjure the sort of magic only found in legend. He certainly hadn't expected this grandfatherly figure, his entire countenance softened by age and gentle mirth. Could this really be the man that sent Moody to kill him only last year?

"What do you want?" he asked sharply.

"I wanted to speak with you before the end of term. I thought you should know as much information as possible in advance to better prepare yourself," the wizard said, his tone soft and soothing, cajoling him to calmness and enticing him out of the shadows. Harry wasn't biting.

"Prepare for what?"

"I have applied for guardianship of you with the Ministry, and given the circumstances of your stay in Germany I dare say I am one of the very few applicants qualified for it."

The moon's influence was beginning to strengthen, depriving him of any fear that he knew he should be feeling at this statement, but in fear's absence, defensiveness was taking root.

"You tried to have me killed."

"Never. That is a lie spread by Voldemort to further his political agenda and blacken my name. You must know him better than most. Does this not sound like something he would do?"

Harry thought about it. "Yes... but it could just as easily be the truth. Why should I trust you?"

"Your parents did."

"So did my godfathers, so did hundreds of other people and you left them behind in Britain while the Dark Lord tore through the country."

"Touché."

They were silent for awhile, each gaging the other but neither able to come to any conclusions. Harry broke the silence first.

"What do you want with me?"

"I want to protect you. Voldemort will surely attempt to kill you while here in Germany so that he may blame the Germans and further incite a war. Additionally, having nearly succeeded in killing Voldemort, he can not possible allow you to exist. You are too much of a threat to him," Dumbledore said plainly.

Harry felt an upwelling of anger, but most of it was directed at Viktor rather than the man before him.

"He told you? Viktor told you about what happened?"

Dumbledore took a sip of his tea. "He told me what he believes happened. I would really like to hear your version of the event."

"No. I won't help you. Forget it."

"Harry-"

"Don't call me that! Don't you dare pretend we're familiar. You just want to use me like the Minister does to kill him, but I won't do it. The first time was just an accident."

"Mr. Potter, please calm down. You misinterpret my intentions. I would never ask you to murder anyone. I am not protecting you for that purpose, but as recompense for my own sins."

Harry was skeptical, but he hesitated denouncing him for the moment and let him continue.

"You were correct when you said I abandon my friends and allies, and it was a decision that has haunted me for many years. At the time, I saw it as the only means by which I could continue to lead the resistance, but now I live in shame of it, though my reasoning remains the same. You are one of those who were left behind, perhaps not in the traditional sense, but in all the ways that matter. More than that I see Voldemort's attempt to corrupt you, and your own attempts to remain untainted as failing. Please, I know that I can help you."

"Liar! If you were really sorry about what you had done you would have tried to save me before you knew I could hurt him, when I was still just one of hundreds of orphans with no special privileges or protections. You would have saved me from the Dursley's and that miserable existence. Just leave me alone. I don't believe you and I don't need your help!"

He made a break for the exit, not wanting to stay any longer and uncertain of what would happen if he did. He could feel his anger rising, magic shimmering against his skin like the heat of a fever. He hadn't made it far, however, when he was met with resistance. He ran straight into a column that he hadn't seen. He bounced off of it and onto the floor. Cursing, he climbed shakily to his feet, feeling like an idiot. His supposed foolishness was soon disproved as he tried to step around the column and a display case moved soundless to block him. Shocked, he could only stare as more columns and trophy cases began to rearrange themselves to block his retreat.

"What the...?"

"My apologies, yet again."

Harry spun around to find that the barriers behind him had moved aside completely, leaving him open and in the direct line of sight of the old wizard, whose wand was now in his hand and his tea forgotten. His eyes were still twinkling though.

Harry tightened the grip on his wand.

"You have no reason to trust me," Dumbledore continued, "and I have no right to ask it of you, but time will reveal my intentions to be sincere. I have told no one what you have told Viktor in confidence, not the Minister or the press or even my own supporters. This is the first gesture I have made. Any others must occur after your release from Durmstrang this summer. I understand your reluctance, but I assure you it is for your own good."

"What if I say no?" Harry challenged, spinning around to face him, but careful not to look him directly in the eyes. If Voldemort were a legilimens then Dumbledore could possibly be as well.

"You are still a minor, Mr. Potter, however mature you believe yourself to be and in the middle of several dangerous situations you only partly understand. You need help, however reluctant you are to receive it."

With a snarl, Harry swung out his wand, "Don't underestimate me! Irritum facio!"

The old wizard had raised his wand to throw up a spell of his own, but stopped the moment he realized what the boy had cast. The Gryffindor spun away from him and back towards the barrier before him and unleashed the brunt of his rage.

"REDUCTO!"

There was a deafening roar and an explosion; glass, stone, and metal trophies and plates raining down and with it a cloud of dust. Dumbledore quickly moved himself beneath the table, fragments from the blasting spell pelting the barrier above him. When all the rubble had fallen and only a gray dust cloud remained, the only thing that remained of Harry was the sound of his retreating footsteps. The old wizard let out a wry chuckle, and dragged himself out.

He was impressed. He had come mainly to observe the affects of the Full Moon Curse that Viktor had described, and uncover the true nature of the Dark Lord's protégé in the absence of his inhibitions and truly the child was something remarkable. Untrusting, yes, angry, sure, and with some seriously misplaced loyalty, definitely, but he wasn't cruel and he wasn't murderous and at least he had loyalty to someone other than himself.

The Nullification Charm had been particularly clever, summoning a invisible bubble around Dumbledore so that the wizard could send out no spells towards the boy but also making it nearly impossible for the boy to send any spells at him, giving Harry just enough time to escape. If the boy had simply thrown the Blasting Hex at him, he might have actually been in trouble, but Harry wasn't another Tom, thank goodness, even if he had just shown himself a force to be reckoned with.

The sound of footsteps running closer warned Dumbledore of someone's approach, and he wasn't the least bit surprised when Viktor came rushing through the haze of dust, staring around him in complete befuddlement. He looked to the elder wizard curiously, then around what remained of the trophy hall.

"Did Harry do this?"

"Indeed he did. Remarkable for someone his age," he chuckled, looking at the utter carnage. "And rather unfortunate for the two of us. I'm afraid I'm going to need your help cleaning up before the Headmaster returns. Getting our young friend sent to detention for the rest of the semester is probably not the best way to endear him to me."

Viktor looked around and sighed. This is what he got for telling Dumbledore the truth, he supposed. The man just had to test it.

"I take it things didn't go well?"

“About as well as I expected... though I have to say I'm glad they uphold the 'no wand policy' for summer breaks in Germany. Would you like a lemon drop? Harry didn't want any so I have plenty of extra.”

“Er... no, thank you, Professor.”

“Suit yourself. We had better get started, then. Reparo!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Book V

Chapter 1: The Lost Prince

As Horace McGunny stepped onto the Hogwarts Express for the last time, he felt a guilty relief he thought murderers must feel when they get away with their vile deed. For months, he had been convinced Snape had figured him out, and was now toying with him as some sort of petty revenge before he sprang his trap. Nothing had come of this paranoia but sleepless nights and Tom laughing at him.

School was a mess. The teachers did their best to reign in the chaos Harry's kidnapping and the sudden absence of nearly eighty students left, but they were powerless to stop the rumors and indignation. It had taken less than a week for the spread of 'Free Harry' merchandise to flood the school, aggravating more than a few educators with obnoxious flashing buttons and ugly themed parchment. McGunny suspected the Weasley twins, but his sources had been unable to confirm. Two weeks later, the even more obnoxious and frankly rather creepy 'Die Durmstrang Die' memorabilia hit the circuit and then things got ugly. There had been more than a few fires that had to be put out as students vented their frustration out on straw dummies in Durmstrang style uniforms. He had figured out Matilda Chutterly's responsibility rather quickly, but nothing had come of it. Lestrangle refused to suspend her for 'patriotism' despite the teachers insistence that she was only aggravating the students and risking school property for profiteering. McGunny wrote an article on it. Lestrangle made him tear it up.

Snape and McGonagall retaliated with dorm searches and crack downs on curfew and detentions handed out left and right. Eventually they'd gotten things under control, and Ravenclaw and Hufflepuff followed suite before they faced similar punishments. Weasley wrote an article on it. Lestrangle made him tear it up.

Even with the sudden rise in censorship, McGunny had been busy. Incredibly busy, not only tracking events in the school, which were numerous, but also adding national news to the school editions, a necessity since much of it related to the school and Harry to begin with. To add to that chaos, he had his NEWTS and college applications and Snape's ever looming shadow to deal with.

And Tom. He could never forget about Tom. The bastard wouldn't let him.

"That's not fair," came the familiar croon in his head, and he quickly threw himself into an empty compartment and locked the door before anyone noticed. "If it weren't for me, you never would have aced that Transfiguration exam. You suck at it, Horace."

"If it weren't for you, my life wouldn't be utter shit right now and I would have had the time and concentration to actually learn it on my own." he muttered under his breath, then slumped into seat. "How much longer am I going to have to deal with you?"

"Don't ask questions you already know the answers to."

McGunny did know the answer. As soon as Tom had a new body, they'd both be free. Or at least Tom would be free. He was becoming increasingly suspicious that he wasn't suppose to survive long enough to appreciate the spirit's absence.

Finding a solution, however, was impossible. Any attempts to read up on exorcisms or discover Tom's identity resulted in horrific migraines and memory lapses. One such blackout ended with him standing atop the astronomy tower, one step away from falling hundreds of feet to the courtyard below. The warning had been clear. For all his threats of killing himself, McGunny quickly learned it was pointless. The spirit would only find another body and he would be dead.

He just had to wait for an opportunity, and hope he was quicker than Tom at noticing it.

Slumping against his seat, he looked out the window as the other students started to climb aboard. Seeing Diggory amongst the horde was a bit jarring, as it had been for the last month that he had been seen wandering the schools. The surgery to replace his damaged heart had been completed and he was now completely healthy, but the months of non-awareness had their affects on him. Under a magically induced coma, he had not been aware of Harry taking his place in the tournament, nor of the betrayal of the Germans, and the events that had lead to a declaration of war; and waking up to find his world on its head had done nothing to help re-orient him. He was depressed and withdrawn, and not nearly as cheerful as everyone had remembered. But that was true of everyone these days. Well, Diggory had another year to get himself sorted out back at Hogwarts, the tournament being canceled and his own missed course work meant he would be repeating the year and take his final exams.

Granger had written an article on it, and submitted last second before Lestrage caught wind of it. Her nerve and her foresight reassured him that appointing her the new Editor and Chief had been a wise move. Tom ranting about him being a blood traitor and a fool had left him feeling warm inside.

And there was Granger and the young Malfoy heir beside her, talking to Snape, who was only half listening to them as he helped supervise the loading of students. The man spotted the Weasley twins slipping things into people's pockets while they were distracted, and a few deft flicks of his wand had the entire contents of the boys' pockets emptied across the platform. It was a rather embarrassing mix of candy, 'Free Harry' badges, half the inventory at Zonko's Joke shop no doubt, and some poor girl's lacey knickers. The students all burst out laughing, even Fred and George, much to Snape's annoyance, but they weren't quite as happy when the potion's master vanished the entire horde.

McGunny chuckled and heard Tom echo it in the back of his head.

Turning away from the window, he reached inside his pocket and pulled out a large seed, similar to a pecan but for its deep purplish-red color. It was Corpus arborus, the Body Tree, a very simplistic name for a very complicated plant... animal.... thing. For over a month, he had watched with his classmates as the fully mature tree had bloomed giant red flowers, into which Professor Sprout had dispensed three drops of blood. By mid spring the flower had wilted, but the 'fruit' ripened into Cedric's new, perfectly healthy heart. It had been a monstrous and beautiful thing to watch.

It had been pure inspiration to Tom, who had realized its potential almost immediately.

The research paper McGunny had turned in on the subject earned him top marks. It had also earned him Tom's silence for two weeks as they poured over book after book on the subject in the library. The nut had been made, as all Body Tree seeds were, in a cauldron, during the new moon with items ordered from different apothecary's across Britain and along the border of the Forbidden Forest itself. It made him shiver to think about what he was doing.

"It's a marvelous idea," Tom said congenially, "You should be happy. No one even has to get hurt or loses their body."

"Assuming you don't kill me the moment you have what you want..." McGunny pointed out tiredly.

"I won't kill you if you don't give me a reason to. I like you, Horace. You're a clever young man. If it weren't for the unfortunate incident that left me bodiless, I think we would have gotten along quite well."

"I certainly hope not."

Tom just chuckled darkly, before fading away into the back of his mind. He sighed heavily. When he had thought of graduation, and the newest chapter to his life, this definitely wasn't what he had imagined for himself. He had always sort of assumed he would be chasing stories, not becoming one himself.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry strode off the Durmstrang ship and onto pier 6 and 1/8 like a soldier stepping onto a battlefield. Six months he had spent at Durmstrang Institute, and four of them he had used in preparation for this moment, when he would leave his uncertain sanctuary to face people and places he could only afford to view as hostile.

The sky was clear and hot, and the breeze across the water was cool but brought with it the stink of polluted water and dead fish. The pier had been cleared to make room for the unloading of passengers and luggage, but at the far end Harry could see crowds of people gathered. Some of them obviously parents waiting for their children, but even more obvious were the reporters. He could feel their eyes on him, like starved dogs eying a discarded bone, barking out their questions before he was even close enough to hear what they were saying.

He searched the crowd for any sign of his new guardian, but he couldn't find him and frankly he doubted the old coyote would be elbowing and shoving his way through the media circus. Harry certainly wasn't going to try it. So rather than face the horde, he moved over to the piles of luggage and retrieved his trunk, found a space out of the way and sat down on it to wait.

"See you next semester, Potter!" a fifth year boy said, coming up to offer him a hearty whack to the back in typical quidditch beater fashion. Harry had joined a quidditch team shortly after his meeting with Dumbledore, not because he particularly wanted to play (although once he had started he couldn't believe he'd ever lived without it), but primarily so he could make his frustration known to Viktor in an innocuous and physical way.

"Thanks. Have fun this summer," Harry said politely. Several other boys followed his lead and even a few girls said their 'goodbye's and 'good luck's and 'see you this fall's, and he responded in the usual polite way. They weren't really his friends, not like Hermione and Draco and the Weasleys were, but they were alright. Once they realized he liked quidditch and therefore wasn't a complete mutant, some had actually been pretty nice.

"Harry."

His eyes slid over to Viktor, and they stared at each other a long moment. They hadn't spoken, really spoken since the encounter with Dumbledore, when Harry had learned of Viktor's betrayal. The animosity was far from one-sided though. The Bulgarian had his own bone to pick with him, and it revolved around the loyalty he still held towards the Dark Lord who more than likely wanted him dead. The older boy couldn't understand, and frankly didn't want to any more than the Gryffindor wanted to understand his trust in Dumbledore or the purpose of tricking Britain in the first place.

It didn't help that Harry thoroughly trounced Viktor in the final game of quidditch and broken his perfect winning streak at Durmstrang.

"Viktor."

Still, they never got around to stop calling each other by their first names.

"Dumbledore sent someone to collect you. Come on, I'll point her out."

"Gee, thanks," he said, dripping with sarcasm. Why don't point out were you'll dump my body when your done while you're at it. Nevertheless, he gathered up his trunk followed after Viktor. The trunk was light, not because of any Feather Light spell but because it was almost empty. He had only left his school uniform, some text books he wouldn't mind losing, Elsbeth's leftover owl treats, and anything else he could easily replace. Everything else he had shrunk down and hidden on his person using the runic spells he had been studying all semester.

The spells weren't for any class, there was no Ancient Runes class at Durmstrang, but at one time there must have been because the library had a treasure trove of books on the subject. Harry had been pretty good in the class at Hogwarts, but not particularly enthusiastic about it. Now that he was going to be deprived of his wand, however, runes had seemed one of the best ways to protect himself, since his wandless magic was pretty rudimentary and taxing on his body. Besides, they had proven dead useful in Curse Breaking.

If anyone searched his things they would find nothing useful, and if the opportunity to escape presented itself, he wouldn't have to worry about leaving anything important behind. He felt rather proud of managing it all on his own.

Harry thought Voldemort would have been proud of his progress too... and then remembered the man more than likely wanted him dead.

From the corner of his eye, he spotted someone else who wanted him dead. Oblitz was still standing on the deck of the ship, staring down at him like a hateful vulture. Harry glared right back at him, plotting revenge tactics on the off chance he survived the summer and had to come back to Durmstrang to endure his company yet again.

They moved up the pier to the main docking area, where the reporters and anxious parents gathered round. They weren't allowed on the pier for safety reason while the students unloaded, but they still managed to make a nuisance of themselves. Several photos were being taken, and Harry tried to convince himself it was mostly due to Viktor and his superstar status as a Quidditch champion. He was quickly disabused of that notion. They were proving just about equally famous.

"Harry! How did you like your first semester at Durmstrang?"

"Mr. Potter, do you feel safe now that you're in Britain?"

"Viktor, now that you have finished your schooling, will you be training full time with the Vratsa Vultures*?"

"Please, let me take a picture for my daughter! She's a huge fan!"

"Are the both of you good friends? Is it true you've sworn yourselves blood brothers?"

"If you could say anything to the Dark Lord right now, Mr. Potter, what would it be?"

"What made you decide to run away? Did the Dark Lord threaten you? How?"

"Can I have your autograph?! It's for my nephew!"

"Mr. Krum, have you considered the offer to play for the Heidelberg Harriers*?"

“Viktor, you've been renowned for your support of social causes. Are there any you are actively promoting? Have you thought about a career in politics?”

“Mr. Potter do you think you'll return to Durmstrang for your fifth year or accept the offer of another school? How many offers have you received?”

With more than a little trepidation, they both waded into crowded and immediately became separated. Harry wasn't very tall, and as the people swarmed around him and blocked his view in all directions, he became disoriented. The day was already hot, and even in his cooler British clothes, the bodies around him radiated like a furnace and stank of sweat. There were more flashing bulbs and shouted questions and people grabbing him to gain his attention, refusing to let him through and he didn't even know in which direction to go anymore. He began to panic.

“How do you feel about your new guardian, Albus Dumbledore?”

“You were born in Britain but raised most of your life in Germany, which do you consider your true home?”

“When you were in Britain did you ever feel your life was in danger?”

“Were you persecuted because your parents fought in the resistance?”

“Tell us what happened when you escaped!”

Harry only shook his head, and shouted, “Please, let me through!”

“There are rumors that dark rituals performed on you while attending Hogwarts, is that true?”

“Please get out of my way.”

He tried to push himself through, but it was pointless because now they were following him and no matter which direction he tried the crowd was just as thick. Where was Viktor? Dammit, did it even matter?

“What happened to the muggle relatives who were originally taking care of you? Do you know?”

“Did the Dark Lord force you to sign over all of your family's assets to him?”

“No comment! Leave me alone!”

“Harry!”

“The Minister has recently come under fire for his tactics in Britain. Do you have anything to say in his defense?”

“Are you assisting the Ministry in their case against Britain?”

“Shut up!” he finally snapped, and several cameras suddenly shattered and pens snapped. There was a moment of stunned silence.

“Harry!”

Someone grabbed his hand, he spun around to jerk it away but stopped when he saw who it was.

“Fleur?”

She was ruffled from squeezing and shoving herself through the reporters, but none of it damped her beauty, her shining halo of blond hair and her glowing smile. Having finally noticed her, her smile widened and she pulled him into hug that stole the breath clean out of him. There were a few clicks from cameras, but they were further back in the crowd. She pulled away, still smiling.

“Come on! Follow me!”

Still holding his hand, she started to running, knocking over people with incredible ease for someone so dainty and pulling him after her.

The reporters tried to follow, but with none able to block her or even slow her down, the two escapees managed to break through them and made a dash for freedom. Harry couldn't believe what was happening. Was he escaping? Now?

If that was the case... he dropped his trunk and forced himself to run faster. Together they ran off the pier towards some warehouses. At one point, Fleur spun around around and cast a shield charm. The thud of several people smacking into it made Harry smirk, but he didn't risk turning around. They continued running until they couldn't any longer and no one else was in sight.

An 'alohamora' later, and they found themselves slipping into a warehouse. It was filled with freight, but empty of people. Turning to each other, they burst out laughing, and hugged yet again.

"What are you doing here?" he asked, grinning like a fool.

"What doz it look lie? I am visiting my friend and rescuing 'im from ze mob."

"And this friend is very grateful, but why? How did you even know I would be here?"

"I asked Viktor. 'E zed zat you would be 'ere today, and I might 'ave a chance to talk. Chance. Ha! I make my own luck."

"Viktor told you?"

"I tried to write you directly but all my letters got zent back."

Harry nodded. He hadn't received a letter all year, and he figured like in Britain, his mail was being restricted for safety reasons... or because it was being stolen for intelligence purposes, which made him ill to think about. Her expression suddenly turned serious, and she looked at him intently.

"Arry, please tell me the truth. Did you run away or were you kidnapped? I 'ave been 'earing so many stories I don't know what to believe."

An ache rose up in him, the question she had presented one that still haunted him. Had he run away? Not exactly. Had he been kidnapped? Not exactly.

"It's complicated," he said. "I didn't want to go... but I can't go back. I made a mistake that I don't know how to fix, and Viktor pulled me out of the fire for completely the wrong reasons, but saved me just the same. But I'm scared Fleur. They want me to do things. Betray the Dark Lord and Britain, but I can't. I can't punish them for my mistakes. I don't know what to do. I don't have anywhere to go."

Fleur pulled him into another hug

"Ah! Mon petite chevalier, is zere anything I can do?"

Harry shook his head. What could he ask of her? The most she could do was let him escape on his own. She couldn't hide him, not after all those reporters had seen them run off together, and if he went to France with her there was no telling if they would keep him there or send him back to either Germany or Britain. Then he realized there was something she might be able to do.

"Do you... do you write letters to Bill?"

She blinked, and after a moment she nodded. "Yes, I 'ave been given special permission to write to Britain. I 'ad to apply for a special license, but I can do it. Why?"

"I... would you... would you tell Bill to let everyone know I'm okay? Hermione is probably so worried."

She gave him a sad look, but nodded. It was as clear to her as it was to him, that he wasn't 'okay'. Then she pulled her bag, a school satchel he hadn't noticed before, off her shoulder and set it on the floor.

"You are not ze only one who 'as made zis request," she said, "Your friends gave me something for you. Zink of zem as belated Christmas presents... or early birthday presents."

Harry's heart began to beat faster as she opened her back and started to hand him boxes. He sat down beside her, and celebrated the Christmas he had missed. The first package was from Mrs. Weasley, a woman he had not met directly, but whom he held a quiet affection for having given him some of his closest friends and respected acquaintances. Inside was a jumper, Gryffindor red with a golden 'H' on the front, which made him smile. It was awful, but strangely sweet at the same time. He had seen Ginny and the twins wear theirs in the common room.

Next came Clyde's gift, which held a fully illustrated play book for the Chudley Cannon's season, where the players zipped around the pages so quickly they looked as if they'd fly right out of the book at any moment. Ginny had made him scarf and glove set, black and sleek, with his initial anagrammed in even darker black. The Weasley twins gave him an entire box of wigs, of all things. Short red hair, long blond hair, curly white hair (and a mustache to match), spiky black hair, and wavy brown hair. Both Harry and Fleur burst out laughing when they found a hot pink mohawk buried at the bottom. It seemed the twins had gotten him started on his very own Incognito Kit.

Draco gave him a knife. It wasn't an ornamental one either. The six inches of smooth steel, the handle plainly crafted wood. He felt no magic from it, but that didn't make it safe. He carefully sheathed it and tucked it carefully out of sight in the back of his pants under his shirt.

Hermione had gotten him a Reader's Ring. It was an enchanted object made of silver that slipped over his entire finger, and was hinged to still allow him movement. Runes were carved on the inside, but on the outside it was shiny and smooth as a mirror. He had seen and admired it on Hermione before while she was researching for particularly complicated research papers. It allowed its owner to find the answer to any question as long as it was within a book within a hundred feet.

Hagrid had even sent him something, a baby dragon tooth, probably from one of the orphaned dragons left in his care. Most surprising of all, was the package from Natalie. They hadn't talked all year and she had barely even looked at him, but she had still sent him a calligraphy set, the nice sort made with polished wood and interchangeable heads and three different colors of ink.

The last item was from Fleur herself it seemed, a large book, but an odd choice for a gift.

“Centurian Prophecies?” he asked, looking at her quizzically. She made a helpless gesture.

“Don't look at me, it wasn't my idea. Ze owner of ze bookstore I went to insisted it was for you. Don't worry, Bill checked it out. It iz perfectly safe.”

“Thanks, Fleur,” he said, genuinely grateful to her for coming all this way on an errand that more than likely should have failed. She just grinned.

“You are quite welcome. Now we better pack everyzing up. It wouldn't do to be found with all zis illegal contraband,” she said, with a wink. There were letters, four of them in fact, but those he wanted to read alone in private, and he made sure tuck those carefully away in his shirt. With his trunk gone, and not having enough time to work out runes to shrink and hide his gifts, Fleur transfigured his cloak into satchel and stored everything away inside it. Not as subtle as Harry would have liked, but it was better than just abandoning it all.

They looked around outside briefly to see if everything was clear and slipped out of their hiding place.

“You should go,” he said. “It's one thing to help me get away from a mob, it's a different thing altogether to help me run away.”

She sighed and nodded, “Ah, yes. I would definitely be expelled from Chevalier training for zat. Did you know I had gotten accepted?”

Harry's smile turned sheepish. “I don't even know what that is.”

She rolled her eyes. “I will be a private soldier to ze Royal Family. It's a very important and prestigious position. You only get in by invitation, you know," she said, looking quite pleased with herself. Harry had seen sentinels with similar jobs for Voldemort, but it didn't seem particularly glamorous. But then, Voldemort had very little need to be protected by anyone.

"Congratulations," he said, hoping this was what she truly wanted. Before, he had thought she wanted to study in Luxemburg, but perhaps it had never occurred to her to even hope for this new career choice. He thought she would do wonderfully at whatever position she took.

"Thank you. If you want to get further into ze city, south is zat way. If you want to try to get back Britain... you know, just in case, you might run into a ferry if you head northwest. Other zan zat, I'm afraid I don't know zis city very well," she lamented.

"Don't worry about it. Go on. I'll be fine."

She kissed him on the cheek, making his ears burn. "Good luck, mon ami."

She hurried on her way, looking around cautiously before disappearing behind another building. Alone, Harry was at a loss about what to do with himself. He had gotten away so quickly and so suddenly, he didn't know where to go next or what to do. Should he try to hide in Germany, as muggle perhaps? It had been a long time since he'd played a muggle, and he wasn't sure if he'd be able to do it anymore. Plus he had no money and no where to stay.

He still had his wand though, which gave him a major advantage among muggles. Locked doors were meaningless, and a few charms would leave him completely unnoticeable to anyone who might think to question or stop him.

But if he were caught, he would be in so much trouble.

He was already in so much trouble, he decided and started heading south. He would find somewhere to lay low before he tried to come up with any long term plans. Perhaps he could even find a way to make himself look different and hide among wizards, and if that failed a way to hide among the muggles like his parents did until he was grownup enough to move to the United States. They had no real wizarding government in the U.S. he had heard, so hiding there wouldn't be hard at all.

Walking south at a quick and steady stride, idea after ridiculous idea flitted through his head, distracting him from where he was going and from being completely aware of his surroundings. So he was just starting to entertain the notion of finding train to take him to Cologne, when a Stunning Hex caught him square in the back and knocked him unconscious to the ground.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Bristol was humming with activity as spring faded into the heat of summer. A normally thriving community to begin with, the wizarding city was now packed to the gills with new Brass Cult recruits, eager young wizards and witches prepared to do their part for their country hustling through their registration, supplying, and training hectically, knowing the deadline for their first strike was drawing closer and no one knowing when they themselves would be called into action.

Hostels and private residents had been contracted to house the extra troops as they waited for their assignments at the various bases that were being constructed across the nation. The most famous of military brass were often seen wandering the streets or coming and going from various offices, drawing on the awe of the soldiers and citizens alike. Chief Commander Lucius Malfoy, Chief Sentinel Morgan, General Blackwell, Judge Devonhill, Admiral Lockhart (although what exactly he was the admiral of no one rightly knew, but everyone admitted he looked damn fine in his uniform), and even Lord Voldemort himself could be glimpsed from time to time.

Not that anyone necessary wanted to glimpse Lord Voldemort. Not lately anyway.

It was generally agreed upon by the public (with the press' insistence) that the Dark Lord was deeply troubled by the upcoming conflict and the safety of the protégé he had come to see as a son, and that the result was a very short temper and an unrealistic expectation for perfection.

Voldemort let them keep thinking that. The truth was too ridiculous to be made public. He was not concerned about the war, was even looking forward to it, and the boy was probably safer amongst the enemy than his former mentor.

The truth was he just plain missed Harry's company.

He blamed his new soul for the most part, and by extension the infuriating Gryffindor himself. He blamed Brennan for his deception. He blamed Snape for lack of vigilance. If he was feeling particularly irritated, he'd even blame himself for having failed to handle his apprentice properly. He was only a child after all. A damn nuisance of a child, who fooled him with his big puppy dog eyes and his stupid Gryffindor ideals and his supposedly inability to keep his thoughts to himself.

It didn't change the fact that he still missed him. Perhaps he even missed him more, knowing the boy was participating in a very adult game that he enjoyed playing himself.

Then he realized what an idiot he was being, and started plotting ways to torment the child upon his return. To his continued annoyance thinking of himself as the boy's master wasn't nearly as satisfying as thoughts of being his teacher.

"Potter is no longer at Durmstrang," Voldemort said, staring across his desk at Morgan who sat ramrod straight and unreadable. In the background a map of Germany was situated detailing strategic attack points, glowing red dots at varying brightness to indicate their importance.

"Yes, my Lord," Morgan agreed. They weren't saying anything most of Britain didn't already know. The German school year was ended, and Potter was suppose to be relocated from the school today although no one knew where.

"But he is with Dumbeldore now."

Also something the public knew was happening today, and were completely outraged by. They were familiar, or at least had been recently reminded, that Dumbledore had been accused of sending assassins after the boy. Morgan nodded.

"That simply will not do."

"No, my Lord."

"Have your spies turned up anything?"

Morgan nodded. "I received news half an hour ago. There was incident in Bremerhaven, when Harry left the ship. He met up with Fleur Delacour on the pier and ran away. She was picked up a few hours later on her way back, but Potter wasn't with her."

This was not public record. Not in Britain and not in Germany, and it peaked the Dark Lord's interest. Why precisely had Harry run away? Where had he intended to go? It had been months since he had been taken into Germany's custody, and Voldemort had expected all sort of sordid details of their shared time together to have been leaked to the press or used as a threat by the German ministry or to turn France against him, but there had been nothing. Could it be possible that the boy had said nothing?

He didn't see how, but all evidence suggested that he had, so far, kept silent. Nevertheless, he couldn't rely on Harry's discretion forever, especially now that he was in Dumbledore's power.

"Was he found?"

"The Ministry received a statement that Potter was in his guardian's custody, and had merely gone off to speak with a friend privately for awhile. This matched Delacour's statement. However, my informant had no way to confirm if it is true or a means to cover up a blunder on their part."

Voldemort nodded thoughtfully.

“Do you have anyone who might track him down?”

“Tried. He's either not using his magic or really was found by Dumbledore. My informant only knows what the Ministry knows, and if they can't find Potter neither can he.”

Not what he wanted to hear, but there was no point in cursing Morgan over it. That the man managed to get an informant in the German Auror division at all was extremely impressive. Given enough time, he was certain Morgan could recruit additional spies within Germany, disgruntled citizens as tired of their ministry's incompetency as Britain had been of theirs. Besides, Voldemort thought to himself, I have been known to come up with a clever plan or two myself.

“If I were able to locate Harry,” he suggested, “Do you think you could get a man to retrieve him?”

Morgan said nothing for a moment, as blank faced as ever, then finally nodded. “I can think of a few people who might be convinced to take the boy, if it meant asylum in Britain.”

“Asylum is definitely something I can provide. How quickly can you get someone?”

Another moment of thought. “... a week... ten days at most.”

“You have four. This will be at the top of your list until it is completed. Harry's represents a security breach of the highest level. We can not afford to let him remain in the wrong hands.”

“Yes, my Lord.”

“Good. Are you ready for tonight's meeting?”

“Yes, my Lord.”

“Ms. Beadle as well?”

“Yes.”

“Good. You are dismissed.”

Morgan stood, bowed and left, leaving Voldemort to brood until his next appointment. This could be it. In the next week, Harry may once more be in his grasp, and he wasn't entirely sure what to do about it. Part of him want to kill Harry, destroy the threat before he could turn into the next Dumbledore, and a larger part wanted to beat him down into complete submission, molding him into a blindly obedient tool just as he had told Lucius and Severus he would. But another part was making itself know, and had been growing like a weed despite the fire of his rage constantly trying to burn it to ash.

Part of him wanted to ask him how he had done it.

And why.

And if he regretted it.

Part of him wanted to sit down with a cup of tea, a pile of blank parchments, and recording quill and discuss everything that had happened from the moment Harry had decided to perform the ritual to the point where he escaped with the Durmstrang students. He wanted to compare ideas and theories, and learn what that sort of magic from that particular goddess felt like, what it required as far as sacrifice, if it was something he himself could harness. He wanted Harry to watch him with his wide, fascinated eyes as he explained the parts that he hadn't realized himself, and feel the tingle of their magic brushing against one another as their mere thoughts drew up the ancient powers, their intellectual and imaginative admiration a form of worship all its own.

Part of him wanted them reconciled, but all of him knew it was pointless.

They would never have what they had lost. The trust was broken.

His whole, willful, and completely illogical soul refused to listen.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Sirius stood up and arched his back, working the crick out of it. Amidst the trees, he and over half his pack, including women and children, were stooping over the forest floor, searching for any sort of valuable plant they could find. The alpha scowled, his annoyance at his current duty only increasing along with the growing ache in his spine. Bide him, Remus glanced up with some amusement.

"It's honest work," his beta said.

"It's nothing of the sort. It's war profiteering," he snapped.

"It's for medicine. Not for weapons. These could save someone's life."

"Yeah, some dumb clod who'll just go out and kill someone else."

Remus rolled his eyes. Sirius had been in a surly mood all day, and Remus knew logic wasn't going to snap him out of it. He wanted to be angry, convinced it was somehow better than being worried.

"That's a very pessimistic thing to say."

They both looked up and turned, finding Luna. Her own bag looked full, though whether it was anything useful was questionable. She had odd ideas about what was important and what wasn't after all.

"Hello, Luna," Remus sighed.

"Hello, Slivermoon. Hello, Blackbone."

"Hmph."

She continued to smile dreamily, oblivious or maybe nonchalant about their complete lack of enthusiasm. They could be gloomy all they wanted, because she knew something that would make them feel better.

"Diana says Harry is out of the ice fortress."

Now she had their attention. They both dropped their bags and came closer.

"Where is he?" Sirius growled. Luna shrugged.

"I dunno."

The alpha grit his teeth and took a deep breath.

"Then what else did Diana tell you?"

She tilted her head, and squinted one eye as if trying to remember, though the meeting could only have been a few hours ago at most.

"She said he's being funny again, which I think is good. If he were in a bad way, that wouldn't be funny at all."

Remus nodded sceptically, "Yes, that's probably true. Did she say how he was being funny?"

She grinned, "He got rescued by a damsel."

The two men shared a look, and finally shook their heads. It was pointless trying to get meaningful answers from someone half mad who was talking to someone else who couldn't communicate her own omnipotence any better.

"Anything else?"

"And they lived happily ever after?" she offered.

"Luna," Sirius sighed, "Is he safe or not?"

"Yep. At least he was when I talked to Diana. He's crazy though, so who knows?" she said, and scampered off. Remus shook his head. She was getting odder and odder with each passing day, and unfortunately more social at the same time.

"Should I be worried that Luna thinks my godson is nuts?" Sirius muttered.

“No. Sane people always seem crazy to the insane.”

“Do you think anything she said was meaningful?”

“Sure. Harry's out of Durmstrang. It's probably the right time of the year for him to be out of class. There will definitely be more opportunities to rescue him now.”

“Or for him to escape. I bet he could, if he tried.”

They fell silent, and went back to get their bags and start harvesting, both of them deep in thought. Harry's kidnapping had come as a complete shock to them, and in a lot of ways they couldn't bring themselves to believe it. Harry anywhere other than Hogwarts or with them, let alone holed up in an ice fortress hundreds of miles away, was impossible to imagine. Like trying to imagine a polar bear in a barn or Greyback in a suit. It just wasn't clicking. The only evidence they had even seen of it was the absence of letters, and Greyback's single, gruff announcement half a year ago.

The upcoming war, however, felt very real. Greyback had already accepted commissions for the harvesting of medicinal plants, animal furs for the lining of winter uniforms, and crossbows. Their head alpha had also begun drilling them in what to do in case of an attack, digging out escape tunnels beneath their homes and random places around their camp, and holding council with the other alphas every few weeks to see how their own preparations were coming. One alpha had already been killed for not taking the threat seriously enough.

As they went back to their task, Sirius finally found exactly what he wanted to say.

“If he escapes... I hope he doesn't come back here. I hope he finds somewhere safe.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Vratsa Vultures is the Bulgarian pro quidditch team. Heidelberg Harriers are the German team.

Book V

Chapter 2: The Tavern

Harry awoke in an unfamiliar bed. Sitting up cautiously, he took in his new surroundings. The bed was small and covered in a green and yellow checkered quilt. The ceiling slanted sharply, and the room itself was long with a window at one end and a door at the other, all painted a clean white. It was empty but for the bed, a small bedside table and lamp, and his trunk with his satchel set on top of it.

He got up and quickly checked himself. His wand was still on him, as was everything else he owned. Had his kidnapper not bothered to search him at all? Draco's gift, still tucked in the back of his pants made him think this was probably the case, or at the very least no one wanted him to know that they knew he was armed. He checked his satchel and found everything in place, and just to be certain he looked through his trunk. The trunk had a rune on it that glowed if it was opened by anyone other than him within twenty-four hours, but it remained dark.

The window he found was open already, letting in a breeze from outside, and though the radiator beneath it made it awkward, he managed to get a look around outside. The view revealed a neighborhood of modest apartments and hotels, bakeries and cafés. The people walking the narrow street appeared to be muggles, with not a robe or broomstick in sight. A girl walking with her mother, looked up at him from the street and waved. Harry waved back, his uncertainty mounting.

Where was he? Some sort of safe house? What kind of hideout would a wizard leave visible to muggles? How had he even gotten here? He remembered walking towards Bremerhaven... was this even the same city?.. and then everything after that came up blank. Searching the room for clues revealed nothing but a tiny storage hutch built into the wall and a tiny bathroom with a toilet and sink. It was all very spartan, but clearly not a cell.

With a bit of uncertainty, he tried the door.

It opened with a little groan. He grabbed his satchel and made his second bid for freedom.

A set of stairs lay directly outside his door, twisting downwards, and he followed it to the level below, and found a hallway lined with six doors with numbers on them and red carpet on the floor. A hotel then, he decided, and followed the stairs down to the next level and found a similar hallway but with green carpet. And so it went for another two floors, until at last he found himself deposited into a lobby.

It was empty. There was no clerk at the checkout desk, though there were several keys missing from board behind him, and no visitors sitting on the sofas or chairs. The lights were on, and the ceiling fan was running. It was ghostly quiet, but the place itself was sparkling clean and ready to receive, and he felt uneasy.

He tried the front entrance, and finally experienced his first obstacle. There was no knob on the door. He tried pushing it, but it didn't budge. With his wand, which he still couldn't believe he had, he tried a revealing charm, and then an unlocking charm, and after some mental debate a blasting charm. All three spells were swallowed up without so much as a rattle.

Throwing a chair at the nearest window had similar results.

Frustrated, he went in search of another exit. If he was forced to, he supposed he could figure a way to climb out his bedroom window and onto the street, but he wanted to see if could manage something less conspicuous on the ground floor. And perhaps find out what the devil was going on.

Searching the ground floor revealed an office, a break room, a coin operated laundry, and a kitchen. One of the laundry machines was running and the kitchen had food in it (Harry wasn't too shy to nick a cookie out of the pantry), but otherwise he found no evidence of anyone. He was starting to entertain the notion that he was going be kept like a pet hamster in a very elaborate cage, when he heard voices. He followed the sound out to the lobby, and to a set of double doors he had overlooked. Beside the door was sign.

Astrada Hotel Bar

Mon-Thurs. 6:00pm-12:00pm

Fri-Sun: 5:00pm -1:00am

There were muffled voices coming through the door, barely audible but Harry got the impression that someone was shouting or at least protesting loudly. Cautiously, he leaned in closer to listen.

"I still say you should have searched him! It's careless and naive Who knows what he's carrying on him? What if he's got something the Dark Lord can trace? Or even the ministry?" someone argued, a woman, he thought.

"Now, now, my dear, I didn't take on this responsibility in order to hold young Mr. Potter prisoner. He has had a very difficult year, and deserves patience and respect. I believe that will prove the best approach for everyone."

"Albus," someone else said, this time a man, "I can appreciate what you're saying, but this is a bit much. Viktor said it himself that the boy still felt loyalty towards the Dark Lord. Now, that's probably not his fault, and he's probably a very nice kid, but you can't expect us to put any trust in him. He wasn't off the boat ten minutes and he made a break for it! What happens if he manages to get out of here and gets picked up by one of Voldemort's men? Or runs off to find one himself?"

There was a moment of silence.

"That's a very good point," Dumbledore said at last, and Harry felt himself recoil. What were they going to do? Lock him up? Well... lock him up more? Cast the Imperius on him? Put him in a magically induced coma? Make him sign a fidelity contract? "Which is why I will be taking special pains to ensure he never meets any of you. Compromising a hideout is one thing, compromising the Order is another thing altogether. With that being said, I must ask you to all to exit through the back door, as Mr. Potter seems to have made himself comfortable at the front."

Harry leaped away from the door. There was the sound of cursing and moving chairs, the number of which suggested there were many more than just Dumbledore, the man, and the woman. His first thought was to turn around and run back upstairs to his room, thinking that if the others were truly leaving, then he might as well try it himself. If he waited for a few minutes, he might be able to escape without worrying about another sneak attack.

He was just a few steps up, when one of the doors popped open with an audible 'click'. He froze on instinct, and turned expecting someone to come out and shout at him for spying or order him to stop, but no one appeared. Looking back up the stairs, it seemed a lot further away, five flights of stairs he reminded himself. The old wizard was alone now though. Surely if he wanted to interrogate him, he would have made the others stay.

Turning back towards the door, he wondered if it were an invitation, and whether he should accept it. The last time he had faced Dumbledore, he had been half mad and hurled curses at him and blown up a room. Hardly the best first impression. Not that he cared.

It was just... that opened door seemed to taunting. I dare you come inside, it seemed to laugh.

Well, he thought, I did want some answers.

He flicked his wrist a few times, making sure his wand would pop out easily if necessary, and headed back and stepped inside. The bar was dark, as bars typically were, and only a few dim lights were on. It smelled of stale smoke and wine, and at the bar sat the old wizard, all alone, drinking what appeared to be...

"Lemonade, Mr. Potter?" Dumbledore offered, his eyes somehow managing to twinkle even in the dark. Harry was very tempted to just roll his eyes and stalk back outside.

"No, thank you."

"Suit yourself," he said, took a long sip from his spirally orange straw, sighed happily, and continued, "How are you feeling? I do apologize for your rather unorthodox arrival. My associates can be a little overzealous in their assignments. I trust you weren't hurt?"

"Not as far as I can tell..." he said, his tone doing nothing to hide his annoyance.

"Good, good. Now that you're awake, I thought we might discuss a few things."

Harry said nothing. In fact, he didn't even move. He itched to take his wand, stun the wizard, and make a break for it. Dumbledore took another sip from his glass.

"Ah, that's wonderful. Best thing about summer, without a doubt, is the lemonade. And ice cream. And fireflies. Those are good too."

Or maybe stun him and call on the nearest funny farm to come and take him away.

"I'm sorry...sir... but what did you want to talk about?"

"Oh, yes. About your stay here for the summer... well, temporary stay anyway. We'll likely move once or twice, but that's neither here nor there. I would like to hire you on as a personal assistant. My sources tell me that you have some experience working in an office."

Harry blinked. That wasn't what he had been expecting. Inquiries about his affiliation with Voldemort, questions about dangerous magics he had performed, and even his thoughts on the Minister of Magic, but not about a job. He was talking about a job, wasn't he?"

"I don't... what?"

Dumbledore didn't seem to find anything about the situation odd, and kept on as if they were long time acquaintances. "I've always believed remaining active during the summer was just as important for keeping the mind sharp as homework ever was, and it's excellent experience for after graduation. Don't you agree?"

“Er... sure.”

“So what do you think? A little part-time job, say, four or five hours a day? I'll pay you of course. That's half the fun of having a job... in some cases the only fun.”

“Uh... what would I be doing, exactly?”

“Filing, taking messages, tidying up, the usual. Do you know how to make tuna salad?”

“... Yeah...”

“Then making tuna salad on Thursdays, as well. I can never get it quite right.”

Harry bulked. He had just hired himself out to a loon. A loon who happened to be one of Voldemort's greatest rivals. Fabulous. Well, at least he hadn't asked for his wand.

“Good, now that that's settled... about your wand...”

Well, bollocks.

“Ministry laws, I'm afraid, and I should be in considerable trouble as your guardian if anyone knew you had cast some rather impressive spells at the front door.”

“How would anyone know?” he tried, then cursed himself for the desperate lilt his voice had taken. Stupid! Stupid! He had been close to begging. There was no way to win that way.

“I am sorry,” the old man said sympathetically, “I know it is disconcerting, but it's not something that can be taken lightly. I promise, your wand will remain safe.”

Harry said nothing, but his expression spoke volumes.

“Do you think I would tamper with it?”

Again, the boy let his expression do the talking, but added for clarification, "I'm more worried about myself."

"Ah, yes. Your trust is not so easily given, I imagine, and my words alone will not be enough to convince you. The only proof I can give you that you can trust me is if you don't have your wand and nothing ill befalls you, and the only way you would give me your wand is if you trusted me. We are at an impasse."

They fell into a thoughtful silence, and Harry found himself tired of standing and took a seat a little ways down the bar. Looking across the counter, he could see his reflection in the mirrored backdrop. He looked thin, pale, and tired, but his eyes were hard. It was a bit startling. The lighting was generally dim at Durmstrang except in the domes, and he hadn't realized his deterioration until now.

"Of course," the old wizard started up again, drawing back his attention, "I could have just as easily taken it from you while you slept."

Harry swallowed thickly, realizing that was very true. He could have taken his wand, and everything else he had on him, and locked him in his room or kept him unconscious or chained to the bed. A lot of things could have been done to him that weren't.

"Then why didn't you?"

Dumbledore's eyes twinkled, and he gently slid a glass of lemonade down the bar towards him. Harry caught it instinctively. "Trust, Mr. Potter, and respect. Before we can ever hope to reach an understanding, there must be a certain level of trust and respect... on both our parts."

He looked away, down at the glass. The outside of it was cool and wet with condensation, and he realized now that the room was uncomfortable warm and he was thirsty. It could be drugged though... but that wouldn't make much sense. He just didn't want to trust the old man. He had been preparing himself for a confrontation, for an interrogation, not conversations on trust and lemonade. It was ironic, but he thought he would prefer his earlier supposition. He didn't know how to defend against kindness.

At the same time, he was sick of the fear and the paranoia, quite literally. His reflection showed the strain it had caused him. Cautiously, he took a sip of his lemonade, pointedly not looking at Dumbledore. He was afraid he'd see triumph there.

They didn't say anything further, and Dumbledore didn't rush him. When he had finally finished his drink, and his thinking, he was lead back out to the lobby and behind the check in counter.

"The hotel is empty," Dumbledore explained. "The muggles who own it have passed on, and I am watching it for their children until they sort out what to do with it, which should take another month or two."

"This is a muggle hotel?" It shouldn't have surprised him, not after looking out the window at the perfectly muggle-looking neighborhood. In the back of his mind, he had just assumed that's how German wizards lived and dressed. For the first time, the old wizard's expression sharpened a bit, into something more shrewd, but it quickly disappeared.

"It's been a while since you went about the muggle world, hasn't it? Five years almost."

"Longer than that," he said bitterly, before he could catch himself. He hadn't been out in the muggle world nearly at all since his parents death. The Dursley had kept him constantly at number 4, Privet Drive, never taking him to school, the store, or even to the park and never letting him outside to do anything except work on the garden. At the time, it had merely been depressing, but looking back on it now left him angry. He had missed out on so much because of his guardians' shame and greed, and that which he had seen and experienced with them was ugly and cruel.

"Then this shall be a rather novel experience. It will certainly be a re-education. Go ahead and pick a mail slot, and place your wand inside of it."

Harry hesitated, fighting the feeling of nausea over what he was about to do. His wand had been a part of him for years, and to be separated from it felt like willingly amputating a finger. The old wizard didn't rush him, and eventually he picked a slot that was eye-level to him and placed his wand inside. With a flick of his own wand, which made Harry flinch, Dumbledore cast a spell on the slot.

"There. Now it is quite safe from theft, fire, and flood. No one will be able to remove it, myself included, without canceling the spell first."

Nothing appeared to have happened. There was no glowing or sparks, and the wand continued to sit there in plain view. Curious, Harry reached up to try and take it back. His fingers missed the slot, and he felt the first tingle of magic. Another attempt and another miss. The third and fourth try yielded the same results. He pulled back his hand.

"Weird."

"Quite. Now that that is taken care of, if you would follow me to my office. I have a bit of filling that needs to be taken care of."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape stalked through the Court of Military Affairs with the same looming quality he had mastered at Hogwarts, and for the most part it was just as effective among the Dark Lord's toadies and the toadies' toadies as it was on school children. Witches and wizards alike, in their suits and uniforms shrank back upon his approach, refraining from any attempts at flattering or networking they normally employed with those of superior rank. The potions master had a reputation as a former Death Eater, and any who came upon him were unfortunately reminded of it by his perpetually dark expression and intense black eyes.

This was good for Snape, certainly a morale booster after months of frustration at his own inadequacy. The Dark Lord had charged him with a task, a task he couldn't afford to fail at, but ultimately saw no way to achieve. Tonight, he was expected to deliver the results of his investigation into the mysterious letter in front of the Dark Lord and a hundred of his colleagues, and he had nothing.

The Court of Military affairs was an ostentatious building for a place that dealt with the affairs of war. The style was Baroque, garishly over decorated in gold leaf and high ceilings, paintings of battles lined the walls, making the hallways unpleasantly noisy when just the images of battling sorcerers and sorceresses blowing each other to bits would have been unpleasant enough all its own. He arrived at the meeting hall and was stopped by Sentinels, suffered through the usual indignity of a search, and was permitted to enter.

He was not late, but he was one of the last to arrive. The meeting was being held in a large room, with no windows and no places to hide for the sake of security. Long tables had been set up in the shape of a 'U' with a shorter table above it for the most important attendees, including the Dark Lord himself. The room was crowded, and the noise of battles from the hallway was replaced with the noise of politicians who liked to hear themselves talk. Heading towards the front of the room, he could see Lucius and Morgan had already arrived. Lucius was talking with small group of important looking people, but Morgan's attention was focused on a woman he didn't recognize. She was in her early thirties, plain faced, though not unpleasant, sprinkled with freckles from getting too much sun, and her dark brown hair was pulled back into an equally unimpressive bun. She dressed modestly in a blue dress, and a darker blue robe was draped over it. Nothing about her suggested any significance, and her wide nervous eyes suggested she didn't think she should be there, but she had been placed between Morgan and himself, which meant someone thought otherwise.

He took his seat, ignoring inquiries from the few brave enough to address him, and waited. The woman beside him turned around, a nervous reaction, but when he turned back to her she quickly looked away. He rolled his eyes. He supposed it was better than being stuck next to talker, but her timidity was irksome.

"You could have just handed my report to someone-" she was saying to Morgan, a rather bold move since he was the second most important person in the room at the moment. He cut her off with flat reprimand.

“You were requested by the Dark Lord himself. If you have objections, feel free to take the matter up with him.”

That shut her up quick, as such a threat usually did, and she spent the next few minutes staring at her hands clasped in her lap. Snape spent his time, trying to think of what he was going to say. Unfortunately, he kept thinking how he wanted to strangle Harry for getting him into this mess.

“All rise for Lord Voldemort, Sovereign of the Kingdoms of Britain and Ireland!”

The room fell silent, and anyone who had been sitting, Snape included, rose to their feet and turned towards the door. The Dark Lord strode inside, a party of six Sentinels followed behind him, but they broke away to station themselves around the room. The sovereign himself, went straight for the center table, and sat himself down. Everyone followed his example, and sat, waiting in silence for his instructions.

“We have much to discuss,” the Dark Lord said pointedly, “So we will refrain from the usual ceremonies and pleasantries. Please keep your testimonies brief and to the point. If anyone has questions or statements to add, wait until the end before presenting them. I shall begin with a explanation of what occurred the night I was attacked.”

Voldemort's story was a shiny little thing, polished after months of consideration and truths dressed in lies and political correctness. It went along the lines that the Dark Lord had been in Ireland, making nice with the local Druidic communities during their Winter Solstice holiday, when he had been attacked with a strange magic. The druids present had been skilled enough to save his life and bring him to the hospital for treatment, where under the excellent care of the doctors he had managed to recover relatively quick. Further investigation revealed the source of the strange magic to be Professor Eric Brennan, a teacher at Hogwarts who had been convinced or possibly coerced by the Germans to attempt an assassination. The Germans had fled without him, and when confronted, Brennan had killed himself and taken his secrets with him. It was also believed he had a hand in Harry Potter's kidnapping, but this could not be confirmed. He has since made a complete recovery.

There was a rather telling lack of questions after he had given his account, and the Dark Lord turned over the hall to Lucius.

“Commander Malfoy will explain the events that led to the discovery of the German's attempt at spying. Commander Malfoy, if you would.”

Lucius nodded to the Dark Lord, and stood. Despite his own sense of self-importance, he kept his account brief. There was, after all, very little about the incident that showed him in a very flattering light. The discovery had been made by an anonymous third party, and most of the Germans had escaped, but for a few minor players, and a child had been kidnapped. The only positive point had been his quick actions, which had prevented the acquiring of confidential information via the parasitic insects. There were a few questions here, but no one dared point out his mistakes. Criticizing Malfoy wasn't as dangerous as criticizing Voldemort, but only because he didn't make you suffer in public before he killed you... usually.

And then it was his turn.

“Professor Severus Snape has been charged with investigating the mysterious letter from Hogwarts,” Lucius ended, taking his seat. Snape stood, careful not to fidget or take a drink of water, or appear anything other than absolutely confident in what he was about to say. He had no real answers, but he could improvise like the best of them.

“Having examined the letter, I can safely say that it did in fact originate from our Lord's office in Hogwarts, and the owl was also a tenant of the school. Further investigation of both the office's security and questioning of those present at the school during the event, I have reached the following conclusion.”

He was distinctly aware of Lucius and Morgan and, most unnerving of all, the Dark Lord's intense scrutiny; more interested than anyone else in the room on what he was to say next. They knew he had reached dead end after dead end, and wondered how he was going to get out of the bind he found himself in.

“Professor Brennan, is in fact, the original author of the letter.”

There were murmurs of confusion, but the Dark Lord quickly broke in.

“Silence! Professor, please explain.”

“Certainly,” he said quickly, but not too quickly. He had to be careful to come off as if he believed what he was saying and wasn't just making excuses. “I believe Professor Brennan wrote the letter in an attempt to protect Mr. Potter from harm, alerting Commander Malfoy of the spying insects as proof of their intentions so that he might stop their plot before involving his student.”

“But Professor Snape,” a woman towards the back objected, “Why would Professor Brennan aid in the assassination of our Lord, but then try to stop them from kidnapping Mr. Potter?”

Snape took a deep breath, and cast an accessing glance at the Dark Lord. He looked curious, but not convinced.

“Professor Brennan,” Snape began, “Has a... history with the Dark Lord. One that may account for his willingness to murder him, but not one that would justify the abduction of Mr. Potter or the revelation of national secrets to a foreign government. Ultimately, we may never know why, but given the timing and the source of materials, only Brennan had access to the office and the foreknowledge of the plot to have sent the letter.”

Not everyone looked certain, but obviously didn't have anything to contradict his theory or even an alternative theory of their own. He managed to re-take his seat, fairly confident he was not going to be horribly mutilated at the conclusion of the meeting.

“Thank you, Professor,” the Dark Lord said, looking rather impressed, which didn't necessarily mean he had been fooled. Snape would have to hope he was impressed enough with his improvisation that he didn't curse him out of hand. “Most of you are unfamiliar with our next speaker, Ms. Ira Beadle. She is a private researcher for the Oxford University of Magical Academia and Medicine, specializing in entomology and has been charged with examining the insects used to spy on us.”

Nervously, the woman beside him stood and faced the crowd, nodding in acknowledgment to the Dark Lord.

“H-hello. Ah... one moment please.”

She suddenly dropped down and after a moment of rather undignified groping beneath the table, pulled out box-shaped item. The Sentinels stiffened, but she was too distracted setting up her contraption to notice. After a few seconds of fiddling with some knobs on the side, the top of the box lit up and a faint hologram appeared a few feet above their heads. The holograms were of the bugs, but they were very difficult to see.

“Um... would s-someone please lower the lights?” she requested. Another moment passed and the lights dimmed, and the insects could be seen much more clearly, and she began. “T-these are not true insects, but ascari, more closely related to ticks. The one on the left... excuse me the one on my left, is a common a Western Imagi, easily found in any Northern European country, including Scotland and Ireland. The one on the right, however, is a completely new species...”

In the dark of the room, focused on a subject she clearly understood well, Mr. Beadle's timid demeanor melted away. With confidence and enthusiasm she explained the technique likely used to change the Western Imagi into the current form, and how the use of grinding the creatures up and mixing them in a potion and then a penseive would reveal everything they had seen and experienced. They had perfect memory.

“Very impressive, Ms. Beadle,” the Dark Lord said, interrupting her before she turned meeting into a course lecture. “You may sit down now.”

Chagrined, she dismantled her projector and quickly took her seat. There were a few more speakers, Sentinels in charge of interrogating the few Germans they had captured, Court officials investigating Germany's preparations and attitudes towards the upcoming deadline, progress reports on Britain and Ireland's security and the military recruitment campaign, and various other matters. It was almost midnight when the meeting was adjourned, and everyone was too tired to attempt another round of schmoozing.

The Dark Lord, however, being an inhuman monster, was still peppy enough for just a little more. Snape was among the privileged to receive a pat on the shoulder and a rather sinister, 'come with me'. He followed the Dark Lord through a back door, and down a hallway. Lucius and Morgan were with them. The guards were not. They stepped into an office and shut the door, Morgan throwing up anti-spying spells behind them.

Snape was rather surprised to find Nagini lounging on the couch, glaring up at them, daring one of them to try and take her spot. It was strange when he suddenly realized he hadn't seen the snake since Harry's second year.

"Hassshe messs ssseeessse," the Dark Lord hissed softly, and the giant snake slithered to the floor and made her way over to him, leaving the couch available to Lucius and Morgan. Snape remained standing, leaning against the doorway. Voldemort reclined in his chair, completely unaffected as Nagini climbed up his chair and laid her head on his lap. He started to stroke her reptilian head and spoke to them in English.

"There are a few matters I wanted to make all of you aware of before you leave. I have recently begun making direct correspondence with Her Majesty Queen Ophelia IV through letters, and she has expressed a willingness to listen to our complaints against Germany. Much of what was discussed today will be presented via representative, and will require you to make yet another formal report and submit it in a week's time for translation. This is an extremely important project, my friends. If we can convince the queen our grievance is legitimate, we may create for ourselves a powerful ally, one who will allow us a foothold on mainland soil. Your roles in this will be limited, but I wanted you aware of what is going on so that you might facilitate this matter among your underlings who express reluctance in associating with a foreign country.”

If that was what this private meeting was about, Snape wondered why he was there. His 'underlings' included a couple hundred juveniles of no political consequence. At least, none of political consequence since Harry disappeared.

“I can see you are wondering about your presence here, Severus,” the Dark Lord continued. “Truthfully, that matter has nothing to do with you. I simply need to ask you a question.”

“My Lord?” he asked, cautiously. The dark wizard's expression was familiar, a casual cruelty that suggested he was going to curse someone out of boredom, rather than out of punishment.

“Chief Morgan and I have been discussing a means of retrieving my dear protégé from Dumbledore, and it seems we may have the opportunity in the next few weeks.”

Something unpleasant settled in Snape's stomach at the news, something that left him nauseous at the thought of participating in the child's inevitable punishment. Still, he managed to get out a 'congratulations'.

“Thank you. Now, however, I must consider exactly what I am to do with him. A few minutes under the Pain Curse just isn't going to cut it. I need him healthy enough to face the public and testify to Durmstrang's kidnapping and torture, but more importantly I need to know he will never again be capable of defying or attempting harm against me.”

Snape nodded, his unease beginning to spread. He didn't like where this conversation was going. “What would you have of me?”

“I need to know if you are capable of instilling loyalty in him, through potions or spells or a good old-fashioned lashing. I don't care, as long as he remains sane and healthy enough to carry out his role as Prince. Can you do this?”

There were fourteen different ways Snape could think of to create artificial loyalty, thirty if one considered blind obedience the same thing as loyalty, and six methods that could maintain one's sanity and health. None he had ever considered using on a child, even one as obstinate and infuriating as Harry.

"... Yes, I can," he said, because to deny his ability would not only endanger him, but leave the boy in the care of someone else, most likely Lestrage or someone else of questionable skill and intent.

The Dark Lord nodded, tension they had not even realized was there, slowly leaving him. In his lap, Nagini closed her eyes, conveying the contentment normally reserved to highly spoiled house cats.

"Good. I recommend making preparations as soon as possible."

"I shall, my Lord... but if I may ask... why me? I have... failed," he bit out, hating to remind the wizard of such a touchy subject, but needing answers just the same. "... to handle Potter properly the first time, and surely you are more than capable of handling him yourself."

He stiffened, waiting for a Cruciatus or possibly something more bloody, but Voldemort merely made a dismissive gesture with his free hand.

"I have two reasons. The first being that I want to maintain the appearance of normalcy upon his return. No one should know of his defection or the retribution that will be exacted on him, not the public in general or his closest associates, including your goddaughter and godson. Removing him from your care would raise questions, and you are too conveniently placed for me not to use you. The alternative would be Lestrage, who lacks the... sensitivity... this situation requires, or Professor Toure, who lacks the skills. The other reason... I do believe he betrayed us both, Severus. You have as much reason to be angry with him as I do."

Snape was surprised, not only by the Dark Lord's reasoning, but also by the realization that he had never felt betrayed. Angry, yes, but not betrayed. Harry's retaliation had seemed perfectly natural, albeit foolhardy and inconvenient. He was a Gryffindor forced to play Slytherin games, and ultimately had lashed out and broken free. Harry's actions were unbelievably reckless and extreme, but not unjustified. Snape himself had often fantasized of ways to put Lord Voldemort into an early (long overdue?) grave.

"Thank you," he said, trying to sound sincere but coming off more than a little perplexed. "You are too generous."

"Aren't I?" It was said with an ironic lilt, a strange sort of joke for man who only seemed to get stranger with time. "That is all, Severus. You may go, I still have a few more matters to discuss with the others."

Snape bowed respectfully and left, aware of the other wizards' intense scrutiny. They had said nothing the entire time, and he would happily have forgotten their presence during the entire awkward and nerve-wracking debacle, but it seemed they would be privy to his every word and subconscious gesture to examine and question on their own once their meeting concluded. His summoning and premature dismissal left him vulnerable to their criticism behind the closed door, but there was nothing he could do about it now. The only true way to redeem himself was to do as Dark Lord requested and-

"Professor Snape."

Ms. Beadle was in the hallway, sitting in a chair like a child waiting to be called into the headmaster's office, her little projection box beside her. She was clearly tired, and he couldn't imagine why she was still there.

"Ms. Beadle... shouldn't you be on your way home?"

She looked up at him with wide gray eyes, then timidly down at her hands again.

"Chief Morgan is my escort," she said, softly, and offered nothing more. Just as well, he decided, since he wasn't particularly interested. And yet some how, he still ended up asking a question.

"A friend of yours?"

She shook her head. "My stepfather."

"Ah." And then he completely lost interest, and started on his way.

"Professor..."

He paused and turned back towards her. She was looking at him directly now, still nervous, but with intent. "Yes?"

"I... I just wanted to say... I..." she stumbled, "You have my condolences... about Mr. Potter, I mean. Like everyone else, I guess... We're all praying for his safe return."

Snape said nothing for a long moment, decoding her ramble into something he could adequately interpret. When he finally figured it out, a laugh jumped straight into his throat before he could swallow it. He laughed, hard and long. Oh, what a ridiculous thing to say, he thought. Never mind he had heard it a dozen times before. To have someone say it sincerely and to his face was just too funny.

It didn't help that her wide eyes had gotten even wider and she was now left gaping, like some sort of deer-eyed fish. His laughter wasn't subsiding, and as it continued her mouth finally closed and her eyes narrowed, but she had also turned beet red, bringing a completely new level of hilarity to the situation.

"Honestly, sir!" she protested indignantly. "What is so funny?"

The laughter finally faded away as he considered her question, and ultimately decided it wasn't funny at all and he needed to get some sleep. He rubbed his eyes, turned and walked away, ignoring her and her question altogether. It would be for the best if he left before Lucius came out and requested a word with him in his usual attempts to prod a situation until he found some benefit to himself in it.

"Goodnight, Ms. Beadle," he said offhandedly.

"Good riddance, sir!" she snapped at his back, unknowingly eliciting a smirk from the utterly disagreeable man.

oo
oo

Harry sat at the window, looking down at the empty street below. It was late, or very early morning depending on how one thought about it, and he could not sleep. His life had just taken a dramatic new turn again and his mind was still reeling. In a day, he had gone from Durmstrang to Bremerhaven, was briefly reunited with Fleur, attempted an escape, was recaptured, relocated into a muggle hotel, surrendered his wand to his former mentor's greatest enemy (not to mention possibly his own greatest enemy if he truly was responsible for the whole Moody debacle), and was now working for him as an office assistant.

The day hadn't gotten any less strange once he was lead to Dumbledore's 'office', which resembled office only by the fact that it had a desk and a filing cabinet. And papers. Lots and lots of papers. In fact, it looked as if someone had set a bomb off in the post office. They were stacked on his desk, on the floor, tacked to bulletin boards, behind the radiator, under the rug, and even in some of the hats on the hat rack. Despite this, the old loon insisted he knew where everything was... except his coffee pot... and his type writer... and Fawkes, who turned out to be a phoenix taking sanctuary in the adjoining bathroom. A wise move, since a lovely as the creature was, he was also a definite fire hazard with all the kindling just laying around.

Harry had spent hours just trying to find all the scattered papers, which could have been done in minutes if he'd been allowed his wand or even if Dumbledore had done a few spells himself, but the old wizard had busied himself typing up letters on his type writer, after it had eventually been excavated from under some old tax forms that had never been filed.

It turned out that Dumbledore was a philanthropist, who ran almost a dozen charities and organizations almost entirely by mail. The Refugee Scholarship Fund, set up to help refugees and children of refugees pay for school tuition. The Three Tongues Program, volunteer-run classes designed to teach refugees the language of their new home country. Universal Rites, a legal assistance charity that provided legal counseling and representation to British families without citizenship. It went on and on, and even though he wasn't reading through every piece, he was getting the gist of what life was like for those who had fled during the war. And perhaps an idea of why his own parents preferred living as eccentric muggles, rather than outcast wizards.

They could have gone back, Harry thought. Most of them, anyway. Did it really seem so awful, that they would prefer to live like third class citizens in a foreign country than as first class citizens under Lord Voldemort?

That seemed to be the case, but he was suspicious. Had no one gone back? He couldn't recall ever hearing a case where someone had left Britain and then returned after the war. Perhaps it had been impossible? The international embargo could have prevented their return, but what sense did that make? Why hold on to people you didn't really want?

He decided he should ask Dumbledore in the morning. Given the man's occupation, it seemed he would be the most likely person to know, and in his case the only person he could ask. Sighing, he moved away from the window and climbed onto the bed. It was too warm to bother with blankets, so he simply curled around his pillow and closed his eyes.

Sleep evaded him for a while, pestering him with ideas of escaping out the window and disappearing while the strange old wizard slept oblivious, but such a silly plot wasn't enough to pull his tired body from his bed. Finally, the world fell away and dreams came to him.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The maze at the Sianach Lodge was far different in the summer than in the winter, and even in the misty gloom he could see the hedges lined in vibrant greens and flowering bursts of color. Somewhere in the distance he could hear a raven call. He made his way towards the center, following the familiar path and nodding to the gods and goddesses perched on their altars, and they nodded back or ignored him in their turn.

The maze opened up at the center, and standing there was the Dark Lord himself, using his staff to burn a diagram into the grass. Harry watched him silently for a while, idly wondering what it was for, not bothering to question why he was there to begin with. When the diagram was complete, Voldemort turned and looked at him.

His expression was cold and blank, and Harry was suddenly reminded that they were not friends any longer. He didn't run though. It hadn't yet occurred to him to be afraid, and when the man extended his hand to him in invitation, he entered the circle without hesitation.

"What are we doing?" he asked, looking down at the burnt lines in the ground, runes running out from the center or into the center depending on one's point of view.

"Where are you, Harry?" Voldemort asked, ignoring his inquiry.

"I am here."

A hint of amusement flitted across the Dark Lord's expression, but just as quickly disappeared.

"No, you are not here. You are only dreaming of this place. Where are you?"

Harry thought about it.

"Germany."

"Better... where in Germany?"

"Westerly Street."

"A city? A town? Are mountains nearby?"

"A city. I don't know its name. In a hotel. There are muggles outside my window."

The Dark Lord considered this for a while, and while he was thinking Harry watched the lines in the grass as they started to shift. Gently, the man lifted his chin with his hand, and drew back his attention.

"Have you told Dumbledore anything?"

"I told him how to make a tuna salad."

Voldemort grinned, but fought it back, trying to keep his expression serious. He seemed to be having a hard time of it, particularly since Harry was grinning up at him.

"Has he asked you about me?"

"No, but I told him I wouldn't tell him anything when we first met."

The elder man cocked his head to the side. "Why not?"

Harry cocked his head to the other side, mirroring him. "Why would I?"

"You betrayed me once before."

"I never meant to hurt you. I just didn't want you to hurt anyone else... just because you could."

"It is my right."

"But it isn't right."

"You're one to talk about morality after what you've done."

"Fine, I'm Mr. Kettle and your Mr. Pot, and we're both too black to criticize each other. I still didn't tell him anything."

Voldemort let out an irritated snort. "Are you with him now?"

"He's somewhere in the hotel... if he hasn't snuck out. I wouldn't know. He took my wand."

And that was a good old-fashioned sulk right there, and he threw in a shoe scuffing for effect. As he was looking down he noticed the diagram had shifted some more, and had warped so that its center was starting to edge towards his feet. He took a step back and watched as it slowly changed directions.

"Weird. What's it do?"

"Hold still and you'll find out," the Dark Lord suggested. "Has he told you anything about me?"

"Not really. You've made a lot of people miserable, but I knew that already."

"Ha ha."

"I want to come back." He stated, seemingly out of nowhere, but it was the only thing he had really wanted to say since he saw the Dark Lord. The rising humor drained away, leaving the dark wizard expressionless once again.

"Then you shouldn't have run away."

"I didn't. Viktor kidnapped me."

Voldemort snorted derisively.

"Alright, so I let him kidnap me," Harry admitted. "You would have killed me though if I had stayed."

"I still might."

"I really am sorry."

"I really don't care."

They fell silent, Harry staring up into his former mentor's blood red eyes and Voldemort staring into his verdant green, communicating in a look what they had already said in words and just a little bit more.

Suddenly, Voldemort pulled back and turned away.

"You may return," he said, stunning Harry to the core and filling him with unrealized hope, "On one condition."

"What? Please, I'll do anything."

The Dark Lord turned back to him, his mouth twisted into a cruel smirk.

"Hold still."

Below him the eye of the diagram finally shifted to directly beneath his feet, and magic welled up beneath him. He felt his magic twist inside him and the diagram pull at it sharply, as if to tear it away. His cry was more from surprise than pain, but pain quickly followed when he tried to jump away and he felt something tear. He screamed and fell, and the earth rose up to swallow him...

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry bolted upright in his bed, drenched in sweat and shivering. What had happened? Not a dream. He knew dreams, nightmares in particular, and that hadn't been either. Voldemort had been there and they talked and argued and he had, somehow, been bespelled.

He didn't need the blood and dirt covering his feet staining his blankets to tell him that.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort withdrew from the dream scape and awoke in his body, sitting at his desk where his minions had left him hours before. Nagini still dozed in his lap, content to remain in his company as long as he allowed it. He opened his hand, in which he had held the diagram from his dream. Where the diagram had been now read an address.

He smiled grimly down at it.

“Gotcha.”

Book V:

Chapter 3: Legends

Harry took a bath in one of the guest rooms that morning, rather than his usual shower, hoping the hot water would ease the ache in his feet. There were cuts on him, in a spiraling arch that matched the diagram he had seen in his dream, and though they weren't deep they ached to the bone. His own magic felt drained, as if he had been casting powerful magic, and he was already tired from lack of sleep.

He laid in the footed bathtub, stared up and out the little window, watching clouds and birds amble by in the slowly brightening sky, and tried to think of what he should do as the water slowly began to cool. There was no telling what the spell in his dream did exactly, or if he wasn't even now suffering under the slow debilitating effects of a curse. The Dark Lord had said he could come home now... but at what price? And in what condition? He needed to be examined, but what if in doing so he ruined his only chance of returning?

And what if Voldemort lied and was really killing him? Or intended to torture and kill him when he got back? The man hadn't been happy with him in his dream, and some how he doubted the waking world made him any more amenable.

Reluctantly, he climbed out of the tub and got ready to face Dumbledore. He would have to tell the old man about what had happened, if for no other reason than he might be risking the life of a man who had shown him nothing but kindness. Mutual respect and trust, wasn't that what he had said? Even if it wasn't easy, Harry knew he had to make an effort too.

He had nothing to bind up his feet with, so he wore his thickest and softest pair of socks and carried his shoes in his hands. He kept Draco's knife in the back of his pants, but the rest of his belongings remained shrunken and carefully stored in the satchel Fleur had transfigured for him. Carrying all of his possessions in his pockets for the entire summer just wasn't that practical, but he still didn't entirely trust Dumbledore. He was actually planing on hiding the satchel somewhere he could get to quickly if he needed to make an abrupt escape. If. So far there hadn't been any reason to be afraid, but then he had been there less than a day.

Gingerly, he made his way downstairs, hoping to find the wizard in his office. His feet ached, but there wasn't as much pain as he thought there should be. He was only to the second floor when the sounds of an argument reached him. At first, he thought it was just another fight between Dumbledore and one of his cohorts, but as he noiselessly inched further down to listen, he recognized the voice of Minister Seibligg. He froze, his eyes widening. What was he doing here?

"Auf gar keinen Fall! " the Minister snarled, "Why would I ever authorize that?"

Dumbledore replied, his tone remaining congenial, but there was a touch of mocking in it, "I did not request your 'authorization', Minister. I was merely informing you of the situation so that you would not be alarmed."

"Don't give me that! Potter is still under my jurisdiction-"

"But he is under my guardianship, and seeing as I will be leaving the country for a while it's only natural that he should accompany me. Really there is nothing for you to be kicking up such a fuss about. It will be safer for Mr. Potter abroad in any event."

"Safer? That has absolutely nothing to do with this! I don't care about his safety, I care about what he knows! What you promised he would tell you!"

Harry recoiled. It had been a trick? The kindness, the liberties, and all that talk about respect and trust? He had thought it too good to be true, but he couldn't help but feel both surprised and betrayed to have his suspicions confirmed.

"I never promised you anything of the sort," Dumbledore said, his tone darkening. "I said I would ask if he ever felt he could entrust it with me, and not a moment before."

Now he felt uncertain. Yet again. He shoved his confusion away to listen further, deciding to withhold judgment for the moment.

“Don't play that game with me! The only reason I let you have custody of that brat was because I know what a manipulative old coot you can be. If you try to back out now, I can just as easily take him back.”

There was an amused chuckle, and Harry wondered yet again about the old wizard's sanity.

“Just as easily? Minister Seibligg, I do believe its Sunday, which means you'll have to wait till Monday to submit a complaint about my guardianship, which even with your political clout will take a week to investigate and take to court, by which time my own lawyers will submit a counter claim and delay it for another month. By then your deadline will be up, and you'll be far too busy trying to save your own skin to worry about where Mr. Potter and I are.”

There was a silence, tense and ugly. The kind Harry associated with anger.

“Do not underestimate me, Dumbledore. I'm a man on the edge, with more than power in my left pocket than all your allies across Europe put together. You can not win.”

“Good day, Minister.”

Heavy footsteps and the slamming of a door indicated that the wretched man had left and he felt relieved, but at the same time uneasy. Now what? He couldn't honestly tell what Seibligg would do, but Harry suspected it wouldn't involve any legal action by the ministry. Plus, he still had the old wizard to deal with.

“You may come down now, Mr. Potter.”

And how did that man do that? He slipped back on his shoes, gritting his teeth as he did so, and descended the rest of the way down the stairs. What he saw when he reached the bottom made him blink in disbelief. Dumbledore stood there, not in his usual gaudy robe and hat, but in a respectable three-piece tweed suit with matching dark brown hat. He looked like a perfectly average muggle grandfather, even with the ridiculously long beard.

"Sir," he said, trying not gawk, "Is everything alright?"

"Quite. It would seem that we may have to move on quicker than I had previously intended. However, there is an errand I hope you would like to accompany me on. Stretch our legs, do a bit of sightseeing and all that."

Harry frowned. Was he really going to ignore the conversation they both knew he had overheard? "Yes, sir."

"Good, good. I hope you are well rested. It's a bit of a jaunt I'm afraid."

Frankly, Harry was exhausted, but he wanted to go out. He hadn't been in the warm sunshine in months. But he also had to tell him about his dream and the spell... which he didn't want to do at the moment. Seibligg's visit left him edgy and paranoid, and though Dumbledore hadn't betrayed him, he still felt leery about telling him. What would he do if he found out? They were leaving soon, so the chances of Voldemort finding him so quickly were slim, but what if he were ill? He didn't feel sick, at least not any sicker than would be expected, but hadn't that medi-witch in Durmstrang said curses could hurt you without inflicting pain? Of course, a curse without pain just didn't strike him as Voldemort's style.

Not yet, he decided. I'll tell him once we get where we're going, then I can still have a day outside.

"Yeah. That sounds great."

"Excellent. Lets have breakfast and then we'll be off."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Yes, I understand. I want payment upfront. After that, I don't care,” Stephen Canis said sharply into the phone, his East London accent creeping into his voice. He pulled the phone from his ear as the man on the other end proceeded to shout into it. “And for heaven's sake stop shouting! I can hear you just fine if you talk like I'm in the room.”

He looked over at his wife and three children at the kitchen table, and rolled his eyes and mouthed the word 'wizards'. Sylvia gave him a warning look, but the children giggled into their cereal bowls. The voice on the other end quieted a bit.

“Yes, I can do that. Two days probably, if I can get him today. Any more than that and you'll know something went wrong...” He listened to the reply, then smiled darkly. “With all due respect, sir, if I'm caught there's not going to much left of me for you or anyone else to do any of that. What is the address?”

There was a pen and paper on the table, which he snatched up and began writing. He repeated the address back to the phone, then nodded to himself. “Good. I'll see you in a few days then.”

He hung up the phone without waiting for a reply, and turned to his family. The children looked curious, but his wife only looked worried. She was always worried though.

“I don't like this, Stephen,” she said bluntly. “This is an ugly business you're getting us mixed up in.”

“This 'ugly business' is going to give us a future out of this slum, Sylvia. We deserve better than this,” he gestured around their 'home', a three room hovel with rotting wallpaper and rotting furniture and rotting clothes strewn about. “Our children deserve better.”

“And what if you're caught? What will happen to us then? And even if we do succeed, how do you know we can trust the British Court anymore than the German Ministry?”

Shaking his head, he moved into the living room, which in such a tiny apartment wasn't very far at all. He didn't even have to raise his voice.

“Just have the car and the kids ready within the hour. We're going to have to leave in a hurry.”

“Stephen-”

“No!” he snarled, and all four immediately flinched and looked down submissively. “I'm not throwing away the only opportunity we may ever have to get out of this place. Just do as I say.”

He waited, glaring at them, until each of them nodded their heads in compliance, even Sylvia who was looking increasingly distressed. He wanted to go over and hold her, to whisper reassurances to her and pet her long raven hair until at last she was convinced, but he couldn't afford dally here. His contact had said it needed to be done immediately, or the target might move again. There was no time for pacification.

Stalking out the front door, he gave a warning look to the nosy neighbor down the hall and the idiot pissing in the stairwell. God, couldn't he at least do that in the alley? There was drainage there at least. He hit the street and started loping towards the city train system. People moved out of his way and watched him cautiously as he passed. Everyone knew about him in the neighborhood. Something about him didn't sit right with the locals, and given the state of most of the residents that said something.

They thought he had killed people, and they would be correct, but no one who didn't have it coming. He had brought a sinister new meaning to 'family man' when he had moved his family there, and anyone who had so much as looked at either his wife or children the wrong way soon learned not to look again. They were all relatively safe, but 'relatively' didn't cut it for him. He wanted them somewhere they were completely safe. Somewhere with a view of trees, where neighbors were friendly, but far between, and where you could go years and never see a witch or wizard.

He wanted to move to Canada... or one of the Northern states in the U.S. at least.

They needed money though. A flight for five passengers over the Atlantic, even one way, was expensive and it still didn't solve the issue of where they would live or how. With the German ministry dogging their every move, refusing to let them work for muggles even when no respectable wizarding folk would hire them, money was hard to come by and he didn't dare risk the less than legal activities that would get them what they needed.

At least, he hadn't until today.

Kidnapping Harry Potter seemed a good way to get a lot of money quickly while simultaneously giving the German government the finger.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"It might not look like much," the landlady admitted, showing McGunny around the one room apartment. It wasn't even very big for a studio. "But it's better than the dorms. Quiet neighbors. Walking distance to the University and the grocery store."

The new graduate took in the skylight, which effectively lit the entire room, showing off faded paint and creaky floor boards. It was clean though, and private. This was the tallest building for several blocks, and he had the highest floor.

"Any trouble with vermin?" he asked offhandedly.

"Absolutely not!" she said, genuinely indignant. "I run a respectable establishment, young man."

"I just had to ask... Would you mind giving me a moment to look around myself?"

She gave him an uncertain look, but finally shrugged. It wasn't like there was anything there for him to steal. "Alrighty, I'll be in my office when you're done."

She left, and once he was alone, he addressed his companion. "What do you think?"

"It's perfect. Just what we need," Tom said, pleased with their latest find. After six other places, McGunny was glad. Disembodied spirits might not get tired, but he certainly did.

"It's awfully small."

"There are ways around that."

"I doubt the landlady is going to want some kid right out of school doing any sort of magical renovation in her place."

"I doubt the landlady is going to want some kid right out of school growing a body in the middle of the room either."

"Point taken."

"Don't worry. I'll put everything back just the way I found it after I'm done. No one need ever know I was here."

"I don't suppose you could oblivate me before you go so we could say the same about me?" he suggested hopefully, because really it was the only conceivable way he thought the spirit might let him live.

"Why, Horace, I'm hurt. Do you really want to erase all the good times we've shared?"

He rolled his eyes. There was no way he'd indulge a statement that asinine. From the back of his mind, he could hear Tom chuckle grimly. For a murderous little fiend, Tom really was oddly jovial.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The morning was cool, so Dumbledore sent him back to his room for something warmer. By the time he reached his room, found a jumper (not Mrs. Weasley's, bless her heart), and returned, someone else had arrived. No, wait. He blinked once, then twice. There were three, shrouded in plain dark blue robes and listening as Dumbledore spoke to them softly. He hesitated on the stairs, and they all turned to him. It was rather creepy to discover he could not see their faces under their hoods.

"Ah, and here he is," Dumbledore said, smiling pleasantly as if he hadn't just pulled Dementor impersonators out of thin air. "Mr. Potter, these are some of my associates, who for reasons you overheard yesterday, shall remain anonymous."

"A pleasure not to meet you," Harry said blandly, cautiously coming down the rest of the stairs and into the lobby. His eyes automatically flitted to the mail slots behind the reception desk, easily spotting his wand. It was only a few feet away, but it may as well have been in Australia for all the good it did him. Turning back to the others, he could see the hooded figures still watching him tensely. He wondered what they thought he was going to do.

"While we're out and about, they will be here packing up and moving our things to another location. One that Minister Seibligg will have little more difficulty locating."

Two of the hooded figures moved, probably to do just as he said. The third one, however, lingered. Harry noted the third had smaller feet and nicer boots. A woman?

"Where to?"

"Greece."

Harry blinked. Greece? What the hell was in Greece? Yet as he thought about it, it didn't seem like a bad place to go. No one would think to look for him there, and it was probably an interesting country... except he didn't know even a smidgen of Greek. He thought about asking where in Greece, but Athens was the only city he had ever heard of and he didn't even now where exactly that was.

"Oh..."

"Shall we be going then?"

“Yeah.”

He followed Dumbledore to the door, and to his consternation the third hooded figure followed. He was so busy staring at the faceless entity that he missed exactly how the old wizard opened the door, and cursed himself for his carelessness. It probably didn't matter anyway. If the others were working on moving them out, they would probably be gone before he had opportunity to try the door himself.

The street was cast in early morning shadows, even as the sky was bright blue, the higher buildings facing East practically glowed where the sunlight touched them. The morning was deliciously cool, and there were people walking around them and the occasional car tottled by the one way street.

“Not to be a spoilsport,” Harry said, as they stepped out onto the sidewalk. “But your 'friend' is kind of conspicuous.”

A man and woman, each with a corgi leashed to them, smiled as they passed. Dumbledore tipped his hat and wished them a good morning in German. Harry turned to watch as they sidestepped the hooded figure without pausing, or even seeming to realize that there was anything there at all.

“No worries, Mr. Potter,” the old wizard assured him, “The cloaks are spelled for misdirection. Muggles will not notice them, and even a wizard would have some difficulty keeping track of them. In fact, I am rather impressed that you seemed to be able to spot our friend so consistently. It suggests a very deep, instinctual understanding of magic.”

So that was why he had trouble counting them when he had first seen them, Harry realized. Now however, he was able to spot her (he was increasingly convinced it was a woman once he had seen it start walking) without any difficulty. He turned back to Dumbledore.

“You can do it too, though, can't you? Like that night in the trophy room. You couldn't have seen me, but you knew exactly where I was.”

The old wizard smiled, but it was sad sort of smile, regretful perhaps. He turned around to address their follower.

"Would you mind giving us just a bit of privacy?"

She hesitated, but finally tilted her head in acknowledgment.

"Thank you." They continued on a ways and when she was about thirty feet away, he continued. "I dare say our magical educations were not that different, Mr. Potter, although mine was likely far more self directed than yours. The Old Magics leave their mark on us, and even decades later, those reckless choices I made in my youth still effect me, as they will you."

Harry stared at him, barely able to believe what he had just heard. Dumbledore, the Dark Lord's sworn enemy and leader of the Foreign Resistance, was a pagan? It was both absurd, and yet appropriate. He didn't know why he hadn't thought of it sooner. How else could he have stood up against Voldemort if he hadn't understood his power, and more importantly how to counter act it? Modern magics were strong, but they weren't as strong as the Old Magics, and certainly not as terrifying.

"How?" he found himself asking. "How did you come into it?"

"Likely the very same way Voldemort did. Through curiosity and ambition and the belief that there was something more than what my professors taught out of Ministry regulated school books. And of course, there was my incredible arrogance. I couldn't accept that my magic, my skill, should be remanded to the same level as everyone else's. I believed myself far too special to accept that."

They walked on in silence to the end of the block, not speaking. Harry sensed that the old wizard wasn't done, but he needed time to collect himself.

"When I was still a student at Hogwarts, a young man came to my village to stay with his aunt, a close neighbor of mine. In him, I found another seemingly as gifted and dissatisfied as myself. His name was Gellert Grindelwald, and he was first person I ever fell in love with. Together we searched for the true limits of magic and ourselves, and destroyed far more than we created in the process.”

If the first revelation hadn't stunned him speechless, this second one certainly did. Everyone knew about Grindelwald, and everyone knew that Dumbledore had defeated him. He could recall one of Toure's lectures, her voice softened by the odd euphoria that seemed to come over her when she talked of Dark Lords.

“Grindelwald turned the world on its head. No one had done the sort of magics he did, not for hundreds of years at least, and he was so very young! Officially, his reign of terror didn't start until he was twenty, but others believe it truly began with his expulsion from Durmstrang at the age of sixteen for cursing a teacher. He was exiled to England by his family, but while there he developed and solidified his ideology, returning two years later to gather followers. The irony here is that his eventual destroyer was in fact also his next door neighbor while in England. It has been a matter of some speculation as to whether Dumbledore and Grindelwald ever spoke to one another prior to their fateful battle. Considering their styles of magic, I myself wouldn't be surprised if they hadn't done more than just discussed the weather.”

So Toure had been right. They had been friends, fellow explorers, lovers? And then it had all come apart. They had tried to destroy each other, until at last one was imprisoned and the other carried around their history together as a shameful secret.

He felt suddenly lightheaded. Was that going to happen to him and Voldemort? Had it happened already? Had this been the inevitable outcome from the beginning? Why the hell was the old wizard telling him all this anyway?

“Those days were the most exciting and joyous days of my life, but ultimately they gave me my deepest regrets and sorrows, as well. I fear, my boy, that you are following the same path I did, and to add to that tragedy, it's not even your own arrogance or ambition that lead you there. Ah, here we are.”

They had stopped in front of a small shop, bouquets of exploding floral packed the window display, handsomely displayed in the dark green painted frame. A sign hung over the door, reading 'Fridas Blumenladen'. Still reeling, he followed Dumbledore blindly into the shop.

The woman at the counter greeted him by name, and he said something in return that made her giggle like a school girl. Harry couldn't concentrate on what was said, and was more than a little surprised when he was handed two bouquets. They were large, with dozens of different flowers, all in their own unique colors. He looked at the old wizard questioningly, but he just held open the door for him. Once out on the street Dumbledore continued.

"I told you before that I wish to save you, and I meant what I said. You are a remarkable young man, as I am sure you have been told before, but these gifts you have can lead you to many places, just as they did myself, and Gellert, and Tom Marvolo Riddle, whom you call Lord Voldemort."

"What? No wait, stop talking. You're talking too much. I mean saying too much. Why are you telling me all of this?"

Dumbledore turned to him, his blue eyes twinkly but it wasn't with mischief or amusement or whatever it normally twinkled with, it was grief and hope and perhaps a little bit of amazement.

"Because I made the mistake of holding back information before, and it has gotten people killed. I feel I must tell you now. Life has taught me that there may not always be a 'next time' or a 'later'. The world is moving ahead without asking us for directions first, and lately it's been going faster than I can make predictions for."

"Okay... then what's with the flowers?"

"Well, it's polite to bring something when visiting people you haven't met in a while."

"Who are we visiting?"

“You'll see. Now where were we?”

So much for not withholding information, Harry groused mentally.

“Tom Marvolo Riddle is Voldemort... is that really his name?” He couldn't help but ask. Tom Marvolo Riddle sounded kind of like a dork, or at the very least nothing like a Dark Lord. At the same time, he just realized he had never heard of Voldemort's first name. Did he even have one? It would have made school kind of weird if he didn't. It was sort of hard to picture someone like McGonagall calling on 'Mister' Voldemort in class or the Dark Lord casting Jelly-Legs on unwary first years. He tried to picture a 'young' Voldemort, or rather Tom Riddle, but he just ended up thinking of Thomas Rook instead oddly enough.

“It really is. I had the rather dubious honor of being one of his teacher.”

Harry tried to picture that, but quickly stopped before his imagination slipped any further down the rabbit hole.

“... What was he like?”

“Charming, clever, motivated. The ideal Slytherin... and then some. He was a murderer before he ever graduated.”

“Myrtle...” Harry breathed, because he had suspected it long ago, but didn't dare linger on the idea. Dumbledore gave him a grave look and nodded.

“Yes, she was his first. I still don't know if she was an accident or an experiment, but once he had killed her and successfully blamed another, he knew he had the ability to get away with it and tried it again when was sixteen. I didn't discover the second murder until years after he had graduated, and by then it was too late. He was already terrorizing the country.”

Harry was having a hard time picturing Voldemort intentionally killing Myrtle. Cursing her, sure, but murdering her? It was easier to picture him killing her accidentally... and then just not really caring that he had.

“Ah, but I've gotten a little ahead of myself. Lets sit here. The bus should be along shortly.”

They took a seat inside the rain shelter, which was thankfully empty.

“Where was I before we were distracted?”

Harry shrugged, honestly unable to tell where one mind blowing revelation ended and another began.

“Hhmmm... oh, yes, wanting to save you-”

“Did you ever try to save him?” Harry butted in, because that was important. There had been something wrong with Voldemort from the beginning, and it seemed fairly obvious too. Someone should have done something long before Harry had to toss him a soul and get caught up in this international mess.

Dumbledore closed his eyes, as if pained, but answered, “Yes.”

“How?”

There was a moment of silence as the old wizard gathered his memory, and tied back his grief.

“I tried twice. The first time... I knew from the moment I met him that something was wrong. He had such hate in him, and it had manifested in hurting other children and animals with accidental magic. He was being brought up in a muggle orphanage and had no idea that he was wizard, but he knew he was different and so did everyone else. He was completely alone in the world. I was sent to give him his Hogwarts letter, and while I was there I explained what he was and warned him of the consequences of hurting others with magic. I had hoped, naively, that by explaining things to him and offering him a place where he could be among his own kind, his frustration and resentment would dissipate. I was very wrong.”

Harry was still having a hard time imagining Voldemort as anything other than his current self. Strong, confident, merciless but not cruel for cruelty's sake. An angry juvenile delinquent just wasn't clicking. A juvenile Voldemort of any kind was hard to imagine in general.

"The second time... I took him to someone else."

"Someone else?"

"Yes. By his third year I could sense that he was delving into the old pagan magics, but he refused to speak to me of it. He did not trust me and feared, rightly, that I would try and hold back his progress. I had abandoned the pagan arts myself, unable to trust myself not to be corrupted by them, so I had no right to direct the course of study he wished to pursue. So I thought I would take him to someone who had done it right. A druid priest named Cyril Carrigan."

A chill ran down his spine. He knew that name. He just couldn't remember where.

"I had actually met Carrigan with Gellert on a weekend romp through the highlands. We thought ourselves so clever and knowledgeable, we decided to try summoning a god. We made a mistake. Actually we made nothing but mistakes, which Carrigan pointed out in vivid detail after he came out of no where and saved our fool necks. He gave us quite a scare, swore if we ever stepped foot in Ireland again he'd tear out our souls and shove them in the nearest donkeys he could find. Said if we wanted to act like asses he would grant our wish. Naturally, being well educated young men of high society, we had a good laugh about it when we got back to England and wrote him off as a backwater yokel. Of course, Gellert never did go back. An endless well of power lies there, but he never dared return to tap into it."

"Was Carrigan really so powerful?"

"His magic wasn't incredible, nothing like Gellert's or Tom's, but his...influence with the higher ups' wasn't anything to sneeze at. He could ask for pears from apple trees or for rivers to run North, and they would do it. So they say."

“So you thought he could scare Vold- Tom back to the straight and narrow?”

Dumbledore smiled a bit at that. “In a sense. I was actually hoping Carrigan would be the sort of role model Tom needed. Someone strong and experienced, with the power to reel the boy in when he did wrong and the knowledge that even that stubborn child would feel compelled to acknowledge.”

“But it didn't work?”

“Quite the contrary, it worked better than I ever could have imagined. They hit it off immediately. Carrigan took Tom in as a student for his fifth year summer and corresponded regularly with him during his sixth year at Hogwarts, and I never saw him more contented. I won't say he was any nicer or less arrogant, but his hatred seemed to have subsided. Carrigan had offered him the understanding that I couldn't, and held the keys to a world he desperately wanted to be a part of. I think he must have felt the same way for that man that I felt for Gellert. He was the first and last person Tom ever came close to loving.”

The slow screech of brakes startled Harry. He had been so captivated by Dumbledore's story that he hadn't realized the bus was coming until it stopped right in front of them. A few people got off, and they climbed on. They went to the very back of the bus to continue their conversation.

“So what happened?”

“The Earth had other plans for him. Plans I could not change and Carrigan could not challenge. The summer before his seventh year, Tom discovered the name of the man who left him an orphan, and all the rage and anger he had forgotten, came back with a vengeance.”

“And he was the second person Tom killed?”

“Yes, but not the last. Even after his revenge, he remained unsatisfied with his world. Carrigan could do nothing to reign in his anger, and ultimately had to settle for teaching him control. Control of his magic at least, which may have saved Tom himself but ultimately damned many others. I foolishly thought the renewed aggravation was nothing more serious than a lover's quarrel or an argument between a father and son. I hadn't learned of the second murder, and still had no proof of the first. In any event, I was too busy with my battles against Grindelwald to worry about any future battles I might have with Tom. When graduation came, I let him go, having no idea what exactly I had unleashed onto the world."

"But Carrigan knew? Why didn't he tell you?"

"Why should he? I had shoved Tom off on to him, and washed my hands of responsibility. He did not trust me, and perhaps more importantly, he still cared for Tom. The same way you find yourself compelled to care for him, even when you've seen and experienced his cruelty first hand. I never understood it then, but I think I have an idea of it now."

Harry looked away, staring at his hands and then out the window. They remained quiet for a long time, and after a few minutes, Harry began to recognize some of the buildings outside his window.

"That's the Hohenzollernbrücke and the Cologne Cathedral and St. Martin Church! We're in Cologne?"

"Indeed we are, and a delightful city it is too. They make wonderful pickles here."

This was very true, but completely beside the point.

"Where are we going?"

He turned back to Dumbledore, who smiled a bit.

"I believe I read in a newspaper somewhere that you said if you ever came back to Germany, you would like to pay your respects to your parents and lay flowers on their graves. I myself am long overdue for a visit."

Harry was struck speechless. He had wanted to visit his parents' grave, but once he had arrived in Germany, it felt as if he were further from that possibility than ever before. It also occurred to him that Dumbledore may have chosen this city as his newest hiding place specifically so he would have this opportunity.

"I... thank you."

"No thanks is necessary. It was the least I could do. I fought along side your parents during the war. Their bravery and selflessness was an inspiration to us all."

Harry opened his mouth to ask Dumbledore about them, but then remembered they were talking about something more important. He knew his parents far better than he knew Voldemort, and it was Voldemort he had to worry about.

"What happened to Carrigan?"

"Not a great deal. He still kept in touch with his wayward pupil, tried to convince him to calm down and not behave like such a bigoted loon. I would say his success was limited, but the fact that Voldemort never killed him suggests something of their bond still remained through the years. Somewhere in between his arguments with Voldemort, he finished his own training and became a druidic priest and took on other students. Professor Brennan was amongst them."

Harry nodded.

"When the eighties rolled around, things got really ugly. Carrigan went out to meet Voldemort one night, no doubt to try to talk some sense back into him again, but was killed by an overzealous young Death Eater. Carrigan's body was peacefully surrendered to his clan for proper rites, but they only ever found pieces of young Ms. Nominy.'

'It was a bad time for the Druids after that. Carrigan had been their unspoken leader and barrier between his people and the war, but with his death the Ministry proceeded to persecute them as dark wizards and Voldemort refused to help them without their sworn allegiance, which they wouldn't give. The Ministry in Ireland was the first to fall, not from Death Eaters, but from regular witches and wizards enraged by yet another unwarranted attack on their people. In Ireland the druids are as much an important profession as they are a religious sect. They are the only effective defenders the people have against the fae, a far more insidious threat than any Dark Lord."

Harry remembered that from history class, and suddenly he thought he knew where he had heard of Carrigan. They called him Carrigan the Mediator before his death... or was it afterwards? His death had sparked a powder keg of violence in any event. Hundreds of druidic priests and priestesses had been arrested and dozens died in raids or in prison, and in their absence the faery folk had run amok amongst the commonwealth. People were disappearing left and right and no one knew if they should blame Death Eaters or Fae or the government itself. In the climate of fear and frustration, the people had snapped one late September night and burned the Ministry offices to the ground and attacked their own officials, hunting them and their families down in search of retribution for their own missing loved ones. It had only taken a few weeks after that for Voldemort and his soldiers to regain control of the country, and then use the resources he found there to continue his attacks on Britain. Yet another incident where the British Ministry had shot itself in the foot.

"... Is that why he took me in?" Harry said after a while. "I mean, he's been watching out for me since first year... sort of... after the whole torture in front the entire student body thing... Does he want me to replace Carrigan?"

"That is hard to say. I doubt that's a conscious decision on his part. Carrigan was stronger than Voldemort in many ways, unacceptably weak in others, and only the Dark Lord's gratitude and respect kept him from ever raising a hand against his mentor. I don't see him intentionally duplicating that sort of relationship. However, the desire for a companion would not be unreasonable. The desire for a son is also possible, as I doubt he is capable of siring any children of his own anymore."

The first idea sat better with Harry than the second. He had never considered Voldemort as any sort of father, and certainly hadn't been treated like a son, at least he didn't think he had. How did Dark Lords treat their offspring?

"I don't think there's anything you can do," Harry said, looking back towards the front of the bus. Their body guard was sitting directly behind the bus driver, going completely unnoticed by the driver or the old woman sitting next to her, or the teenagers sharing ear pieces to their cd player directly across from them. "He messed me up already. My soul belongs to the Earth. I am a Child of the Moon and Madris is my patron goddess. It can't be undone, and I can't even bring myself to resent him for it."

Dumbledore nodded. "I thought as much. That is not what really worries me. You are not like Tom or Gellert or myself. You are more like Carrigan, and like your mother. If I can keep you from the Dark Lord, I believe you can grow up to be a perfectly self sufficient and morally upright individual, and given your impressive displays of magic, you could easily surpass Carrigan in say... fifty or so years."

".... swell."

"I think the next stop is the one we want."

The bus rolled to a stop and they climbed off. It was another six blocks taken in silence, as Harry tried to process everything that he had been told, and what it might mean for him and his future. He had learned more in the last half hour than he did in the last five years about the Dark Lord, but as things were going he may never be able to ask him all of this himself. Tightly packed rows of three story houses all painted different colors of the same shade, passed by unnoticed as he tried to puzzle it all out. Would he be on the run forever just like Dumbledore? Moving from safe house to safe house, city to city, country to country? And to what end?

He tried to picture himself doing what Dumbledore did, running charities for people he would likely never meet, endlessly fighting against the injustices of the world from behind a desk. He couldn't do that. He'd end up hanging himself or jumping off a bridge within a year from depression.

Perhaps he could set up a new identity for himself. It couldn't be that hard with all the spells and potions out there, disappear as one of the thousands British refugees wandering Europe.

Maybe he just needed to do what neither Carrigan or Dumbledore could accomplish, and just kill the murderous bastard. He shivered at the thought, feeling distinctly unclean for thinking it, and shoved it aside. It appeared he was too much like Voldemort's faceless mentor, picking up the torch where the other had dropped it, endlessly loyal until the day he died. How pathetic was that?

The row of houses curved upwards until they opened onto a T-section in the street. Beyond that was the cemetery. A high grated fence mounted on a low brick wall ran the length of the street, separating the living from the dead. Rows of tombstones and mausoleums were packed tightly together, not unlike the houses on the other side.

Without the buildings surrounding it, the cemetery already had full sunlight, and was oddly cheery in the summer light. The stones were clean, the flowers by some of the graves no more than a day or two old, and the occasional oak tree did a lot to give the place an open park-like feel.

Harry didn't need to follow Dumbledore to know where to go from there. He remembered it perfectly even seven years later. The gravestones were simple black marble, like dozens of others, but he remembered the angel statues on the graves nearby. He remembered having dreams about them after the funeral, showing up in strange places, haunting him like benevolent specters of death.

He stopped midway up a shallow hill, and found his parents laying side by side. He knelt down between them, placing the flowers on each of their graves, and listened. He wasn't sure what he expected to hear, but all he got was the sound of the wind and the occasional passing car on the street below. This was a place he thought he might be able to commune with his parents, to sense them or even hear them, but it felt like nothing more than a plot of grass. His mother's gentle eyes and his father's laughing mouth did not come to mind, no words they spoke to him, or gestures of comfort came. Of all the travels and destinations in their lives together, this one was the emptiest.

His parents were not here, not in any way that had meaning to him. They hadn't been with him since the last morning they sent him off to school, and the last time he saw them was as the funeral director gently closed the coffin lids over their sleeping countenance. There would be no more memories of them after that.

There would be no more walks to the grocery store with his mum, no more football matches in front of the telly with his dad, plans made around the breakfast table, or weekend adventures out in the country. He would never hear them say 'wake up', 'goodnight', 'look there', 'come here', 'I'm proud of you', 'you know better', 'I missed you', or 'I love you' again. He would never get to ask him those questions that dogged him from the moment he learned that they too had been wizards but had kept it hidden. They were gone, and all that was left of them were his memories and two stone markers bearing their names.

His vision began to blur, but the tears didn't fall. He had wept for their loss when he had was eight, enough tears he thought he would drown in them, until he just didn't have enough left to spare. He had to keep the rest for later, for when others that he loved died and passed away, as he had come to accept while alone in the third bedroom at Privet Drive.

"They're not here," he said, not looking away from their names. "They're gone, and I won't ever get to see them again. Not even when I die."

"The world is not so black and white," Dumbledore said, coming up behind him to place a hand on his shoulder. "Not in life and most certainly not in death. You may yet see them again. You may have already seen them and just never realized it."

"You're just trying to make me feel better," Harry accused, glaring over his shoulder. The old wizard pretended to be affronted.

“Me? Comfort someone? Just what sort of wizard do you take me for?”

Harry's lip twitched a bit and he looked away, shaking his head. “It's okay. I knew what I was giving up when I gave myself to the Old Magics, and I don't regret it. It saved a life and gave me a family among the living.”

“Really? And who are the lucky people?”

“Sirius Blackbone and Remus Slivermoon. I think they worked for you too. They're werewolves now.”

There was a moment of silence then Dumbledore gave a little laugh. “I had nearly forgotten. It's been so many years, I wasn't sure if they had lived or died after their transformation. Yet another reason why one should never attempt to make predictions for the future. I do have to wonder what Sirius is like now. He always had a lovable mongrel air about him in his school days.”

Harry felt a little of his grief subside, as it often did when he thought of his godfathers. He had loved his parents, and still did, probably more than he ever would anyone, but he loved his godfathers too and more than that he felt proud of them. They were strong and brave, and had been willing to die for him. More importantly, they had lived for him, and now they shared with him a fate in life and in death that comforted him more than any optimistic foretellings of the future or well meaning patronizations ever could.

“He's going to be head alpha one day,” Harry said. “And Remus is his beta. They saved me from Moody. Didn't you know that?”

“No. I saw no pictures of your guardians in the papers and they were only ever listed as Blackbone and Slivermoon, names I had never heard used on them when I was still in their company.”

“Oh,” he said, and looked back towards the tombstones, the sadness ebbing away. “Dad would have approved of them looking out for me, I think, seeing as how they're my godfathers already. I don't know about mum though. I think Sirius would have driven her crazy.”

"No doubt. Of course, both your father and Mr. Black drove your mother crazy, particularly back in their school days. In fact, Lily didn't liked James at all until their seventh year."

"I didn't know that."

"Indeed? And your father loved your mother at first sight. It made for some very interesting hallway drama."

"So you were still Headmaster when my parents were in school?"

"Yes, as well as your godfathers and good many of your current teachers. For instance, your guardian, Professor Snape, was in the same year as your parents. I dare say he was at the crux of your parents differences."

Harry had heard from this from his godfathers, but it was always to strange to hear. His mother and Snape as friends? Weird. Inconceivable even. Plus the man had never said anything or indicated Harry's parents mattered to him in anyway.

"... He never said anything."

Dumbledore smiled a bit sadly. "Severus has always kept his feelings closely guarded. That was true as a child and still holds true-

The old wizard's suddenly stopped, his mouth tightening into a grim line as his eyes focused on something beyond Harry's head. Confused, Harry turned to see what he was looking at. Some distance away, standing beside a mausoleum was a hooded figure. At first, Harry thought it was just their follower, but soon realized the truth. The figure was shrouded in black, not blue, and from within in the hood he could clearly make out the bone mask of a Death Eater.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. Before anyone starts shouting down hellfire on me for adding more gay couples, I feel I should clarify somethings. One, Carrigan and Voldemort were never in a romantic relationship. It wasn't all that different from what Voldemort and Harry have, except for the political maneuvering and screwing around with each other's souls. Two, Gellert and Albus' relationship was described by Rowling herself in aforementioned fashion. Whether that love was of a romantic nature or just a deep brotherly affection, I'll leave for you to decide one way or another in both cannon and my story.

Book V:

Chapter 4: Recreant Knights

Voldemort stroked Nagini's head, pondering Harry and the chances of him ever seeing him alive again. After sending the address to Morgan to handle, he was left with nothing else to do but wait and think. Being a man of action, this was more difficult than it sounded. A lot could go wrong in extracting Harry. The agent could make a mistake and kill Harry, foolishly attempt to fight Dumbledore directly and fail, or Harry may have told the old coot about the dream and they may have left before the agent even arrived. Even if Harry was recovered, there was still the journey back to Britain to consider.

Germany's and Britain's border's were closed to magical transportation. They would have to rely on muggle transportation, and that was a treacherous route to take for entirely different reasons. The German ministry would send out its Aurors if they knew what happened, and again either the agent or Harry could be killed in their pursuit. If his protégé were unwilling, that presented new dangers all its own. The boy was resourceful, he could find a means of escape and disappear completely.

The more he thought about it, the more it seemed likely that something was going to go wrong.

Even if it went right, he still wasn't sure what he was going to do with Harry.

Their meeting in the dream had been disconcerting. Six months of silence and an assassination attempt had done nothing to lessen the magnetism he felt for him, and he was more than a little annoyed to find himself charmed and challenged by him all over again. He had liked talking with him. He had liked arguing with him. He liked tricking him, but that was hardly unusual. He liked tricking everyone. It was just a bit funner with Harry, since he always ended up surprising him later on.

And Harry had said it was accident... the nearly killing him at least. Hadn't Brennan said the same thing? And Diana? This didn't make it forgivable. Messing around with someone else's soul was not something that could be easily overlooked.

Except that Harry had. The night of the moon ritual, he had let Voldemort change his soul forever. The boy had never held it against him, even knowing that he had done it for completely selfish reasons.

Of course, he had been giving Harry something he wanted. To save his godfather, and preserve what little family he had worth keeping. The Dark Lord most definitely didn't want a completed soul. He didn't want these weird new feelings that contradicted his reptilian logic or to be motivated by emotions he could not control. He didn't want to forgive someone who had, however unintentionally, betrayed him.

He had been thinking this for hours... no, for weeks... months? Still no conclusion could be reached about what he should do. He needed advice from a more 'divine' source. Carefully, he unwound Nagini from his body, and left her dozing in his chair. The display cases in his office, showcasing ancient and modern magical marvels alike, were ignored. Instead, he went to the liquor cabinet, but avoided actually indulging, no matter how tempting it was at the moment, and pulled from a drawer a pack of cards.

Tarot cards.

They were useless for divination as far as Voldemort was concerned, but they were a fairly effective way of asking the universe a question about the past or the present without a great deal of magical preparation. They didn't even require magical cards. In fact, the best decks had no spells on them at all.

This one was no different. It was a plain deck, worth no more than five knuts, with starkly plain pictures, not unlike a regular card set. He shuffled them for about five minutes, not looking at his hands, merely concentrating on the questions that had been plaguing him up until now.

Tarot was one of those rare crafts that any sentient being, magical or mundane, could master requiring only the ability to correctly interpret the cards and the self-discipline not to 'cheat'. Therefore, most witches and wizards refused to acknowledge it as anything other than a hoax. Voldemort saw no reason to correct people. It was just another hidden weapon few others knew how to use.

He didn't ask a question, the 'universe' would know the right answer and the right question, without his help. He flipped over the first card.

The Hierophant. Upright.*

He stared at it for a long time, sorting through its various meanings, but it all came down to two. Two perfect answers, and he didn't know if he could accept them. Even though he wanted to.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"I'm sorry," Harry blurted out, turning away from the Death Eater on the hill to Dumbledore, "I was going to tell you, but I thought we had time. I swear I thought we had more time."

The old wizard didn't look at him, instead scanning the entire graveyard. Harry followed his example, and sure enough they spotted two more Death Eaters. Their follower was nowhere in sight.

"I am afraid I have no idea what you are talking about," Dumbledore said, still keeping an eye on the threat. "But we will discuss it later, if we manage to escape the five Aurors. They certainly pulled out all the stops to bring us down."

"Aurors?" Harry did a double take, but all he saw were the bone masks.

"Yes. The Death Eaters were disbanded shortly after the war, given high ranking positions for their service, while the Sentinels took their place. Do you believe Voldemort called together five high ranking Court Officials and sent them into enemy territory for a highly risky snatch-and-grab? No, Mr. Potter, this is one of the Minister's plots. He knows I was going to take you out of his reach, and sent these men to retrieve you. Then he can blame your abduction on Voldemort. He may have come to the hotel with this very plan in mind, but hadn't counted on the wards. They had to wait until we came out into the open and weren't surrounded by muggles to attack."

Harry felt his heart beginning to race, feeling more than his life was now in danger. He looked around yet again, but could only see the three, who made no attempt at concealing themselves. Instinct drew his eyes upward, where he spotted the other two Dumbledore referred to. They hovered directly above them like vultures. Without his wand, he was almost defenseless. There were few spells he could do wandlessly, and he would only be able to do two or three before he exhausted himself, which he couldn't allow if he were going to run away. It wouldn't be enough to get passed them all. It would all be up to Dumbledore now.

"Why aren't they attacking?" he asked.

"They want to see if we'll surrender first, most likely."

"What are we going to do?"

The old wizard scanned the cemetery grimly, assessed the situation, and after a moment, touched Harry's shoulder with his free hand. The young wizard let out a slight gasp, feeling magic spread into him, warm and tingling.

"This will repel two spells, three at the most," Dumbledore said. "I am sorry I can provide you with no better protection. It will be your speed and your cunning that saves you now. Do you think you could find your way back to the hotel?"

"What? I have no idea-"

"816 Westerly Street."

Harry began to protest again, unable to remember the route they had taken, but... what other choice did he have? He'd find a way.

"But they could be waiting..."

"It's enchanted against forced entry, just like your wand in the mailbox. You'll be safe, as long as you can get inside. Once you reach the street, they won't dare use their magic in front of muggles, but you mustn't let your guard down."

"What about you?"

The old wizard's grim countenance melted away, and his twinkling eyes found his. "I assure you, Mr. Potter, I am more than adequately armed to face this threat on my own. Now, when I cast my first spell, that will trigger the others to attack. I need you to run, as fast as you can, to the gate and then keep running. Don't look back. Don't hesitate. Understand?"

Frankly, Harry didn't really understand what was happening. Too much had been revealed today, and now he was going to have to run for his life from duplicitous Ministry Aurors back to the place he had been trying to escape only yesterday? What the hell?

"Sure. Why not? It's a nice day for a run," he laughed, his voice a touch on the hysterical side.

"That's the spirit! Alright, we best take care of our friends up there first. Tacicimos!"

One of the robed figures above them suddenly jerked, smashing into his (her?) partner and knocked him from his broom. Flailing, the unseated flyer fell from his brooms to the ground below. The still mounted Auror cast some sort of spell, and regained control of his broom, only to have another spell from somewhere else knock him off. It seemed Dumbledore's blue robed follower had finally decided to show up.

Harry didn't stay to sort out where everyone was or what they were doing, he was already bolting for the gate. Two Aurors ran to head him off, and it was with more than a little concern that Harry noticed at least one of them was closer to the gate than him. Behind him he heard the sound of stones shattering, and knew Dumbledore was now fully engaged in a battle of his own.

The Death Eater reached the gate first, blocking the exit. They had not bothered to stun Harry, so they had to have known he was unarmed, and assumed him defenseless. It wasn't until the 'Death Eater' saw the boy wasn't slowing down, that he realized something was off, but it was already too late.

“Stupefy!” the Auror shouted, and Harry was too close to avoid it. It smashed into his chest, momentarily knocking the breath out of him, but ultimately bounced off him harmlessly. Harry threw out his hand, shouting one of his wandless spells.

“Expelliarmus!”

The Auror was thrown back, his wand torn from his grip, and he landed in the street. Harry dived behind a tombstone, as he heard yet another stunner being cast at him. It barely missed him. He had barely taken cover when another spell flew at him, this time a Blasting Spell.

The tombstone he was hiding behind exploded, sending him flying into the side of a plinth of a statue. Pain stabbed at him everywhere, in his head, in his back, arms, legs. For a moment, he could only lay there, too shocked to move. He couldn't believe they had actually done that. That could have killed him... it may already have.

Blood was running down his face, getting into his eyes and mouth. His glasses were gone, knocked off in the mayhem, but he didn't need to see to know there was blood on his hands or that they were shaking badly. Was anything broken? How deeply had he been cut? Was anything lodged in him? He was too afraid to move, to find something that was broken or that he had been cut deeply or that there was something still inside him.

He was still just laying there, when the Auror caught up to him. The wizard just gave him a quick once over, then grabbed hold of his arm and hauled him to his feet. New pain flared, making him cry out, but at least he now knew nothing was broken.

“Wo ist dein Zauberstab?” the man shouted, shaking him harshly, his cover instantly blown. “Where are you hiding it?”

“What?”

“Your wand, damn you?! Tell me or I'll break your arm!”

The hand on his arm tightened, revealing a strength capable of carrying out that threat. Harry hissed and grit his teeth. They thought he still had his wand? Of course they did. They had no idea about his wandless ability.

“I dropped it!” he cried.

“I just bet,” the man snarled, and threw him back onto the ground. “Stupefy!”

Again the Stunner hit him directly and again it bounced off, but Harry let himself sag and fall, partially to trick the man but mostly because he was really hurting. The Auror walked up to him, and Harry thought he would pick him up or drag him, but he moved passed him and towards the gate.

“Meier! Get out of the street before you're run over, we still have the old man to deal with! Idiot!”

Harry opened his eyes and watched the vague, blurry figure of the Auror stepping through the other side of the gate to help his comrade. As soon as he was out of sight, Harry got to his hands and knees and began searching the grass for his glasses. It was not his glasses that he found, however, but something much better.

It was Meier's wand.

He could feel the magic inside tingle as he touched it, not like his own wand, but it would work.

“Accio glasses.”

His glasses flew to his hand, and he put them on. One of the lenses was cracked, but he could now see much better than before. Turning back to Dumbledore, he could now see why the old wizard hadn't tried to help him. He had his hands full fighting off three wizards at once, while his helper was hiding somewhere, and casting spells from some hidden spot but only enough to cover his back. The two on broomsticks had apparently recovered from their fall, and were going all out. It was mesmerizing to watch. The Aurors were well trained, their attacks perfectly in sync and always varying, but Dumbledore just wouldn't fall, throwing out shields and hexes and illusions, and the follower threw the Auror's strategy into chaos. He had to tear his gaze away. He had his own battles to worry about.

Struggling to his feet, he limped towards the hedge and squeezed inside. He could already hear the two Aurors arguing, and while they were distracted he cast a spell on the iron gate closest to him. Through the iron gate, he watched for the right opportunity.

"Leave off, Shauffer," the disarmed Auror snapped, shoving the other man off as he climbed to his feet. "How was I suppose to know he was a little freak? I hit him spot on, and he barely moved. I didn't even see a wand. I mean what the hell?"

"Enough of your bullshit. Get your wand and come on. I mean if you think you can handle an unconscious teenager. I know it's challenge, but-," Shauer cooed at him mockingly.

"Shut up!"

They stepped back into the cemetery, and Harry made him move, pushing aside the now rubbery iron gate and climbing out onto the side walk. As soon as he was on the other side, he hobbled across the street, barely taking the time to check for traffic and moved as quickly as he could. The houses along the street were all connected, leaving no alleyways to hide in, and with every step he became increasingly anxious that the Aurors would come back out and see him.

What he hadn't counted on, was the kindness of strangers. No sooner than he was half way up the street, than a passing car suddenly slowed beside him. Harry turned in alarm, expecting an attack, but what he saw was a young woman, barely into her twenties staring at him with some alarm.

"Are you alright?"

"I..." he quickly looked down the street, so see if anyone was coming. The street sloped upward, meaning he should have been able to look over the fence and into the cemetery, and indeed he saw graves and trees, but no Dumbledore and no fake Death Eaters or exploded tombstones. They had spelled it so no one would notice what was happening inside... but that didn't mean they couldn't see him outside.

"Uh... no," he choked out, looking at her desperately hoping for some help. "Can you get me out of here? I don't really care where, just... not here?"

She looked surprised, and then looked back at where he had been looking. Of course, she didn't see anything.

"Did someone hurt you, honey?" she asked, then realizing he seemed to think the danger hadn't passed, opened her door. "Get in. I'll take you to the police station."

A police station wasn't where he wanted to go, but it would be better than here. He climbed into the front seat, and she pulled away from the curve. He kept checking the mirrors and looking over his shoulder, but as the cemetery faded from view and pulled into busier streets he felt himself start to relax.

Annie was the name of his rescuer, and her first order of business was to ask him what happened. He told her he was mugged and beaten up, which she seemed to think odd for the neighborhood, but didn't question. The second was to call his parents. He told her they were staying at a hotel, vacationing from Britain and all, and that he had an address but not the number or even knew where it was precisely. It took a little bit more haggling, but he managed to convince her he would rather go find his parents than a police officer, and after a brief stop at a kiosk to figure out exactly where 816 Westerly Street actually was, made their way across town.

When they finally reached the hotel, the day had warmed up and the streets were crowded. Harry felt both relieved and paranoid. Like Dumbledore said, no witch or wizard would attempt magic on him here, but that didn't mean one wasn't hidden in the crowd, invisible amongst the multitude.

"Thanks for everything," he said to Annie, who smiled and gave him a pitying look.

"You sure you don't want me to take you up?"

"No, it's okay. You've done too much already."

"Well, I hope it was enough to make up for what happened to you. I am sorry that you had to go through that on your vacation. We are all usually much more welcoming."

He smiled shakily at her. "I know. Thanks, again."

Climbing out of the car, he made a quick look around and moved as quickly as he could to the door. His primary fear was that it would be locked with magic, but the door opened and closed behind him without incident. It wasn't until he was inside, that he remembered he had never figured out exactly how to get back out. The door handle was still missing.

Likewise, he didn't see anyone around. He checked Dumbledore's office, but found it empty. So was the kitchen and the bar.

Now what?

To find an empty room, curl up and hide seemed like a wonderful idea. Wonderful, but stupid. He needed to be able to defend himself... which technically he could now. He had a wand, and it worked, but... it wasn't his wand.

So wand first.

Retrieving his wand, now that he had another wand, turned out to be absurdly easy. A few flicks and the password, Cockroach Clusters (seriously?), and he pulled his wand out of its slot without issue. Now he had two wands. How awesome was that? He stuck the spare wand in the back of his pocket with his knife, and headed for the stairs.

It felt like an eternity before he reached his room, every part of him aching, including his previously injured feet. As he made his ascent, the conversations he had just had with Dumbledore flooded his mind, the sheer volume and impact of information leaving him numb to it. As he sifted through it, he realized he had said some things he hadn't intended to tell, not even if tortured. Nothing about Madris or the Moon, and he had very nearly told the old man about the first Winter Solstice, when he had shared something beyond description with the Dark Lord, something the old man could never have experienced with Grindlewald.

Why had he said that? Why had he said anything at all?

He suddenly felt tricked, manipulated... and hated himself for it. He had sworn to himself he wouldn't fall for any of the old coot's tricks, but he had just been falling into them one after the other. Dumbledore had told him to give up his wand, yet the very next day he had been attacked and left to fend for himself. He had told Harry things, causing him to drop his guard. Who knew what he would have told him if the Auror's hadn't interrupted them.

Dumbledore had already tricked the Minister in order to gain custody of him. And for what? For Harry? Impossible. The old wizard was a politician, even his charities suggested he had strong ties with powerful witches and wizards and the people in general, and wouldn't risk making an enemy of the German Minister unless the gain outweighed the risk. What did he think he could gain from making Harry his ally? Was he really gambling on his information on Voldemort to be so valuable or was he banking on something else?

When he reached his room, he stripped out of his ruined clothes and took a shower, a torture all its own as the soap stung his wounds. The water turned pink as it flowed down the drain. He checked his wounds, and found too many for his liking, particularly on his back and shoulders which also starting to turn purple, but nothing that looked too serious. He couldn't leave them bare like he had his feet though (which had re-opened as well and ruined his socks), and used his knife to cut up strips of bedsheets and used them for bandages. He redressed in slacks and a button up shirt, nothing unusual for a muggle, but exchanged his shoes for his charmed boots and slipped his arm guards underneath his shirt. He raided his satchel for anything that might prove useful in a fight (or flight), and found the golden ring for his watch, the UnSilencing Bell, but nothing else inconspicuous enough to wear around muggles.

One of the Weasley twin's wigs, however, found a use and after charming his glasses invisible, he found himself looking... not like Harry Potter. The wig was magical, turning not only the hair on his head blond (and long), but also his eyebrows and eye lashes, and the absence of his glasses made him look older. He thought he looked rather like a college art student... which turned out to look pouncier than he would have liked.

"You ready to go then?" he asked his reflection, who regarded him unenthusiastically. "Well, tough luck. We aren't sticking around here."

He put on his satchel, ignored his trunk, and opened the window. He looked up and down the street, up at the sky above, the windows of the adjacent buildings, but saw nothing but muggles. Muggles who were going to make his escape less than conspicuous, but also ensure no one was going to swoop down out of nowhere and grab him.

He wasn't entirely sure what he was going to do after that.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"He's not in the cemetery. You sure there wasn't anyone else?" Tonks asked Dumbledore, striding towards him. The five Aurors were now unconscious, and latched together with ropes and devoid of wands. Dumbledore was quite happy to leave them there until the police showed up and arrested them for defacing the surrounding graves, and put them through an embarrassing and much deserved processing down at the muggle police station until the Ministry tracked them down and sorted things out. Depending on how vindictive he was feeling once he reached the hotel, he may or may not give a call to the local wizarding paper and tip them off to the Auror's less than righteous activities.

He had to find Harry first.

"I am quite sure I saw Harry collapsed over there, but he seems to have disappeared. Given that one of these Auror was missing their wand, I think it might not be unreasonable to assume he took the wand and ran away under his own power."

Tonks shook her head and ran a hand through her, currently black and red streaked, hair. "Great. How far do you think he got before someone else picked him up? A block? Two?"

They began to make their way out of the cemetery, and she pulled off her blue robe to reveal a light peach colored dress and white sandals. Together they looked like daughter accompanying her grandfather somewhere or other, and while she was not invisible anymore they did look inconspicuous together.

"Let us hope our young friend was resourceful and lucky enough to make it back to the hotel."

"Or that he even bothered to go back to the hotel. He may have just run off into the city and disappeared," she pointed out, extremely disgruntled over this turn of events. She hadn't wanted to take the boy out in the open to begin with, too many risk factors even without the Minister's men after them, and now they had lost him.

"A possibility," he admitted, "but I think he trusts me enough now to consider my hospitality preferable to the Ministry's or the great unknown. We should hurry though. Once Seibligg discovers his failure, he will no doubt try again before we can get out of the country."

She let out an irritated huff. "Easy for you to say, you don't have to walk the entire way in these shoes."

"Alas, my dear, the anti-apparition wards around the country are rather tedious, but you may be comforted to know your shoes are very flattering. I am quite certain any gentlemen we pass will be quite envious of me for having your company.”

She slapped him on the shoulder and rolled her eyes, but she couldn't fight off a smile completely. Their plans were falling apart like a tissue in the rain and they had gained yet another enemy, and he was flirting with her!

Only Dumbledore could be that charmingly weird.

oo
oo

Climbing five stories down a rope ladder (transfigured from his Durmstrang uniforms) was a lot more awkward than Harry had thought it would be. It didn't help that a small crowd had gathered outside the inn to watch him do it. Nevertheless, he managed to successfully descend to the side walk, and the crowd gave him a little applause for his troubles.

“What were you doing up there, kid?” someone inevitably asked.

“Er... fire drill.”

“Told you so,” another observer said to her friend.

The spectacle over, the people started to wander off, and Harry was one of them. Looking around for anyone suspicious, he hurried off down the street. His first thought was to get out of the city. This was easy enough to accomplish with the many rail systems and tourist buses. All he had to do was cast a Notice-Me-Not Charm, sneak aboard and ride the rest of the way to... anywhere. After that, he would have to figure out what he was going to do.

He walked quickly, but kept himself from running. Running was suspicious, and if wizarding spies hadn't just seen him escape out a window, he didn't want to draw their attention now. And also, he was in a significant amount of pain and exhausted already. So with a great deal of paranoia, he walked several more blocks until he was completely out of the neighborhood and in some sort of shopping center and found what he was looking for. There was a kiosk in the center of the square, and there was of course a map of the city printed on one side of it with symbols of important landmarks, including the train and subway stations and the airport and bus routes. Concentrating on his next destination (he was starting to entertain the idea of hopping on a plane to New York), he forgot to keep looking around.

He was only mildly surprised when he felt a hand on his shoulder and something sharp pointing into his back.

"Very clever, kid. I applaud you on your ingenuity. Now if you would be so kind as to hand over your wand?" the voice said in perfect English. Shakily, Harry handed over the spare wand, which the still unseen man behind him confiscated.

"Who are you?"

"Just a bloke trying to earn a living. The Dark Lord says 'hi', by the way."

Harry grimaced. Out of the pan and into the pot and then straight into the fire. Only your luck could this twisted, he lamented. The man grabbed his arm, causing Harry to grimace as pressure was placed on one of his cuts, and pulled him away from the square. Now, Harry could see the man clearly. He was medium height, in his thirties, brunette with a week's worth of stubble and hard eyes. His clothes were ragged, but he held himself with a sort of confidence that belied his social standing. Something about him reminded him of Sirius.

They only made it a few feet before Harry started to resist, digging in his heels. The man turned back to glare at him, and tightened his arm threateningly.

"Let go or I'll scream," Harry warned him.

His abductor snorted. "I knew you'd be a handful. There's nothing omega about you, is there?"

It suddenly clicked for him why the man seemed familiar.

"You're a werewolf."

"Clever, clever. Which is why you should know better than to threaten me. You scream and the first person who comes to help you gets to spend the rest of their life with odd cravings for raw meat and a sudden fondness for the moon. Have I made myself understood?"

Harry glowered at him, but nodded. He couldn't risk innocent people getting caught up in his fight. He would just have to figure a way out of this himself. It shouldn't be too hard. He had been escaping all day. He was on a roll.

And he still had his own wand tucked up his sleeve and knife tucked into his boot.

Letting himself be dragged along, he waited for his opportunity.

"So what are you going to do to me?" he asked. Though assassination seemed likely, it just didn't seem to fit with what Voldemort had told him last night in his dream. Merlin, had that only be last night?

"My job is to take you back to the UK, but if you keep dragging your feet I'll take a detour to beat the shit out of you. Hurry it up."

"I just had the shit beaten out of me, asshole. It doesn't improve my pace any in case you haven't noticed."

They were out of the square now and half way down a street of apartments, and only a couple was walking their dog far ahead of them. The werewolf jerked him forward, the blade he was carrying now finding it to Harry's throat. The boy froze, the first real sense of fear of the man coming over him.

"Don't push me, you little prick. You ever sass me again and I'll cut out your damn tongue."

Oh yeah, werewolf, Harry remembered, you don't go picking fights with the dominants. Not unless you knew you could win. He wisely kept his mouth shut, and the man put his knife away and started moving again.

“And stop looking around for escapes. If I have to chase you, you'll be sorry.”

And Harry believed him, which was why he couldn't let him chase after him. His wand was still up his sleeve, but he couldn't use it with the werewolf gripping his arm. Likewise, his wandless magic could backfire on him while they were this close. That left the knife in his boot. The knife he couldn't get to if they kept up their current pace.

“Please... can't we just stop... for a second? I really did get beat up.”

The werewolf glared at him, but stopped. “What the hell happened to you any way? How did you ditch the old man?”

Harry blinked. “You didn't follow us?”

“I didn't go any further than the bus stop. I just waited around for you to come back. Your coming alone made things a lot simpler than I expected.”

“I got on the wrong side of a Blasting Hex. The stone I was hiding behind sort of exploded on me.”

The man gave him a weird look. “What the hell did you say to piss off that old goat?”

“He's not the one who tried to blow me up! Those were Aurors!.”

The man tensed, and looked around. “Break time is over. Come on.”

His moment of distraction was all Harry needed to grab the knife out of his boot, which he promptly brought to the man's throat. The werewolf tensed.

“Let me go and step away.”

“You don't want to do that. Just put the knife away. No one has to get hurt.”

“Mister, I've been nothing but hurt all freaking day. I'm tired, sore, and and frankly sick of being kidnapped. So back off,” he said, prodding him with gentle poke of the knife. To his surprise, it cut into the skin easier than he had thought, and he flinched as he saw the blood. It was a mistake.

The man let go and moved away quickly, but only far enough to move his neck out of harm's way. In stead of retreating, he grabbed Harry's wrist and jerked him forward, meeting him with a savage head butt.

The world exploded into pain and lights and stars, and then just as quickly went dark.

oo
oo

“How precisely did you talk me into doing research the day after we get back from school?” Draco whined, following Hermione through the isles of books. The Treacle Tatterly Public Library was quiet, and almost empty, much as any library should be during summer break in the young Malfoy's opinion.

“I didn't,” she said, not bothering to tear her eyes away from the titles listed in front of her, “I said I was going to the library and you insisted on following in case I were kidnapped by rogue Bulgarian Quidditch players.”

“You know that's not as funny when we actually know someone it's happened to. What are you hoping to find here that wasn't at the school library?”

“I'm hoping to find some of the book I couldn't get to because they were in the restricted section. They don't have a restricted section here.”

“That's because their selection is lame.”

"Hush. I think I found one."

She pulled out a large book, the cover green faded almost to brown and the edges tattered.

"What is it?" Draco asked, not really interested. After months of trying to help Hermione figure out exactly what she had forgotten the day Viktor had run off with Harry (and he still had urges to throttle her after she told him about her reckless confrontation), and finding nothing he was more than willing to just forget the entire incident. What did it even matter? Knowing what happened wouldn't get Harry back, alleviate Krum of his treachery, or help Uncle Severus (according to mother, he had already weaseled his way out trouble on his own).

"It's a book for diagnosing and treating memory loss."

"Why would that be in the Restricted Section at Hogwarts?"

"I don't know. Lets find out."

With a sigh, he followed her out into the study area and resigned himself to wait. It took less time than he thought. It took half an hour in one decrepit book to find an answer that had been evading her for six months.

"I think I was obliviated," she said, frowning down at her book. Draco blinked at her.

"Pardon?"

"Obliviated. It's really bad. I'll never be able to recover the memory on my own."

"Wait, wait, wait. What is 'obliviated'? How do you know you weren't hit with a regular forgetting hex."

"Draco, please. I tried the counter spells for nearly a dozen memory spells, and none of them worked. An obliviation is different though. It doesn't just hide a memory, it fragments it and then buries it. It's considered a Dark Arts spell."

"Do you think it was Oblitz then? He is a former Auror and Dark Arts Teacher. I bet he knows a ton of spells like that."

She frowned, flipping through the pages. "Maybe. I don't know why he would bother though. Why not just stun me?"

Draco shrugged. "Why do you think it was even an obliviation?"

"It's... it just fits the symptoms... or the lack of symptoms. Most memory spells have after affects, they fade and you start to remember or you dream about the incident or have a strong case of deja vu. With an obliviation you don't have any of those things. It's like nothing ever happened."

"Sounds kind of feeble, if you ask me... and there isn't a cure? If that's even what's wrong with you."

She closed the book and looked him in the eye, and he instantly knew she was going to propose something he wasn't going to like.

"I can't get to the memory myself. Maybe if I were some sort of meditation guru I could, but that takes years of training and mental preparation. However... I know someone who could."

"... if you say Ron, I'm going to pop you one just out of principle."

"What? No, of course not! I meant Uncle Severus. He's a skilled Legilimens. He could probably do it... but..."

"And the other shoe drops... but what?"

"... Remember how I said the memory is fragmented and buried?"

"Yeah."

"Well... in order to put it back together, I would have to let him sift through my other memories."

He blinked at her. Then looked horrified. "No way!"

Someone shushed them from the other end of the library.

"Are you serious? I like Uncle Severus and all, but do really want him poking through your head. In case you've forgotten, we weren't... aren't exactly saints. We've broken priceless artifacts and blamed it on House Elves-

"- technically only you did that-

"Snuck out after curfew at home and school-

"Yes, well-

"And stolen books out of his library!"

"Borrowed, Draco. I always put them back."

"Not to mention all the embarrassing stuff, like the first time you kissed someone or that time you wet yourself in public."

"I was five and I told Narcissa I really had to go."

"Anyway, do you really want him to see all of that? Do you really want to make him see all of that? Is it even worth it?"

Hermione shook her head. "It's not just about the memory. I woke unconscious on the floor, Draco, and I have no idea how I got there or how long I had been out. I was helpless, completely vulnerable. What if someone... did something to me?"

Her brother suddenly paled. It had never occurred to him that something other than being knocked unconscious could have happened to her. There had been no marks on her, her clothes were intact, and she had only seemed scared of being found out, not of being... that.

"I don't just mean rape, Draco. I'm pretty sure no one had the time to do it and to get rid of the evidence that thoroughly. But what if it were something else? What if I were forced to tell an important secret or have another spell on me that I'm unaware of? What if I betrayed someone and don't even know it?"

"... but what if it's nothing and you end up betraying those secrets to Snape instead?"

"I've got to know. Not knowing is driving me insane. Besides, I trust him."

"He's Slytherin, Hermione. As a four year veteran of that particular House, I can safely say he'll only keep secrets as long as it's advantageous for him to do so."

"That's an awful thing to say."

"Awful? I'd be disappointed in him if he didn't!"

Her only response to that was to roll her eyes. She had already made up her mind, and Draco knew it was impossible to dissuade her. His only hope was to dissuade his godfather from going along with her foolhardy scheme.

They checked out the book and took the floo to a little pub, and from there made their way up the winding road towards Snape's house. It wasn't until they were actually at his door that the awkwardness of the situation began to dawn Hermione. Their godfather wasn't exactly the sort of man who cared for unexpected visits.

However, as a Gryffindor, stubbornness accounted as much for her bravery as anything else.

"Uncle Severus!" she called, knocking on the door. "It's Hermione and Draco. I have to talk to you. It's important."

It took a few more minutes of persistent pounding, but eventually the door cracked open to reveal a very unhappy potions master.

“Someone better be dead.”

“Uncle Severus, you would really feel awful if you had said that and it turned out to be the case.”

“I imagine it couldn't be much worse than now. Do you know what time it is?”

Draco checked his watch. “11:26.”

The potions master let out a tired sigh and stepped away from the door, letting godchildren inside. “What do you want?”

Hermione told him. Snape stared at her blandly through the entire explanation, sighed again, rubbed his forehead, and turned to Draco.

“What time did you say it was again?”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry was jostled awake when the car came to an abrupt stop, and his seatbelt caught him and threw him back into his seat, knocking him upside the head.

“Ah, fuck, fuck, fuck...” he cursed, holding his pounding head in his hands. It felt as if someone had tapping on his skull with hammer for the last hour.

“Hey, no cussing in front of my kids,” he heard snapped at him from somewhere ahead of him. He groaned, pulling his hands away from his head so that he could see exactly where he was now and in what state.

The first thing he noticed was that he was in a rather small car. The second, was that it was a very crowded small car. The man from before was at the driver's wheel, and in the passenger's seat was a woman. Sitting beside him in the back were two children, a boy and girl, neither more than nine years old. He blinked at them blearily, and they blinked back with wide brown eyes. Who were they?

"Here, drink this. You're probably dehydrated," the woman upfront said in a barely discernible Scottish accent. She held out a water bottle, and only after a moment's hesitation did he reach out to accept it... then realized his hands were tied together. He looked at the ropes binding his bare wrists, then realized his button-up shirt was missing. In fact, as he looked himself over, he realized he was missing just about everything. His boots, his arm guard (and his wand), his boots, his wig (no real loss there since it itched something awful), and his socks. The only thing left to him was his undershirt, his pants, and the make-shift bandages he had made for himself..

"Come on, drink up," the woman urged. Slowly, he accepted the bottle and took a drink. It was cold, and soothing, and not nearly enough. He felt confused, sick, and sore. Outside his window he could see other cars whipping by them and farmland stretching out behind those. Where were they?

"Where are we?"

"About twenty miles south of Cologne," the woman said. "How do you feel?"

"Probably about as good as I look. Do you have a headache potion, perchance?"

The man snorted.

"Or a Tylenol? I'm not picky."

"Nothing. I'm sorry," she said.

"It's fine."

"Oh, now you decide to be polite?" the man scoffed. Harry glared at him.

"You're hardly in a position to criticize. You said hello with a knife at my back."

“Point taken. Now that you're our guest, I am going to set up some ground rules. If you follow these rules, maybe you'll get to where you're going in better shape than you are now,” the man said, watching the road and Harry in his rear view mirror simultaneously. Harry scanned his prison on wheels for routes of escape and the scenery outside for potential sanctuary. “Rule 1, you call me 'Sir', you call my wife 'Ma'am', and you don't talk to John, Jane, or Noah period.”

Harry looked at the two children beside him. “Where's number three?”

From behind his seat there came a rustle, and third child made an appearance. He was about five and was missing half his teeth when he grinned at Harry.

“I'm Noah!”

“Noah, you're not suppose to talk to him, remember?” John scolded, glowering as menacingly as a nine-year old can.

“Oops!” he ducked back behind the seat and disappeared.

“Rule 2, you will respect me and every order I give you. Rule 3, you will respect my wife and every order she gives you. Rule 4, you will not try to escape.”

“That it?”

“I doubt we'll be together long enough for any other rules to come into play.”

Small blessings.

What was he going to do now?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. If you want to know what the Upright Hierophant stands for, you'll have to go look it up. Otherwise, I'm going to keep you guessing until Harry and Voldemort meet again.

Book V:

Chapter 5: The Quest for the Prince

“Damn it! Damn it all to hell, don’t people understand what’s riding on this? How can everyone be so stupid?!” Minister Seibligg snarled, throwing something across the room, and forcing one of his interns to jump out of the way. “I’ve got three and a half weeks! Just three and a half weeks, when I could have had six months... It’s that damn Dumbledore’s fault. He said he’d handle it. Well, he handled it alright. Handled it right over to Voldemort more than likely!”

The minister continued to rant for several more minutes along these lines, while the half dozen interns waited in quiet tension for him to either wind down or throw something at them. You could never be certain which would happen first with a man as volatile as him.

It didn’t help that the political climate lately was... intense.

The papers had been criticizing him relentlessly for the failed attempt at spying, and more importantly for risking the lives of mere school children in the process. His political opponents were out for blood, suggesting he be surrendered to the Dark Lord as a display of peaceful reconciliation with Britain. Their blood thirst wouldn’t let them wait until September when the national election would be held, and defeat him legitimately.

If it weren’t for the common consensus of the public that Britain was ruled by the Devil, and public outrage at the Dark Lord’s Ultimatum, he might have been impeached months ago. As things stood, his chances for reelection were slim to nil.

He had needed Potter’s support, and what ever intelligence he might have on the Dark Lord, not only for military reasons but for public ones. The witch and wizarding community were still patting their own backs for ‘rescuing’ the little ingrate, and he needed to take advantage of that while he still could. The boy was his single gain in the entire Triwizard Tournament debacle, but if anyone found out the child had disappeared or even worse, that he had defected back to Britain, he would be ruined.

They would say he had lied to the public, and the boy really had been kidnapped just like the Dark Lord had been claiming all along. They'd throw him to Voldemort just out of principle.

During coffee breaks, the interns silently admitted to one another that they hoped Potter showed up at the execution and gave the bastard the finger.

"I want Potter found! I want Dumbledore found! Heads are going to roll for this, and mine sure as hell won't be one of them. Autman! I want you to contact every major paper and tell them the old bastard was attacked by Death Eaters, and we don't know what happened to him or Potter. Tell them the Ministry is posting a 1500 Schulich* reward for any information leading the safe recovery of Potter or Dumbledore or both. I want it out by the morning post or it's your balls, Autman!"

Autman hurried to do as commanded, more than happy to be safely out of the room than worried about his manhood.

"Spencer, you're going to contact the Auror Corps. I'm issuing a national alert. The borders are closed. No one in or out until that boy is in our custody. Blame it on the Death Eaters, but make it known Potter might be resistant to capture... Imperius curse or some other nonsense. Eisenhoff, find someone convenient to blame for the breach in security. Oreff, find those imbeciles to botched the mission and then 'lose' them again. I don't want their screw up messing with the official report, got that? And Dieski..."

"Yes, sir?" she said, timidly, hopeful that she'd finally get to do something important.

"Get me a beer."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

The newest headquarters for the Order of the Phoenix was a bit more cramped than their usual selection, but Harry's disappearance had ruined much of their plans and forced them to compromise. Something no one was happy about.

“You seriously couldn’t find anything better?” Phoebe groused, timidly stepping over a desiccated pile of rodent crap. “I wouldn’t even sleep here.”

The basement of the abandoned paper factory provided them with plenty of privacy, but that was about it. It was dank, smelly, and infested with rodents. It was also only a few blocks from the Astora Hotel, and roving gangs of Aurors trying to track Dumbledore down.

“It is only for a short time,” Dumbledore assured them, “Until we have a better idea of where Mr. Potter has gone.”

“He ran away,” Johan stated bluntly. “Didn’t I say he would at the first chance he got?”

“Some how I don’t think this specific circumstance was what you were referring to,” Viktor said. Of everyone, he was the most concerned about what had happened. Harry and he had not parted on good terms, but of everyone there Viktor thought he understood the boy the most. Harry was probably the most conflicted person he had ever met, which meant all his actions only made sense to himself. It frustrated Viktor beyond words that Harry couldn’t just decide whose side he wanted to be on, but perhaps that very indecisiveness was the final remnant of innocence still left to him. He was still only fourteen, and that boggled Viktor’s mind more than anything else. He was only fourteen and running around with Aurors and Dark Wizards chasing after him. There was nothing good that could come out of this situation.

There was a knock at the basement door, followed by Fredric, still in his Auror’s uniform. They all turned to him expectantly. He gave them a grin.

“The Minister doesn’t have him. He’s shutting down the borders and put up an award for the both of you. I think he still believes you have him, Albus.”

There was a vague air of relief at the news, except for Johan who just snorted in disgust.

“What did you think happened? They spelled him to get his stuff and then climb out the window? How the hell did he even get his wand?”

Dumbledore smiled a bit at this. “I believe he disarmed one of the Aurors and ran off with his wand, and used that to retrieve his own wand.”

Now Fredric was confused. “How did he disarm an Auror without a wand?”

“I am not entirely certain myself. I was unfortunately distracted.”

“I have heard a rumor,” Viktor offered, “that he can do some wandless magic. I don’t know if it’s true. I’ve never seen him do it myself.”

“Marvelous,” Johan muttered.

“So now what?” Tonks said impatiently. “We can’t stick around here.”

“Not all of us,” Dumbledore admitted. “Viktor, I’d like you to stay in the area and conduct a search of your own. No one will question you searching for a lost friend. Fredric, just keep monitoring the situation as best you can. I will talk to the police, and put myself up somewhere for the next couple of days.”

The Order looked a bit confused by his last statement.

“Who are the ‘Police’?” Timmons asked.

“Muggle Aurors,” Tonks said, grimacing. She’d had a few run in with those. A few unauthorized entries while working for Dumbledore had gotten her in more than few hot spots with the police.

“What could they possibly do?”

“Mr. Potter escaped into Muggle Cologne, not Wizarding Cologne. He has no idea how to get to the magical part of the city, and even if he did, he would probably avoid it. I feel it is likely he will try to flee the city by railway or bus. The police can send out a notice to be on the look out for 'my runaway grandson', if you catch my drift."

It seemed like a sound idea, except to Johan who saw the obvious flaw. If Potter didn't want to be noticed by muggles, he certainly had to know some spells to ensure that he wasn't. He didn't say anything though. No one listened to him anyway.

"We will meet here in twenty-four hours. If we have made no progress, we will relocate and make new plans."

With that, they made their exit. Fredric first to make sure no one was there to spot them, and then the others, each wandering to different sides of the abandoned factory to carry out their various duties.

Viktor hung back a little to talk to Dumbledore, who seemed to be expecting him.

"You are worried about our misplaced friend," the old wizard surmised.

Viktor nodded.

"What, specifically, are you worried will happen?"

"A lot of things. I'm worried he'll get caught by Aurors. I'm worried he'll get caught by Voldemort's men. I'm worried he'll go back to Voldemort of his own free will. I'm worried he'll just disappear and we'll never know what happened to him."

"Worrisome things indeed."

Much to Viktor's dismay, he realized Dumbledore didn't have any words of comfort for him. All of these fears were legitimate, and the old wizard wasn't going to downplay the seriousness of the situation. The only solution was to find Harry first.

He might as well try and find Atlantis while he was at it.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

It took less than an hour for Harry to become completely and utterly carsick. At least, he hoped it was just carsickness. If any of his wounds got seriously infected he would be in serious trouble. In any event, he was not in a good state.

The car's air conditioning didn't work, and despite rolling down the windows, the car was still cramped and sweltering and stank of sweating bodies. His kidnapper didn't seem to mind, and neither did his family. The children napped or doodled in activity books, obediently quiet and pointedly not talking to Harry. Their mother watched Harry like a hawk, frequently looking at his hands to make sure they were still bound and unmoving in his lap. He felt too ill himself to work up a good stare of resentment, so he ignored her. The father kept his attention on the road. The only sign that they even acknowledged the heat was the frequent passing of a water bottle.

Harry had his own bottle, nearly empty. Lycanthrosis, he thought vaguely, gradually coming to the conclusion that all of the family were werewolves and not just the man if they didn't seemed worried about contracting it. He didn't think too much into it. He was too nauseous and headachy to devote much energy to any thoughts aside from 'where are we going' and 'how do I get out of here'.

They were heading north, towards the North Sea. They passed a few road signs with names Harry thought he recognized, places with rivers leading out to sea. Lubreck. Bremen. He had been in Bremen before. The Durmstrang ship had dropped him and everyone else off there. Where they going to take the same route out of Germany? There seemed to be dozens of easier routes. Plane. Train. Bus. Most of them leading south into Belgium or France, and taking either a ferry or the 'Chunnel'* into England

"Why are we going by sea?" he asked, the first words he had spoken since he'd woken up. The mother's eyes widened and she turned to her husband. So he had guessed right.

“Why do you think we’re going to the sea?” the man demanded, as if accusing him of something.

“Because we passed by all the train and bus stations, and a couple of airports... and several post offices if you wanted to get clever about it.”

No one said anything for a long moment. The car suddenly lurched to the side to let another car pass, and Harry closed his eyes and clenched his teeth, his insides threatening to revolt.

“Oh God, pull over. I’m going to be sick.”

“As if-“

The mother interjected. “Dear, he’s serious. Pull over.”

There was another abrupt swerve and fierce stop. Harry struggled with the door, but it wouldn’t open, and as his stomach wasn’t waiting for him to complete his evacuation, he gave up and climbed half way out the window and vomited over the side. There wasn’t much to expel, but it seemed to take forever, and when it was finally over he could only hang over the door, exhausted to the point of pain.

Had he ever felt this awful? After Infelix malis? When Snape slipped him that Blue Pox potion? At this point, he couldn’t even bring himself to care that he was being driven to his probable torture and death. This was insidiously slow and torturous death all its own.

“Here,” the woman said from behind him, nudging his hand with his water bottle. “Wash out your mouth and get back inside.”

“Is he okay?” Jonah queried sleepily from the back.

“He’s fine. Go back to sleep.”

“Does he need medicine?”

“Go to sleep,” his father reiterated, and the boy fell quiet. Stephen looked to Harry, who had climbed back into the car, and sat slumped in his seat. They stared at each other for a long time. "You should sleep as well."

Harry glared back at him. "You should just leave me at the nearest hospital."

"I swear to god kid, I'm going to pop you one if you don't drop the sass."

"Next upchuck I'm aiming at the back of your head."

"One more word, just one, and I'm gagging you."

Harry believed him, and relented, turning to stare out the window as they headed back out onto the road. How far was it to the sea? Several hours. When would they stop? Would they stop at all? If they did, he might be able to stun both of the adults. The children were too young to stop him. He could find his things and runaway again. Find a place to sleep off the sickness.

If the fucking drive didn't kill him first.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Hermione fidgeted nervously in the kitchen chair, staring across the table at her godfather, his eyes skimming the article she had found. He looked awful, like he hadn't slept at all, even though he obviously needed to. He was still wearing a brewing apron, dragon hide, and his hair was tied back. Had he been brewing all night? What ever for?

He had listened to her though, from start to finish, and even double checked her interpretation from the book. At last, he shut it and looked back at her.

"Do you have any idea what you are asking?"

She nodded. "I know I'll have to let you into my memories... even those I'd rather you not see..."

“There’s a lot more to it than that,” he said, closing his eyes. She hadn’t a clue what she was requesting. Sure he might find what she was looking for, and perhaps she was willing to sacrifice a bit of privacy to do that, but there was more at stake. She had buried memories that he had buried himself and that WYRA had lawfully buried. Memories of the basilisk incident and memories of her family before the Malfoys had adopted her. Shaking any of those memories loose into her conscious or subconscious mind could have serious ramifications.

It would be a tricky enough operation if her other memories weren’t a factor and he had a full night’s rest, but as it was he didn’t even want to attempt a glance into her mind. His own was too exhausted.

He had been up all night, tweaking loyalty potions, altering them enough so that they could be reversible or broke down on their own in time. The Dark Lord might THINK he wanted a completely loyal Harry, but Snape knew such a thing would soon result in disappointment. A servant who did not question would simply become another meaningless sycophant.

There would likely be several ‘experiments’, before Voldemort found a solution that satisfied him.

Snape knew something had to be done, but he suspected it would all come down to the Dark Mark or something similar. Physical and mental freedom, but with a magical bond. One that could easily destroy you if you ever attempted to break it. The idea didn’t sit well with him, but then nothing about the situation did.

Which was what made Hermione’s unexpected appearance almost welcome. He needed a distraction that even the Dark Lord would excuse.

“Fine. We’ll try, but if it becomes too much of a hassle, I’m pulling out,” he said, leaning back in his chair. Draco, who had been uncharacteristically quiet standing by the counter immediately protested.

"You can't be serious! When was the last time you slept? If you go stumbling through her brain like you are, she's going to end up thinking she's poodle by the time you're done!"

"Draco!"

"A legitimate concern," Snape said mildly, turning to the boy. "Which is why you're going to make some tea. Some very, very strong tea. Second cabinet on your left."

"You're all loons," he muttered under his breath, but did as he was ordered.

An hour later found them in the living room, the curtains all shut tight. Draco guarded the windows, peaking out to make sure no one came to disturb them. Hermione and Snape sat on the couch, a pensieve on the coffee table. Snape took her face in his calloused hands, and stared deeply into her eyes.

"I want you to think of that day in the castle, just before your memories disappear, in as much detail as you can manage."

Her cheeks instantly pinked at the thought of Viktor's proposal to her in the abandoned classroom. The potions master scowled at her.

"You can't afford to be embarrassed. Your mind retreats from memories that make it uncomfortable, and that makes my job that much more difficult."

"I'm sorry..."

"Just concentrate."

Gradually, the memory came to the forefront of her mind, and Snape found himself the third party to an adolescent soap opera. All tears and pleas, and the only think keeping him from retching was Hermione's staunch adherence to logic even in the midst of teen heartbreak. The memory suddenly stuttered, and he found himself looking down at Hermione on the floor, waking up in confusion.

Having found the time frame of the lost memory, he left her conscious thought to find exactly where it went. Technically, he had no physical body with which to move, and both time and space was ephemeral concepts in the mind to begin with, but with mental discipline and self awareness, he found it easy enough to create a landscape that he could work with.

Concentrating, he dismissed Hermione's image of her last meeting with Viktor, and found himself staring out in a smoky black void. He hovered in the nothingness for a moment, deciding on the mindscape that would best suite his needs, and willed it into being. The darkness suddenly brightened, and where once there was endless space there was now white walls, a floor, and a ceiling. A corridor stretched on into forever, and the walls were each lined with a door, and all of the doors were different. Wood doors, painted doors, glass doors, barn doors, tiny doors, car doors, draw bridges, attic doors, beaded doors, elevator doors, round doors, pink doors, doors with knockers, doors with mail slots, doors with signs on them, just endless doors of all varieties. Their only linking factor was the set of gold numbers printed neatly above each.

Curiously, he opened what appeared to be a closet door. Inside, he found Hermione, no more than six, watching Narcissa intently as she dressed for a night at the opera. Long, elegant fingers weaved through her golden hair, her swan neck tilted just a bit as she looked into the mirror. The image of a beautiful princess made real to a little girl, and the heart racing thrill of knowing she was her mother now.

He closed the door, more than a little embarrassed. If Lucius ever found out he had seen his wife in her under clothes, he'd never see the light of day. He looked at the door number. 2836621. He tried another door.

This one had Harry in it. It had to have been first year, he looked so tiny. They were outside the castle with their fellow first years, Professor Grimms barking at them not to mount their brooms. Snape had heard about this incident, but couldn't help but linger as it played out before his eyes. He watched as Grimms was called away, as everyone became aware of Weasley riffling through Harry's bag, the insults, and the fight on the broomsticks. In wasn't until the end of the little drama, when Grimms smacked Harry upside the head with the journal, that Snape realized exactly what it was.

What the bloody hell is that doing here?

He didn't find out what happened to the journal, as Harry was pulled away and the memory ended, but he made a mental note to find out where and how exactly the boy had come across it. There was no way it could have come into his possession by accident, or that he could have had it for long if he was still alive and (relatively) sane.

It was an important discovery, but not the one he was there looking for. He made a note of the door number, 4594532, and continued on his way. The walking continued on for what seemed like hours, but time was ultimately meaningless since to Hermione and Draco it wouldn't even be half a second, and his mental body did not fatigue. It was merely an attribute to Hermione's rather remarkable memory. Aside from the first two memories, most of what was stored behind the doors were facts and foresights she had acquired over the years. Even Snape learned a thing or two when he bothered to pay attention.

Most of them he left untouched. The fractured memories were hidden behind some of these doors somewhere in the corridor, and there would be some sort of sign to let him know when something wasn't where it was suppose to be.

And it came in the form of door 6002 41, a simple blue house door with a conspicuously absent 5th number. He opened it and instantly recognized the memory as one he had altered himself. Hermione and Harry and the Weasley girl conspired in the library over what had happened to the unfortunate Ms. Sweetey. On the other side of the Library, Hermione and Viktor talked softly about fairy folk and house elves. A memory overlapping a memory.

Knowing what to look for now, he watched the numbers of the doors as he passed, looking for any with missing numbers. He found two others, ones of Hermione when she still living with her muggle parents, but it was the fourth door the yielded the first meaningful results.

Door 6666 66, a black door with silver fixtures. Snape recognized it as one leading to Lucius' study. He opened it.

Larousse's funeral procession marched passed him, himself at the forefront, marching up the hill with his fiancée's body resting on the palate he held on his shoulders. He could see Morgan on the other side of the palate, but the other men helping him take her to her pyre, he didn't know and had never bothered to meet. Behind him trailed Harry, looking absurdly young and pale in his grief, Hermione and Draco standing on either side of him.

He forced himself to look away and not follow them to the top of the hill, and watch as that wretched morning played itself out. He would indulge in masochism after he found the memory that was hiding within this memory.

Looking around for anything out of place, he spotted a strange outcropping of trees, still green and deeply shadowed even in the depth of winter. He headed for it. The moment he entered the darkness of the forest, it shifted into the dimness of Hogwarts' history classroom. At the center, he could see Hermione and Viktor arguing with each other.

He had found the right place. All he had to do was wait.

The wait wasn't long at all. Within seconds of his arrival, the door to the classroom burst open, and a figure stepped through the door, flinging out a stunning hex. Hermione was down in an instant, sent into unconsciousness by the hex. The image dissolved around him but Snape had seen what he needed to.

He had seen Horace McGunny.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

"He has a fever now and he's soaking wet. We have to stop for the night."

"Sylvia-"

"I'm not killing this boy in front of our children for you, Stephen."

"He's not dying-"

"Says you..." Harry muttered, not bothering to open his eyes. He wasn't getting any better. In fact, the more time that passed the more he was convinced he was dying. He could barely open his eyes, let alone move his body, and breathing the hot, humid air was becoming increasingly difficult.

"... Fine, fine, whatever," Stephen snarled. This was followed by several sharp turns that rolled Harry's already sensitive stomach and insured that he would despise 'Stephen' for the rest of his probably very short life. They came to a stop somewhere and Harry dozed off, until the door was opened and he fell out of the car. Stephen caught him, and pulled him the rest of the way out.

It was more than a little alarming to find his legs wouldn't support his own weight. He was half carried, half dragged into the hotel room and straight to the bathroom, where he was set in the tub. It was blessedly cool and unmoving, and he sighed in relief. He had to have drifted off again, because he was woken by Sylvia, turning on the tub faucet. Cold water splashed his feet, jolting him back into awareness.

"Easy now. I'm just going to cool you off and then put to you to bed," she said.

"What's wrong with me?" he said, because he hadn't been this bad off that morning. Not even after being blown up and climbing out a window.

"I think you have a concussion. The heat and physical exhaustion only worsened things. Don't worry, you just need some rest to regain your strength."

The water was a touch too cold as it rose up around his legs, making him shiver even as it eased the pain. She left him in his pants, but pulled off his shirt, which he could see was now stained with sweat and blood. His makeshift bandages were likewise discolored and filthy, and he did nothing to protest as she started to unwind them.

“What happened to you?” she said, clearly surprised by the damage he had been hiding. He gave her a wane smile. The water around him was starting to turn pink.

“Aurors.”

“Aurors did this to you?”

“Most of it. The cuts on my feet are all Voldemort though.”

She looked perplexed by this, but didn't question. Taking a wash cloth, she began to wipe him clean, and despite his embarrassment at being bathed like a toddler, it felt too good for him to ask her to stop. Besides, his hands were still tied and didn't think he could do much for himself at this point.

“Where's...Stephen...Sir... whatever?”

She glanced at him briefly, and then at his hands, then back at him.

“He's getting some supplies. Food. Maybe something to make you feel better. There won't be any stops tomorrow. How do you feel?”

“Better. Why are you all doing this? What did Voldemort say he'd pay you?”

“Is that what Stephen told you? That it was for money?” she said, looking disgusted. “He can be such an ass. He doesn't care about the money. The money is just a means to an end. A way to get somewhere better than here.”

“What's wrong with here? Isn't it your home?” he asked. He was starting to shiver, but he didn't want to get out yet. After hours of feeling like he'd melt in that damned oven of a car, this was pure heaven.

She shook her head. “Not any more. Not for many years now.”

“Why, what happened?”

“I got bit by a werewolf,” she said simply. She expected him to flinch, or to somehow withdraw, but he didn’t react at all. He seemed to have figured it out already.

“Are people cruel to you, because you’re a werewolf?”

It was the most absurd question she had ever heard. Where people cruel to her? Of course they were cruel. They spit at her in the street, refused to serve her at the grocers, didn’t give back her change, accused her of stealing, wouldn’t acknowledge her mere existence, took their children to the other side of the street, threw rotten food- She could tolerate it if it had just been directed at her, but her heart shattered when her children were given the same treatment. They were her angels, her babies... they deserved far better than their stupid mother. They deserved what their father wanted to give them.

“They are.”

“I’m sorry.”

She looked at him squarely. This had to be the first time a wizard had ever apologized to her, and ironically enough it was from someone who had a legitimate reason to hate them.

“You say weird things.”

He smiled weakly, but it slipped away, leaving him looking drawn and very fragile. She wasn’t what she had been expecting, all fierce eyes and assertive confidence like he was in the papers. Fourteen, she remembered, he was still only fourteen.

A bang at the door alerted to them to her husbands return. He walked in on them, looked at her and then at him, his expression contemplative. He set a plastic bag on the counter and addressed his wife.

"I'll take over from here. Go look after the kids." She looked at him curiously, but did as he said. When she was gone, he turned to Harry. "You better not be trying to sweet talk her."

Harry gave him a baffled look, then snorted. "You caught me. My plans to run off with your wife to Paris have been foiled."

"You are so lucky they were out of duct tape at the store."

There was Tylenol in the bag, which Harry was grateful enough for that he bit back any witty remarks as Stephen dried him off, cleaned his wounds with peroxide, and wrapped him up in real, clean bandages. The werewolf wasn't gentle about it, but he wasn't intentionally rough either. As long as he sat on the edge of the tub limply and didn't make direct eye contact, the alpha didn't seem inclined to smack him around.

"Do you want anything to eat?" the man said at last, tying off the last of the bandages.

"...Maybe later."

"Can you walk on your own now?"

Embarrassed, he made an attempt to stand. This time he was able to get to his feet, although the position made his head pound. Carefully, he made a few wobbly steps. Stephen watched him closely for signs of falling, but once he was fairly certain he wouldn't, he handed him a towel.

"Take off your shorts and dry off. Then come out and lay down. You have five minutes."

Harry did as he was told, and came out into the sleeping area with the towel wrapped around his waist. Sylvia and the children were gathered around a table, eating, while Stephen stood staring at the TV. There were two queen sized beds, and Harry climbed into the nearest one. Finally feeling as if he weren't going to die, he began to think of what he should do to escape. Stun and running, was about the only thing he could come up with, except for the fact that running wasn't really possible at the moment.

"Shit."

Harry opened his eyes, not even realizing he had closed them, and turned to Stephen.

"What is it?" Sylvia asked, coming over to look at the TV.

"Storms up north. Bad ones. They're suspending all water and air traffic."

"For how long?"

"They're not saying. The storm supposedly 'came out of nowhere'. I can think of a few likely sources."

Harry could too. He wondered if the storms would hit land, and he'd find himself walking out into one in the middle of the night. Did the Ministry know where they were going? Or was it just another way to block off one of his escape routes? Perhaps even Voldemort had sent it as a means to cover their escape. Stephen didn't think so, but he seemed to be flying by the seat of his pants anyway.

At some point, he drifted off again without realizing it, and when he opened his eyes the room was dark and he could hear rain outside, arguing with the droning air conditioner. He felt no compulsion to go outside, but he couldn't think of what had just woken him.

"Go back to sleep," the Stephen growled from the other side of the bed.

I could stun him now, he thought sleepily. I could stun him and his wife and just walk away. I feel stronger now.

Deciding he had put it off too long already, he rolled over to do just that. Stephen was just a vague shape in the darkness of the room, highlighted in the faint glow from behind the hotel curtains. He sat up and extended his hands out to him.

“Stup-”

There was a crash of thunder and wood exploding, a blinding light and shouts of surprise. Harry’s first peculiar thought was that the door had been struck by lightening. The second was that they were under attack. The children and Sylvia screamed in surprise and fright, their bodies clearly visible now on the second bed, huddled together, but then there were other shouts, not of surprise but of command.

“Put your hands in the air and stay where you are!”

Wizards poured into the little hotel room, soaking wet and wands drawn. Some of them had cast Lumos, which now lit the room in a harsh blue-white glow, blinding its inhabitants. Harry felt the bed shift, then heard a snarl of rage.

“Stupefy.”

There was a thud, followed by Sylvia screaming again.

“Don’t anybody move! Put your hands in the air and stay exactly where you are!” another wizard shouted. They all did so, even Harry, whose bound hands were now clearly visible.

“What the hell?” a spiky –haired wizard exclaimed, looking at Harry in complete bewilderment. Now that everyone was still and not screaming, Harry could see there were three wizards total, and they were dressed as Aurors. They looked awfully young. “Who the hell are you?”

Harry blinked. They weren’t here for him?

“Er... Heinrich Makowski?”

“Oh shit, that’s Potter,” another Auror with crooked nose said. The other two looked at him and then at Harry, their eyes widening in surprise as they finally recognized his face. Harry’s estimation of them went down considerably. They were all clearly rookies, but what were they doing here if it wasn’t to find him?

'Spiky's' expression hardened, and he walked over to Stephen, now sprawled dazed on the floor, and kicked him in the chest. Hard. He grunted in pain and the children let out shocked cries. Harry could only stare, stunned at the pointless cruelty of it.

"What the hell, Canis? When did you graduate from mongrel to Death Eater lap dog?" Another vicious kick to the kidneys.

"Stop! Please, stop!" Sylvia begged.

"Shut up, you stupid bitch!" the third Auror, the bulkiest of the lot, snapped, seizing her by the hair and pulling her off the bed and away from her terrified children, who cried and reached helpless for her. He tossed her into a dresser, where she hit her head and slumped to the floor, blood running down her face.

What are you doing? Arrest them or stun them, what's the point of this bullying? Harry marveled, horrified as he had been with Voldemort that day in the Forbidden Forest and his brutal interrogation of the centaur herd Spiky approached him, and he instinctively flinched away, but the man made a calming gesture and gently took his bound hands.

"It's alright, no one is going to hurt you. You poor kid, you're a mess. They really worked you over, didn't they? Excarcerous!" The ropes fell away from his wrists, freeing them. Harry stared at them, shocked, then at the Auror. He thought the werewolves had hurt him, and not his buddies at the Ministry?

"You are one lucky guy, you know that?" he said, looking him over for any other wounds. He eyed the crescent moon tattoo suspiciously, but didn't examine it too closely. "Got a call from a concerned neighbor that these guys had run off without notifying anyone, and we were dispatched to track them down. The tracking spell on their car led us here. I thought they were just trying to run off to the mountains, not run off with you. You okay? Where are your clothes?"

Harry couldn't say anything. They had broken into the hotel just because Stephen's family hadn't been at home? What were they going to do if they hadn't found him there? Arrest them for being on vacation?

"Hey, kid, you alright?"

He blinked at the man, and finally managed, "What are you going to do to them?"

"Don't worry, they're not ever going to be able to hurt you again."

"What do you mean?"

"Kidnapping, assault, conspiring with a hostile foreign government. As soon as we get back to headquarters, they'll be scheduled for execution. You'll be safe."

His heart sank into his stomach. He looked over towards the children still huddled together on the bed, their tiny faces morphed into terror and grief, choking back sobs. Oh god...

"The children..."

Now, the Auror seemed to sense something was wrong. Harry's expression wasn't one of relief. If anything, he was looking increasingly distressed. He looked to his comrades, who seemed to have sensed it too, but they were occupied with guarding the werewolves.

"No."

"Harry? What is it?"

"Let them go..."

There was stirring on the floor, and 'Crooked Nose' lashed out with a sharp kick to Slyvia's back, knocking her to the floor, on top of her husband. She let out a cry of pain, and Noah scrambled for her.

“Mama, mama!”

“I said don’t move!”

‘Bulky’ grabbed him by his neck, and shook him like a rag doll, ringing out screams of pain. Harry was on his feet so fast, the Auror who was attending him fell to the floor. He was so fast in fact, the Auror who had grabbed Noah didn’t even realize he had moved until Harry’s foot smashed into his face.

“Expelliarmus!” The wand of Crooked Nose flew into his hand, and knocked the man into the wall. With his newly acquired wand, he swept it towards Stephen. “Rennervate.”

The man was on his feet just as quickly as Harry had been, and he went immediately for the first Auror who had been tending Harry, just beginning to climb to his feet. Stephen’s fist knocked him back into the ground, and he didn’t get back up.

The threat neutralized, the werewolf immediately searched out his pack. John and Jane rushed into his arms, latching onto him as fiercely as they could, sobbing against him. Noah was already with Sylvia, who had managed to sit up again and was hugging him to her breast.

Harry watched them all and felt like crying himself. But he couldn’t. He had to get away. Again. On shaky legs, he climbed off the bed, just barely able to find a path with everyone crowded around and unconscious bodies littering the floor, and made his way to the bathroom. He could feel their eyes on him, but he didn’t look back. His clothes were hanging over the tub, and when he put them on they were still a bit damp, but tolerable. He took two more Tylenol, stared at his pale, hallow face in the mirror for a minute, and then wobbled back out to the sleeping area.

Sylvia and the children were now back on the bed huddled together in a comforting pile, while Stephen searched the Auror’s for anything useful. He noted that Sylvia had a wand, but Stephen didn’t. Everyone turned to him as he re-entered.

“You’ll have to abandon your car when you leave,” Harry said softly. “I left the Tylenol by the sink, if you want any. Oh... and I want my stuff back.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

A Schulich is a German form of wizarding money. The equivalent is about $50, so the reward is about $75,000.

For those who don’t know the ‘Chunnel’ (Channel Tunnel) is a subterranean rail system under the English Channel between France and England.

Book V:

Chapter 6: The Fae

Harry swayed, dizzy, but kept to his feet and kept walking. His satchel hung weightless at his side, his small collection of wands tucked into either boot. Stephen had given them back to him without a word as he proceeded to move his family's belongings from the trunk of his car to the car he was in the process of stealing. Harry felt bad about that, but thought he might feel worse if the family was caught because they were stuck in their current rust bucket.

He had left them still loading the car, simply wandering away while they were distracted with their work. There was no point in saying goodbye, and frankly he didn't want to risk a confrontation with Stephen, who may still be reluctant to let him go. Probably the only thing stopping the man so far was Harry's newest wand and the evidence that he was both proficient and quick with using it.

The rain hadn't stopped, merely slowed to a drizzle, and off in the distance he could make out the lightening traveling south with the storm. It was a good time to travel. The air was cool with the rain, and his black cloak provided both warmth and concealment in the night. He just had to be wary of cars traveling a little too close to the side of the road, and he would be fine.

Well, perhaps he had to be wary of Aurors wandering a little too close as well.

He was practically buzzing with energy after the confrontation with the men in the hotel, senses on edge, even as his body fought its own physical fatigue. How far could he get like this? It was too late... early in the morning for buses to be running, and he had no idea where the nearest stop one was located. He might get a ride from a passerby if he were lucky, but with his luck he'd probably end up hitching a ride with a vampire.

He couldn't have made it half a mile when headlights coming up behind him drew his attention. He tensed, and tensed further as the vehicle began to slow down. Weird luck, he groaned mentally, when he realized it was Stephen and family in their newly acquired vehicle. The man rolled up beside him, but Harry kept walking, forcing him to follow along at a crawl.

“Hey, get in,” Stephen said, sticking his head out the window. Harry just glowered at him, and kept walking. “Come on, we’re in the same boat, you might as well come with us.”

Harry snorted.

“Harry, please,” Sylvia said, rolling down her own window to speak directly. “It won’t take long for those men to wake up and report to their superiors. Aurors are going to swarm this area, and you don’t want to be anywhere near here when it happens. Please, get in the car.”

He glared at the both of them. “I’m not an idiot! I know all of that. But I also know hitching a ride with people who are going to try to sell me to the highest bidder is an equally stupid idea!”

“Ha-“

“And stop using my name like we’re friends!” he snapped. “I didn’t save you because we’re friends!”

There was a moment of tense silence. Sylvia hung her head, shame faced, while Stephen proceeded to simply stare at him in his usual unreadable stare. In the back seat of the car, the children stared at him with wide, frightened eyes. Harry just kept walking, eyes on the road, and his wand clenched in his fist. Finally, the alpha broke the silence.

“Then why did you save us?”

“I did it just for your kids, got it? I hate people who hurt kids!”

This was perfectly true, but not the entire truth of the situation. He did hate people who hurt kids, but the situation was a bit more complicated. The fact was, he understood why Stephen and Sylvia had kidnapped him. They wanted something better for their children.

A life Harry was beginning to understand they couldn't get in Germany. So he had saved them, and given them a second chance. But he wasn't going to pay for their chance at happiness with his blood. They'd just have to get creative.

Stephen heaved an irritated sigh. "You really are a fucking prince."

"You're fucking welcome!"

"What do you want? An apology?"

"I want you to go away! Go find someone else to kidnap."

"Will you just get in the car? What do you think we could do against you when you've got...that anyway?" And by that, Harry assumed he meant his wand. He had a good point there. "The law is going to be here in a few minutes, and none of us can afford to stick around here. So get your sassy ass in the car before we all get blown to bits!"

Well, shit, he was right. He couldn't afford to be picky with his rides, and right now they were the lesser of two evils. Escaping them would be a lot easier than escaping Aurors, if it came down to that.

"Fine, but I'm sitting up front."

"No w-"

"Honey," Sylvia interject, her own patience finding its limit. "Don't make a mountain out of a mole hill."

Harry stopped walking, allowing them to stop the car so she could climb in back, and he could climb in front. He had barely closed the door, when Stephen put his foot to the gas and sped away with a screech of tires. Harry quickly fastened his seat belt.

For half an hour, no one said anything. Luckily, their new car was nicer than their old, with roomier seats and working appliances. The digital clock glowed 2:35 am. In the rearview mirror, he could see the children snuggling up to their mother as best they could in their seat belts, except for Noah who was curled up on the floor around her feet.

“Where are you going exactly?” Harry finally, quietly.

“If you’re not going to accompany us all the way, it’s better I not tell you,” Stephen said bluntly, not looking away from the road. The boy fought back his annoyance. The situation called for civility, even if it had to be faked.

“We’re not going north.”

“There’s nothing north. The ports are all closed due to the storms. Besides, the Aurors will know that’s the direction we were headed. We’ll head back south along the less busy highways until we can find a place to lay low for a while.”

“... Why did you even come to get me?”

“It wasn’t gratitude,” Stephen sneered.

“I didn’t say it was,” Harry sneered right back.

“Hn. It’s safer to travel with a wizard on our side. Sylvia knows a little magic, but not much. Nothing like you. So you get a ride and we get a little more protection. Everyone wins.”

Everyone wins, Harry thought glumly, if by some miracle I can keep you from betraying me.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Snape had wanted a distraction, but he wasn’t entirely sure if he wanted one this badly. As much as he disliked fiddling around with other people’s free will (with a few exceptions), he didn’t like wandering around London in the middle of the night much better. It was actually a newer city by wizarding standards, having been developed after muggles had settled there rather than at the same time, and as a result the city was... dirty. Not as bad as the muggle part of the city, but still dirty and cramped and decidedly slipshod in several districts. Oh sure, the Court Offices were all magnificent, along with the art and theatre districts, and a few high end residential areas, but for the most part it was kind of grimy.

It wasn't as noticeable in the day time, when all the wizarding folk were about in their colorful attire and the stalls for produce and flower sales were open, but at night the garbage littered the streets and rats ran freely trying to snatch it up before morning cleaners came through and magicked away as much of it as they could. The buildings were blacked and crumbling from acid rain, byproducts of living so close to muggles. Their own cultural assertion that old was somehow better than new, and their subsequent refusal to tear down or replace anything didn't help matters.

At least he didn't have to worry about muggers. It was a bit early in the morning for any to still be out and about, and none would dare attack a man as well dressed as him. After Voldemort's regime, any sort of crime you were convicted of with high recidivism earned you a one way trip to Azkaban or the werewolf colonies. Arson, rape, thievery, and the selling of contraband were the most common of these crimes. It was still around, but the perpetrators kept to their slums, where they could act out their brutality and self destruction on one another and no one gave a damn.

The neighborhood he currently found himself in wasn't particularly nice, but it was well out of the slums. Mostly tiny apartments and shops that catered to the nearby university students and faculty. Here he could see a few windows still glowing as some desperate student crammed for their next exam or abused the vitality of their youth with some other arbitrary excuse to dismiss sleep.

Not that Snape was in any position to criticize them. He should have been asleep hours ago. Hunting down an address when the Court offices were closed (it was still Sunday when Hermione arrived on his door step) was not easy. Hunting down an address when the Court offices were closed and not calling Lucius in for a favor was damn near impossible.

He had made the effort though. Horace McGunny had some role in the Durmstrang students escape, and he suspected the boy also played a role in Harry's abduct... escape as well. By all accounts, he could have just taken what he learned directly to Morgan or even Lucius and had the boy arrested and interrogated, but he wanted to hear the truth himself and judge whether the boy's crime was worth destroying his life and possibly harming his goddaughter over. For all he knew, McGunny had been helping Harry per his request, and Snape didn't see any reason to ruin the Ravenclaw because of his former ward's selfishness.

The more he thought about it the more it seemed likely McGunny had helped Viktor in some sort of attempt to help Harry, not Germany. McGunny had a fondness for Harry, which was hardly uncommon in the last few years, and was very astute. He may have realized something was wrong when Snape himself had not, and gone out of his way to remedy it. The risk seemed awfully high for someone as conservative as McGunny, but then Snape didn't know him all that well. He would find out soon enough.

The Newt Hill Tavern stood in the middle of the block, made completely inconspicuous by the four other apartment 'taverns' that surrounded it. The entrance was not locked. There was a registry in the entryway next to the mail slots, and he ran his finger down the list until he found Horace McGunny's neatly scrawled name at the very bottom. Mentally, he groaned. Of course, he would be on the top floor. The building had no elevator.

Maybe McGunny did deserve to be thrown to the Sentinels after all.

Nevertheless, he found the stairs and followed it all the way to the top floor. There was only one room, and Snape was a bit curious to see light was still shining out from the bottom of the door. From inside he could hear a soft, rhythmic tapping.

He knocked sharply on the door.

The tapping sound stopped. There was a moment of silence.

"Just a second," came a muffled voice, and a moment later the door opened cautiously.

Horace McGunny stared out at him, tired and suspicious. He looked older than Snape remembered, paler too, but that could have just been fatigue. His clothes were rumpled and his eyes were darkly circled.

“Professor? What are you doing here? Especially at... whatever time it is right now.”

“Can I come in for a moment?”

“Listen, I’m really busy. I’ve got a transcript due tomorrow, and this is a new job, so I really-”

“It’s about Mr. Potter.”

McGunny’s tired eyes suddenly became more alert.

“Is he alright?”

“As far as I know... maybe. Can I come in?”

This time McGunny moved away from the door. The apartment was small, only one room it seemed, and despite only having a bed, desk, chest, and small shelf it felt cramped. On the desk sat a type writer, the likely source of the tapping noise. There was no where he would deign to sit.

“Not to be rude, but why are you here, sir?”

“Like I said, it’s regarding Mr. Potter. I needed to ask you something.”

McGunny sat on his bed, across the room from him, and waited.

“Did you obliviate Hermione Granger the day the Durmstrang students escaped with Mr. Potter?”

The boy tensed, his entire continence frozen into an expression of surprise.

“I... what? No. What are you talking about?”

“Actually, that wasn’t really the question. I already know you did that. What I want to know is why. Did Mr. Potter ask you to do it or did you do it of your own volition?”

“I don’t even know what you’re talking about. How would I have... obliterated... obliterated... whatever Granger? She wasn’t even there that day. What does this even have to do with Harry’s abduction?”

Snape’s expression didn’t change.

“Did you do it yourself did someone help you? Perhaps you got Oblitz. He probably knows about Obliviation.”

McGunny scowled at him. “I don’t care for what you are insinuating, Professor. I think you better go.”

“Yes, you’re probably right,” Snape conceded. “But not without my answers. Legilimens!”

He caught McGunny off guard, as was his intention. The subject they had been talking about was now at the fore front of the Ravenclaw’s mind, and he sifted through it quickly. His interruption of Krum and Hermione’s argument, the sleep spell he cast on her, the run to the tower, and his return to obliviate his goddaughter.

And then things got very, very weird.

McGunny started to talk to himself... and someone who didn’t sound like McGunny was talking back. Schizophrenia?

Snape didn’t have long to theorize on it, because he was very quickly and very violently thrown out of the Ravenclaw’s head.

“Oprimmo!” McGunny snarled, slashing his wand out at him. Reeling from the mental expulsion, Snape didn’t dodge quite fast enough. His left hand caught the Crushing Hex, and pain seared through him as he felt the bones in his fingers and hand fracture.

“Sectumsemptra!”

McGunny rolled off the bed, which exploded into a flurry of feathers. The Ravenclaw landed on the floor, and found himself staring directly at the potions master. The man's black eyes burned with the agony of his broken hand and rage was quickly rising to the surface.

On his end, Snape noted clinically that one of McGunny's eyes had turned red. He didn't analyze it, merely flung out his wand again.

"Incendio."

"Obsideo," McGunny said, blocking the Fire Curse, then grinned nastily at him. "Don't you think you're getting a little carried away? Codicarius!"

Snape only partially avoided the curse as he leapt to his feet. The wood of the floor boards had already started sprouting roots, ensnaring part of his robe, so that when he pulled away, it tore away his sleeve with it. He considered himself lucky. That particular curse could have resulted in roots growing straight into his body and torn him to pieces. It was a very obscure curse. Where had McGunny discovered it?

"Celoxis!" the young wizard shouted, before he could get off another curse of his own. Snape didn't recognize it, which made his attempt to block it as futile as any attempt he may have made to dodge it in the tiny room. It cut through his shield as if though it were nothing, and caught him in the gut.

There was a moment of stunned silence. Snape slowly looked down to see the front part of his robe fall to the floor, cleanly cut. The pale skin of his stomach shown completely untouched, but slowly he started to feel something happening inside his body... something that was quickly turning to agony.

He fell backwards, landing heavily on his back, and further jarring his damaged insides. He screamed, unable to hold it back. Oh fuck, oh fuck... what is that?

“Do you like it? It’s one of my own creations. It leaves the skin intact, but inside... inside it rips you to pieces.”

McGunny was the one who said it, but it wasn’t McGunny’s voice. Struggling against the pain, he looked up at him and could now see both of his eyes were brilliant red, and his smile was monstrous. Casually, the monster walked towards him, sticking his thumb in his pockets, confident in his victory.

“What...” Snape let out a grunt of pain, “... are you?”

The grin grew larger and nastier.

“I’m Lord-”

“Sectumsemptra!”

As close as they were, the curse couldn’t be blocked effectively, but McGunny instinctively throwing up his arms saved him from being killed instantly, and it knocked him clear across the room in a spray of blood.

Snape didn’t wait to see how effective his attack had been. He was dying quickly, and needed to save himself before he could worry about destroying his enemy. Closing his eyes tightly, trying to gather his concentration around the pain, he thought of exactly where he needed to go and all of the parts of himself he definitely wanted taken with him.

There was a loud ‘pop’ as he apparated away.

At the other end of the room, lying halfway in the bathroom, McGunny lay stunned as his blood began to pool around him.

“Oh God,” he gasped, “Oh God, oh God, oh God...”

Shut up! Tom snapped. Get a hold of yourself.

“I’m bleeding... I’m bleeding to death,” he gasped.

You will if you just lay there. Get up and get to a hospital. It's easy enough to fix.

"I can't... I can't move... I can't..."

He was quickly slipping into shock. Snape's spell had cut deep into both his arms, severing veins and arteries alike, and perhaps taking some of his bone as well. He couldn't feel the pain, but he knew he should be in agony and the amount of blood that was pouring over his clothes and onto the floor told a story of eminent death.

"This is all your fault," he said, his voice shaky with fear and anger. "If I die... I'm dragging you to hell with me..."

I won't let you die. I still have plans for you.

There was a loud banging at the door, startling them both. "Mr. McGunny! Mr. McGunny, are you alright? Mr. McGunny?"

Relief washed over him. He may yet live.

"Help..."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

St. Mungo's saw its fair share of emergencies at four o'clock in the morning. Admittedly, it was usually during weekends and holidays and involved the over indulgence of alcohol and most of them came through the front door with the assistance of Paramedi-wizards and witches.

Tonight, however, Professor Severus Snape apparated himself straight into the lobby, and from the floor, proceeded to instruct the medi-witches and wizards that came to his aid in exactly what potions he required and in what dosage and order... then proceeded to wail in agony out as they moved him into the nearest vacant room to do just as he said.

Dumbledore's wake up call was unfortunately early. The news Fredric brought him about Harry's most recent sighting was even more unfortunate. Listening to Fredric's account of his debriefing and the latest assumption that Harry Potter was now infected with Lycanthrosis and running north with werewolves, Dumbledore was beginning to think he may have gotten in over his head with his latest project.

Breakfast was a sausage roll and a large coffee from the gas station they next filled up at. The morning was gray and gloomy, and according to the radio storms across the country had caused transportation delays, although in the south it seemed business as usual. Harry fought to stay alert as the hours passed with nothing but the soft tones of the radio, and an endless road stretching out before them.

“Hey...” he said, “What kind of life do you want?”

"I'm curious. What kind of life did you think you could get for selling me?"

“Shit, could you make that sound a little less perverted? Why the hell do you want to know?”

“Just curious.”

“Mmm... nothing fancy. Just... a normal life. A house, a job, school for the kids, some place I can let them run around and not worry about perverts or fanatics. A life where no one tells us where we can live or how, or watches us like some sort of criminals every moment of every day, where we don't have to worry about some bastard deciding on a whim we don't deserve to live and sending Aurors after us. Some place where everyone speaks English would be kind of nice too.”

Harry thought that very reasonable, but not really applicable to him.

“How did you become werewolves?” he found himself asking instead. “For that matter, how did you end up in Germany? You're obviously British.”

Stephen just glowered at the road, but from behind them Sylvia picked up the tale.

“It's kind of a long story. I suppose it's really my fault. We both lived in London, same neighborhood, same primary school, same muggle upbringing. When I turned eight, a neighborhood kid started harassing me. Lifting my skirt and making lewd jokes, and wouldn't leave me alone. I got scared and... sent him away. They found him two days later curled up in a drainage pipe. He couldn't remember how he had gotten there, but I knew I had done it. That day a man came to me from the Ministry of Magic and told me I was witch...”

“Were you really a jerk, even back then?” Harry said, looking at Stephen, who sent him a dirty look.

“That wasn't me, you jackass... that was my brother. My older, creep of a brother.”

“Anyway,” she interrupted before they really went at it, “I was really happy. I thought my life had become a fairy tale and I was going to have adventures and magic and live happily ever after... but it wasn't like that. It wasn't like that at all. By the time I was old enough to go to school, I discovered the wizarding world could be as nasty a place as the muggle one. I suppose it wasn't that different in most ways. I had friends, classes I love and hated, people who teased me because I was poor, and I worried about my future. By the time I graduated, I decided I didn't want to be a witch anymore. My family was all muggles, all my neighborhood friends too. Besides, Voldemort and his Death Eaters were roaming the country, and I decided I'd rather pretend to be a muggle than risk my life as a muggleborn. I lived with my parents for a while after graduation, and met Stephen."

"My brother used to insist Sylvia was a witch, but no one believed him," Stephen said, smirking a bit as he brought up the memory. "I didn't like my brother at all, so I ended up asking her on a date just to freak him out. Which it did."

"How romantic."

"It was really a lot of fun," Sylvia said. "Although, Stephen didn't think so when I told him the truth. He wouldn't talk to me for a month."

"Hn... then you wouldn't talk to me for two months after I came to my senses and apologized."

"So you got married?" Harry prodded.

"Yeah," Stephen said. "We got married. We got jobs, and our own place. We were broke all the time, but we got by. And then we got the Scare."

"The Scare?"

Sylvia sighed. "That's what they call it now. Just after the Dark Lord finally destroyed the Ministry, there was a period of time called the Scare, when everyone thought the Dark Lord would start to slaughter muggleborns and half-breeds and anyone who sided with the Ministry. Thousands fled believing their lives were in danger. When one of my friends from school warned me that the Death Eaters would use Ministry records to hunt down me and my family, we decided to flee. We spent all the money we had saved up just getting to Germany. We didn't speak any German, so getting a job was tough. We ended up living in the ghettos for British refugees, and I worked at a local tavern, while Stephen found work at a muggle office as a janitor. We thought we could make it work, just like in London, but..."

"You got bitten by a werewolf?"

"The ghettos were pretty seedy. The local werewolves started to infiltrate them, hoping to find better living conditions because their own parts of the city were even nastier. They'd set up cages in basements and sewers during the transformation, and then just go about their normal lives the rest of the time. It probably would have been fine, but sometimes someone got careless. We were taking a walk together, the closest thing to a date we could afford back then, and we got attacked. It went straight for me. Broke my collarbone and dislocated my arm. I'm not too clear about what happened after that, but..."

"I killed her."

Stephen said it bluntly, his expression completely blank. The silence that followed convinced Harry not to ask specifics.

"And that's how you got bit?"

"No. After Sylvia was treated for her wounds, we found out she was pregnant. Our land lord kicked us out, and we ended up living on the streets. We tried living with other werewolves, but they... we couldn't stand them. They were just a nasty lot, and we knew eventually they'd kill us or worse, so we tried it on our own. John was born, and I made my first mistake. I didn't take into consideration that he would need to be kept with Sylvia during the transformation. Eight months old, and he took a bite out of me. It was actually a relief. I knew I'd end up dead or turned eventually, and frankly I don't mind the werewolf stuff so much. Some of it is actually kind of fun. It's the damn wizards that are such a pain in the ass."

Harry wondered how they had the other two children. It didn't seem likely that they would intentionally have more kids into the situation they were in. Unless they ended up doing...it... while they were werewolves. He supposed that was the most logical reason. It wasn't like a werewolf would ever use a condom in the middle of a transformation, and why the hell was he thinking about werewolf sex lives exactly?

"So you want to live somewhere without any wizards bugging you?"

Stephen shrugged. "It would definitely be an improvement."

“Mm...” Harry thought on that, but couldn’t imagine pretending to be an average muggle for the rest of his life. It seemed sad and lonely to him, but perhaps it was different when you had a family. It must have been for his parents to have chosen just such a life. A quiet, feminine voice spoke up.

“What about you?” Jane asked. “What kind of life do you want?”

Harry tensed. Stephen glanced at him briefly from the corner of his eye, then back at the road. They all seemed to want to know the answer.

“... I wonder... I guess I want pretty much the same thing, a family, friends, and not having to worry about people trying to hurt us, but... I still want to be a wizard. I understand why you would want to avoid magic. It's brought you a lot of pain, but for me... I could never leave it behind forever.”

“What’s it like for you? To do magic?” Jane prodded.

"I don't know... it depends on the magic. Sometimes it makes me feel warm, other times really strong or weightless, and on very rare occasions... like I can feel the universe stretching out around me and its waiting to do exactly as I say. It feels like..."

“God.”

It was Stephen who said it, barely above a whisper. Harry turned to him, but he was still staring out at the road. He didn't say anything further and the car fell into silence once again.

[illegible]

Snape woke up in a tiny room, surrounded by the smell of antiseptic potions and his godchildren's concerned faces. He was bleary from the sleeping potion (which he had not asked for and would be throttling someone over later), but he still managed to hold onto a vague idea of what had happened that night... morning.

Gingerly, he prodded his side with his uninjured hand. It ached, but was hardly the mind numbing agony of before. He lifted his injured hand to examine it, and found it wrapped in a mitten of bandages. Someone had scribbled on top of it, 'Do not use until 10:30 am, Tuesday.'

Well, bother.

"Uncle Severus?"

"Yes, Draco?" he said softly, his voice husky from screaming.

"Are you alright... I mean, aside from the obvious."

"Aside from the obvious, I should be fine. What day and time is it?"

"Monday," Hermione offered, "About three in the afternoon."

"How did you find me?"

"The hospital identified you through BIN*, and found Lucius listed as your emergency contact number. They called the house, and we all came down. Lucius had to go back to work after signing all the paperwork and Narcissa went home to prepare a room for you. The medi-wizard said they could discharge you tomorrow, but you'll have to take it easy for a week. What happened to you?"

Snape closed his eyes, trying to think through the haze. It took him a minute to think how exactly he wanted to handle this.

"Did you tell anyone about our meeting?"

"We only said we went to visit you," Draco said, "And that you had to leave on an errand and sent us home... and really it was very rude of you to just run off without telling us what you learned. Hermione was freaking out."

"I was not freaking out!"

"You kept rambling about-"

"Children, if you would please shut up, your Uncle Severus would greatly appreciate it."

"Sorry," they apologized in unison.

"Good. If anyone asks, I am going to tell them I went out to Knockturn Alley to pick up some potion ingredients for a special project. I was attacked by an unseen assailant, who I managed to fend off but not before sustaining serious injuries. I aparated here for treatment. That's it."

They both nodded, and Hermione asked, "But what really happened? You didn't say anything before you ran off. Did you see who knocked me unconscious? Is that who did this to you? Oh, Severus, you're such a mess. They said you would have died within minutes if..."

She was starting to tear up, guilt and relief rising to the surface, but tried to fight it back. She knew it wouldn't be appreciated. Severus despised emotional displays, sincere or otherwise. Wiping away a few stray tears, she mumbled out a 'sorry'.

Whether it was leniency on his part or he was too tired to care, her godfather didn't bother chastising her.

"McGunny," he said, "That Ravenclaw boy. I confront him, but... there's something wrong with him. I don't know if he's entirely in control of himself."

Draco and Hermione shared a look of surprise. Horace McGunny? They never would have thought of him. The idea of him attacking Hermione was absurd enough on its own, but attacking and nearly killing their godfather, Dueling Champion and former Death Eater, was just plain inconceivable.

“Do you think it was the Imperius Curse?” she asked.

“No. Whatever it was, it was something more... insidious. If he is still alive, he will need to be thoroughly examined.”

Hermione’s insides suddenly twisted.

“If he’s.... what did you do? He isn’t...”

“Dead?” he said plainly, not an ounce of remorse present in his voice. “I don’t know. The blow I gave him before I escaped was potentially lethal, but... if I have survived, I suspect he will have managed to as well.”

“What are you going to do?”

“Find him. I under estimated him last time, but that will not happen again.”

He was tired, but not oblivious, so when his godchildren shared concerned looks he caught them easily enough. It wasn’t hard to figure out their thoughts on the matter. In their selfish, loving way they didn’t want him pursue this matter further and risk his life yet again. Snape honestly didn’t want to either, but he had made a dangerous enemy last night and he couldn’t afford to let him run free. If McGunny survived, there was a chance he would come after him on his own to determine what Snape had told others, putting both himself and his godchildren at risk. There was also the simple fact that McGunny had aided the Germans in Harry’s abduction, and it was possible he was aiding them still or would cause additional mischief in the future.

At this rate, he might have to tell the Dark Lord, and the consequences for that would be dire. He had hidden some very significant facts for over six months, and even now may have allowed a suspected traitor escape. He needed to find the boy, find the truth, and then find a way out of this mess.

The 'old fashion' solution was the most obvious, but depending on what was making McGunny a psychotic encyclopedia of Dark Spells that might not be the best solution.

And frankly, it would be a pity to have to kill him. He was bright, sensible, and competent. The world needed more people like him, and he didn't like the idea of him increasing the ratio of stupid people to smart ones. It was high enough without his interference.

"Get me a medi-wizard. I need him to write some prescriptions for me, and then check out of here."

Both children opened their mouths to object, but he cut them off.

"That wasn't a suggestion. Either do it or I'll do it myself."

Draco let out an annoyed huff, but stalked out to do as he was told. Hermione just stood there, a horrified look on her face.

"What are you going to do?"

"My dear, the answer to that isn't going to make you any happier."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

"These tidings bode ill..." Voldemort murmured to himself, looking over the latest report Lucius had sent him. Severus had nearly been killed the night before. A bit of bad luck at any other time, but right now Germany was starting to behave strangely. He would consider these events unrelated, if it weren't for the fact that his protégé had made a brief but impressionable appearance around the same time in Germany. According to Morgan's spies, the boy had been found, but escaped not only his captures but the Aurors as well. The search that followed had yet to yield results, and more importantly, the Canis family hadn't reported in. Were they dead or merely attempting to flee after their failure? Either way Harry was in the wind and there was no telling when or if he would reappear.

It felt as if forces were at work protecting Harry, and that wouldn't be surprising in the least. He had made a powerful ally in the goddess Madris, and even now might have moved out of his sphere of influence. If the Hierophant card was anything to go by, he would have to accept that he didn't have as much control over Harry's destiny as he originally thought.

Ugh.

He needed to stop thinking about it. There were other things he did have control over that he should be utilizing right now. Germany was frantically searching for Harry, and in doing so had closed their borders, and more than likely irritated more than a few of its neighbors. It was a prime opportunity to write Queen Ophelia of what he had learned. She likely knew just as much if not more than he did, but the exchange of information was as symbolic as it was practical.

They were 'friends' now, and friends share gossip.

While he was slowly strengthening his alliance with France's queen, he could begin his work weakening Germany's alliances with its allies. The Netherlands, Belgium, Denmark, and Luxemburg, proud but small countries that had been held in a financial stalemate with Germany for decades, unable to afford to break away, yet unable to grow with the German Ministry's ever growing list of trade restrictions and tariffs. Suggesting an open trade market with them might be exactly what they needed to break that stalemate. He already had his people working on several trade proposals which would be sent out by the end of the week.

If everything went according to plan, Sweden, Finland, and Norway would open their borders if only to remain competitive with their southern neighbors. Spain and Portugal could go either way, but sharing a border with France made it more likely they would follow their example. Italy was a hopeless case. They had hated the British long before he had come to power and nothing had improved the situation since then. Eastern Europe was if-y, but they were also in an economic slump, meaning they had a lot of unemployed young men, which more often than not spelled a revolution. A revolution the Dark Lord wasn't opposed to stirring up for his own benefit.

But that was all years down the road. Right now, he needed to focus on France and Germany, and Britain itself. He had already scheduled a press release for Seibligg's latest blunder, informing them that Harry had runaway from them, and that the Minister was trying to blame 'Death Eaters'. He would ask them all to 'pray' for Harry's safe return. It would be the perfect opportunity to gauge his protégé's current popularity, as well as the public's outrage at Germany.

Everything was falling into place, except for Harry himself, and perhaps that was just how it was meant to be.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Harry woke when the car stopped. There was a moment of terror, an instant of knowing he was in danger and had left himself vulnerable. He started violently, nearly dropping his wand.

The world snapped into focus. He was still in the car with the werewolves. Stephen was still at the wheel, and Sylvia was still in back with the children, who had switched seats at some point so that Jane was now napping on the floor of the car.

Stupid! He snarled to himself. He had fallen asleep. Stephen could have snatched his wand out of his hand at any time. Why hadn't he? Had he not realized Harry was sleeping? Unlikely. The man saw everything.

"Where are we?"

The car had stopped at the side of the road. On either side of them stood trees, old trees, thick and tall, reaching high into the air. Flowers crowded along the roadside, whites and purples and yellows, gradually slipping into the forest. The place gave him an odd feeling.

"About two miles from the next town," Stephen said. "You need to decide now if you're going to stay with us for the full moon or get out there. I can't guarantee your safety either way."

“Tonight is the full moon?”

“Yes.”

“What would you have done if we made it to the port?”

“Not that it’s any of your business... but our contact there was supposed to have Wolfsbane potion.”

Harry’s first thought was that Stephen was too damn trusting. The ‘potion’ could just as easily been poison. His second thought was that he was too damn jaded. His third was that he didn’t know what would happen if were left around muggles during the full moon. He would be completely uninhibited. Magic would be inevitable, and if he did it in front of anyone, things could get very bad very quickly in many different ways. Spending the night with werewolves, however, presented more obvious pitfalls.

Pitfalls he already had experience dealing with.

“I’ll go with you.”

Stephen gave him a weird look. “You’re a lunatic.”

“The word ‘lunatic’ has its root in the Latin word for ‘moon’, you know, so you’re absolutely correct.”

“Whatever, don’t come crying to me if we eat you.”

They stopped at the town anyway to get some food, gas, and a map, and Harry found out exactly where they were. The Black Forest. Arguably, the most magical forest in the world. Nearly 4,600 sq mi of mountains and forests and rivers that the muggles knew about, and another eight or nine thousand sq mi that only wizarding kind did. Well, wizarding kind and the fae.

They were at the north end of the forest range, and drove for an hour on the mountain highway, before turning off onto a dirt road. After forty-five minutes of squeezing between the encroaching trees and being tossed about by the rocky, uneven road, they couldn’t go any further, and got out to walk for another forty minutes. Only Harry brought supplies. The werewolves would have no need of shelter or food once the transformation was upon them. The forest would provide.

They had wanted to bring chains to secure themselves from running off and tearing apart any hapless hikers or from getting separated once the sun rose, but Harry had convinced them he could create a ward much more effective and a lot less damaging to them. While the werewolves waited anxiously, the sky slowly beginning to dim as it sun settled in the west, Harry walked a large circle around their 'camp', writing runes in the air with a fiery 'Flagrante' spell.

He had the very distinct impression that he was being watched. By what exactly, he didn't know, but he didn't think it was anything... human. Fairies, he thought, but couldn't be certain. If they didn't want to be seen, he wouldn't see them. If they did want to be seen... he might be in a bit of trouble.

He was a bit old to be spirited away, but that didn't mean they wouldn't take advantage of him being right in the middle of their territory. The Black Forest was notoriously dangerous due to their abundance. Handfuls of people, wizard and muggle alike, disappeared in there without a trace every year. The werewolves would be fine. As far as fairies were concerned, they were already apart of their realm, and didn't bother with them.* So ten minutes before sunset, he magicked himself a platform up in the trees, and climbed up, then placed additional protective wards around himself.

Then it was only a matter of waiting.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

"Mom, will you relax? I'm fine," McGunny assured his mother, who had been bursting into tears randomly since she had arrived at his hospital room. He understood it was her love for him that made her so upset, but it was starting to get tiresome.

St. Hababa's was a teaching hospital not far from the university, and therefore the first place his landlady, Mrs. Anselfeldt, had thought to take him after finding him a bloody mess on the floor of his room. One of the tenants was a medical student and had managed to stop the bleeding long enough to get him there, and after that things had gone fairly smoothly as far as a rather shaken McGunny could tell. It was his first time being critically injured by a curse, so he had no other incident to compare it to.

They had made him swallow a lot of potions and dipped his lacerated arms into vats of warm ooze, all of which left him numb and disoriented, but blessedly free of pain and with more blood inside of him than out.

A Sentinel had come to question him about what appeared to be a rather nasty assault. McGunny had told him he didn't recognize the assailant. The man had been crazed, ranting about him owing him money, and then started tossing out spells before finally apparating away. He said he thought it was some sort of addict high or drunk on some sort of potion. The Sentinel hadn't believed him, but since McGunny was the obvious victim he wasn't in a position to accuse him of anything.

"I know, I know, it's just..." she sniffled. "When I went to your apartment to get your clothes and wand, I saw all of that blood... It's just too horrible. You could have died and I just can't... I just can't..."

"It's fine, mom. I'm fine. Why don't you go fire call dad and the kids, and let them know I'm okay? They're probably worried."

"Ah, you're right. I'm being selfish making them wait. I'll be back in a few minutes, alright?"

"No worries, I'm not going anywhere," he assured her, managing a little smile as she walked out the door. When she was out of sight, he let his smile drop, and climbed out of bed. He grabbed the bag she had brought with his change of clothes, and after checking the hallway, walked away.

He didn't know if Professor Snape was dead or alive or how he had found out about his involvement with Harry's abduction, but he couldn't risk sticking around for another confrontation. The chances were high that someone like Snape would have informed someone else of where he was going last night and why.

He stepped into an empty patient room and changed into his street clothes, then walked straight out into the lobby, passed the check-in desk, and out into London. After that he apparated into the muggle part of the city, inside the attic of pub he had never been in. Tom was guiding him now. This was all Tom's fault, but that didn't change the fact he was the only one who could save him, even if it was only to save his own incorporeal ass.

You'll like Germany, the evil spirit purred, There's a lot of history there, and good food.

"Fuck you. I may have killed my potions teacher because of you."

Believe me when I say, he had it coming.

"You've ruined my life."

I'll make you a better life. It'll be fun. Harry will be there.

"You leave him alone, you freaky pervert."

Now you're just being childish. You always knew it could come to this. You should be thankful that you are even alive.

As annoying as Tom was, he was right about that. He was thankful to be alive. He would be more thankful if he knew he was going to stay that way.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Harry watched in child-like fascination as the Canis family began to transform beneath him. He was too high up for a really good view, even with his improved vision, but it was still mesmerizing to watch as smooth naked flesh turned black with coarse hair, and bones rearranged themselves in painful snapping sounds. It all took less than a minute, but it left an excited thrill in Harry.

This was the first time he had been with werewolves during a transformation since the summer ritual. He rocked himself anxiously as he watched them gather together below him, sniffing and licking at each other in greeting.

He wanted to go down and say hello too.

As if he had heard the boy's thought, the alpha male suddenly looked up at him and gave short, querying bark. Harry made a little whine, but didn't go down. He wasn't afraid of the wolves, but the little creatures that were starting to close in on his perch.

"Komm doch herunter," a wood sprite said, hanging above him from a higher branch like bat, his stick-like fingers curled under his pointed chin. Black, pupil-less eyes smiled down at him, and Harry fought the urge to smile back.

"You'll kidnap me," he pointed out.

The sprite shrugged. "Probably."

"I'm always getting kidnapped. It's no fun at all."

"Then they obviously ain't do'n it right."

Laughter broke out in the surrounding trees, but in the darkness of the branches Harry was having difficulty finding the sources. Maybe it was the trees themselves.

"Won't work, won't work," someone chirped, and a moment later another fae appeared, a body of pheasant and the human-ish head hopped up and down at the far end of the branch, causing his platform to pitch to the side a bit. "Too much like the serpent king, hiss hiss, slither slither. No time for wine, food, or women. Sounds the war drums, drums, drum, drums. All blood and no battle makes Tom a dull boy."

More laughter through out the trees, and Harry found himself getting annoyed. He enjoyed a good laugh or too, but these fools had the humor of drunks and babies.

“If you’re going to laugh at nothing, do it somewhere else.”

More laughter this time, and it didn’t stop. It dragged on for several minutes, grating at his nerves, until at last he flung out his wand and sent out a wind hex, shaking the trees violently. The fae hiding there let out terrified shrieks, and a few of them even fell, although not very far. Most of the tree dwelling fae had wings or gliders of some kind.

“Serves them right. Obnoxious little runts,” a voice said in English.

Harry looked down at his side, and found a raven standing next to him. Inside the ward.

“How did you get in here?” Harry asked curiously, not in the least afraid. In fact, the higher the moon got the less concerned about the fae he was becoming.

“I’m not a fairy. Those wards don’t work on me,” the raven said, his voice deep and smooth, strange for bird known for its high and coarse calls.

“What are you then?”

The raven fluffed up its feathers and then hopped up to a higher branch so they could stare more directly at each other.

“I’m a familiar. My name is Bobby.”

That made Harry grin. “Bobby?”

“Well, technically it’s Bobitimus Tarotte IV, but that comes off as a bit pretentious, don’t you think?”

“Quite. I’m Harold James Potter, but everyone calls me-“

“Harry. Yes, yes, I know about you. Everyone knows about you.”

Harry tilted his head, curiously. “Who’s everyone and how do they know?”

“The faery folk. The Seele Court, and the UnSeelie too. Madris’ people have been gloating about you for months. It’s very annoying.”

“Are you a part of the Fairy Courts?”

“No, no, didn’t I already tell you? I’m a familiar, not a fairy. Very big difference. They’d just wish they could get their hands on me.”

Harry was about to ask his newest guest a few more questions, but he was interrupted by the sound of a fiddle. As he listened, a flute of some kind joined in, and then a drum. Dancing music. Harry’s foot began to tap in rhythm.

“What is that?”

“Wedding party,” Bobby explained, “Mountain elves. You should go. A wizard would make the party complete. They won’t try and kidnap you there. It would be rude.”

“I haven’t been invited,” Harry said, although he was already thinking about it. He wanted to see the other fairy folk. He had never read or heard of a satisfying description of them. Already he could tell they had good music.

“Of course you have. Anyone who can hear the music is invited. That’s why they play it.”

“Well, if that’s the case.” He tucked his wand into his sleeve, and proceeded to climb down the tree. The horde of little creatures started to climb down after him, blocking any possible attempt to return to his perch, but he wasn’t interested in it any longer. He wanted to have fun tonight.

The werewolves were waiting for him when he reached the ground. He smiled at them. They moved forward as one, and he greeted them with his open hands, rubbing their large furry heads behind the ears and down their backs. The fur was coarse, just as he remembered Remus' being, yet soft in the undercoat. The werewolf pups jumped up on their hind legs, begging for his attention. It was a pity he didn't have more hands.

He moved forward and they followed after him or, in Stephen's case, wandered ahead in search of potential threats. Surrounded by them, Harry could feel their magic and their sheer physical presence, rippling against his senses, smelling of earthy things. Moss and flowers and musk and old blood. It was a homey, comforting smell.

They moved to the edge of the ward, and with a flick of his wrist the fiery rune floating in the air vanished. He had no intention of leaving his friends behind for this night. They followed the music deeper into the woods and higher up the mountain and Harry started to sway and move his feet to the music. Meanwhile, other fae began to gather. Not just the foolish tree dwellers either. White fairies, wood elves, High anytas, nymphes, satyrs, centaurs, harpies, horn gnomes, and peoples who appeared completely human, but whom Harry could sense were not. They all moved through the trees, on feet, wings, paws, and hooves, some dancing, some gliding, some cart wheeling, dressed in the finest silks and gold, in furs, in leaves, in absolutely nothing at all.

The music led them to a clearing, fairy lights floated everywhere, shining all around them like white Christmas lights. Harry stopped for a moment to admire it, and Bobby landed on his shoulder.

"Have fun," the raven said, "Just don't accept anything anyone offers you. It'll make for a very long morning after."

With that, Bobby flew from his shoulder, scattering a small flock of pixies, who chattered at him angrily. The wedding itself must have occurred earlier, for there was nothing ritualized in the party to suggest a ceremony. The bride and groom, mountain elves who appeared nearly human but for their glittering white limestone skin, danced at the center, their union marked in the extravagant brilliance of their Mithril adorned wedding attire and by the tender joy in their eyes as they stared at one another.

Very few of the people there spoke English or even German, but somehow Harry was able to convey everything he wanted to say in gestures and no one seemed confused. In many ways it wasn't that different from a werewolf celebration. Everyone danced and played, entertainers who were guests or guests who entertained moved about the clearing, charming and surprising them with their talents. Harry nearly busted a gut laughing as one elderly looking gnome folded up pieces of paper, like origami, and his creations proceeded to argue you with one another about who was best until their argument became so heated they all burst into flames. Another creature that Harry couldn't identify, struck up a conversation, and every time he looked away and then looked back something about him had change. The first time, only his eyes changed color, and Harry was certain he only imagined the difference. The next time he suddenly had a mustache. The third his eye brows were missing. By the sixth time, he had become a she, and Harry ran off before things got really weird. Harry ended up playing a few tricks of his own. Setting off fireworks from his wand and changing people clothes different colors were simple tricks, but it amused the simpler fairies plenty.

There was food and drink, which Harry reluctantly declined, and dancing that Harry did not. The elves seemed to find him particularly amusing, and since many of them were blessedly shorter than him, he found plenty of partners.

The werewolves lingered around the fringes of the party, playing with other werewolves and fairy canids and sneaking off with pieces of the food when no one was there to stop them.

The night passed in the simple celebration of life, and for a few hours Harry forgot about his past, his present, and his uncertain future and lived in the moment. The beautiful, beautiful moment.

The moon settled behind the mountains before the sun rose, and as it did, Harry felt his energy wane. He rested against a tree on the edge of the clearing, and quietly watched the rest of the party from there. The Canis family had found a grassy hill to curl up against, and were fast asleep by the time their bodies reverted back to their human form, oblivious to the revelry surrounding them. Harry too must have dozed off, because when Bobby alighted on his shoulder yet again, the wedding party was gone and only an old crone was left sitting across from him.

He stared at her for a long time, wondering if he were dreaming or if she were real and the fairy party had been a dream. She was rough and brittle being, like an old dead tree, her eyes and nose and mouth little more than knobs and gnarls in her bark-like skin. Indeed, if he were not looking right at her he would have mistaken her for deceased shrubbery.

“Her name is Cucuchoin Anan,” Bobby told him, his voice soft and dreamlike, adding to the uncertainty of his wakefulness. “She has a message from Madris.”

Harry suddenly sat up straighter, his attention caught. When the old crone spoke it was wheezy and barely discernable.

“Hywaa nabucuri nas ni d’hal.”

He waited for her to continue, but she said nothing more, merely stood and moved off into the trees, slower than seemed conceivable. It took her nearly three minutes to move two feet. Harry turned a confused look to the raven, who looked extremely amused.

“I don’t suppose that made any sense to you?”

“Certainly. It’s very basic crone.”

Harry looked at him expectantly. Bobby just preened his feathers.

“Aren’t you going to tell me what she said?”

“Aren’t you going to ask?”

“I wonder if ravens taste as bad as crow,” Harry muttered to himself. Bobby just laughed, and told him.

“It’s time to go home.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

BIN stands for Blood Identification Network. Works like a muggle DNA database. No machines involved, but a person does have to register with the Network to be quickly identified, and then additional information can be gathered such as medical records and emergency contact information. All Court officials and many public service jobs require this registration and Snape is no exception. There are other spells and potions that will identify a person using their blood or hair, but they’re less reliable or take longer.

In my universe, werewolves are technically a sort of fae. They are humans who are physically altered by a fairy curse, and as a result become ‘pagan’ not by choice but by the corruption of their spirit. Sirius told Harry that he and Remus will never go to heaven and so became pagans in a previous chapter, and this why.

And yes, Harry and Voldemort reunite in the next chapter.

Book V

Chapter 7: Kings & Princes

It occurred to Snape after leaving the hospital that perhaps his physician wasn't a complete idiot when he said it would be unwise to move for another day, and then as little as possible for a week. Whatever internal damage he had acquired due to McGunny's spell had been repaired, but it certainly didn't feel that way as he walked through the city streets. His insides felt bruised, and with every step he could feel each individual organ and muscle throb.

He had pocketed the Pain Relief potion prescribed to him without taking any, knowing once he did his investigative ability would evaporate and he may as well just lay around like a log, just as the medi-wizard had suggested. If the pain proved just as mentally debilitating as the potion he might consider taking some later.

"What's happened?" he asked a young man, a student most likely, crowded outside McGunny's room in the hall. There were nearly half a dozen other tenants there as well, looking curiously at the open door, but kept at bay by the glowing green line just outside of it. Inside, he could see a pair of Sentinels wandering around the room, taking pictures and collecting evidence.

"Someone got attacked this morning. Really early this morning. Woke up half the building."

"Really?" Snape said, feigning surprise. "Was anybody hurt?"

Another person, possibly the young man's girlfriend, eagerly butted in.

"Yeah, the guy who lived here was really messed up. The landlady had to take him to the hospital, but he should be okay. It's a crazy world though. I've been here for two years and nothings like this has happened before, and here this poor guy wasn't even here a week and it happened to him. Isn't it a crying shame?"

"Quite," Snape agreed solemnly. "Perhaps some of us should send him some flowers. Do you know what hospital he was sent to?"

“That’s good idea. I think he was taken to the university hospital. It’s the closest. You could always ask the landlady to be sure. She should be in her office.”

“Thank you, I’ll go do that.”

He did not go to question the landlady, who unlike the young gawkers would know he wasn’t another tenant and likely have been suspicious, but went straight to the university hospital. The nurse at the reception desk told him quite plainly that Mr. McGunny was not there, but something about her nervous, almost embarrassed expression told him that at one point he had been. Checking the sign-in roster proved that Mrs. Trudy McGunny had arrived to visit her son earlier that morning. She had not signed out yet.

When the nurse was once again distracted, he continued his search in the halls. It didn’t take long to find what he was looking for. The patient observation floor was nearly full, medi-wizards, nurses, interns, patients, and visitors roamed the crowded hallways, making it simple for him go unnoticed as he read the names of the medical files sitting in the slots beside every door. Within minutes, he found a file with McGunny’s name printed on it. The door was already ajar and he could hear voices coming from inside.

“He is not lost. For heaven’s sake, he’s not an idiot,” a woman said, frustrated and impatient. “He could have easily asked someone to help him find his way back. It’s been over two hours.”

“Er, yes, well... he was pretty heavily medicated. He probably stepped outside for something and got confused. I’m sure we’ll find him napping in one of the other patient rooms or something similarly harmless. Don’t worry-“

“You keep telling me not to worry, but what else am I suppose to do? My son was attacked last night and now he’s missing, and you expect me to not worry?”

“Madam, please-“

Snape walked away, cursing. He had missed his chance, by two hours apparently. His next stop would have been the boy's family home, but obviously that lead was already bust. Just as well, it saved him a trip to Salisbury.

He took a short break for lunch, ate some very bland soup (the only thing he didn't think would cause him agony to digest), took a few sips of pain potion, and tried to think of what to do next. He ended up returning to McGunny's apartment, by now devoid of investigators and gawkers, broke the ward to get inside (he had been to enough crime scenes to know how), and looked for any clues of where the young man may have gone or what might have been wrong with him.

He searched the most obvious places, the desk, chest, drawers, and closet, but came up with nothing. The only even slightly questionable thing was the closet, which had been expanded into a little sun room with a large skylight. There was only one feeble little plant in it, but if McGunny had only been there a few days he probably hadn't had the time to get any more. He was just starting to search the floorboards and the wall panels for hiding places, when it struck him.

Why would McGunny bother making a sun room for a plant he could just as easily have placed on his desk?

He went back to investigate the plant.

It was just a tiny thing, barely a sprig with two tri-lobed leaves, not that dissimilar from a maple. It was not a maple though. In fact, Snape couldn't identify it at all, and being a potions master with a rather vast mental encyclopedia of plants, that was a bit suspicious. He gave it a cursory sniff to see if he could identify it by smell. He cringed away. It reeked of spoiled blood.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Harry waited till late that morning to wake up Stephen and his family, tossing them their clothes and kicking them lightly on the feet. The look Stephen gave him when he finally opened his eyes promised death. Harry just smiled down at him, cheekily.

“Wake up, Sunshine. It’s time to get dressed.”

It suddenly occurred to Stephen that he was very naked... and so was his wife.

“Turn around, you little perv!”

Harry snorted.

“Like I haven’t seen naked people before. I’ve spent the night at werewolf colonies during the full moon. Hundreds of naked people all over the place.”

Stephen chuckled a rock at him, which Harry avoided easily. “Alright, alright. Just get dressed. I need to talk to you about something.”

Harry moved a ways down the clearing to a nest of boulders, and sat himself on top of one. Bobby appeared from out of the tree line and settled himself beside him. The raven had been hovering all morning, and Harry wasn’t so sure what to make of it. Surely his master would be expecting him back once Harry had received his message from Madris. Speaking of which...

“Who is your master, Bobby? Were they at the party last night?”

The raven tilted his head curiously at him. “My master is dead. Dead for a long time.”

“I’m sorry,” Harry said sincerely. “But why are you helping me?”

“Because I choose to.”

“Yes, but why?”

He tilted his head in the other direction, and Harry got the impression he was supremely amused. “You’ll make a fine new master. If you don’t get blown up.”

The young Gryffindor blinked at him. Oh no, most definitely not...

"Listen, Bobby, you're really interesting and all, but I've already got an owl... and a snake...and a godfather who can turn into dog. I don't think I can handle another familiar."

Bobby seemed to consider this for a moment then gave a little birdy nod.

"Okay. Then you can be my familiar. Ha ha."

Before Harry could protest, the raven had already flown off, laughing to himself as he went. The boy shook his head and wondered if the bird wasn't channeling Fred or George. A minute or so later, Stephen made an appearance, not looking any more happy to be awake than before.

"Where the fuck are we? What happened to the ward you put up? Don't tell me that was just a bunch of BS."

Something about irritating Stephen amused Harry or perhaps he was just feeling really good at the moment, but he couldn't keep the smile off his face.

"It's a bit complicated, but you don't have to get upset. You all weren't in any danger. I think you actually had a pretty good time. I know I did."

"Would you just spit it out already? This mysterious crap is just making you come off as a pervert. What did you want to talk about?"

Harry decided to have mercy on him... well, that and he didn't want to piss off the guy who was going to be taking him home.

"I think I'd like to go back to Britain after all."

Stephen just stared at him for a minute then glared suspiciously.

"Seriously?"

“Seriously.”

“What made you change your mind? Isn’t the Dark Lord trying to kill you or something?”

“I don’t know, but I know it’s safe enough for me to return now.”

“How do you know that?”

Harry really couldn’t help himself. It was just too perfect.

“A little birdie told me so.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

McGunny was scared of muggles. Strange as that was, with all his power and pragmatism, it was now an undeniable truth. For all of his life, a muggle had always been nothing more than an accepted idea, like great white sharks and Polynesians. Something you knew existed, but would never meet. Standing in the middle of a muggle department store, in the middle of an enormous building called a ‘mall’, surrounded by hundreds of these ‘accepted ideas’, McGunny was very close to having a panic attack.

At any moment he expected the notice-me-not charm on himself to fail and for dozens of people to suddenly turn to him and shout ‘DEMON!’ Exactly what would happen after that, McGunny wasn’t entirely sure. Logically, he could just apparate away and that would be the end of it, but for the life of him he couldn’t bring himself to calm down. Tom was getting very irritated with him.

Honestly, the spirit grumbled, you’re being ridiculous. Being scared of muggles is like being scared of boggarts. They’re only scary if you imagine they are.

“Yes, well I wouldn’t feel very comfortable walking through store full of boggarts either. Just tell me what we need so I can get out of here.”

You tell me. We're looking for your clothes.

Very true. They had already picked up a traveler's trunk from another store, and were now wandering around the largest clothing store McGunny had ever seen in order to fill it. The wizarding world have very few large corporations, and those few corporations were centered around specific products not the stores that sold them. McGunny hadn't been in a store not owned by a single family his entire life. Walking around the monstrosity known as 'Macy's' was dizzying.

It didn't help that he only recognized about half the items being sold, and that only twenty-five percent of the clothing being sold there would be anything a wizard would be caught dead wearing (although the women's section proved considerably more aesthetic if not for the complete lack of modesty in the juniors department). It drew out an already nerve-wracking experience.

Guilt, however, never factored in. He couldn't find it in himself to feel bad about the actual items he was stealing, because as much junk as this place had, he didn't think anyone would notice a couple of missing socks.

If it weren't for all the muggles, the Ravenclaw thought he might actually have enjoyed himself. He walked all over the place, sometimes picking up something he would wear and sometimes to just stare and wonder at myriad of strange items scattered around the store. What the hell was a camcorder anyway?

Another feeble attempt by muggles to be more like wizards, Tom sneered. McGunny didn't even bother to point out that since muggles supposedly didn't believe in wizards anymore, his comment didn't make much sense.

"How long should I pack for?" he asked instead.

A very long time.

What else had he been expecting?

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Chief Sentinel Andreas Morgan never really left the office. It followed him where ever he went, and home was no exception. Or rather it followed him to Erica's house. As far as he was concerned, the office was his home, and the only room in the London flat he shared with his wife he truly felt comfortable in was the study he set up solely for that purpose.

"I hope you like the peach marmalade, dear. Lydia just came back from visiting her cousin in the country, and brought us back a jar. She's such a sweet girl. I never could figure out why she and Ira didn't hit it off. They have so much in common..." Erica said lightly, continuing on with her usual inane chatter. Morgan didn't particularly like to chatter himself (which was good because he could barely get a word in edgewise once his wife got started), but with a career mired in conspiracy, terrorism, government cover-ups, espionage, and war, he liked to be reminded of the much simpler lives of the rest of his fellow citizens that he was helping to protect. And there were very few people as simple as Erica.

"Lydia and I have absolutely nothing in common," Ira said, joining them in the dining room. "Good afternoon, mother. Good afternoon, Andreas."

Morgan nodded politely to his stepdaughter, and continued with his lunch.

"Oh really, what do you have against Lydia? Certainly, she's better company than your bugs."

"I could write a treatise to the contrary."

"Honestly! No man, no friends, and only creepy crawlies for company. You're turning into a-"

Riiiiinnnggg.

Everyone in the room gave a startled jolt, and Erica dropped her cup, spilling coffee into her egg salad. The matron of the house let out an irritated huff.

“I hate that thing! It scares me every time.”

Riiiiinnnggg.

Morgan, however, felt a jolt of excitement. There were only a handful of witches and wizards who even knew how to work the muggle telephone, and only three of them knew his telephone number. He stood from the table and went to his study.

Riiiiinnnggg.

The phone was in the old style, black and elegantly carved. He picked up the receiver and placed it to his ear, mentally reminding himself not to shout into it.

“Hello?”

“Good afternoon.”

Morgan stiffened, instantly recognizing the voice on the other line.

“Mr. Potter.”

“... Chief Sentinel Morgan, isn't it? I would have thought someone else would be manning the Court phones.”

“How did you get this number?”

“A mutual friend. He's here with me now if you want to speak to him, but I'm afraid we don't have much time to spare. I only had enough change for a five minute call.”

“Where are you?”

“Some place I won't be in about five minutes. I only called to tell you I'm on my way. I'll leave it to you to inform all relevant parties.”

Morgan couldn't help but be surprised. The boy intended to return on his own? He wanted to ask why, but then thought better of it.

"Do you require any assistance?"

"Just tell me how to get back into the country. I'll take care of the rest myself."

If only his own men were so efficient.

"Are you familiar with the 'Chunnel'?"

"Yes."

"That's your best bet. It's the only way you can get directly into Britain from the mainland. Otherwise, you'll have to take a boat to Ireland, and take the floo network from there. Any above ground travel into Britain is likely to kill you."

"Good to know."

"There's something else. If you take the Chunnel, you'll have to get to France. Assuming you can do that, things get tricky. France doesn't allow the use of unregistered wands, and they have means of finding people who use them. If you use your wand, an alarm will go out and you'll find yourself in the custody of the French Wizarding Guard. I have no way of knowing if they'll return you to Britain or send you back to Germany, and I would rather not find out, so once you cross the border you can't use your wand for anything, not to hide yourself or shrink your luggage or fend off muggles. Nothing."

"...Shit. We'll need to buy tickets... no we're not robbing a bank in Germany...because my guardian believes in corporal punishment... no, you would not like him. He'd blame you for corrupting me and turn you into a rug...I don't know Noah, he'd probably turn you into a hat or something... Shut up, Bobby..." Who else was there? Their replies were too far away to make out. When Potter spoke again it was directed at Morgan. "That may be a bit problematic. We're essentially broke here. Don't suppose I could borrow a couple hundred Euros?"

No, never mind. We'll figure something out. I'll contact you again later."

"Potter-"

The line went dead. The cheeky little bugger. Morgan almost smiled, but movement out of the corner of his eyes stole the opportunity. Erica and Ira were standing at the study door, both wide-eyed and perfectly silent. He had forgotten how quiet women could be when they wanted to snoop. He glowered at both of them.

"What exactly did you hear?"

For once, Erica couldn't seem to find anything to say and just sort of floundered for a bit. Ira, however, was more curious than cautious.

"That was Harry Potter, wasn't it? And he's trying to get back home... on his own... without magic... and probably a lot of people after him."

So they heard everything. He seriously hoped that wouldn't prove problematic later. He didn't like messing with people's memories, particularly in his own house. It tended to make people flakey or paranoid.

"Essentially," he said darkly, pleased when she flinched. "Since you seem so interested in matters of national security, you can assist me. I need to go to talk to the Dark Lord. I want you to find Professor Snape and inform him there has been a development in the Potter case. He'll know where he needs to go."

She looked ready to protest, but then thought better of it. In all honesty, she had nothing better to do. And she was interested. Very, very interested. Perhaps if she helped now, he would tell her more later... or maybe Snape would tell her something. Impossible wretch though he was.

"Very well. Where can I find him?"

"He should still be at St. Mungo's. He was attacked last night in London. If he's already checked out, he should be at Malfoy Manor.

Erica, you stay here and wait by the phone. If it rings, take a message. And whatever you do, don't give them your real name."

Ira frowned at the mention of an attack on the professor, but Morgan was already heading towards the living room where the floo was located, ignoring Erica's protests and unlikely to answer her questions. She decided Snape had probably said something obnoxious to the wrong person and got into a tussle. It couldn't have been too bad if he was supposed to check out today.

"Well, that's that," she sighed. "I best do as he says. I'll see you later, mother."

She kissed her still flustered mother on the cheek, and headed for the door. She hated the floo and the hospital wasn't far, so she decided to walk. Half an hour later she walked into St Mungo's main lobby and learned Snape had already checked himself out. She apparated to Nottingham, and from there hired a carriage to take her to the Malfoy Estate, inaccessible by apparation or floo.

A house elf greeted her at the gates, and once she told him her business, it disappeared with a loud 'pop'. A few minutes later, the gates opened, and the carriage brought her to the manor house. Narcissa Malfoy met her on the marble steps personally, and this made Ira more than a little nervous. It was no secret that Lady Malfoy could be down right dangerous if you got on her bad side.

"Ms. Beadle," she greeted stiffly with a slight inclination of her head. Ira made a subtle curtsy.

"Lady Malfoy, thank you for seeing me."

The older woman dismissed her greeting with a wave of the hand. "I am afraid your errand is in vain. Professor Snape is not here."

Now Ira was getting frustrated. She had spent nearly an hour trying to find him, and he just didn't seem to want to be found. Not by her at least. She did her best to keep the frustration from her voice when addressing her host.

"I see. Do you know where he might be?"

Now here Lady Malfoy looked annoyed, and Ira wondered if she weren't in trouble.

"On some stupid, manly mission of revenge, no doubt. Couldn't even wait for his hand to heal, the fool."

Ira didn't know what to say to that, so she kept quiet. The older woman let out an annoyed sigh. "He'll stumble back here at some point. Would you like me to leave him a message?"

"Ah...yes. Would you tell him Chief Sentinel Morgan needs to speak with him as soon as possible?"

"Can I ask what about?" There was a definite glint of curiosity, but Ira wasn't sure if Morgan would care if she knew or not.

"He didn't tell me," she said, and Lady Malfoy seemed to accept that. It wasn't like Ira had any business know anything about what her stepfather did. "I'm sorry to have taken up your time. Thank you again."

She walked back to the carriage, unaware of Lady Malfoy's speculative look as she climbed inside and out of view. As the carriage left the Malfoy Estate, Ira was stuck with the question of what to do now. Andreas had intended for her to find Snape, but he couldn't have known the man would prove so difficult. Unfortunately, she had no way of contacting her stepfather about her difficulties, and this matter was definitely an important one.

Harry Potter was trying to come home. The thought of the child attempting it all on his own, was both frightening and captivating. What kind of a person must he be to do that? She, like so many of her fellow countrymen, had read the papers and heard of his many fantastical exploits, and she often felt like a school girl reading a favorite book. One where the hero triumphs against impossible odds and gets the girl at the end. Her brief visit with the boy's guardian had shaken her image of the boy, however. The guardian had laughed. Not a cruel laugh really, but a very tired one, tinged with irony. What did Snape know that she didn't? Afterwards, she had started to think about it, really think about it, and realized something.

Harry Potter was surrounded by people who terrified Ira. Lord Voldemort wasn't even the worst of them, and he was formidable all his own. There was also Bellatrix Lestrange, Lucius Malfoy, various people who tried to kill him, and werewolves and others whose vicious reputations preceded them. The more she thought about it, the more impressed she was with him. If she had been in his position, she would have curled up on the floor at St. Mungo's by now.

And he was coming back to that. He was willingly and intentionally coming back to that.

If he was willing to that, Ira decided, the least she could do was make sure his guardian knew about it. She needed to try something clever and unexpected. Something Harry Potter might do.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

"Not far now, my darling familiar," Bobby sang as he soared beside Harry's window. Inky black feathers glistened in the afternoon sun, guiding them through the plains to a place not listed on any map.

"Bobby, for the last time, I'm not your familiar. And are you sure it's still there?"

"Yes, yes. I know these things. The fae only wish they could get their hands on me for all these things I know."

Harry hoped that was true, because as far as he could tell Bobby was leading them absolutely nowhere. The road had turned to gravel miles back, and he was starting to feel the beginnings of car sickness again. At least they were out of the mountains, the land spreading out around in vast fields, broken by the occasional wooded glen and shallow river that flowed down from the mountains. The air here had the cleanliness of the mountains, but not the eerie feeling the fae of the forest left on their lands.

"I cannot believe we're following a bird," Stephen muttered, for probably the hundredth time. The werewolf's dislike of magical beings, his wife notwithstanding, left him leery of Bobby. The raven's insistence that it knew a secret route to get passed the wards surrounding Germany made him downright reticent. However, they were following Harry, the only one who genuinely seemed to want to help them and actually had the capability of doing so.

And Harry was following Bobby.

"Don't worry about it. Even if this falls through, it's not like we're not heading in the right direction. There has to be a dozen different places to cross the Rhine around here."

"The Bridges will all be monitored," Stephen pointed out.

"Then we'll find someone to take us across by boat. They can't monitor every muggle tugboat and dingy out there," Sylvia pointed out.

By now, the children were all starting to come out of their post transformation lethargy, and were actually starting to get excited. Harry's tale of the night before and Bobby's confirmation of it had them giddy. They had also never seen so much open space in their young, disadvantaged lives, and were eager to explore this strange new world.

"Are we going to live in France?" John asked, uncertain of the idea.

"No, baby, we're not going to live in France. We're going somewhere even better."

"Like England?"

There was an uncertain silence, and Stephen spoke first. "I don't know. I don't know how the English handle werewolves."

There was a pointed look at Harry, which made him feel rather silly for not having told them all about it sooner. Of course, earlier they hadn't been allies, and once they were they were usually too busy with other things.

"It's a lot different than here," Harry said. "Probably as different as you can get. Werewolves don't live with other wizards or muggles. They live in... colonies... or clans I guess. Packs. There are territories all over the UK, mostly woodlands, where only werewolves live. And all the werewolves live in these territories, and they can't leave but no one else can enter either, and it's... kind of a feudal era setup. They build their own houses and hunt their own food, but they also had trading posts where they can exchange goods with wizards without crossing into each other's spaces. They're actually pretty rich. They have a monopoly on the fur and potion ingredient's market, and Voldemort is a friend of the Head Alpha."

"Head Alpha?"

"He's sort of... the werewolf king, I guess. All the packs have an alpha, a chieftain, they follow, but all the alphas still have to follow the Head Alpha. He's kind of a jerk actually, but he does a good job. No one ever goes cold or hungry, as far as I can tell. He throws really great parties during the summer solstice."

Stephen gave him an odd look out of the corner of his eye. "You've met him? This werewolf king?"

Harry gave him sardonic grin. "Oh yes. He tried to turn me into a werewolf once. Oh, and he almost killed my godfather, who also happens to be the next in line for Head Alpha, and part of the reason why we can all be such good friends during the full moon."

"...That explains a whole lot, and is at the same time extremely confusing."

Bobby flew in through the car window and landed in Harry's lap, distracting them once again.

"Turn off the road here. There's an abandoned manor house a little ways up. Beyond that is the entrance to the tunnel. Humans don't know about it anymore. Not muggles or wizards."

Harry stroked Bobby's back gently, conveying his appreciation, which the raven definitely seemed to enjoy it.

"Then how do you know about it?"

"The dwarves know about it. They use it every couple of years to move their goods. They'd trust a tunnel under a river rather than a bridge over a river any day."

"And wizards don't know about it?"

"Humans make nasty thieves. Wizards are the nastiest. Too smart and too dumb at the same time. Except for you, of course. You're a doll."

Harry rolled his eyes. Sure enough though, after a minute or so they came upon an abandoned manor house, easily four hundred years old, the windows all empty of glass and the stone infested with ivy. It would have been a great place to explore, but they didn't want to linger anywhere for long. The tunnel entrance was behind the house, disguised as a tomb. All around lay the graves of the land's previous owners, the names worn away by time and the elements. The rusted iron gate blocking the entrance practically disintegrated in his hand as he and Stephen pulled it open.

"What do you think?" Stephen asked, looking down into the darkness, "Do you think the car will fit?"

"For right now, yeah, but it'll be tight. We won't be able to open the doors once inside, and if it gets narrower or turns too sharply? We'd be in trouble. Bobby, how familiar are you with this tunnel?"

Bobby was perched on the iron gate, looking inside rather curiously himself.

"I've never been inside," he said, "It shouldn't get any narrower. The dwarves have very large carts for being such short people."

They thought about it for a minute or so, and Stephen made the decision.

“It’s can’t be that far. Two or three miles at the most. You and I will walk in front, Sylvia will drive the car behind us with the head lights on. If we hit any obstacles, we can move them out of the way or break the windows and help them crawl out, and we’ll all walk the rest of the way.”

And that’s what they did. With the car’s headlights shining behind them, Stephen and Harry lead the way into the darkness. The tunnel itself was in good repair, probably by the dwarves who were very finicky about their tunnels, but also cold and wet and very, very dark. To stave off claustrophobia, they talked about Harry’s experience with werewolves in his home country.

Harry told them about the Summer Solstice celebration, about the Moon Goddess they worshiped, the Head Alpha Fenrir Greyback, his godfathers Sirius Blackbone and Remus Slivermoon, about the goddess possessed Luna and now Diana, about the trades, the foods, the fights, the arts, and everything Harry could think of. He wasn’t exactly trying to convince Stephen that he might be happy amongst one of Greyback’s packs, but he held such a fondness for the people it more than likely reflected in his descriptions. Stephen said very little; accept to ask for examples or for him to elaborate every so often. For the most part, he remained deep in thought. Bobby, who rode on Harry’s shoulder the entire way, remained nearly as attentive and even quieter.

What felt like hours later, though it couldn’t have been more than one, they saw the faint glow of sunlight in the distance, which grew brighter and brighter with every step. At its end, they were bathed in the heat of the summer air, the chill of the underground and their own soaking wet feet, began to warm in the light.

Turning to one another, they couldn’t help but grin and laugh. They had made it. They were free. Now they just had to get home.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

“Professor Snape!”

The potions master stiffened and turned, mentally cursing himself for not realizing he was being followed before hand. He was exhausted and in more than a little pain, but that was no excuse. It could have been McGunny coming up behind him to finish what he started the night before. Fortunately, it was not the elusive little hellion, but a woman he thought vaguely familiar.

"Madam?" he said cautiously, as she hurried towards him as fast she could without knocking into anyone on the busy walk way. It was a little after five, and most everyone was heading home for the evening or out to eat, crowding shoulder to shoulder with their fellow Londoners. Snape very much wanted to go home himself, but thought he might have to settle for a hotel. With no further leads for finding McGunny, he had visited the local flower shops in hopes of identifying the plant, and its significance if any. No one had known what to make of it, and he was thinking he would have to try Knockturn Alley for answers, but he knew better than to attempt it in his current condition. He would have to try again in the morning, unless the woman before him had a reason for stopping him. He seriously hoped not. He was tired.

"Professor Snape, thank goodness I found you. I've been looking everywhere for you," she said, breathing heavily from her pursuit. She looked him up and down, and frowned critically. "You're a mess, sir. You should be in bed."

"Very true," he said blandly, and turned to leave, "I was just about to do just that."

"Wait! You probably don't remember me, but we met at the court a few days ago. You laughed at me."

Oh, yes, now he remembered. Myra or Ira or something Beadle, the bug woman. He turned back to her, and waited expectantly.

"I have a message from my stepfather." She looked around at the crowd of people, and then at Snape, her brows furrowed in uncertainty. "I think you should come home with me, Professor."

You're in no shape to be about, and this is sensitive information. Would you please come with me?"

He thought to protest, remind her that taking home men she barely knew would do her reputation no good, but he was tired and she was already signaling for a coach. Plus she had already taken his plant from him, and he wasn't about ready to wrestle her for it in the middle of the sidewalk with only one good hand. When the coach pulled up for them, he climbed into the cabin and leaned back into the seat, fighting off the urge to sleep. If he wasn't careful he'd collapse for certain.

"How did you find me?" he asked, genuinely curious, if a bit tired.

"It wasn't easy. None of the tracking spells I tried seemed to work, and neither the hospital or Lady Malfoy seemed to know where you had gone. It's a good thing I have a few tricks up my sleeve."

From her sleeve, she pulled out what looked like a silver toothpick, but when she brought it to her mouth it wasn't to clean her teeth. A little chirp, not unlike a cricket emanated from the tiny instrument, and a moment later a large black moth fluttered towards her and landed on her outstretched pinky. Snape was a bit alarmed to realize that it had come from somewhere in the folds of his robes.

"This is Marty," she told him. "He a breed of moth in the Saturniidae family. A very interesting species. A male can find a single female within six miles using only molecules it catches in its antennae. That's a hundred times more sensitive than a dog's nose. I've been training them at the university to find people for law enforcement purposes. Congratulations. You're the first successful trial."

"Honored, to be sure," he said flatly. "Now, perhaps, you can tell me why you went through the bother?"

She blinked and suddenly became more flustered. Apparently, she had been more prepared in finding him, than actually speaking with him.

“Of course. My stepfather received a call... I mean he was contacted by Mr. Potter today.”

Snape grimaced. That was all he needed. Potter come to make things more complicated and uncomfortable again.

“But of course. Is he still in one piece?”

“I didn’t get to speak with him myself, but I don’t believe he was injured. He informed Andreas that he was coming home. I don’t know if he said when or where exactly. Andreas told me to find you and said you would know what needed to be done. Though, I don’t think he knew you were wandering around London, hunting muggers and shopping for house plants at the time.”

“It’s for a potion,” Snape said quickly. “I meant to pick it up yesterday, but I didn’t factor in the random malice of the universe.”

She nodded. “You should stay at the house tonight. Andreas should be back eventually, and you can talk more with him then.”

“You live with your stepfather?”

Ira blushed, embarrassed. At twenty nine, she knew very well she should have a husband and children, or at the very least her own apartment, but life hadn’t been considerate of society’s expectations.

“For now,” was all she answered, and quickly changed the subject. “What is Harry Potter like?”

“Trouble some,” Snape said, and by his tone he meant it. “Everything he touches gets complicated.”

She gave him a long, hard (or as hard as she seem capable of) look, frowning thoughtfully. “Do you not like him?”

The potions master laughed softly, a quieter version of the laugh he’d had at the Court. “Like I said. Complicated. Now please be quiet. I need to think.”

They rode the rest of the way in silence.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Fleur expected to come home to an empty house. Her parents and sister were off in Sète, sailing their yacht and soaking up the sun. She had to stay behind, her apprenticeship at the Royal Military Academy of Paris keeping her close to home. In another week, she would be assigned to a Master, and would be living under his or her roof while attending the Academy. For now, she just had to mentally prepare herself for the separation, this one more final than any she had had while attending Beauxbatons or even Hogwarts. When she left home, it would be as an adult, and she ached with both pride and homesickness at the thought of it.

Pride and homesickness were the furthest thing from her mind, however, when she came home not to an empty house, but Harry Potter sitting on her doorstep. His hair was Weasley Orange, and his glasses were nowhere in sight, but even so she knew instantly it was him when he grinned at her.

She blinked at him dumbly for a moment, and then grinned back. She threw her arms around him and laughed.

"You scallywag," she said in English. "Ow did you get 'ere? You are zupost to be running wild in Germany. Zey say you were abducted by Death Eaters, and zen zey say you are a werewolf. Pah! No one believes it."

"That's good, cause it's utter bollocks."

"Urry, now, come inside before anyone sees you."

They stepped in her house, and he let out an appreciative whistle at the granite floors and high arching ceilings. The entire place was a mix of Arte Nouveau and Baroque, an elegant combination of curves and extreme detail. It was beautiful and contemporary by wizarding standards, and Harry thought it suited Fleur every well. There were no house elves, but a maid was there to accept their cloaks and offer refreshment. Harry watched her nervously, but Fleur assured him that Nadia was well trained in the art of discretion. If she knew who Harry was, she would never admit it.

To anyone.

They went into the study, however, and closed the doors. Harry highlighted what had happened, firstly about the Auror attack in the cemetery, then about Stephen picking him up and telling him that it was safe to return to Britain (a little fib, but he didn't have time to get into the entire complicated mess) and that they were werewolves, and then of the second Auror attack and their inability to escape to the North Sea, about his acquiring Bobby in the Black Forest and him leading them into France, and finally that the Canis family were hanging out in a park around the corner and waiting for him. They intended to spend the night in Paris and head into Britain the next morning. Which brought him to the real reason why he was there.

"I know this is really rude of me, and I wouldn't ask if I could think of another way, but... do you think I could borrow some muggle money? I mean, if you have any or know how to get any or... something. Or know how I could get some really quick... without using my wand, cause that's really not an option..."

His ears burned at having to ask. He had never had to beg for money. Not at the Dursley's, not at Hogwarts, and not at Snapes (unless it was to buy groceries which didn't count). To do it from Fleur, a friend who risked a great deal by helping him, was even more humiliating. She just smiled at him though, and kissed him on the cheek.

"If zat is all you need, I am 'appy to 'elp. Ah, zis is zo romantic. Just like in my book. Kidnapped princes escaping across borders with ze 'elp of strange of allies. I'll be in 'istory books for zis one day. Just wait."

He smiled a bit at that. "You're already in history books, remember? The Triwizard Tournament? All the champions saving each others lives, before Durmstrang got all weird on us."

She laughed and led him out of the study and up a flight of stairs to the bedrooms.

“Just wait. Ze two of us, we are just getting started. We will ‘ave eternal glory and fame. You in ze service of your King, and I in ze service of my Queen.”

“Don’t forget Viktor. He has a master of his own that he serves,” Harry said, trying to bite back his disappointment there. He didn’t blame Viktor for his choice. Of the two of them, Viktor’s choice was probably the more morally sound. It just happened to make them enemies, as well.

“Ah, poor Viktor,” she sighed, “e does not understand true rulers cannot pick and choose ‘zer battles based on morality like Dumbledore. Zey must face all dilemmas with all the resources available to zem, even zose zat bring zuffering. A nation is built with sweat and blood, ‘Arry, with love and with pain. It is maintained ze same way.”

Harry considered her words. He was starting to see, or perhaps he had always seen and was only now starting to understand what she meant. Voldemort was a Dark Lord, a ruler steeped in murder and manipulation. But so was Seibligg. Harry might not have seen it like he had with his mentor, but he sensed it when he met him and with the barbarism his Aurors had displayed towards the Canis family and himself. He knew the Old Ministry had its own list of crimes it had to answer for. Fenrir Greyback ruled his people with a more honest brutality, but it was no less violent, and he knew intuitively that Sirius would not be any kinder when it was his turn to take over. He couldn’t afford to be soft.

The more he thought about it, the more it seemed like no ruler could afford that.

They reached Fleur’s room, sensually decorated in rich blue velvets and gleaming hardwoods. She had a small writing desk, which she opened and pulled out a silver jewelry box. Inside was a large wad of muggle money. She handed the entire thing to Harry.

“My Aunt Suki zent it to me as a graduation present. She always zays zat muggles always ‘ave ze best shoes. Zis is very true, but I won’t be wearing anyzing but my uniform boots for at least a year. Zo zere you are. You ‘ave one year to pay me back.”

Looking through the wad of money, several hundred Euros worth, Harry wondered how many shoes her aunt intended for her to buy. She walked him back to the door, hugged him again, wished him luck, and opened the door for him...

And then slammed it closed again in Viktor’s startled face.

She turned to Harry. “Was zat who I zot it was?”

The Gryffindor could only stand there and wonder the exact same thing for a moment. There was a knock on the door. Neither of them moved to open it.

“Fleur, open da door. I know he’s dere already.”

“Go away, Viktor. You are not in Germany anymore.”

“Harry, please just open da door. I only vant to talk to you.”

They gave each other an uncertain look, but eventually Harry just sighed and nodded. Fleur opened the door again. Viktor scowled at the both of them.

“What are you doing here, Viktor?” Harry asked, exasperated.

“Ven Dumbledore found out you left Cologne already, he sent me to France on da very slime chance dat you might head here after the ports closed in the north. How did you even get out of Germany?”

“How did you?” Harry challenged.

“Dumbledore... he has his ways,” the Bulgarian said.

“And I have mine. You should know by now I’m a sneaky little bastard.”

Viktor's mouth twitched into the beginnings of a smile, but he quickly smothered it. "Dat I do. Vat are you intending to do, Harry?"

Harry considered lying, telling Viktor that he was going into hiding and never be seen from again. It seemed a possible way of avoiding another fight with him, one that he couldn't use a wand for and didn't want to drag Fleur into. It would also break any trust that still lingered in the face of Harry's defection.

"I'm going home, Viktor."

"To Voldemort?" the older boy accused.

"And Hermione," he snapped back, "and my godfathers, and Draco, and Clyde, and Ginny, and Fred and George, and everyone else who gives a damn about me for reasons other than what I can do for them."

Viktor's grit his teeth, frustration bubbling to the surface. "You told me yourself that the Dark Lord wants you did. That taking you out of Britain saved your life. I saved your life."

"So did Voldemort. So did Professor Snape and Vesper Larousse and Sirius and Remus. They all saved my life. And a dozen others made it worth living. I am not going to turn my back on them for you. I'm not going to betray them for that psycho Minister or a country that doesn't mean a damn thing to me!"

"What about Dumbledore, Harry? He could have given you life outside the killing and political games and dark magic. He still can. Just come with me and I'll take you back to him."

"And do what? Hide the rest of my life? Fight against 'evil'? I'm sorry Viktor, but I don't see a future there. I don't know what he wants, and frankly I don't care anymore. I can do more good in Britain, than I can do hiding behind his robes."

"Harry, Voldemort will kill you!"

“Not anymore, he won’t. I know what I have to do. And I know you have to do what feels right to you, but you’re not going to change my mind. I’m going home.”

Harry stepped out of the house and around Viktor, who just watched slack jawed as he walked away. He didn’t move to stop the other boy, although once he was out of sight, he curled his fingers in front of him as if to strangle the memory of Harry in midair.

“Nichts ist diesen Ärger wert!”

Fleur couldn’t help but smile at her friend’s foolishness. Viktor might not understand (or simply refused to understand) what Harry had said, but he was still a good guy. He would not force Harry to do something he didn’t want to do. Not intentionally.

“Come inside, my irate friend. I’ll make you something to drink. Something with Vodka.”

He looked ready to snap something at her, but then couldn’t seem to settle on anyone particular thing before finally giving up and slumping inside. She patted him on the arm sympathetically, and led him towards the parlor. Two Triwizard Tournament champions visiting her illegally in one day. She wondered what her future Master might have to say about that, and grinned.

It appeared as if life had no intention of slowing down for her any time soon.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Harry and the Canis Family ordered Chinese food and crashed in their hotel room, everyone exhausted but happy with their adventure. In the evening, Harry stayed with the kids in the hotel, watching the Little Mermaid in French which Jane translated, going so far as to sing along with the songs she had memorized by heart (it was her favorite movie), while Stephen and Sylvia went for a walk in the most romantic city in the world.

When husband and wife returned, Harry had already had them bathed and put to bed. Stephen pulled Harry outside for a little talk of their own, highlighting their final plans for the next day.

"If we go to the UK," Stephen started out, "Will they let us leave or are we going to have to stay at one of these... colonies?"

Harry thought about it for a long time, and finally answered, "I don't know. I don't know if Voldemort ever intended you to get this far. He might let you go if he thought you would keep quiet about the 'kidnapping' bit or he might send you to Greyback or he might kill you just to hurt me. I really don't know."

"I can't risk my family like that, Harry. I need a plan where I know they'll be safe."

"... If I could, I'd just buy you a plane ticket and send you where ever you wanted to go, but that's more money than I have and you don't even have a passport. You and your family could stay here in France somewhere and pretend to be regular muggles for the rest of your life, and hope no one finds out."

Stephen snorted.

"The last option is that I take you straight to Greyback before anyone finds us. He's an asshole, but he takes care of his own, especially the women and children. If you become a part of one of his packs, I don't think Voldemort will try anything, but you'll never be able to leave."

They stayed quiet for several minutes, looking out the window at the city, glittering streets and buildings tall as mountains. It would be hard to give up this sort of place. From what Harry knew of them, none of the Canis family had ever lived outside of a city before, let alone out in the wilderness. They would have to abandon the creature comforts of 'civilized' living for a life they only knew about from his stories.

"Is it a good life?" Stephen asked. Slowly, Harry nodded.

"It's not an easy life, but it's a good, honest way to live. You get to punch guys who piss you off, and everyone is okay with it."

The werewolf barked out a laugh, and returned to the room, saying he would think about it. They left early the next morning, all of them sluggish and reluctant after the long day and short night. They abandoned their car at the motel and walked to the train station, purchased their tickets, and waited for nearly an hour. The entire time the adults (and Harry) anxiously scanned the station for signs of trouble, unable to believe they had made it so far without a hitch of some kind, but the time elapsed and they climbed aboard. Bobby followed them inside, and he must have possessed some sort of magic of his own, because no one looked twice the entire time. The moment they sat down they visibly relaxed.

Their tickets took them to London, a near three hour ride, and the first thing Harry did was use some of the change he had left to call Morgan, but it was a rather flustered woman who picked up.

“HELLO? IS THIS HAROLD POTTER?”

Harry pulled the phone away from his ear, and prayed that ear was still useful.

“Yes. You don’t have to shout.”

“Oh... sorry,” the woman said, still a bit loud but no longer deafening. Stephen smirked at him, and Sylvia had to hide her smile behind her hand.

“Is Chief Sentinel Morgan there?” he asked.

“Ah... no, not right now. He told me I should take a message if you called.”

“And who are you?”

“I’m Eri..er...ah... Betty. I’m his secretary.”

For some reason, Harry seriously doubted that.

“Okay, Erierah Betty, just let your boss know I’m in London.”

Then he hung up.

Bobby led them into wizarding London through a strange portal existing on platform one and three quarters. It seemed as if Bobby knew his way around everywhere. Harry kept his the hood of his cloak up after that, which was hot and uncomfortable in the summer heat but necessary. He earned several odd looks, but rarely a second glance. It was London after all.

Harry could hardly believe he was home. After six months abroad, believing he would never get to see his homeland again, it all came at him extraordinarily fast. He was extremely tempted to run to the nearest Court Office and turn himself in, face Voldemort once and for all and finish the journey.

But before he could do that, he needed to ask Stephen his decision.

"We've never had an easy life," Stephen said, "But we've had a mostly honest one. No point in mucking it up now."

"Why, that's the smartest thing I think I've ever heard him say," Bobby said, as if awed, then fluttered out of reach when the werewolf made a swipe at him.

They had absolutely no British wizarding money to get to Scotland, and since none of them knew how to apparate, it was up to Bobby to lead them, and as knowledgeable as the raven was about magical short cuts and secret routes, it still took them two days of walking and two nights of sleeping outside, before they reached Fenrir's territory.

Harry remained at its edge, stopping the others before they tried to step over the glowing green line that marked the werewolves' domain. Once they crossed into it, they would be unable to leave without Fenrir's permission. He should probably knock first.

"Hello!" he called, and listened as it echoed through the forest. There was no reply. "Hello!" he tried again. Bobby landed on his shoulder.

"They are there. They're just hiding. Pull down your hood."

Harry did as instructed, and within seconds the foliage moved, and where once there was nothing but trees and undergrowth now stood two werewolves, a man and a woman, each armed with crossbows. Stephen let out a curse, and moved his family behind him. Bobby hopped off his shoulder and disappeared into the canopy.

"If you play games, sir, I shall kill you for this insult," the woman said, glaring suspiciously at him, even as she drew nearer. She was vaguely familiar to Harry, but he could not recall her name.

"No games or insults intended," Harry assured her, tucking away his wand. "I have returned, and wish to speak with Greyback. I have brought friends," he gestured behind him, "who seek asylum with his people. May we enter?"

The werewolf pair shared an uncertain look.

"Think it's really him," she whispered to the man. "Could be a trap. An illusion."

"You stay here and watch them," the man said, "And I'll go get Greyback. He'll know. He always knows."

"Hurry up then."

The man ran off, leaving the woman glaring at them and clutching her crossbow. Stephen nudged Harry's shoulder to get his attention.

"Are they all this friendly?"

Harry grinned. "When you first meet them? Pretty much. I got my head shoved in a mud puddle."

"Where was that story when you prattling on about Fenrir's werewolves?"

"Did I forget that one? Sorry, it slipped my mind."

Stephen glowered at him. Within minutes, Fenrir appeared, along with about half his pack, and at the forefront of the crowd Sirius and Remus. Harry couldn't help but grin when he saw their amazed expressions. He had a feeling he was going to be seeing a lot of that.

"Potter, you ballsy little bastard," Fenrir snarled, somehow coming off as good natured at the same time. "How the hell did ya get over here?"

"There was a lot of walking involved. Can we come in?"

"Get in here."

Harry stepped across the boundary, and wasn't the least bit surprised when he was swept up in an enormous bear hug and had his hair ruffled into a messy fluff. After days of travel and more than a few lingering bruises, it was painful, but he wouldn't have stopped it for the world. It was the first time in a very long time that he felt truly happy.

"Prongslet, I can believe it!" Sirius laughed, finally pulling away to get a better look at him. "Although I probably should. An entire Ministry couldn't stop you."

"Yes, well, I had a lot of help," he turned to his traveling companions and gestured for them to follow, which they hesitantly did. "This is the Canis Family. Stephen, Sylvia, John, Jane, and Noah. We sort of... escaped Germany together. They're werewolves too."

Fenrir was already before them, leering at Stephen who looked on the verge of snarling and bashing in someone's head if any of the other werewolves came any closer to his wife or children.

"I can tell. This one's got a nasty look about him," the Head Alpha chuckled, and leaned in so close to Stephen their noses were practically touching. The Canis patriarch let out a low, threatening growl. Fenrir threw back his head and laughed. "I like him! Hopefully, I won't have to break his neck."

“Greyback,” Harry said, his voice laced with warning. “Leave them be. They’ve traveled a long way to have to deal with your particular brand of weirdness.”

“Bah,” Fenrir dismissed. “I wouldn’t fight him now. He’s as weak as a puppy. Athena! Get them settled. Make sure no one starts anything.”

The alpha female appeared out of the crowd, and close behind her trailed Luna. The dream-eyed girl smiled at Harry, but didn’t yet approach, following her pack mother’s example and showing the Canis family the way to the settlement, leaving Harry to his godfathers and Fenrir. When all the others werewolves had left, curious about the latest additions to their pack (women were rare enough, and children only occasionally born and never just brought in), the Head Alpha dropped his amused expression.

“Does Voldemort know you’re here?”

Harry stiffened, and then shook his head.

“Why not?”

“I couldn’t be sure what he would do with them, so I came here first. I’ll go see him as soon as I know they’ll be fine.”

“You’ll stay here until I tell you you can leave. Are you bit?”

“What?”

“Are. You. Bit? There’s been rumors floating about since you went missing. Some blaming the Germans, some blaming Voldemort, and more that few blaming werewolves. Claims that you’ve been infected. Is any of that true?”

“Are you serious? No, I wasn’t bitten. Merlin, I don’t know if I can turn into a werewolf even if I were. I spent the full moon walking around with them, and it was completely... safe. Like walking around with really big dogs. They like to be scratched behind the ears.”

“Harry!” Remus said, clearly horrified at the mere thought of what he had done. Sirius looked stunned too, although Harry suspected he would be delighted once the surprise wore off. Greyback looked more skeptical than anything.

“You’ll stay here until I can get your master to come get you. If you disappear on me, one of your new ‘friends’ will pay for it, do you understand?”

“Yes.”

“Good. Blackbone, he’s your responsibility... as if you didn’t know already”

Sirius stuck his tongue out at Fenrir’s back when he turned away and Remus slapped him upside the head, making Harry grinned. He had really missed them. Sirius swung his arm around his godson’s shoulder, and led him further into the forest.

“Come on, Prongslet, you have got a lot of explaining to do.”

Harry smiled a bit nervously at that. He wasn’t entirely sure if he had enough time to explain the entire thing before Voldemort showed up and wrung his scrawny neck.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort was very close to wringing Snape’s neck when the missive arrived from Fenrir. It wasn’t that the potions professor had done anything to earn his ire, it just so happened he was the only one in the room and frankly he was in a bad mood.

They had lost Harry. Again. In London of all places. It didn’t help that Harry had been the one to even inform them that he was in the area, and then neglected to show himself for another three days. Voldemort, who believed he had been very patient and done a good job at waiting for his re-emergence was quickly rediscovering what it was about Harry that frustrated him.

He was too damn self motivated.

If Harry had been just a little more uncertain or a little more dependant, Voldemort was positive he would never have gotten it into his head to go messing around with another man's soul and then to run around Europe like it was a bloody vacation.

To make matters worse, the potions Snape had been brewing to instill that uncertain dependency known as blind loyalty were ruined while the man was holed up in the hospital. Another reason he probably should wring the man's neck, but he had the feeling the Earth was trying to tell him not to fuck around with Harry in that particular manner and he should just let it slide. Anyway, he didn't have enough spare potions masters just lying around to where he could toss out his best one.

"Forget it. With the way things are going, you'd probably end up ingesting the potion and swear eternal fealty to Harry, and the entire situation will turn into an even bigger joke," Voldemort muttered, leaning back in his chair. They were at Hogwarts at the moment, presumably a random choice, but both knew it was on the off chance that Harry showed up there. Harry didn't really know a lot of other places.

Snape grimaced at the back handed insult, but silently agreed. If anything could possibly go wrong, Potter would find a way to make it happen.

As if to prove it, an owl flew through the window and smacked straight into the back of his head.

"Bloody hell!" Snape spat before he even realized it, clutching the back of his head. He really shouldn't have taken any Pain Relieving Potion before coming here. Nothing would ever have been able to sneak up behind him if he were sober.

"Quite," Voldemort said with some amusement then retrieved the letter from the owl now sprawled across the floor. From under his desk, he could see Nagini eying the fallen bird speculatively, and left it where it lay. He opened the letter and scanned it. A hard smile settled across his mouth. "Harry just turned himself over to Greyback."

Snape stiffened, then nodded. "What do you intend to do?"

"Whatever the universe allows. Stay here. If Harry requires medical attention, I would prefer to avoid the public hospitals."

"As you wish, My Lord."

The Dark Lord left. Snape went to do the same, to wait in the infirmary, but paused just long enough to scoop up the owl from the floor before Nagini got to it. Not all creatures were as talented as Harry at handling snakes.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

As if out of habit, Harry remained elusive even after Voldemort arrived at Fenrir's door. The boy was not in the colony itself, and his godfathers were plainly visible at the center of the commune, sharpening knives and glaring death at him. He checked with the Head Alpha. Fenrir wouldn't be so careless as to let him slip away.

"He said something about making an offering of thanks," the old werewolf said, leaning in his chair. He looked to be in a rare, thoughtful mood, and Voldemort wondered what Harry had told him or if it were something else weighing on his mind. "He took a stool, some herbs, and a bowl, and left alone on the Western Path about a half hour ago. I told my people to leave him be. You should have plenty of privacy."

Voldemort nodded and went in search of his wayward protégé. It didn't take long to find him. Harry had moved nearly a quarter of a mile into the forest for solitude, but made not attempt at hiding. The Dark Lord did not immediately say or do anything when he found him, but watched silently with a breathless sort of fascination.

Harry had stripped down to his pants, and Voldemort could see that whatever had gained the boy his freedom had come at a cost. His back was scrapped raw and bruised a yellowish-green, and he could count each of Harry's ribs protruding from his skinny frame. There were cuts and small bruises on his face as well, but it was odd shortness of his hair that unnerved Voldemort. Had his head been shaved at some point? Like all the rest of those Durmstrang clones?

The idea of lumping Harry into the masses set his teeth on edge. It was insult by proxy. The masses had never stood a chance at against a Dark Lord, and to suggest they were of the same ability as the Gryffidnor Prince was absurd.

He pushed the thought aside to focus on Harry's actions. Already he could tell Harry had burned some sort of ward into the ground, and was already burning sage, waving it within his protective circle and around his body so that the fragrant smoke cleansed the ward of negative energies. He cast the remnants of the smolder herb into a bowl resting on a wooden stool, the very crudest form of an altar. Beside the bowl sat a ceremonial dagger. The same ceremonial dagger he had gifted Harry with the year before to sacrifice the sianach.

His breath caught as he watched the boy drag the blade over left arm, then switched hands to cut his right arm. Transfixed, he followed Harry's every movement, his trembling arms, his pained expression, the rivulets of blood dripping down into the smoking bowl, and a mouth speaking too softly and too quickly to make out.

Voldemort felt a ripple of power escape from the protective circle and it sent a pleasant shiver down his spine. This was perhaps the crudest of sacrificial ceremonies he had ever seen, but the offering was given in such complete sincerity that its power could rival the most elaborate of performances. There was no lip service here. Harry held less guile than a house elf and enough passion to make Shakespeare weep. Terrifying and captivating traits in a pagan.

Suddenly, Harry let out a small gasp, and his head and spine arched backwards so that there was no way he could have kept his balance, and yet he did not fall. Voldemort stared directly into his wide green eyes, and wondered what the boy saw. It wasn't Voldemort. There was nothing close to recognition there.

He was tempted to try a legilimens, but he didn't dare. Madris had already proven she could hurt him, potentially kill him, and he wasn't going to provoke her by poking her worshiper with a proverbial stick while they were conversing.

Harry closed his eyes, and the stiffness suddenly left him so that he slumped forward, and landed on his hands and knees. There was soft sigh, and with shaking hands he took the bowl and flipped it onto the ground, covering the burning sage in order to smother it. The ritual was over.

Voldemort stepped forward. The boy stiffened, and slowly turned towards him.

"Hello, Harry."

"...Hello, my Lord."

"Still misplacing yourself, my friend?"

"Oh, no. I actually meant to end up here for once." He climbed to his feet. He did not have his wand on him, but his dagger remained firmly in his hand. The Dark Lord looked at it curiously.

"Do you mean to use that on me?"

"I hope not. I'm not entirely sure what would happen. You might explode. I might explode. This is far more powerful than I realized."

"And it gains power with every use."

He stepped forward, Harry stepped back. Cautious. Good.

"You betrayed me."

"Yes," Harry agreed readily, even as his expression tightened with pain at the admission. "But I never meant to hurt you. You can't claim the same."

“That’s very true. Circafiat!”

The ward shattered under his spell then caught Harry up in it, sending him flying like a spinning top hurled through the air, and he crashed just as heavily. He landed with a thud, and continued to roll until he hit a tree. There was a groan and a hiss of pain. He was still clutching the knife. Stubborn.

“I should cut out your soul and feed you to the dementors,” he hissed, stalking towards his fallen adversary. Greens glared up at him.

“If I have to go to one more of those stupid charity banquets I’d welcome it.”

Voldemort paused, staring down at him, incredulous. “You have no sense of self preservation at all, do you?”

“No. It ran away with your guilty conscious and we haven’t seen either of them since.”

A grin founds its way onto the Dark Lord’s face, but it wasn’t the comforting sort the foolish Gryffindor was probably hoping for.

“Fio torrete!” Voldemort said, flinging his wand, almost negligently. Harry rolled out of the way this time, and the tree took the hit, shaking violently, but it gave no clues to the spell’s purpose. Voldemort snapped around for another try, but Harry finally decided to start fighting back.

And fighting dirty.

He hadn’t even realized what the boy was doing until the rock actually hit him in the face, smashing into the bridge of his nose and part of his right eye. He stumbled back from the blow, tripped over something, and fell backwards... into a ditch. And fuck, that hurt.

“You son of a --argh! You broke my nose!”

“Well, you cracked my ribs, you damn psycho,” Harry called back.

Snarling, he wiped at the blood pouring from his nose, but it was instantly replaced, making the effort futile. He crawled out of the trench, but by then Harry had disappeared. Marvelous.

“Expelliarmus!”

“Protego!” Voldemort snapped out automatically, shielding himself. He glared over at the cluster of trees the spell originated from. “This isn’t Hogwarts, Harry. You’re going to have to do better than that.”

“I don’t want to fight you. It’s pointless.”

“On that we are agreed. You should remain still and take your punishment like a man.”

“How about I take it like a fourteen year old and sit in my room until I’ve learned my lesson.”

Voldemort let out a laugh. “I’ve missed you, Harry, I really have. No one else can survive being this cheeky with me.” Then he had to spit, as the blood from his nose leaked into his mouth. Yuck.

“I missed you too,” and that sounded sadly sincere. “Do you think we could start over?”

“This isn’t a board game, Harry. We can never go back to what we were. You’ve made sure of that.” He murmured a spell, static voca, under his breath, and moved out of view, taking a circuitous route towards Harry’s location.

“... Could we at least stop trying to kill one another?”

“I’m not trying to kill you. I just want to make you suffer,” he said, and though he was moving closer, it sounded as if his voice were the same distance away.

“How’s that working out for you?”

“I can honestly say, I’ve never had the novel experience of a broken nose. I feel obliged to share it with you.”

"I already broke my nose, remember? Moody and that damn potion."

"... Oh... how about your fingers?"

"...Yes?"

"When?"

"... Uh... at Durmstrang?"

"If you don't sound convinced of your own answers how do expect to convince me..."

Now he could see Harry's profile, peaking carefully from behind some trees at the location his voice sounded from. He had his wand now. Clever boy. Must have snatched it up before he hid himself. Not that it would do him any good.

"Would I lie?"

"Certainly," Voldemort said, dropping the spell. Harry spun around to find himself standing not three feet from the Dark Lord, and he froze like a startled rabbit. "Just not very well. Levicorpus."

The Gryffindor didn't have a chance to utter a single word before he was pulled from his feet and left dangling from the air. He cried out in pain and struggled to breath, and Voldemort remembered his potentially injured ribs, making regular breathing difficult enough. He smiled coolly at his captive, and reached out to place his hand over the crescent mark on Harry's chest. The skin beneath his hand instantly sizzled, as if touched by a brand.

His protégé opened his mouth to gasp, to scream, but he couldn't pull in the air necessary for it. He could only hang there, making feeble choking sounds until Voldemort finally pulled his hand away. A skeletal handprint in blackened flesh remained, the red crescent resting in the middle of the palm. An ominous marking.

Both the knife and wand had fallen out of Harry's hands, and the boy simply hung there limply. Voldemort thought there might be symbolism in that, but right now he was just appreciating the moment. Harry had already closed his eyes, waiting for the next blow, resigned to the pain even as he feared it. Ah, sublime submission. He let it drag on for a nearly a minute, letting suffer in the silence.

Then he flicked him on nose like a bad dog.

Green eyes flew open, and blinked. Voldemort glowered at him.

“I want you to remember this moment. I want you to remember the pain and the fear and the helplessness, because if you ever try to mess with me like that again, I will make you feel a thousand times what you are feeling right now for rest of your natural life and then I really will feed you to the dementors. Finite incantem.”

Harry fell, landing heavily and no doubt cracking a few more ribs, if his pained gasps were anything to go by, but nothing lasting. Satisfied, Voldemort walked away, leaving the boy to catch his breath and wallow in his misery. He had only made it a few steps, however, before the Gryffindor somehow managed to get just enough breath for a final question.

“We good now?”

The Dark Lord turned back to him and smiled fondly. “Yes. We’re good.”

[illegible]

Book V:

Chapter 8: Serfs and Nobles

There was no comfortable position to lie in, but he was too tired to sit or stand. His entire body felt like one big bruise, aching everywhere except on his chest where the Dark Lord had scorched his mark on to his flesh. That just plain stung.

“Your bed is going to stink like medicine,” Harry protested to Remus, who just rolled his eyes, and continued to rub salve gently over his chest. He had cracked a few ribs on the left side, but nothing was broken. It just made breathing about as uncomfortable as moving.

“You’re not the only reckless fool I’ve treated in this bed,” the beta said, throwing a pointed look at Sirius, who was glowering in the corner of their little house. The bed itself was monstrously large, easily fitting five or six adults at a time, which was practical since it was shared with three other werewolves. Everything in the werewolf colony was communal, from kitchens to beds to showers, but Remus assured him he would be getting the bed to himself unless it rained. Apparently, the werewolves only bothered with a bed when it was too cold or raining outside. Most preferred sleeping under the stars if possible. “This should help with the bruising and the swelling. How do you feel?”

“Would you be mad if I told you, smugly satisfied?”

Sirius snorted harshly. “Satisfied? With what? You’re a mess. You finally make it back home after half a year and the first thing the Dark Doofus can think to do is beat the crap out of you? What the fuck?”

“Sirius...” Remus said, warningly.

Harry just smiled at him cheekily. “I really did have that thrashing coming, even before I broke his nose.” Sirius started to protest, but Harry held up a hand to silence him. “It’s over and done with now, and I’m glad. I don’t want you to get worked up over it. It was worth it.”

And he didn't just mean the beating. He had been gone for six months, alone and guilt ridden, but he had learned so much along the way, and seen such wonders he could not find it in him to regret.

Sirius didn't look sure, but then Harry hadn't told him the whole story. All he knew was that Harry had allowed himself to be kidnapped because the Dark Lord was pissed at him (the specifics he didn't get into) and that he had come back on his own. Remus was more accepting, although he was none too pleased with Harry's injuries either.

"Come on, Padfoot, we had best let him rest for a bit. We should go introduce ourselves to his 'souvenirs' before nightfall."

"If Stephen is a bit snappish, don't take it personal. He's a bit defensive when it comes to taking care of his family," Harry said, leaning back more fully against his pillows. They left him to his own devices which unfortunately involved just laying around like a log. Voldemort was... somewhere, and would be there until tomorrow it seemed and left him to the care of Fenrir and his pack. Harry was happy with this, because as much as he wanted to see Hermione and his friends, family came first.

And they coddled him shamelessly. Which he needed. It had been a long, hard week. He was actually prepared to attempt a nap, try to ignore his aching body, but there was something he wanted to do first.

Very carefully, and very slowly, he pushed himself up, climbed out of the bed, and pulled his satchel out from underneath it. He opened it, and after riffling through it for a minute or two, found what he was looking for and brought them onto the bed with him. His letters, still in their envelopes, remained unopened and mysterious. He had longed to open them when he had first gotten them, but events had pushed them from his mind almost completely. There had been no time and no privacy to read them before, but now he had both and he thought he ought to read them before facing his friends.

He picked one of the four letters at random.

Dear Harry

Heard you got into a pickle. I have faith in you, though, and I'm sure you'll find a way out of it. Everyone is rooting for you. –Hagrid.

P.S. The girls, Betty and Thelma, are growing big and strong. Norbert had a bit of trouble in the beginning but he's doing well. They're all beautiful. I can't thank you enough for the recommendation to Charlie. You've made a life long dream of mine come true, and I'll never forget that. The tooth I sent is one of Norbert's. He lost it in a fight with Thelma. Get back soon, so I can introduce you to all of them properly.

Harry smiled. Leave it to Hagrid to talk more about dragons than anything else. The next one was from the Weasley's. All of them. Even the ones he didn't even know very well. Mrs. Weasley prayed for his safe return, not unlike Hagrid only with a lot more flowery adjectives, but luckily the other Weasley's offered a bit more information than well wishes. They told him about what happened at Hogwarts after he left, about Dueling Club (Ron had the nerve to threaten him to get back to handle the rookies), school gossip and simple news, National Quidditch matches, hilarious pranks, and the sort of things he would have liked to be with them to experience. Even Charlie Weasley, who Harry had never met, wrote a little something about Hagrid's rather hazardous but excellent care of the dragonets.

Next came Hermione's.

Dear Harry

I hope this letter finds you in good health and in good spirits. The papers speculate on your well-being constantly, and after a week I could not bring myself to read them. Uncle Severus assures me of the unlikelihood of you being seriously harmed, but even if you are not being tortured I know you can't be happy.

I miss you so much. Everyone does. Even those you wouldn't think of. Out of everyone, I think Natalie might be the most upset. She hides it well, but I've known her for a long time, and Draco is worried about her.

It's futile, but I wish you were here constantly. Hogwarts just isn't the same without you. I go through the day thinking 'Harry would have loved to try that' or 'Harry should be in Transfiguration right now' or 'Harry would have found that hilarious'.

I know it's a bit weird, but I started to make a log of these moments. I thought, if I ever managed to get it to you, you could read it and it would be sort of like sharing the moment together, like we should have. One day, I pray we will be able to do just that for real. Good luck, Harry.

Love,

Hermione

Harry smiled and rubbed his eyes. Dear, sweet, Hermione. He couldn't wait to see her again. Behind the letter, was about thirty pieces of parchment, consisting of the log of events Hermione had written, and he took a moment to scan them.

Jan.6

The Hogwarts Herald published its first edition of the New Year. Your kidnapping is featured on the front page. It's a really bad picture. Draco actually cringed.

Uncle Severus held orientation for Dueling Club. It had the largest turnout yet, with 55 potentials. Ron is freaking out. With you gone, he can barely keep track of the 30 we have already. We may have to divide up the club and get another instructor. I hope the newbies are joining for the right reasons.

We had potatoes at dinner.

Harry chuckled. This would definitely prove helpful when he returned to school. He had missed so much already. Melancholy threatened to invade his happy mood, so he moved to the last letter. It was from Draco.

Harry

Hope you're not dead. Get your ass back here.

Draco.

"Your wish is my command, oh Blond One," Harry chuckled.

"If that's my new nickname, it's awful and inaccurate."

He nearly jumped out of his skin, and dropped all of his letters. The move jostled his body and he grimaced at the fresh throbs and stabs of pain that lanced through his body. He turned his head to glare at Bobby, who was now perched on Remus' chair.

"Oops. Careful there. Didn't mean to startle you."

Harry sighed and resettled against his pillows.

"Where have you been? I haven't seen you since we got here."

"Exploring. Do you think all these things I know are second hand? This is an interesting place."

"Did you see Lord Voldemort while you were exploring?" Harry asked.

"Do you mean, did I see him toss you around like a ragdoll? Nope, didn't see it."

The boy rolled his eyes.

"Thanks for the help."

"Your welcome."

"You-"

"Did you tell him about me?" the raven interrupted. "I hope you didn't."

Harry looked at him suspiciously. "Why?"

“Fairies aren’t the only ones who would like to get their hands on me. These things I know are valuable. You’re lucky to have such a master as I.”

Harry snorted. “Fine. I guess it would be hypocritical of me to let the Dark Lord use you, after I escaped Germany for pretty much the same reason. The Canis’s though...”

“I’ve already talked to them. They’ll take responsibility for knowing how to get out of Germany. No one else need know I exist.”

Harry gave him another suspicious look. “How do I know you’re not a spy? Maybe the Germans set all of this up so that you could get into Britain. You never would have known how to get in otherwise.”

“Ha! I most definitely could. I work for no man or fae. Raecellos is my patron, Protector God of Prodigal Sons and Explorers, Lord and Vassal in the Court of Madris. I have endless navigational resources at my disposal.”

Harry thought on it and nodded. “I suppose that makes sense. Madris wanted me back home, so she had Raecellos send you to make sure of it. But why are you still here? Your mission is complete.”

“Because I like you,” Bobby laughed, and hopped from his chair to fly out the open window. Harry glared after him. He hated when the raven did that.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

At some point, Harry must have dozed off, because when he opened his eyes it was already nightfall. The little house was lit with lanterns hanging from the ceiling, perfuming the air with the faint scent of lamp oil. He was not alone.

On the other side of the bed, Luna and Diana had curled up around each other and fallen asleep, while Sirius sat at a small table, Stephen across from him, playing a game of cards. Both alphas turned to him as he sat up and rubbed the sleep from his eyes.

“Where’s Remus?” he asked.

“Patrolling. We’ve had issues with smugglers tearing down the wards lately.”

“Smugglers?”

“Voldemort’s been rationing a lot of goods across the country. Makes it profitable enough for smugglers to risk their lives to make up the difference. Dumb as bricks, most of them.”

Harry nodded.

“What are you two doing?”

“Playing cards, talking, keeping watch. People don’t seem to get that you need your sleep.”

Harry looked over at the two girls, and chuckled softly then grimaced as it jostled his ribs. Apparently, he wasn’t the only one in need of rest. He turned back to the Stephen.

“How is the family settling in?”

Stephen looked thoughtful for a moment, before answering.

“I wasn’t really sure in the beginning. It’s so... different, but the kids... They’re sleeping with Greyback’s kids tonight. They’ve never had friends besides each other before. They were really excited about it. We could barely get them to go to sleep.”

Harry smiled at that. Having had few friends growing up, and none for the three years he had lived with the Dursley’s, he knew that finally finding others who understood you and connected with you was precious.

"If you need to talk to someone about adjusting, I'd ask Remus," Harry said, "He grew up as a werewolf around wizards before the colonies were founded."

Stephen nodded, but Harry thought he had probably been given this advice before.

"Does anyone know how long I get to stay yet?" he asked.

"Dark Lord Snake-breath is off blowing his own horn somewhere. He'll be back in the morning to get you, though. I recommend going for a kneecap this time around."

"Don't make me laugh, Sirius, my ribs are still soar. It'll be fine."

"You should go back to sleep," Sirius said, looking unconvinced. "I doubt the bastard is going to let you get much of it tomorrow."

"Alright, just wake me up early so I can say goodbye to everyone."

Because really, Sirius was probably right. He settled back into his pillows and closed his eyes, trying to let his natural exhaustion take him into sleep. Before he had completely descended into the dream world, however, he heard Stephen and Sirius talking softly to each other.

"I honestly didn't believe him when he said his godfather was the next Head Alpha. I didn't think he had a clue what he was talking about. He didn't seem scared enough."

"Harry is a lot like his father that way. His mother too. They were good, strong people. They judged people by their character, rather than who or what they were. Although, I don't think even they could have managed what Harry has. He finds character in the weirdest places."

"You mean the Dark Lord?"

"I mean you."

“ ... ”

“I know you didn’t just ‘come across’ Harry and instantly decide to run away with him. I’m guessing you were hired to bring him back. I don’t think he was entirely willing either.”

“... I don’t know-“

“There were rope marks on his wrist. An Auror would never have had to resort to ropes.”

“ ... ”

“I’ll assume you had your reasons. Harry obviously felt you did.”

“... I needed something better for my family. I couldn’t protect them in Germany. The entire system worked against us at every turn. I had to do something. Anything.”

“I understand. It is your prerogative as a father to put your mate and your pups above anyone else. Which is why I know you’ll understand when I tell you, that if you ever raise your hand against my godson again, I’ll kill you.”

“... Fair enough.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Luna woke him up in the morning by playing with his toes. He slipped on his glasses and looked down at her, as she took each toe individually and gave it a little wiggle.

“You have monkey toes,” Luna informed him. “They’re so long. You can tell where your shoes smooshed your pinky toes. They don’t straighten out all the way.”

To prove her point, she took both his pinky toes and tugged them up. They did have a little bit of curve to them. Funny how he’d never noticed.

“Rofin has an extra toe on each foot, but they’re all straight.”

“I imagine Rofin doesn’t wear shoes very often.”

“Nope. Drover only has two toes on his right foot. He lost three of them in a bear trap.”

“His shoes must be particularly roomy.”

Luna grinned up at him, and he grinned back.

“Welcome back, Harry.”

“It’s good to be home. Smooshed pinky toes and all.”

She abandoned his feet to crawl up the bed and lay beside him. He could feel her warm skin against his shoulder, and he was suddenly very aware that he was lying in bed wearing only his slacks and bandages with a girl dressed in nothing more than a one piece wrap, leaving her shoulders naked and her legs almost completely bare. He felt his ears begin to burn.

“Diana said you would be back, but she wouldn’t say when. Everyone was very sad.”

“I’m sorry, Luna. I came back as soon as I could. I didn’t mean to worry anyone.”

“I know. You had to go. It was in the stars,” she said, dreamily and closed her eyes, turning her head that her forehead rested on his shoulder. Now he could smell her, dogwood, tallow, salt, and Luna. She smelled of magic. Harry remembered she was in training to be a shaman.

“Did the Moon tell you this?”

“Mmm...”

She kissed his shoulder, and his breath caught in his throat.

"Luna, sweetheart," came a voice from the door, "please stop provoking him. He's injured."

He looked over to see Athena standing in the doorway, and the redness of his ears quickly covered the rest of his face. The alpha female didn't look bothered by the situation, which only made it worse. Luna sighed and looked up at her foster mother.

"Come on. You're helping me with breakfast. We have more mouths to feed than usual."

"Coming," she promised, then looked to Harry. "Do you prefer strawberries or apples in your pancakes?"

"Er... strawberries, I guess."

"Me too."

She crawled off the bed, careful not to jostle him, and headed for the door. She gave him a little wave at the door and disappeared. Harry let his head fall back and groaned, embarrassment and arousal warring inside him. Oh, yes, he was definitely a healthy young man, if his reaction to Luna were anything to go by.

He really hoped he didn't react this way with all his other female friends. He knew from an aesthetic point of view that most of them were quite attractive, but he hadn't thought of anyone that way since Natalie dumped him and he had been so distracted by other things at the time he had never really thought about anything beyond kissing and holding hands.

Well, he was thinking of other things now. Curse, Luna. Odd, beautiful, and completely uninhibited little daffodil that she was. Bother.

He tentatively got out of bed, and checked his injuries in the morning light. He was still bruised, but now they were yellow rather than the purples and blues of the night before. The mark Voldemort had left on him was as tender as ever and black as pitch. He cautiously walked around the room, loosening his stiff muscles.

Not bothering with a shirt or shoes, he headed out the door and squinted into the early morning sun. The commune was just starting to wake up. The werewolves were dragging themselves from their sleeping places, a lot of them from hammocks or the roofs of their buildings, and heading towards a particular path that led out to a small creek where they all did a majority of their washing and bathing. He headed out with them, knowing it was the most likely place to find his godfathers.

Sure enough, Sirius and Remus were scrubbing down with the rest of the men folk at a spot where the creek was both wide and just deep enough to accommodate the dozen or so others. The women and children were further upstream and out of sight, although every so often you could hear them talking or laughing. Harry had already been wiped down last night to clean his injuries, and didn't bother with anything more than washing his face and wetting his hair at the edge. The men teased Harry good-naturedly about being skinny and whether he had met any cute girls, making him blush when he was reminded about Luna.

When they got back to the commune the air smelled of cooking ham, and Harry's stomach growled. They gathered together at the long tables set outside, where the cooks set out ham, eggs, and, of course, pancakes with strawberries. They waited only long enough for Fenrir and Sylvia, their pack alphas, to start eating before everyone else started digging in. The commune was loud with cheerful conversation. Several of the men had clustered around Stephen and started talking about their seasonal plans for the commune (which now included building another house to accommodate five more pack members), and some basic skills he would need to be taught right away. Likewise, the women had clustered around Sylvia, gossiping a great deal about men and fawning over her children, who ate their food as quickly as possible then ran off to play with Fenrir's boisterous bunch.

It was a happy time, and Harry soaked it up like a sponge, the feeling of belonging and community easing his sorrows and fears of the previous months. Home, Harry thought. This is home. Whether he was a werewolf or not, they accepted him and there were people that loved him here.

His happiness high lasted until around nine, when Voldemort returned, interrupting him in a game of checkers with Luna, who kept moving his pieces for him. It was with more than a little reluctance that he pulled on a shirt and shoes, both of which rubbed against injuries he preferred to remain untouched, and grabbed his satchel. He shook hands with everyone (he really wasn't up to hugs), except for Luna, who kissed his blushing cheek, and headed out to greet the rest of the wizarding world.

Fortunately, Harry didn't have to walk far. Voldemort's black car was there to pick them up. Victoria beamed at him as she opened the passenger side door, and he couldn't help but grin back. If it weren't for the Dark Lord, she would probably have broken a rib with one of her hugs.

"You seem very happy," Voldemort observed.

"I am very happy. I'm home."

The Dark Lord gave him a considering look.

"You left easily enough."

Harry's congenial mood vanished, and he glared at the older man.

"The hell I did. I had just found out that I nearly killed you and that you were going to find out at any moment and more than likely come after me, and suddenly Viktor comes out of nowhere offering me sanctuary, and I couldn't think. I just stood there like a bloody idiot. I probably would have just kept standing there if Brennan hadn't-"

He froze. Brennan. He still had no idea what had happened to Brennan. Voldemort seemed to realize what he was thinking, and answered the unspoken question.

"He's very much dead, Harry. Unlike you, he knew exactly what he was doing when he designed that ritual."

Harry closed his eyes, a powerful ache coming over him. He had known Brennan wouldn't be spared, but to have it confirmed was painful. He had been a friend and a mentor with so much knowledge to share with him and the others. It seemed such an unforgivable waste.

"He caste an Imperius on me," Harry said, when he could find nothing else, he cast his grief aside for a better time. "I could have thrown it off, I think. I nearly broke it at least twice. I was still confused though. I didn't know if I should stay or go, and by the time I snapped out of it, it seemed a pointless question. I could either go to Durmstrang as a prisoner or a refugee. Refugee seemed safer."

"So you were just pretending?" Voldemort said coldly, his voice somewhere between disapproval and derision.

"No. I decided to be a refugee. It's not like I didn't think my life was in danger."

Voldemort nodded. "Yes, I did in fact intend to kill you those first few days."

"Er... good to know. Would hate to think I did it for nothing."

Of course, given everything he had learned in the last week, might actually have been worth the whole running away thing. Maybe. Kind of.

"What happened in Germany? Did they interrogate you?"

"They tried to threaten me into renouncing you publically, but they didn't have anything to threaten me with. Not really. They didn't know about the spell, thank Merlin, or I might have been in real trouble. Dumbledore knew though. He came to see me half way through term."

"How did that go?" Voldemort asked, genuinely curious.

“Well... he visited during the full moon. He offered me lemon drops and spiritual guidance. I threw curses at him and I blew up a room. It was like visiting you only with candy.”

The Dark Lord laughed. “Ah, I wish I could have seen that.”

“So, what have you been up to? Burn down any villages while I was away?”

“Not yet. I’m currently courting the Queen of France by post. Which is a lot trickier than it sounds. Did you meet the Minister of Magic while you were in Germany?”

“Unfortunately.”

“What did you think of him?”

“Dirty. I felt dirty just being in the room with him.”

“Intelligent?”

“Manipulative. I don’t know if he’s any good at planning or leading, but I don’t think so. No one seems to really respect him. He gave guardianship of me to Dumbledore, which was a piss poor plan. The old goat didn’t seem to think he held any real power, if he could double cross him so easily. Are you really going to kill him?”

“If his own countrymen don’t do it first? Absolutely. You’re welcome to attend.”

“I’ll pass, but thanks.”

They talked for the entire forty minutes of their drive. The tension from yesterday had not completely abated and Harry could feel the burn on his chest throb and chaff under his shirt, but the old chemistry was still there and conversation came out smoothly if not well organized. They talked of Durmstrang, Grindelwald, Dumbledore (although not about Grindelwald’s relationship with Dumbledore which Harry felt was nobody’s business), Harry’s various kidnapping attempts, the Dream Meeting, national outrage at Germany, Harry’s various escapes, Voldemort's rationing policy, the fairy wedding, and Hogwarts. Everything had to be simplified and abridged. Time was not on their side and they knew it. More detailed accounts would have to wait until later.

They pulled up in front of Snape's house, and the potions master was already waiting for them. Staring at the menacing dark figure in doorway of the cozy little cottage, Harry was surprised to find he had missed the man almost as much as he had Hermione.

Weird.

"Mr. Potter," Snape greeted blandly, "Still alive I see."

"Now, would I do anything as cliché as dying?"

The potions master's mouth twitched, ever so slightly, but retained its usual intimidating glower.

"Put your things away, and then come back to the kitchen," he instructed, and Harry followed his orders. His room was waiting for him it seemed, the knick-knacks of last summer exactly where he left them. It was just like coming back from Hogwarts.

Elsbeth's owl stand was empty and Inana's basket was conspicuously absent, and he wondered briefly who was taking care of them. He set his satchel on his bed, and went back downstairs to the kitchen.

Voldemort was drinking coffee at the table, while Snape laid out bottles and vaguely familiar looking instruments. Harry sighed, and resigned himself to the inevitable.

"Strip down, Mr. Potter."

He did as instructed, removing everything but his boxers. It wasn't like they hadn't seen him naked before, although Harry felt distinctly more uncomfortable about it with them than he did with werewolves. Snape studied him head to toe, lingering a bit on the newest addition to his tattoo.

“You don’t do anything by halves, do you?”

Harry offered him a tired smile. “I didn’t break any bones this time.”

“Yes, I can tell. Most of them are clearly visible through your skin.”

Snape began to check him over with various little rods and disks and instruments from the table. Eyes, ears, nose, and mouth first. Then lungs (and ribs, four hair-line fractures on the left side), heart, blood pressure (high), reflexes (sharp as ever). He was also made to suck on what looked like long lollipop sticks, each turning a different color.

Snape looked at the sticks closely.

“Just as I thought, you are malnourished. You need potassium, calcium, and vitamins C and D and K. Your kidneys aren’t working well either. What has your diet been like?”

Harry thought on it.

“A lot of convenience store junk and fast food for the last week. I was skinny before that though. I don’t know. I kept getting to trouble at Durmstrang, and they’d only give me gruel to eat. I hate gruel. I started skipping meals if I knew that’s what I got.”

Snape gave him a look to show how unsurprised by that bit of stupidity he was.

“No fresh fruits or vegetables either, I suppose?”

Harry shook his head.

“Imbeciles,” Snape muttered. “Unfortunately, nutrients can not instantly be brought back to normal levels using potions or spells. Saturating your system before it has time to gradually absorb them and adjust itself will poison you. I hope you like asparagus.”

Harry’s expression stated plainly that he did not. Voldemort chuckled into his coffee.

“Where did you learn all this stuff anyway? This seems like way more than they cover in Magical First Aid.”

“I worked part time as a physician’s assistant while I attended university. I dare say I learned far more than I am legally allowed to practice without a license.”

Harry tried to imagine Snape at 19 or 20, doing this sort of thing on 100 year old men and pregnant women, and was very dismayed when he succeeded.

And finally, the really unpleasant part of the examination. Musculature. Snape bent and pulled and pushed all of his limbs and back and head, testing what parts of him were pulled or sprained or torn or just bruised. And since Harry was all of those things everywhere it really, really hurt.

This was followed by treatment which was even worse.

“Your immune system is shot from stress and malnutrition, this will help fight off infections,” Snape said, handing him a bright green vile. Harry drank it and cringed as it burned his sinuses, then he bulked as Snape continued to hand him several more potions. “This will flush your kidneys of excess nitrates. This should heal yours ribs, but don’t get carried away, they’ll still be vulnerable to re-fracturing for another week. This is for the bruising. This is for the cuts. And this is for your teeth, because you clearly haven’t been flossing.”

“Hey! I have too,” Harry protested, but drank it anyway. Ugh. He was starting to get nauseous. Snape handed him three more potions without bothering to explain what they were for. “Is all of this really necessary?”

“Absolutely not. I just get a supreme thrill out of watching you turn green. That last one was actually an anti-vomiting potions. You’re really going to feel the affects of all those potions in a minute here.”

“You-“

Voldemort burst out laughing. Harry glared at him and then at Snape, who smirked at him smugly.

“Welcome home, Mr. Potter.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry was supremely unhappy once they left Snape at the house. He hadn't been entirely sure what sort of home coming he would be receiving from his guardian, but he probably should have seen this coming. His stomach rolled and squirmed, threatening to come up, but Harry knew it wouldn't. Snape had made sure of that. The bastard.

He hoped everyone didn't decide to take a jab at him for his quasi-kidnapping. If the Weasley clan banded together for it, he didn't think he'd survive. Of course, the only people who knew he had allowed himself to be taken were Voldemort, Snape, Lucius, and probably Morgan. He'd have to be careful around Lucius for awhile.

“Where are we going?” Harry asked weakly, keeping his eyes closed to stave off motion sickness. In lieu of the latest Slytherin prank, his good humor towards Voldemort had shriveled for the day. No unnecessary chit-chat this time.

“London. We're expected for a press interview. Don't worry; you won't have to say anything. A few pictures proving you're actually here should be more than enough. The kicked puppy look will tell them everything they need to know.”

“Except that it was you who kicked the puppy?”

Voldemort just smirked.

It took an hour to get to London, which was good because Harry feeling a little better by then, although still not very talkative. They were in the Court District, with all its various division houses, and it didn't take long for Harry to figure out which one they were going to.

The couple thousand people crowded outside the Department of Public Affairs was a fairly obvious give away. Harry could only gape at the gathering. They couldn't all be reporters, but what where the others doing there?

"Do they know I'm back?" Harry asked, unable to believe the crowd could have been solely for him. He might be well known because of the Triwizard Tournament and the kidnapping, but he wasn't that important... was he?

"No, they only know I'm holding a press conference. If I had told them what it was really about, we would have had to hold it in the London Stadium. You've become something of a national icon in your absence, my young friend. Your return is going to make a lot of people deliriously happy."

"Then why are there so many people, if they don't know what this is about?"

"I don't speak in public every day and only if it's about something important to the country," Voldemort said, "This is the common man's opportunity to see their ruler and history playing out at the same time. These lucky few will be the first to know of your return, to see you with their own eyes. This is a moment they will be able to share with their children and their grandchildren."

Harry didn't know what to say to that. Part of him felt numb to it. He wasn't sure if he could accept that he held that much significance to complete strangers. It was mind boggling, even though he had known for along time now that his life was not solely his own anymore.

Thank Merlin, he didn't have to talk today. He didn't think he'd be able to do more than stutter like a fool under the weight of all that attention.

The car pulled into the secret entrance garage at the back of the building, where several Sentinels were there to meet them. So was Lucius Malfoy. They stared at each other for a long assessing moment.

"I remember you being taller," Malfoy said at last.

"I remember you being younger."

Smirks all around. Harry was still careful not to leave his back exposed to the Malfoy patriarch as they left the garage and made their way towards the front doors. As they went, one of Voldemort's assistance instructed him on where to stand and how to look and gave him a glass of water he very obviously needed.

"Welcome back, Mr. Potter," the assistant whispered, sincerely, and Harry managed a smile for him before following the Dark Lord. He had to wait just inside the doors for the first few minutes while Voldemort spoke, and during that time he could neither see nor hear what was happening, and that made him more than a little nervous. He rubbed his clammy hands on his robes and reminded himself that he didn't have to do anything other than not fall on his face or start picking his nose and everything would be fine. "Okay, now," the assistant said, and Harry opened the door and stepped out.

And nearly ran back inside, as some three or four thousand people let out a roaring cheer so loud that Harry could feel the vibration against his skin. Cautiously, he stepped forward until he was standing beside Voldemort. He smiled nervously, and photographers flashed their cameras and a few audacious reports actually tried to rush passed the security personnel.

"Mr. Potter when did you return? How did you manage to escape?"

"Mr. Potter, what happened while you were in Germany? How were you treated?"

"Do you have any insights on why Germany attacked the Dark Lord?"

"Is there anything you would like to say to your captors?"

"Is there anything you would like to say to people of the UK?"

Voldemort lifted his wand, and enormous BOOM sounded through the air, drowning out the reporters and the crowd instantly. Everyone was stunned silent, including Harry, who hadn't been expecting it.

“Ladies and Gentlemen, please,” Voldemort said congenially, a warning in the undertone. “Harry has had a very difficult week, and is in no state to be interrogated. When he is ready, there will be time for asking questions. He kindly offered to show himself today to verify his presence and well being to everyone who has shown such concern for him. For which I am sure everyone is very grateful. I could not bring myself to ask anything more of him.”

Nor will anyone else, was left unsaid but clearly heard. Harry silently marveled at the Dark Lord’s way with words. He was a scary, scary man. In the background, he could hear individual voices shouting out, ‘welcome back Harry’ and ‘way to go Potter’ and ‘we love you, Harry’.

Voldemort gestured for him to take a seat and to rest, still in view of the crowds and reporters but not at the forefront. The Dark Lord continued to speak for a few more minutes, giving a few details of Harry’s return, primarily that he had managed to return using muggle transportation and the help of werewolves (which left people gasping rather melodramatically in Harry’s opinion), and glossing over the fact that Harry was in Britain for about four days before he let anyone know exactly where he was. For this, Harry was grateful. He didn’t fancy Hermione finding out he had decided to go spelunking for a couple of days instead of letting her know he was okay. Unless Lucius had already known about it and saw fit to inform her and/or Draco.

By the end of Voldemort’s announcement, Harry was not only feeling a bit more relaxed, he was starting feel as if he owed the crowd something more than just sitting there. Like the Dark Lord had said, these people would be telling their children and grandchildren about this one day. Might as well give them something to talk about.

As Voldemort moved to leave, the conference concluded, Harry caught him lightly by the arm. He turned to him.

“What is it?”

“Do you think I could say something?” Harry asked. His mentor frowned, a bit uncertain.

“Is it incriminating?”

“Er... no.”

Voldemort took another moment to think about and finally nodded.
“Keep it brief.”

Harry moved to the podium. The crowd that had already started to move off, hesitated. He cleared his throat.

“I just wanted to say... thank you. I’ve been gone for a long time, and while I was gone I thought of home and how much I missed it. Now that I’m back, I see that home missed me, as well. It means more to me that I can clearly express. Thank you all.”

There was another deafening cheer and more shouts of ‘we love you, Harry’s and he retreated back into the building with the Dark Lord, his cheeks burning with embarrassment. He felt like such a sap.

Voldemort, just chuckled and patted him lightly on the head.

“Charming. Positively, charming.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

McGunny was scared of muggles.

He was scared shitless of airplanes.

He could not conceive of how a multi-ton monstrosity could roll down a ‘runway’, let alone fly several thousand feet in the air. Crammed into rows upon tightly pack rows were the muggles he was no longer invisible from and hurtling through the air in a giant flying metal coffin, made him wish he thought to pick up some calming draught before he left wizarding Ireland, but it was too late now. He didn’t dare accept the strange little pills the old woman beside him had offered. Tom kept insisting muggle medicine was poison to wizards.

McGunny wasn't sure he believed him, but he didn't dare risk it.

You could always hand over control to me for a little while. Just until we land, of course.

He couldn't reply to Tom, not when there was a little old lady to the right of him and dour looking man to his left, but he had no intention of letting Tom out. True the spirit could force it, but even he knew that was only temporary. McGunny's will to resist provided enough magic to prevent a complete take over, but if he started surrendering it, he doubted he would be able to regain control as easily. So he just closed his eyes, grit his teeth, and did nothing.

It would only be about an hour, he told himself. Then we'll be on the ground.

What happened after that, he couldn't even guess. Tom had some sort of plan, but the spirit was more ambitious than cautious and he was afraid to know the exact details. He knew it involved Dumbledore, and by extension, Harry, and for that alone he hoped it failed.

At the same time, he really hoped Tom didn't get him killed.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

When Harry returned to the garage with the Dark Lord, he was nearly thrown to the floor by a hundred pounds of best friend. He had barely stepped off the elevator, when out of the gloom came Hermione, with the largest smile he had ever seen. She came so suddenly, he didn't have time to protest when she wrapped herself around him in a hug, crushing his bruises and abrading the burn on his chest.

He clenched his teeth to keep from crying out, and hugged her back.

"I can't believe it! I knew you were missing in Germany, but I didn't know how you could have gotten home and was certain something awful had happened to you, but here you are and you look a mess but still you're alive and okay. Thank god, I missed you so much!" she babbled into his shoulder. He smiled despite the pain.

"I missed you too. I got your letter. How could I stay away after that?"

She let out a sound, half sob, half laugh and pulled back. Her eyes were bright with tears, but she was practically glowing with happiness. And dammit, he was having a repeat of the 'Luna Moment'. Stupid teenage hormones.

"I just can't believe it," she couldn't help but laugh. "I probably should have though. You've never been in a situation you couldn't get out of."

"Hey, you're making me sound very Slytherin when you say it like that."

"What's wrong with that?" came another familiar voice, and he looked up to see Draco smirking at him. He looked... a lot taller than he did last year. Stupid hormones, they're conspiring to keep him short and horney. "And break it up you two or there will be some serious dueling over her ladyship's honor."

"Draco!" Hermione protested, her cheeks burning. She did step away though, and let him in to shake Harry's hand.

"Welcome back. How was your incarceration?"

"It was cold and the food was awful, but they did have an excellent Quidditch Pitch. How was Hogwarts?"

"A lot more weepy Hufflepuffs than usual, but the food is still decent and they put back together the Quidditch Pitch. Ron about gave himself a coronary with the new Dueling Club recruits."

"Draco!"

Harry chuckled, "Sorry, I missed that."

"Honesty, the both of you are incorrigible."

Someone touched his shoulder, and he turned to see Voldemort standing there patiently.

“I hate to break up your reunion, but we must be going. I’m sure Severus can arrange a get together later.”

Hermione and Draco stiffened and nodded in agreement, and Harry sighed.

“Alright. I’ll see you both soon. We can make a day of it so we can catch up.”

Hermione nodded, and stole one more quick hug before letting him go. Draco rolled his eyes, and hauled her away. Voldemort and Harry got back in the car.

“Where to now?” Harry asked.

“The Department of International Affairs. We’re going to need a complete and formal account of your time spent in abroad. After that, you’ll be taken home. No doubt, Severus still has a few more potions he wants you to try.”

Harry grimaced.

“You’re enjoying this way too much.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort had made giving an account of his time in Germany sound like nothing more than a simple errand, like buying shoes or visiting a sick aunt, although if the sick aunt had been Vernon’s sister, Marge, he supposed it wasn’t that far off the mark. It wasn’t just a re-account of what he wanted to say, it was an interrogation.

There had taken him to a court room, and sat him in a chair at the center while some dozen or so others sat in the jury box, including Voldemort, Lucius, and Morgan. He didn’t recognize anyone else, but they were all stern faced and unsympathetic. Harry knew it was an intimidation tactic, to keep him off balanced, but despite knowing that he couldn't fight back his genuine unease. They had made him hold a large yellow crystal, about the size of a banana, and informed him it would turn red if he lied.

There had been a professional interrogator, who appeared to be about the only friendly person in the room that smiled and cajoled him to into tell his story, pressing politely for more details, until Harry showed any sort of reluctance. Then he turned into an irascible bully.

The crystal kept him from lying, but Harry quickly figured out that omitting certain truths didn't affect the color of the crystal at all. Thank Merlin. There were a lot of parts to the story he would rather keep the Dark Lord ignorant of. He told them about the kidnapping (leaving out that he could have thrown off the Imperius Curse if hadn't been so conflicted), about deciding to play along with Viktor's preconceived notions, his meeting with the German Minister, his meeting with Dumbledore, his life at Durmstrang, his encounter with Fleur on the docks and his short lived escape attempt and capture, his second meeting with Dumbledore, the trip to see his parents' graves (although he mentioned nothing of Carrigan and said only that Dumbledore had indicated Voldemort was rotten even as a child, which amused the Dark Lord considerable), the attack by the aurors, his escape, his capture by the Canis family, the second Auror attack and his second escape, his truce with Stephen, the full moon and the fairy wedding (at which point everyone became very uncomfortable, and kept looking to Voldemort to make sure Harry hadn't gone crazy), the crone's message (but not Bobby's role in delivering it), the escape to France using a secret underground tunnel Stephen had heard of, his visit to Fleur (but not his confrontation with Viktor), and the final leg of the journey into Britain via the chunnel, and the longer trip to the werewolf colonies. Just for the hell of it, he also tossed out the Dark Lord beating the crap out of him.

"You had it coming," Voldemort said, looking just as amused as Harry as the other witnesses squirmed uncomfortably in the presence of their Master's insanity.

"So did you."

And his protégé's insanity as well.

It lasted a little longer, the interrogator demanding he give up any offers the Minister or Dumbledore or anyone else might have given him to betray the country, which Harry did easily enough, and attempts to make Harry second guess his decisions while away, which he did not. A few of the witnesses even asked questions, but only petty details and personal curiosities. His story was so fantastic that no one could think of anything he might have withheld without making themselves sound utterly absurd for asking.

Finally, they had thanked him for his cooperation and let him go.

"Victoria will take you home," Voldemort informed him, "I must stay and analyze the new intelligence your story has provided."

"Fun," Harry said blandly. He was starting to feel exhaustion creep up on him again, stress and fatigue taking their toll. Voldemort ruffled his hair affectionately.

"Get some rest, today was only the beginning of a very long, busy summer."

It was the first time since his return, which Harry wondered if he was going regret coming back.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Victoria was careful not to hug him when she dropped him off at the cottage. She had seen his grimace of discomfort when Hermione had done so, and known he was injured when she had first picked him up. Instead, she squeezed his hand gently in hers and kissed his cheek, and told him she was happy that he was home.

As he wandered up the path to the cottage, he wondered if he would get sick of hearing that. 'I'm happy you're back'. 'I'm glad you're okay'. 'Welcome home'. Some how he doubted it.

He went to the side door leading into the kitchen, rather than the front, and stepped inside.

"I'm ho- who are you?!" he blurted, more than a little startled to find a woman standing at the sink, filling a kettle with water. She gave a startled little squeak of her own, and dropped the kettle. Harry almost instantly relaxed. Her wand did not appear, and by all accounts her wide brown eyes looked far more frightened of him than he did of her. She had an honest face, no make up and freckled brown from the sun.

"Oh," she said faintly, staring at the wand that had automatically jumped into his hand. He quickly pushed it back up his sleeve, embarrassed by the slip. "I'm sorry. We-we haven't been introduced. I'm Ira Beadle. I've been looking after Professor Snape for the last few days."

He blinked at her. Taking care of Snape?

"Oh," he said, "I'm Harry. Nice to meet you."

She smiled timidly.

"Your kettle is overflowing."

She let out another little squeak and spun around, turning off the water. Quickly pouring out the excess water, she moved the kettle to the stove and turned it on.

"Sorry, sorry. I was just making some tea. Professor Snape is in his lab. He should be resting, but he's really very stubborn. Of course, I'm sure you know that already."

Harry nodded, just watching her run about with a growing confusion.

"I'm sorry, but... he didn't mention you when I was here earlier. Are you...?"

He wanted to ask if she were a maid or a cleaning woman, but if she weren't that would sound extremely rude. He struggled to find an appropriate term. "...from town?"

Er... at least it didn't sound rude.

"Town? Oh no, I'm from London," she said, seeming to realize he really was confused about the entire situation. "I don't know if he told you, but Professor Snape... had something of an accident about a week ago while in London. He's an associate of my stepfather, so we looked after him at our flat for a little while. He insisted on coming home early. Stubborn, you know. So I've been dropping by to make sure he doesn't overdo it."

"That sounds like the professor, alright," Harry sighed. "Don't get carried away. He'll take advantage of anyone doing the housework for him."

"I don't mind. With classes out, I don't have much else to do. Besides, the countryside is much more relaxing than London in the summer."

They fell into conversation, a bit awkward at first but gradually it began to lighten. Ira was easily into her thirties, but she had such a sweet and vaguely insecure air about her that she seemed much younger. She worked as a research assistant at the London University of Witchcraft and Wizardry, and loved her job but hated the city. Crowded, she said, and noisy all the time. She definitely knew who he was, but she didn't ask him any questions about what had happened to him and he was grateful for that. He was getting tired of rehashing it after the third time.

They shared tea and conversation for nearly an hour, and when it came time he helped her prepare dinner by peeling vegetables and shucking corn. At some point, Snape dragged himself upstairs for a cup of tea.

"My god, there's two of you now," he muttered.

"If you could take care of yourself, it wouldn't even be an issue," Ira said pointedly. He glared at her.

“At least, I own my own house.”

When she flinched, Harry's hero complex kicked in.

“Which Voldemort gave you,” Harry said. “Don’t get self-righteous, Professor, it’s really unbecoming of a Slytherin.”

"You're right, that's more a Gryffindor trait," he sneered.

"Quite right. We're perfect like that. Still overpaying for eggs?"

Snape just glowered at him, and headed back towards his potions lab.

“Tell me when dinner’s ready.”

After the door slammed, Harry turned to Ira, and Ira turned to Harry, and they both burst out into laughter.

[illegible]

Book V:

Chapter 9: The Prince and the Purpose

“Get up, Potter.”

“Is it noon yet?” Harry muttered into his pillow.

“Most definitely not.”

“Then nooooo...” But even as he said it he sat himself up. If he didn’t get up on his own, Snape had a variety of ways of making him. He snagged his watch from bedside table. 8:45am. Good grief. He turned to glare at the potions master smirking at him from the doorway.

“Ms. Cypher is downstairs.”

“Natalie? What is she doing here?”

“If you like I could send her up and you can ask her yourself.”

Considering that Harry slept only in his boxers last night, that wasn’t the best of ideas. His over enthusiastic hormones didn’t agree, but they could go straight to hell for all he cared.

“Alright, alright, I’ll get up. Is Ira here yet?”

“Miss Beadle has already served breakfast and gone to market. I will be in my lab researching for most of the day. Do not disturb me,” he said, and left.

“Happy hunting,” Harry tossed after him, immune to his cantankerous ways. He dressed quickly, brushed his teeth, washed his face, and hurried downstairs. Natalie sat in the living room, looking as sophisticated as ever. He paused to admire her for a bit, like Draco, she had changed during his absence. A tad more curvy, face slightly leaner, and eyes a shade darker. Her smile was relieved and nervous at the same time.

“You look awful,” she said, as if it were a compliment. He grinned at her.

“It’s all those darn after parties. They can really wear a guy out. I got your gift. Thank you.”

She blushed a little, but quickly hid it, but changing the subject. “Yes, well, your art is all well and good, but your handwriting is awful.”

He crossed his arms and pretended to be insulted. “Oh, so that’s how it is. I suppose once I’ve mastered the pen, you’ll have me writing you poetry.”

“Oh, ha ha.”

He moved into the living room and took a chair kitty-corner to Natalie. He could see now that she had brought a very familiar looking basket.

“Is that..?”

She smiled and opened the basket. Inana immediately slithered out, climbing up the girl’s offered arm and around her neck, just as she had done with Harry countless times before. He watched in amazement as the snake settled around her shoulders. Inana had always liked Natalie best out of his friends, but he hadn’t thought the regal serpent would allow even her to manhandle her without Harry present. Obviously, he was mistaken.

Inana turned her pointed head towards him, flicked her tongue and finally seemed to recognize him.

“Where have you been? I haven’t ssseen you in agesss.”

“Sssorry. I was kidnapped, and I only got back a few dayssss ago. Are you alright? What are you doing with Natalie?”

“Isss that her name? I don’t know. When you didn’t ssshow up, ssshe ssstarted visiting. She isss tolerable... for a human.”

“What did she say?” Natalie asked, gently stroking the top of the serpents’ scaly head.

“Nothing really, just... airing all your dirty secrets to me. I never would have guessed you keep that in your closet.”

“Harry Potter, you are so full of it,” she laughed. Inana had slid down from her shoulders and was now making her ways towards Harry. At nearly seven feet, she didn’t have to move much, and even seated comfortably in Harry’s lap, she still managed to keep her tail curled affectionately around Natalie’s wrist.

His laughter died off, and he stared mutely at the serpentine body connecting them. The Slytherin girl also fell into uncertain silence.

“I’ve missed you, Natalie.”

“I’ve missed you too.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

McGunny stared blankly at the German newspaper, not comprehending a word of it, but getting a vague idea of what was happening by the moving photos. It was in fact the photos that drew McGunny’s attention in the first place.

There were three photos on the very first page. Harry Potter, looking thin and nervous, standing on a dock somewhere. A picture, a mug shot rather, of another man, looking very much like he wanted to jump out of the picture and strangle someone. The third was of Dumbledore, who looked rather annoyed.

The title page read, Harry Potter zurück in London! Entführt von einem Werwolf! Dumbledore noch immer vermisst!

Out of that, the only words McGunny recognized were the names and 'werewolf'. He felt an inkling of fear. Had Harry been attacked by a werewolf? In the back of his mind he could feel Tom stirring, and then a sudden piercing headache that disappeared almost as quickly as it appeared. And suddenly he knew German.

Harry Potter back in London! Kidnapped by a Werewolf! Dumbledore still Missing!

McGunny closed his eyes, then opened them again. Reread the German script. It remained the same. He could not only read it, but he was pretty he could say it without stumbling over the unfamiliar words. Too strange.

Read the bloody article, Horace.

He made a quick look around the street, lined with small shops and busy with morning shoppers, and found himself an empty bench to sit on. No one gave him a second glance, and despite being in a hostile country, McGunny felt a lot safer among these wizards than he did among the muggles at the airport. He began to read.

'June,12- The Ministry of Magic has just released its first official statement regarding the disappearance of 14-year-old Harold James Potter, former protégé of the Dark Lord Voldemort who was rescued last December by Viktor Krum. Minister Seibligg confirmed public speculation of an attack by Death Eaters on June 3rd, during which Potter was taken against his will and his guardian, Albus Dumbledore has disappeared.

The latest intelligence puts an odd new twist to the event. A mere sixteen hours after Potter's abduction, a routine patrol by three Jr. Aurors turned up the child at a known werewolf hideout. Despite their heroic attempt to rescue Potter, all three Aurors were injured and the kidnappers escaped. The names of the Aurors and the extent of their injuries have not been released. At least one assailant was identified as Stephen Nostrom Canis, a known agitator and black market trader in the Berlin Underworld...'

McGunny had to stop, a shiver running up his spine. A hundred ghastly images popping into his head of what might have happened to his young friend while in the custody of ruthless criminals.

Don't believe it for a second, Tom hissed. The Ministry lies to protect itself. The paper lies to make a better story. You know this already. Keep reading.

He did know better. He had been around Potter enough to know when the paper made up things about him, and they frequently did, and when the 'official' story was a load of crock. He continued to read. The article went on to describe the suspicion of a Death Eater circle being set-up by disgruntled werewolves within Germany, the massive efforts to locate Potter amongst them, the half dozen arrests that had already been made, fears of Potter being infected during the full moon, and finally his reappearance in London during a public appearance by Voldemort. There was a lot of speculation about whether Harry was now a werewolf himself, and if the Dark Lord hadn't 'Imperio-ed' Harry or threatened him to insure his cooperation. The German Ministry still adamantly denied any suggestion of kidnapping Potter in the first place, and insisted that the young wizard was happy to be rescued. In fact, the more McGunny read, the more certain he became that the entire article was a load of bullshit. The few vague suggestions that Dumbledore was now dead struck him as particularly absurd. If Dumbledore were dead, the perpetrators would want that publically known. The old wizard had obviously gone into hiding.

Which meant all of Tom's plans had just gone to pot.

As the increasingly agitated spirit realized this himself, a burst of angry, wild magic ran through McGunny's body, exiting through his hands and lighting his newspaper on fire.

"Shit!" He threw down the paper and stomped out the flames. "Tom, you idiot."

The fire extinguished, McGunny looked around and wasn't surprised that half the people on the street were now looking at him like he was a loon. No point in tempting fate, he decided, and quickly walked away. He could feel Tom raging, pounding like a tiny, but persistent hammer at the inside of his skull. When he had finally found himself on an empty street, he risked talking to the enraged spirit.

“Now what? All your efforts to get Harry out of the country were completely undone, and now that Dumbledore’s gone you don’t have any resources available to you in Germany, and we sure as hell can’t go back to England. I don’t suppose you had a Plan C?” he said, sarcastically.

Tom was silent for a long moment, but with each passing second became calmer and more certain.

I’m a genius, not a prophet. I couldn’t have predicted these turn of events, but as a genius I can find a way to turn them to my advantage. Lets find somewhere to live for now. I will need to gather information before I make any decisions.

“That’s a long winded way of saying ‘I don’t know what I’m doing’.”

You’re being awful mean-spirited, Horace.

“Go back to hell, Tom.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

It had only been about a week and a half, but the mysterious plant Snape had brought home with him was now almost twice as large, which still wasn’t very impressive, being about a foot and a half tall with six leaves. It was rather by accident, that he discovered if he nicked a leaf or stem, it bled. It was a rather disturbing little plant.

At least it didn’t appear to actually require blood, although he found himself changing the potting soil every other day, and seemed quite content with tap water and the artificial sunlight. With this information he was quite certain he could identify the plant, if he could actually find the time to get to the library to get some books on magical botany.

Currently, he barely had time to sit down, let alone do some research, and it was all Harry's fault. Ira was still coming around to do the shopping and the housework, but there were some things she just wasn't qualified to handle. Supervising Harry was one of them. Six months abroad had done nothing to curb his willful nature, and if anything he was twice as bad as before. He was already writing letters to just about everyone, including his godfathers, without checking with Snape first and had even gone out to visit Clyde for lunch the day before without telling anyone. The sad thing was, Harry honestly hadn't seen the harm in it. The potions master was very close to ringing his neck.

On top of that, Snape found himself accompanying the boy to London almost daily for press interviews and conferences with the Dark Lord (which admittedly were more for his benefit than Harry's), and to Dueling Club tournaments (which he would have had to attend anyway as the club's adult supervisor, but now had to deal with being in charge of a celebrity at the same time). Then there was the increase in post. It hadn't taken long for people to realize that Harry wasn't receiving their mail, and much of it was now being routed through to Snape, including nearly forty betrothal offers, sixteen modeling offers by advertising companies, and a rather lot of free tickets to Quidditch matches (which he had no intention of letting Harry go to if he continued to wander off on his own). And as if that weren't enough, Ms. Cypher had returned to Harry's life, and reminded him, that yes, he is in fact an adolescent male with all the parts and instincts that entails, and therefore couldn't be left alone with her. Or Hermione, but luckily she always came over with Draco.

Speaking of the Malfoys...

"To what do I owe the privilege of your company?" he asked, only mildly sarcastic, as it was a rare event that Narcissa ever visited him without her husband. She had arrived in the company of Draco and Hermione, who had quickly been sent off to find Harry, out watering the garden with Ms. Beadle. Snape put on a kettle of tea, and sat down with her in the living room. She looked distinctly out of place in his modest country house, her hair and clothes done in chicest London fashion, but not uncomfortable. She was queen of where ever she was, be it a palace or a pub.

They had been good friends during their school years and even tighter during the war, but time and responsibilities had gradually been taking them in different directions. They still enjoyed each others company.

“Lucius and I have been worried about you, Severus. After that attack in London, you just wandered out of the hospital and all but disappeared, and when you did show up you acted as if nothing had happened. Then Potter showed up, and suddenly you’re everywhere. It is a bit baffling,” she said, not looking the least bit baffled.

“You know me, Narcissa. I was never one to lie around and do nothing... even when I probably should have. You needn’t have worried. Ms. Beadle has been mothering me in your absence,” he said, smirking a bit. She smirked back. Her bedside manner had always left something to be desired, and she wasn’t the least bit apologetic.

“Ah yes, Ms. Beadle. Rather charming girl, in a mousy kind of way.”

“If you say so.”

“You must like her at least a little, if you haven’t sent her running yet,” she said, knowingly.

“She cooks and keeps house for free. I’m not going to look a gift horse in the mouth.”

“Mmm... How are you recovering?”

“I’ve been recovered for nearly a week,” he lied. Truthfully, he still had trouble sleeping at night because of the aches in his abdomen, but he was able to function for the most part.

“And your ward?”

“Potter is nearly twelve pounds lighter than when he left. You wouldn’t know it for all the hell he still raises.”

“Yes, Draco mentioned he knocked one of his adversaries clean into the stands during the last dueling competition.”

Snape smirked at the memory. No one had looked more surprised than Harry when his simple disarming hex had sent a duelist twice his size nearly thirty feet. The Weasley twins had been crowing about his spectacular come back, even after he was disqualified from the rest of the matches for ‘excessive force’. Harry had turned bright red, and hadn’t stopped blushing until after they left the tournament.

“I suppose duking it out with the Dark Lord and the German Aurors has made dueling against his peers seem rather tame in comparison.”

Narcissa very nearly twitched at the vague reference to Harry’s fight with Voldemort. She didn’t have a clue what it was about, but she did know that Harry had broken the Dark Lord’s nose (not that you could tell) according to her husband, who was still reeling from the fact that the Gryffindor had not only come back to Britain on his own, but had actually survived the Dark Lord’s temper tantrum relatively unharmed. The only one who hadn’t been surprised was Snape, who was taking the ordeal in about as good a humor as Snape took anything.

“Yes, I suppose so. I hope you both can avoid getting into a row. He’s at that age now, after all.”

It wasn’t something he particularly worried about. Harry and he had been in plenty of fights, some real shouting matches and plenty of door slamming, but they had never resorted to wands or fists. There was an unspoken, but mutual agreement that violence had no place in their home. That wasn’t something he felt Narcissa needed to know. It inferred things he didn’t like.

“I assure you I have Potter well in hand.”

“That’s a relief. I have a feeling things are going to get very tense soon, Severus. We need you to be at your most commanding, to lead the children through the difficult times. They’re coming soon. I can feel it.”

He nodded. He felt it too. All of Britain felt it. The Dark Lord’s Ultimatum to Germany was like a ticking bomb, the entire world turned to watch as the time ran down to its final, violent conclusion. Voldemort was still demanding the German Minister be held accountable for his act of war against a ‘peaceful’ nation, and Seibligg was still denying any wrong doing. Potter’s return hadn’t diffused the situation, and had in fact made matters tenser. Germany had no hostage, and the Minister of Magic was more desperate than ever to prove himself in the right. There was no reason for the Dark Lord to hold back.

“I know. When the time comes... I will ensure that they know their duty. Especially Potter.”

And wasn’t that going to be fun.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Harry’s life had gone from very slow and tedious (Durmstrang) to frantically chaotic (return to Britain), and finally seemed to settle somewhere in the middle at frantically tedious. Two weeks after his return, he had finally gotten tired of hearing ‘welcome back, Harry’. He had done more press interviews in one week than he had in all the years prior, met a few times with Voldemort, visited almost all his friends (thank Merlin for Ira, because Snape couldn’t be bothered to take him anywhere just for leisure), written to those he hadn’t (Elsbeth had returned on her own on the third day), helped Ira keep house (which involved a lot more work than the two bachelors had bothered with the year before), finished reading Hermione’s log, and continued Dueling practice and tournaments (and was more than a little surprised to find he was ahead rather than behind most of his classmates). He hadn’t even started on his summer school work. He was afraid to even ask about it, wondering if Snape would tell him he would have to repeat the entire year like Cedric Diggory (whom he had visited and had a very interesting discussion about Valkyries with).

Despite his tight schedule, he made point to set aside this one particular day for a trip to London. It wasn't for interviews or Voldemort, but it was important. He had been thinking about it off and on since he had been taken to Durmstrang. Ira was escorting him this time, which was good because Snape could be damn frightening to anyone under the age of... dirt. He was could frighten just about anyone if he put his mind to it.

Even through the door, Harry and Ira could hear the sound of too many children after eating too much sugar. Laughter and screeching and singing and running feet. Harry turned to his escort.

“Are you sure you want to come in? If you want to go home and pick me up in a few hours that would be fine too.”

She shook her head, and said solemnly. “Professor Snape would kill me if he knew I left you with a horde of impressionable young people.”

They both laughed. One of the things Harry liked about Ira was that she was one of the few people that knew how to handle Snape. It took a thick skin, a bit of wit, and the ability to ignore him when he got testy, and if you could do all that eventually you found yourself enjoying his company. He was like drinking really strong, black coffee. It certainly wasn't for everyone.

He knocked on the door. There was a few more moments of playful racket, and then the door was pulled open by Robert Reicher, coated in a layer of glitter and confetti. His eyes widened as he recognized Harry.

“Harry?”

“Surprise?” he said, smiling weakly. It occurred to him that he probably should have sent them word in advance that he was coming, but by the time he had remembered Elsbeth had already been sent out to deliver a letter to Hagrid.

Nevertheless, Robert smiled. "I'll say."

He pulled away from the door a moment to look behind him, then turned to Harry. "Okay, hurry in quick before they spot you. This will be a perfect surprise. I have the kitchen cordoned off for the adults."

They hurried inside and towards the back, Harry chuckling as they snuck passed the living room where a dozen or so children were busy playing a game that looked suspiciously like Twister. They made it to the kitchen safely undetected, and there found a large pile of presents and a congregation of parents. Harry set his present down amongst the rest, and looked around.

"Where's Kyle?"

"Watching the kids," Robert said, "I'll get him in just a second here. It's good you came. Morgana insisted you would be here, and it would have broken her heart if..."

"I made a promise," Harry said. "I never forget my promises. I'm sorry, I should have sent you word ahead of time."

Robert placed his hand on Harry's shoulder, and smiled. "I'm glad you're here." There was a lot said in the gesture, more so than even the words, and Harry felt familiar warmth he associated with home. Then he seemed to finally notice Ira.

"Oh, I'm sorry, we haven't been introduced. Robert Reicher."

"Ira Beadle. I'm Harry's...er..."

"Friend," Harry offered. "She's been helping me settle back in."

"Ah, well, it's nice to meet you. Let me just get Kyle. He'll ring my neck if I don't warn him in advance."

He left the kitchen in hurry, leaving the two with six other strangers, more than a few of them openly gawking at Harry.

“Good Lord, you wouldn’t happen to be-” one rather hefty looking mother started.

A father, one of two there, shook his head. “Oh, I get it, you’re a look-a-like. I’ve heard of this. You hire a look-a-like to entertain at parties, like birthdays and weddings. As if Rob knows-”

“Actually no,” Harry said. “I really am Harry Potter. Nice to meet you.”

The other parents looked uncertain for a moment, but then one of the mothers, clearly well into another pregnancy, came forward and shook his hand.

“I’m Addy Gaines. My son, Joel is in Morgana’s class.”

“Nice to meet you, Mrs. Price.”

And that started off the introductions, but they only made it half way through before Kyle came running into the kitchen as if it were on fire. One moment, he was just staring at Harry and then the next he was hugging the body like an anaconda.

“I can’t believe it! You rascal! You had me laughing for days when I heard you got back all on your own.”

“Well, I couldn’t break my promise, now could I?” he managed to wheeze out. Kyle just laughed and patted him on the back.

“It’s good to have you back. Come on out. Alyssa is already suspicious, and if she catches you, the kitchen is going to be as big a mess as the rest of the house.”

Harry took a quick moment to introduce Ira, and then followed Kyle out into the hall, the other parents following behind out of curiosity.

“Morgana, Alyssa, look who finally showed up!”

Harry had barely even stepped into view before he found himself with an armful of little girls. They cried out in delight, wrapping their little arms around.

“Harry!”

“How are my beautiful princesses?” he said, kneeling down. They were all done up in curls and pink and yellow birthday dresses, flush from laughing and running around. Alyssa reached out and touched his cheek.

“You’re so skinny!”

“Ah, well you see, I missed you both so much, I just about wasted away,” he explained, solemnly, “But then I remembered my promise, and decided I just had to escape.”

Morgana turned to a little boy, who looked a bit like Addy, and said, “Told you so!” Then she turned back to Harry. “Tell us about it! You always have the best stories! I bet this one is really good!”

Harry looked uncertain. Telling stories to two little girls around bedtime was a lot different than telling stories to a dozen little girls and boys hyped up on sugar.

“Please, Prince Harry?” Alyssa begged, which got the other children going.

“Please, please, please?!”

He sighed and nodded, and they all let out a cheer, including some of the adults in the hall just to be cute. He waded through the children until he reached the sofa, Morgana on the right, Alyssa on the left, two more kids squeezed in on both sides and the rest sitting on the floor, while the adults found seating or lounging spots where ever they could.

“Alright, where shall I start?” he asked. Morgana of course, had the answer.

“Tell us why you got kidnapped. Papa said it was because Germany doesn’t have its own prince, so they stole ours. They just have lords and ladies and a really stupid minister.”

There was soft chuckling from the adults, but Harry just nodded solemnly, the idea for the story (because there was no way he was telling it the way it really happened) already starting to take shape.

“Oh, yes, this is very true. There are many noble lords and ladies in Germany, but no king or queen or princes or princesses. All they have is Minister Seibligg, and he is quite stupid. In fact, the Minister was elected because he was so stupid, and the people thought it would be a funny joke to pick him. You see if they had a stupid ruler they thought they could have all the fun they wanted and he would be too stupid to stop them. They could skip school and sleep during work and eat ice cream every day.”

This made the children all smile. It certainly sounded like a good plan to them.

“So they had a lot of fun there?” a little girl asked.

Harry shook his head. “No, they did not. It was only fun for a few days, and then the children all grew bored, the grown-ups all ran out of money, and eating all that ice cream gave them tummy aches. So they went back to school and they got back to work and they ate their spinach.” The children wrinkled their noses. “Now the Minister thought he was doing an excellent job. For a whole week everyone was so happy, so he didn’t understand why they had all started going back to studying and working and eating spinach, and he passed a law ordering them all to stop. This made the people very angry, and they all told him he was stupid and he couldn’t make them do anything, and they kept learning, working, and eating-“ “Spinach,” several children said at once.

“Exactly.” *

Harry continued his story, weaving a tale of foolishness and bravery and magic, enrapturing the listeners, both child and adult. He told them of the Minister’s foolish plan to become king by adopting an orphan prince so that he could rule forever, and how he betrayed King Voldemort, who had just happened to have an orphan prince lying around, and stole the orphan and locked him away in an ice fortress. But the orphan was very clever, as most orphans are, and escaped by sneaking aboard the same pirate ship that kidnapped him. Once he reached land, the orphan prince met many people, some bad and some good and some strange, until at last he met the werewolves, who saved him from being lost in a dangerous wood and led him home through a secret underground tunnel.

“And then,” Kyle pitched in, “They all celebrated by eating-“

“Spinach!” some yelled, and everyone laughed.

“Ice cream and cake! Everyone into the dinning room!”

There were shouts of glee, and the tranquility of before was shattered by the promise of more sugar. Alyssa and Morgana each gave him a big hug and ran off with the rest. Harry sighed in relief, and slumped into the cushions. It was hard work telling a story for nearly an hour and keeping it entertaining.

“That, my friend,” Robert said, helping him to his feet, “Was a very good story.”

One of the other parents laughed, “I don’t suppose I could hire you on to do Rachel’s birthday party? I’ve never seen that many children sit that quietly for that long.”

Harry laughed, but shook his head. “I’m afraid I’m all booked up for the rest of the year.”

The rest of the party went off without a hitch. They had their cake and ice cream, Morgana opened her presents, and they spent about another hour burning off sugar with several rounds of hide-in-seek, before everyone started to crash and their parents took them home. Morgana and Alyssa were very reluctant to let Harry go, so he lingered until the very end by having coffee with Robert, Kyle, and Ira until even Morgana and Alyssa were struggling against sleep.

He kissed them both on the forehead, wished Robert and Kyle goodnight, and followed Ira out into London. The sun hadn't quite settled below the skyline, but the afternoon heat was quickly fading. They were both tired, but in a pleasant, drowsy sort of way.

"You really are a prince, you know that?" Ira said after a block.

"I've heard it said, once or twice," which was as far as he was ever going to be to admitting it.

"You made those little girls very happy today."

"I also made them miserable for six months worrying about me. Do you think a few hours makes up for that?"

She looked at him startled. He was still smiling, but it had taken on a melancholy air she had assumed was simply fatigue.

"It's hard being my friend," he said, "It can even be dangerous. Trouble finds me and I seek out trouble, and bad things happen sometimes."

"That's not your fault."

"Do you think that makes it better? I love my friends, I care about them, and for the last six months they had to wait here and wonder if I was ever coming back or if I was even okay. Before that, they had to wonder if I was going to survive the bloody Triwizard cup and before that being stalked by a terrorist and before that it was... something else... and something else before that... It's always something, and there will always be something."

She couldn't say anything to that. She didn't even know how the subject had come up, but she was feeling distinctly out of her element.

"I like you, Ira. You're a nice lady and easy to talk to, but you need to understand what caring about me entails. I get into dangerous situations sometimes. I have a lot of secrets that I'll never tell you. I practice the kind of magics that can tear apart a person's soul if they're not careful. I enjoy the company of werewolves, and do things with them that no sane person would dare. I talk to snakes. Oh, and Voldemort wants me to help him rule the UK. That's all the major things, I think."

She just blinked at him, and then swallowed thickly. Now, she was feeling just plain out of her league. The things he was talking about she never expected to face, not in a hundred years, but that was the everyday existence for Harry. A life so fantastical it couldn't be anything but lonely.

He looked so small walking there beside her.

"You have to think this through, Ira," he continued. "I've given you fair warning, which is more than anyone else ever got when they fell in with me. It's not all going to be tea and birthday parties. Just ask Snape. He can rant for days on the subject."

"You're tired, Harry."

"Yeah, but I'm not lying."

"I know. Lets just get you home."

He smiled bit more authentically. "I'm already home. Everyone welcomes me back where ever I go. Complete strangers, even. It's weird, but kind of nice. I bet I could stop anyone on this street and introduce myself, and they'll say. 'It's good to meet you, lad. Welcome home,' or 'Oh yes, I've heard of you! Good to have you back!' I'll bet you a whole galleon, that's what they would happen."

"You're probably right," she said. "They all mean it too."

“And that’s just what the king intended”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry sprung up in his bed, staring wide eyed into the darkness of his room. He could sense it was late into the night, possibly even the early morning before even a hint of pre-dawn light.

“Bobby? Elsbeth? Is that you?” he whispered, searching blindly for his glasses and his wand on the bedside table. He cast a Lumos on the darkened room, bringing his wand to a gentle glow that wouldn’t hurt his eyes.

There was no Bobby or Elsbeth, but there was an owl standing on the owl perch, unfamiliar, but with a very obvious roll of parchment on its leg. He dug some owl treats out of his bedside table, gave one to it while he untied the message. Unrolling it, he found a letter in familiar flowing script and a newspaper article. He read the letter first.

Dear Harry

I was relieved to hear that you had returned home safely. I knew you could do it. Your escape, however, has had some unforeseen consequences that I know you would want to be made aware of as soon as possible. There are werewolves trying to get into France without permits or papers, and while this isn’t uncommon, we have never seen so many at once. I did some investigating, and what I learned breaks my heart.

The werewolves in Germany are being hunted. There is no telling how many have been arrested, but those who have managed to make into France insist the number to be in the hundreds and dozens have been killed already. The Ministry is accusing them of being Death Eaters, but even if it were true their tactics are too extreme to be legal or moral. They are even arresting the people who are hiding the werewolves, and there has been rioting in Munich and Stuttgart.

The Queen intends to renounce their actions formally soon, but she doesn't hold much sway in Germany any longer and we do not have the resources to handle so many people so suddenly. If there are accidents, and a werewolf hurts or kills someone, she will be held accountable.

I know you care about these people, so if there is anyway you can convince Lord Voldemort to help us, I can almost guarantee France will accept it. If anyone can convince him, it's you.

It wasn't signed, but then Harry already knew it was Fleur. The article she had sent him was in German, detailing lie after lie about Harry and his escape from Germany. There was nothing of the Aurors who had attacked him, which he wasn't expecting, but describing Stephen, a family man through and through, as a lone dissenter attempting to raise a covert army was absurd. There was no mention of his wife and children at all. He stared at it, baffled for a long time. Then realized what was being done was a lot more important than what was being said.

The werewolves needed help. They needed help, and while he wasn't sure how he played into it, he was certain it was at least partly his fault.

The weight of an overwhelming responsibility began to settle on his shoulders. He didn't know if he could do anything. He had no power of his own, only what Voldemort gave him, and he didn't know if he could beg this boon from him so soon after his return, the ashy taste of betrayal still fresh in the Dark Lord's mouth.

Unless...

"I have to make it appeal to him," he said softly to the dark.

He lit the candle on his desk with the flick of his wand, and pulled out some parchment, a quill, and ink. For ten minutes, he simply sat there and tried to clear his mind of images Fleur had conjured in her letters. Images he associated with the Jews and gypsies of World War II; entire families hiding in attics as soldiers hunted the house for them, desperate dashes for freedom in the dark of night, and lines of the captured marched into the back of trucks never to be seen again.

He couldn't use those. The Dark Lord wouldn't care, and all they did was weigh him down with guilt and responsibility. He had to shove them aside, and find a reason that would make Voldemort want to help them. To find the advantages in a situation that should be resolved for solely moral reasons.

When he could finally push aside his own feelings, he was amazed that reasons were abundant, all of them cold and amoral, but plentiful. Quickly, he began to write.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"I need to see Lord Voldemort. Today."

"Certainly. I'll just cancel your appointment with the Spanish Minister and bump that meeting with the Pope to three," Snape said, not looking up from the forty-second marriage proposal. Once you got passed the flowery introductions, they were actually pretty funny to read. Like James Potter's love letters to Lily. The man couldn't write a poem unless it rhymed and that had resulted in some interesting similes and metaphors that rhymed with 'Lily'.

Ira was at the stove, making eggs, as if she had never left. She looked over at him curiously, but didn't ask. This clearly didn't involve her.

"It involves his relations with France. It's important."

Snape looked up from his letter, curiosity peaked.

"And how would you have come across information relevant to the Dark Lord's relations with France? And what makes you think he doesn't know what you know already?"

“I have friends in France. How do you think I managed to get through it without getting arrested? And I’m sure the Dark Lord knows what I know already, but just to be sure...”

“If you just tell me-“

“It involves me too.”

Snape’s eyes narrowed in suspicion. Harry tried to smile innocently, but he had been up in his room all night brainstorming and then picking apart his own ideas like Hermione had taught him to do, and was too tired for anything more enthusiastic than darkly amused.

“I could make you tell me...”

“I’m not eleven anymore, Professor. Do you really want into see what’s floating around in my head? Even the Dark Lord shies away from it these days.”

“You’re getting better at this,” Snape remarked, and turned back to the letters. “I’ll send him a missive. If he can spare the time, we’ll go.”

“Thank you,” Harry said, sincerely. The potions master sighed.

“And you were doing so well up until that point. I almost forgot you were a Gryffindor.”

“Gryffindors get the toast that’s less burnt,” he said, smirking up at Ira as she set down his plate in front of him. She just rolled her eyes. Snape, however, double checked to see if it were true.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Voldemort did, in fact, have time to spare for them, and a quarter before noon, they walked into the Department of Foreign Affairs, Scottish Branch in Glasgow. Harry made it a point to dress in his interview clothes, freshly spelled free of wrinkles and shoes shined.

He had Fleur's letter and his own list of ideas folded neatly in his breath pocket, but he hoped he wouldn't have to take out either.

They went through the usual security checks, and entered the Dark Lord's office. The style was distinctly gothic, narrow pointed arches at the windows and door way, and high vaulted ceiling making the room feel more like a medieval church than an office. The Dark Lord's desk however, made of ancient timbers and inlaid with dragons and horses and gods would never have been at home in a church. He leaned against his high-backed chair as they entered, his interest immediately settling on Harry.

"You wished to talk to me about something?"

The Gryffindor swallowed thickly, and took a seat nearest his desk. Snape, however, remained near the door with his arms crossed, stating without a word that Harry was on his own here.

"Yes... have you... have you received any letters from France recently?"

He raised a brow.

"I have."

"Then you know of the werewolf situation?"

The Dark Lord smiled knowingly. Out of the corner of his eye, Harry saw Snape shift, and thought if he turned to him he would see one very pissed off potions master.

"Do you intend to help?"

"Do you?" Voldemort asked, curiously.

"...I only have the power that you give me," Harry said cautiously. "If you give me the power to help them, I will."

“A very good answer. And how would you help them if I granted you such power?”

That was a tricky question to answer. If Harry asked for too much, he would be denied, if he asked for too little opportunity would be lost. He decided to aim high. He might be able to argue his way up.

“Offer to take a few hundred of the refugees off France’s hands and set them up with Greyback, perhaps set up additional colonies in France with their permission.”

Voldemort let out a snort. “A few hundred refugees? Do you think Greyback have that much room to spare? They’re hunters and gathers, not urbanites. I would have to hand over half the forests in Britain, including the Forbidden Forest to accommodate that many werewolves. And then I’d have to re-open all those cells in Azkaban because there was no more openings left for the felonious amongst the furred.”

“They’re people,” Harry said pointedly, “They can adapt to being something other than hunter gatherers. They can be farmers, and still live off the land and provide a service to wizarding kind. Or shepherds. Dairy farmers. Anything that gives them space away from witches and wizards.”

Voldemort conceded the point with a gesture.

“Alright, I could take a few hundred people off their hands. Now tell me why I should?”

“Aside from the fact that the Queen of France will love you for it?”

The Dark Lord smirked. “Aside from that.”

“You’ll have hundreds of very grateful people, seriously pissed off at the country you intend to go war with for one.”

“Oh, I like that one. Greyback won’t let me take them out of his territory for military purposes though.”

Harry thought for a moment. "He'd probably let you take a lot of the men if you negotiated for it. There are a disproportionate number of men to women in the colonies."

Voldemort conceded that point as well. Harry let out the breath he was holding. So far, so good. Naturally, the Dark Lord had to throw a curve ball.

"I doubt I'll be able to get the Brits to agree with you though. They're still grumbling over the monopoly on furs and forest goods the wolves have going. If the system didn't work so well, the trade guilds would still be pushing to dissolve the colonies."

Harry didn't know anything about the trade guilds opposition to werewolves, but he had factored in the public's reluctance to let more werewolves into the country after only a few years of having control over their native population.

"I'll convince them."

"You?"

"I'll convince the people that it's the right thing to do. That it is the right and honorable thing to do. Isn't that what you wanted? For me to sell the people on an idea that you can't? I think that's what you said."

Voldemort's smile faded, and he stared at Harry thoughtfully.

"And do you think you could do it now? Are you that brave? That strong? Once you start down this path you can't step off of it. You will be identified by your cause, and there are going to be a lot of people who hate you for it, strive to dishonor you and those close to you, mock your every decision and action."

Harry remained quiet, truly thinking about what the Dark Lord was saying. Life was already difficult without public criticism, but he wasn't naïve enough to think it wouldn't have ended up that way. Voldemort wanted his prince, and the prince was always more vulnerable. The least he could do was have the subject of criticism be something he could support whole heartedly.

“I am a child of the Moon,” Harry said, “And they are my brothers and my sisters. What is the mockery of men compared to their suffering? If you give me the power, I will help them.”

“And if I don’t?”

“Then I’ll have to find the power elsewhere... and that is a scary, scary thought.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

“This is the stupidest idea you’ve had yet,” McGunny hissed under his breath, wandering down the darkened street. Blood Row. Vampireville. Coffin Corner. That’s what they called these places in England. The one or two blocks the vampires kept themselves to in any given city, where a mortal only came under the protection of one of its inhabitants or if they had a death wish. McGunny didn’t have either, but Tom had taken control over his limbs just to get him there, and now was moving him about with the sort of confidence that kept even the most suspicious shadowy figure from looking twice at him.

They are powerful here and numerous. Just the allies we need.

“Can’t we get allies that are breathing and vegetarian instead?” he muttered.

Sure, if we were raging a war against cancer and obesity.

The apartments and shops along Blood Row (he had no idea of the street’s real name or what the Germans called it), were all dark and all open, the soft glow of candlelight peeking out of the odd, open curtain. Pale men and women walked the street, dressed in either elegant black, whites, and reds or tattered grays, and music flowed from every shop, all varieties including folk and acoustic guitar. There was a lively air about the place, despite most of its occupants being dead, and if it weren't for the poor lighting he might have passed down this street without even realizing where he was.

“Aren't you a little young to be out on your own, little man?” a voice suddenly purred in his ear. If McGunny had had any control over his body, he would have jumped near out of his skin, but Tom didn't allow him to so much as flinch. Instead, he turned to the male vampire smirking at him. He was slender, almost sexless in shape, with narrow eyes and a wide mouth that made him look like a snake.

Tom liked him instantly.

“Who is the Master of this Row?”

“Who is asking?”

Tom/McGunny handed him a card, black with an elegant golden V, and nothing else. The vampire took it, but there was no recognition.

“Give it to the Master of the Row. He will know what it means or else he is not worth talking to.”

The vampire's eyes widened and he hurried off, disappearing into one of the shops. They didn't have to wait long, before the slender vampire returned.

“Mistress Katiana will speak with you.”

Splendid.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Harry stood at the podium, his hands clenched against the wood to keep them from shaking, and looked over the some six-thousand people gathered into the square in the London Court District. It had only been two days, and despite what he had said to Voldemort he didn't feel the least bit prepared.

He had helped write this speech with one of Voldemort's professional speech writers, who had then made him practice it over and over so that Harry didn't even need his cards (although he still kept them just in case) and didn't sound like he was just reading at the audience. He had practiced it in front of Sirius and Remus and Luna while Voldemort negotiated with Greyback, and they insisted it was a good speech. Diana had even given him her blessing.

He was as prepared as he could possible be, but still felt like he was going to freeze up and fall over before a single word escaped his mouth. Closing his eyes and taking a deep breath, he reminded himself why he was doing this in the first place. People were suffering out there, people like the Canis's and his godfathers, and if he could do something...

"Hello and good morning," he said, his voice magically amplified to rise above the natural din of the crowd. Everyone settled fell silent to listen. "Thank you all for coming on such short notice."

There was the expected shout of 'We love you, Harry', somewhere in crowd, and he ducked his head shyly, before forcing himself to look up and continue.

"Now I am afraid I must apologize. You see, I invited you all here under false pretences."

There was a confused murmur through the crowd.

"I did not come here to talk to you about what happened in Germany or during my journey home. You can read that in any newspaper from here to Dublin. I have had ample opportunity to share my story with you, and you have been captive audience. No, I do not come before you to speak for myself. I speak to you on behalf of those who have no voice. I speak on behalf of werewolves."

The crowd reacted as Voldemort had predicted and the speech-writer had warned. Outrage and indignation, but mostly confusion. A press release had been given the day before, detailing the German Minister's anti-werewolf campaign and France's only dilemma in taking in those who fled the country, so at least some of them had an idea of what he was going to talk about. Harry took a long slow breath, fighting down his instinct to run from the stage. Now came the really hard part.

“Please,” he continued, and the ruckus died down a little, “let me say my part.”

He gave the crowd another few seconds to settle, and eventually even the dissenters quieted.

“I know it isn’t easy for you accept werewolves. We have had a long, dark history of fear and violence between us and them, and it can not be erased or forgotten in the course of a few years, and nor should it. Their existence is made more tragic and more frightening in their humanity. They are all children and siblings and spouses and friends to us, and it is only bad luck or bad choices that keeps them from sitting at our dinner table, shopping in our stores, and going to our schools.”

Harry had to stop for just a moment, forcing back the emotion that was threatening to choke him. He was thankful everyone remained silent until he was ready to continue.

“As many of you know, my godfathers are werewolves and they have saved my life more than once. The Canis family, also werewolves, risked not only their freedom but their very lives to bring me across hostile country to my homeland. I owe them all a debt of gratitude and eternal friendship, so when I received word that the German Minister has begun a campaign of tyranny against their native werewolf population and any who would attempt to protect them, using my escape as an excuse, lying to save face...”

The anger here was genuine. Two days and Voldemort’s explanation of the Minister’s tactics had fed a deep seated hatred for the man. Tactics, Harry now realized were dripping with spite directed at Harry himself, a way to hurt him while at the same time rescuing himself.

“I can not remain passive as my actions are being used to persecute a people who has no voice, no means of defending themselves. I make my stand here and now. With help from the civil rights group, Voice for All, I am submitting a proposal to the Wizengamot to open sixteen new colonies...”

Some of the crowd started to protest, but Harry continued to plow through before they gained momentum to drown him out.

“... consisting primarily of farmland, rather than forest...”

That shut up nearly half the protestors right there.

“..so that we might accommodate some three hundred displaced werewolves within our nation’s borders and also send twenty or thirty native werewolves to France to help them set up werewolf colonies of their own. The proposal is called Proposal 4-66, and will be released for public scrutiny in two days. I am requesting your support.”

There were more protests, although most of the crowd now looked more torn than anything. Most people had no real opinion on werewolves, who were so far out of their realm of experience as to not warrant thinking about, and being forced to do it so suddenly left them uncertain. Voldemort told him it would be his job to lead the uncertain people to his way of thinking. That was a politician’s job.

“I know this is a sacrifice,” Harry said, raising his voice, drowning out all others. “I am asking you to sign over lands that can no longer be held for public use. I am asking you invite strangers into your backyards. I am asking for you accept that added risk of more werewolves. And I am asking you to do this with no offer of compensation. By all accounts, I probably shouldn’t bother asking at all, and if I didn’t know a few things I wouldn’t. But I do know some things.’

‘What I know is that our nation has integrity. I know that you want to do the right thing the right way for the right reasons. Even when it’s scary, even when its hard, even when others say it’s wrong.”

Protest died right there, and there was a small murmur of agreement.

“Do you know how I know this? I know this because you are standing in front of me right now. I know this because fifteen years ago you all took a stand. While thousands fled for reasons both legitimate and false, you or your parents took a stand to hold firm. And when the fires burned out and the future remained unknown, you rebuilt from the ashes your homes, your businesses, and your communities. I know I can ask you this unreasonable request, because I know you are not strangers to unreasonable expectations. Because I know you no strangers to tough decisions.”

Now everyone was starting shout out their agreements, a sense of pride swelling in their chests. Harry could feel the end of his performance drawing near, and his terror was greater than ever, knowing if he fumbled now he would have blown the entire thing. His mouth was dry as sand paper but he didn't dare take a drink and disrupt the flow of enthusiasm he had finally gathered from the crowd.

“You know, over there,” he said, pointing east, in the general direction of Europe, “They think it was the good people that left during the war. They think only the smart and honest people left, but I know the truth. I know the real quality witches and wizards stuck it out. I know the loyal, the proud, and the courageous stuck it out.”

The crowd was cheering now, shouting out at the end of his every sentence, the crescendo to a line of music.

“And do you know what? We're going to prove it to them! We are going to show them that the United Kingdoms do nothing by halves. We will show them not only through our great deed of magic and business and art, but also through our great deeds of compassion and humanity. Right now, we have the opportunity to save hundreds from persecution, in a way that no one else can. We have first and only completely successful program for dealing with werewolves, that not only maintains public safety but also the dignity and well-being of person infected. We have not only the obligation, but the honor of sharing this knowledge. In the years to come, what we decide to do today may save the lives of thousands. So if I were to ask you now, for the betterment of our witches and wizards, both here and abroad, will you support Proposal 4-66, what would your answer be?"

"YES!"

The cry rang out through the square, possible through half the wizarding part of the city, and Harry nearly stumbled backwards. I did it! he thought weakly, torn between relief and awe.

"What is your answer?!" he shouted out again.

"YES!" they cried louder than before, and began to chant, "4-66! 4-66! 4-66!"

Harry stepped away from the podium, the chant of the crowd at his back, and entered the Court Building. Voldemort stood beside the door, smiling like the devil and applauding his performance. Harry was very tempted to vomit on his shoes, but politely refrained. One the interns got him a chair and he collapsed into it.

"I feel like I'm going to die," he moaned. "Please tell me I don't have to do that again."

"Not today," Voldemort said cheerfully. The day had been a marvelous success, and not just because for Proposal 4-66, but for Harry himself.

Harry was now, officially and undeniably, the Prince of Britain.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

1. I ended up writing a lot of Harry's tale before I realized it could make a chapter all its own, so I will be posting it separately in a few days so that it doesn't take up too much of this chapter.

Ack! My notice didn't post! I actually posted a notice on Thursday, or thought I did. Apparently, it didn't show up on . Sorry about that. No one said anything until today so I honestly didn't realize anything was wrong. This is the message I sent:

Hello boys and girls, sorry about the delay in posting. RL has been particularly chaotic this week. I now have a new job, and am spending half the remaining week visiting family before it starts. With my new upcoming job schedule and my college classes due to start in a few weeks, I have decided it would best to move my posting day to Mondays. I know you have all become accustomed to Friday posts, but I think this will work best in the long run. Chapter 10 will be posted this Monday, barring any further RL complications.

Book V:

Chapter 10: Political Unrest

Katarina, Mistress of Berlin's Vampire Row, was not a typical specimen of vampirism, but then most Masters and Mistresses were not. It took a rare sort of vampire to look beyond the moment, beyond the despair of an unending existence, and plan for themselves and for others. Katarina was the type to laugh at stereotypes and ideology without substance. She did not wear black or red, as was customary among vampires, but preferred bright colors; violets, blues, yellows, and greens silks and velvets, and perhaps a little more gold jewelry than was strictly tasteful. With her dark skin and kohl painted eyes, McGunny found himself thinking of Egyptian Queens, even though her dress was pure European.

McGunny noted her appearance and demeanor as merely a second hand observer. He had surrendered his body to Tom for this meeting, as much he hated it, with the understanding that if he tried what Tom was doing, the vampiress would see him for the liar that he was and kill him.

"It is happening just as he predicted," Tom said, idly stirring his tea. He was sitting across from Katarina in the living area of squalid, little apartment she had provided him. Originally there had been no furniture in the apartment except for a lumpy mattress on a creaky iron bedframe, but he had started transfiguring some crates and abandoned rubbish into furniture on the first day there, and after six days, the apartment had actually started to look homey, which no doubt irked the vampire. She obviously wanted him to squirm, while she thought over his proposal.

She said nothing at first, merely staring at the newspaper article in her lap. The German Ministry was on an anti-werewolf campaign. This wasn't unusual. She had been through several campaigns in her seven hundred years in dozens of different countries. The UK and France offering sanctuary wasn't odd either. Countries often offered refuge to the victims of their enemies, out of spitefulness or to recruit more soldiers, just as Europe had done for the refugees of Voldemort's coup d'état. However, it was the very fact that there was nothing unusual about these events that concerned Katarina. She had lived long enough to know what would happen once the Ministry ran out of werewolves to torment.

“Your people will be next,” the young man who had called himself ‘Horace’, barely more than a schoolboy, stated plainly. “The werewolves are already fleeing. When they are all gone, the Ministry will turn on the other non-humans. Veelas. The half-fae. Goblins. And most especially-”

“Vampires. Yes, I know that. I have danced to this tune more than once, child,” she said, shortly. She really didn’t like wizards. Their arrogance always astounded and disgusted her. The fact that the Dark Lord had sent this toddler to negotiate with her didn’t endear her to either of them.

He made no acknowledgment of her irritation. His palms didn’t sweat, his body didn’t tense, and his eyes didn’t widen. He merely sipped his tea and continued as if she hadn’t interrupted. She was really starting to despise him.

“Then you know you have three options. One, you can ignore the danger, and wait till the Ministry decides to burn this neighborhood to the ground in the middle of the afternoon. Two, you can gather your people and flee ahead of the danger, leaving behind your land and businesses for the Ministry to seize and redistribute as they see fit, starting over at some other city until the cycle is renewed yet again. Or three, you can ally yourselves to the Dark Lord, and take control of your destinies.”

She snorted.

“What can your Dark Lord offer us? The vampires of your country have no more rights or liberties than we do in Germany or anywhere else for that matter. Do you expect me to risk myself and my family to maintain the status quo? We will liquidate our assets through a muggle company and transfer them to another country. When the fighting is done, we will return. I am not interested in playing your master’s game.”

He smiled, a decidedly unpleasant look that reminded her of Goethe, the very messenger who had brought this boy before her.

“The vampires of the UK have no more rights or liberties, because they did not earn them. They played your game, dancing out of the way of danger. Risking nothing. Gaining nothing. If they had sided with the Dark Lord during the war, like Fenrir Greyback did, they too would be enjoying the benefits of his gratitude.”

“Crammed together in the middle of the boonies where the fine witches and wizards of Britain don’t have to deal with them? How wonderful that would have been.”

The look he gave her suggested she was being particularly stupid, and she had to fight herself to keep from ripping out the fool’s throat.

“They are not ‘crammed’, and for your information, they are living exactly the way Fenrir Greyback negotiated for. Their lifestyle is suitable for their condition. You have the opportunity to make a similar negotiation. Think about it. You could have a voice in the government, equal rights to wizarding folk. No more hiding. No more running. No more depending upon the tolerance of others.”

She snorted.

“Until the Dark Lord dies, of course. Then we will once again be dependant on the tolerance of his successor,” she said.

“Madam, the Dark Lord will more than likely out live you and everyone in your coven. It is not a matter you need to worry yourself over.”

This little tidbit silenced her for some minutes. She had heard the rumors, of course, that the Dark Lord had somehow managed to make himself immortal through the Dark Arts. At nearly eighty, and not looking a day over thirty, this wasn’t hard to find plausible. It changed the game somewhat. If the Dark Lord were indeed immortal, and had plans on Germany (and possibly all of Europe), it might be a very bad idea to get on his bad side. A mortal could only hold a grudge for century or so, and their ability to exact revenge was even more limited. An immortal, however, was a different matter altogether.

“Why you?” she asked, changing the subject before he realized he had unbalanced her. “Out of everyone he could have sent, why a scrawny little nobody like you?”

She was starting to descend into pettiness, but she didn’t care. His presence was insulting, and she didn’t feel inclined to tolerate it. He didn’t rise to the bait.

“My Lady, now you are just being rude. It is quite unbecoming,” he chided. “I assure you I am somebody. Somebody Lord Voldemort would no risk for just anything. He chose me specifically as a demonstration of his sincerity.”

“Just who are you, then?”

Tom tilted his head, as if considering. “You won’t believe me. Not unless I show you something first. I beg your indulgence, for just a minute. Serpensortia!”

The vampires leaped to her feet and across the room before he even finished his incantation. She had no wizarding magic of her own. Her only defense against it was retreat or attack before a spell could hit her, and she never forget this while in the presence of a witch or wizard. Her caution and quick reflexes had saved her more than once. She needn’t have bothered this time. The spell had done nothing more than summon a large snake, which was harmless to her kind, poisonous or not.

The boy blinked at her, as if surprised by her reaction, but she knew damn well he was more amused than anything. The snake he had summoned rose up and flared its hood, and she could see the telltale markings of a King Cobra as it hissed and made a mock strike at Horace’s outstretched wand. He didn’t seem the least bit alarmed, and even pocketed his wand.

“Assskuuu sstisss muisss,” he hissed, and immediately the snake’s hood collapsed. The boy held out his hand, the unprotected flesh mere inches from death. “Kissshhh ne sssisss inusss.”

The snake immediately curled around his outstretched arm, and made its way over him and into his lap, where it curled up like an affectionate housecat. Katarina could almost imagine it purring. She could only stare, dumbfounded.

“You are a parselmouth.”

“Yes. A trait I inherited from my grandfather.”

“Who...” she trailed off, realizing the stupidity of her question. “You are the Dark Lord’s son.”

“His grandson actually, but yes.”

“But... how...”

“The usual mechanics, I imagine. Do you believe Lord Voldemort holds to the idea of celibacy? I assure you, before and after the war, he indulged in more than a few trysts. Witches are very good about taking contraceptives. Muggle women are not. You are aware of Harry Potter’s lineage?”

She thought about lying and saying she didn’t. It was a matter of pride that vampires abstained from wizarding tabloid fodder, but Potter was one of those universally entertaining characters. Her goblin banker and she liked to share gossip on him during their monthly transactions. She nodded.

“Pureblood father. Muggleborn mother. Lived with his mother’s muggle sister before he was discovered. No other living relatives.”

“Lily Evans was no muggleborn*. She was a half-blood. Her mother got into it with Voldemort at some point, when he was nothing more than handsome young college student, traveling for the holidays. My father’s mother has an identical story.”

“Why would he keep that a secret? If he has heirs-”

“And inform the entire world that he’s a hypocrite and philanderer? I’m sure you are aware of his public policy against wizarding and muggle interaction, and his youthful exuberance would not be looked kind upon even sixty years later. Additionally, we are not the Dark Lord’s heirs. He has no heirs, as he will not be dying any time soon. Announcing our existence as his brood would not only endanger us, but place us in a position where we could be used against him. No, no, we will never be officially claimed. However, that does not mean we do not hold any importance to him. Potter is a fine example.”

Katarina moved back towards him, staring down at him in fascination. This was a completely new game. The Dark Lord had sent her his grandson, his kin. This was no small thing to a vampire. Vampire clans were tight knit and protective. For a Master or Mistress to send out one of their own offspring was only done in extreme circumstances. It spoke volumes about the Dark Lord’s sincerity. She settled back into her chair.

“Very well. Give me a few more days. I will need to discuss this matter with my coven and decide upon the terms of our agreement. In the meantime, I will see that you have accommodations more... suitable to your status.”

He nodded appreciatively.

“Thank you. I ask only that you keep my relation to the Dark Lord to yourself. I have been given permission to tell you this only as a means to convince you of the importance the Dark Lord has placed on our negotiations. Under no circumstances is this to become public knowledge.”

“I understand.”

She left the room, feeling shaken but refusing to show it. She had so much to think about, and she had wasted too much time already. A wave of resentment rose up against the young interloper. If he had told her of his lineage when he had first been introduced, nearly three days ago, she might have taken his presence more seriously. As it was, she saw him as no more than a half-hearted attempt at recruitment into a questionable endeavor.

Well, that and perhaps Sunday's dinner.

Goethe was waiting for her at the end of the hall. He had been the one to inform her of the boy, known only as Horace, and given her the Dark Lord's card, and she had subsequently assigned him to look after the mysterious mortal.

"I want him moved to one of the private suites on the East End. He is to be treated as a prince and protected the same way. The Ministry cannot be allowed to know of his presence here. Is that understood?"

"Yes, Mistress," he said plainly, his wide mouth stretched into a serpentine grin. He was having way too much fun his new role, in her opinion. He had always been a troublemaker, only happy when things were going wrong. If he weren't so damn good at spying, she would have thrown him out into the sun decades ago.

"And don't you dare bite him."

"Not a nibble. I swear," he said solemnly.

She glared at him. His lips started to twitch. She stalked away before he lost it completely. It wasn't like Goethe was a real threat to Horace. If the boy really was the Dark Lord's grandson, then the vampire was in need of protection far more so than the mortal.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Climbing down from the stage and disappearing from the view of thousands of people calling his name, Harry accepted the glass of water from one of the 'Voices for All' aides. His stomach was still fluttering with nerves and threatening to empty itself, but he managed to keep it all in. He escaped into the sanctuary of a nearby office that had offered its space to Voices for All and Harry for the rally.

This was his third public speech, and it wasn't any easier than the first. If anything, it had been harder. There had been more hecklers and protestors this time around, attempting to throw him off balance and turn the crowd. It had taken a longer to get the crowd enthusiastic about his message this time, but eventually they were won over. The Wizengamot was in three days. The Ultimatum deadline was in five. The next full moon in seven.

Political rallies and protests and pamphlets were on every street corner. The UK was anxious. The newspapers were flooded with speculation of Voldemort's next course of action and the possibility of war with Germany and peace treaties with France. Harry's own cause was quickly being shuffled towards the back of the papers, but his popularity wasn't fading. The rallies he had spoken at were all packed, and he had interviews daily, often multiple times by newspapers and magazines and once even for wizarding television. He had been shuffled from London to Glasgow to Dublin in the last week, and was exhausted.

"Harry!" He turned and smiled as Hermione and Draco came into view. Hermione threw her arms around him. "Harry, that was wonderful! I'd read you were a great speaker, but I had no idea!"

"Not bad," Draco conceded. "A bit preachy for my tastes, but that's just me."

"Thanks...I think. I'm not entirely sure if either of you are being entirely complimentary."

His friends had come along on his trip to Dublin, insisting to see him in action after all the hype in the newspaper. He was glad for their company. After days of nothing but speeches and meetings with Voices for All and hotels and reporters, their presence was grounding and comforting. Snape was already strung out, and currently refusing to say anything to anyone for fear of hexing someone without realizing it.

Suddenly, there was someone standing between him and his friends. He looked up to see a handsome man in an impressive Brass Cult uniform, his smile so white it looked like a Lumos had been cast on it.

“Excellent presentation, my good man. Very good show,” the man said, taking Harry’s arm before he could even react. “I’m Gilderoy Lockhart, but I’m sure you already knew that. I’m quite famous, you know.”

Harry thought the name sounded vaguely familiar, but he would be lying if he said he was familiar with witch and wizarding celebrities.

“Er... yes, of course. Good to meet you, Mr. Lockhart,” he said, and looked around for an escape. Hermione and Draco were looking somewhat horrified at the beaming man, and Harry didn’t think that bode well for him.

“It’s Admiral Lockhart. See the fancy uniform? And good to meet you at last, Harry. You don’t mind if I call you Harry, do you?”

“Actually-”

“Excellent! It really has been too long. We should have met ages ago! We have so much in common. Powerful, intelligent, popular... and devilishly handsome if I do say so myself,” the man laughed, even as he preened in a passing mirror. Harry was feeling increasingly awkward, but Lockhart hadn’t released his arm and was starting to lead him off to Merlin only knew where. “Of course, you could use a few minor adjustments. Nothing to be ashamed of, of course. Just a tweak here or there. A bit of advice from someone who’s been there before. For instance, have you considered growing out your hair? Ladies love that. Or taking off those glasses? Not all the time, mind you. Glasses make one look very clever in the right circumstances, but they look rather nerdy sometimes don’t you think? It’d be a shame to waste your green eyes-”

“On anything as trivial as reading,” Snape’s acid tone cut in. They both turned, and Harry felt a wave of relief at seeing his dour guardian glaring death at his would-be fashion advisor. Hermione or Draco must have found him. Lockhart was still smiling, but he suddenly didn't seem as confident. "Admiral, I am rather surprised to see you here, as busy as someone in your position must be."

"Oh, Professor Snape, yes, well... I happened to be in the area. Photo shoot just a few blocks over, you know. Thought I'd drop by and introduce myself."

"Yes, that's very generous of you. I am sure we all appreciate you gracing us with your presence, but I must ask you to leave. This area is a restricted. Your military training should make you aware of exactly what that means."

"Er... yes, well, military personnel. Higher security clearance and all-"

Snape didn't wait for his fumbled explanations. He grabbed Harry and hauled him back to the other side of the room, making a physical barrier between the man and the boy. When they were far enough away, Harry turned back to him.

"Thanks, Professor."

Predictably, Snape sneered. "You can escape werewolves, German Aurors, and the Dark Lord's wrath, but you can't get away from that imbecile on your own? You're slipping, Potter."

"Who was that guy anyway?"

Draco and Hermione rejoined them, and they made their way towards an empty office Harry had been given for his private use. There was long table piled with food and drink and Harry's own itinerary and half completed speeches. The three teenagers set themselves into the comfortable chairs, while Snape set about making himself some tea.

"Admiral Gilderoy Lockhart," Draco offered, "The most useless pillock in my father's army."

“Draco,” Hermione began to chastise, then seemed to realize he was right and didn’t finish. Oddly enough, it was Snape who disagreed.

“Admiral Lockhart is not useless, Draco. He performs the function your father intended quite admirably. And I remind you that the Brass Cult is not your father’s army. It is the Dark Lord’s, and I recommend you not forget it again.”

“What is Lockhart’s function, then?” Harry asked.

“Publicity,” Hermione said, looking disgusted, “He doesn’t command any troops or have any combat experience. He just goes around the country and looks handsome in his uniform and tells outrageous stories in order to convince people to join the Brass Cult. It’s disgusting.”

Draco laughed. “Didn’t you used to have a huge crush on him?”

“Only for like... a week! Then he opened his mouth.”

Harry laughed and shook his head. He had missed this. Sitting around talking with his friends, getting in and out of strange situations, and even Snape’s dark, witty practicality. More than ever before, he wished the summer were over and he were heading back to Hogwarts, surrounded by his friends and a comfortable routine of classes and club activities.

“I hate to be the barer of bad news,” Snape said, smirking a bit at the looks that statement earned. “None of you will be entirely free of Lockhart for quite some time. He’s been offered a part-time position at Hogwarts.”

Hermione looked positively horrified. “As what?”

“Introduction to Military Training Instructor. Supposedly, it’s a prerequisite to officer training in the Brass Cult.”

“Remind me not to join that class,” Harry muttered.

“It is only open to seventh years, fortunately. It’s a complete publicity stunt, but the Dark Lord went along with it. You will find several differences at Hogwarts this year to accommodate the war effort.”

“We’re not at war,” Harry said, hopefully.

Snape just gave him a look, and didn’t deign to reply.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Viktor and Tonks sat on the garden wall and looked out across the South Aegean at the collection of islands, lined in the stubby white buildings that typified the region. The sun was hot, but the wind coming off the sea made it tolerable, and either of them felt any desire to move into the shade.

“He makes it very hard to hate him, doesn’t he?” Tonks said, staring down at a newspaper. It was a Wizing Weekly, only two days old, and sharing the front page with the usual doom and gloom article about the tensions with Germany, was Harry and his outrageous and heroic mission to ‘save the lycanthropic victims from the tyranny of Minister Seibligg’.

“Yes,” Viktor agreed. “He’s a good guy. He just has lousy taste in father figures.”

“I wonder what he would think if he knew Dumbledore was helping get werewolves out of Germany?”

“He’d probably be grateful, just not grateful enough to switch sides.”

Tonks sighed, and ran a hand through her leopard print hair. She missed the days when you could support your allies with the same enthusiasm you could oppose your enemies. Seibligg had ruined that for them. The previous minister, Janis Handel, had been a good man with a generous heart and an iron will. He had led his countrymen through the dark days of Voldemort's assault on Britain, preventing the Death Eaters from getting a foothold in Germany and opening his doors to those who were forced to flee. However, the strain had been too much for his health, and he could not continue another term. Seibligg had shown promise, but his own conceit and secret disdain for foreigners had weakened the Ministry and confused the public.

The rallying against the werewolves was the final act of a desperate man still clinging to power, and Tonks knew it would only serve to weaken the country in the long run. The people were divided, resources were being wasted to persecute a make believe enemy, and their allies were turning away in disgust. More than once, Tonks had wondered if it wouldn't be better to just let Voldemort have the place and straighten it out once and for all. If she hadn't remembered exactly how the Dark Lord straightened out countries, she would have just given up.

"Do you think we can win like this?" Tonks asked. "We can't even stay in the country, and Seibligg just keeps making things worse everyday."

Viktor didn't say anything for a moment. Leaving Germany, he thought, was the best thing they could have done. It was so much harder to think objectively about Germany's future while surrounded by its chaos. In the South Aegean, where news travels slowly but thoughts had plenty of time to settle, he was starting to see things more clearly.

"Dumbledore thinks we can. Seibligg's time is running out. If he can be replaced with a strong leader before the Dark Lord can get a strong enough foot hold, then they might just have a chance."

"That's a big 'if'."

"I prefer to think of it as a 'do or do not'. If we don't find a way, we are all royally screwed," Viktor said.

"Well, since you put it that way, I feel much better," she laughed.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

On June 29th, the Wizengamot voted 'yes' to Proposal 4-66. On June 30th, Harry celebrated at the werewolf colonies and got utterly smashed, and very nearly got into an orgy with several other drunken werewolves. He was unfortunately rescued by Remus. On July 1st, he was dragged out of the colony by a very amused Voldemort (who had probably been in that orgy that Harry could only now vaguely remember) to Paris to meet Queen Ophelia. Blessedly, there had been a three out stop at one of Voldemort's many manor houses for breakfast, bathing, and grooming or he would had to meet her looking like wild man and smelling like a brewery.

Queen Ophelia the IV, was built like an opera singer, heavy set and powerful. It did nothing to distract from her beauty, but only enhanced her presence. She was no dainty wallflower. Every step, every gesture, every turn of the head was pure confidence and grace.

Harry was embarrassed to find he had fallen in love with her within five minutes of meeting her. Luckily, she seemed to find his uncontrollable blushing charming.

"I am told," she said, with barely even a hint of French accent, "that it is your efforts, more than anyone else's, that have brought us all together this day."

"I am not entirely sure why I am here, your Majesty," he said, trying his hardest not to look like a bumbling school boy. It was hard when she was difficult her smiling at him like that, her elaborate white and golden dress making her shine like an angel. "But I am glad we could meet, for whatever the reason."

He nearly fell over when she kissed him on the forehead, and he suddenly became convinced she had to be a full blooded veela. She moved away, several musketeers and ladies-in-waiting following her. Voldemort placed his hand on his shoulder and lead him in another direction.

“She likes you. I knew she would,” Voldemort teased.

“I’m going to get you for this later,” Harry said, glaring up at the man. There were nearly twenty other men and women in their entourage, all of them Wizengamot or Court officials, or in Lucius’ case, both. Snape was somewhere, probably the royal library, but Harry had to wonder why since he couldn’t read French. They were all dressed to the nines, and even Harry had been shoved into a brand new and ostentatious set of suit and robes. He supposed meeting the queen of France warranted looking good, but he suspected something more significant was happening than a simple meet and greet. Voldemort being very nearly cheerful convinced him of it.

“What are we doing here, exactly?”

“We’re signing a treaty.”

Oh. Now that he thought about it, that was pretty obvious. Stupid residual hangover.

“For the werewolves?” he asked, not entirely certain. Voldemort seemed entirely too pleased for something that simple.

“Part of the treaty includes the establishment of new werewolf colonies, but that is only a minor part. The United Kingdoms and France are ending the embargo and resuming trade and travel, formally renouncing Germany actions against us, and allowing us to open four military bases along its border to France.”

Harry could only stare at him. This was HUGE. Way larger than Harry felt qualified to deal with. This was the sort of event Toure made them study in the History of Magic. At least he didn’t have to make a speech.

“Seibligg is going to piss himself,” Harry finally blurted out. Several of the other officials in the room chuckled. “But why am I here?”

“You are an honorary guest. Proposal 4-66 was essential for this treaty, which would not have been possible if I could not demonstrate an immediate benefit of our alliance. The queen needed something to reassure her people of our intentions before she could agree to it. You have earned the right to witness these proceedings. Besides, the French like you.”

Merlin, was he serious? Had his efforts with Proposal 4-66 actually made this treaty possible?

He was still wondering this when a valet arrived and escorted their party to a conference room. Voldemort, Queen Ophelia, and all other their officials were set at the table, while Harry sat with a small group of attendants along the wall and watched. There were speeches made by both the Dark Lord and the queen, words of welcome and hopes for peace and prosperity and strength through their alliance. The treaty was read, then passed around and signed. There were more speeches by another official. A Catholic priest blessed the document (and surprised Harry by not immediately bursting into flames when Voldemort not-so-subtly glared at him). Photographs were taken. Drinks were handed out to everyone to toast their work. And finally, finally it was over, and Harry still had no idea how he could have possibly brought any of it about.

Merlin, he hoped Snape didn't hear about any of this. He's accuse him of having a big head before he could even bring himself to accept even partial responsibility.

Voldemort and Harry stayed at the queen's palace for two more days (as did Snape although Harry didn't see him at all until it came time to leave), and Harry spent a majority of that time wandering around and making sketches. The Dark Lord was absent more often than not on official business or merely conversing with the queen, but in the evening he would take some time to talk with Harry.

“Do you think Seibligg will have to resign after this?” Harry asked, staring out the window in Voldemort 's bedroom. From here he could see the internal courtyard, where several couples and friends were wandering about and enjoying the evening. The Dark Lord was at the desk, signing paperwork, and drinking sherry.

“It doesn’t really matter one way or the other,” he said, not looking up. “The due date for the ultimatum has passed. Germany has done nothing to make amends to me, and allowed the perpetrators to remain unpunished. They could have saved themselves a lot of grief, but now they will have to face the consequences of their actions.”

“What sort of consequences?”

“Bankruptcy for one. France is the largest importer of German goods, particularly potion ingredients and certain types of manufactured products like cauldrons, which they will now be getting primarily from the UK. The embargo from ten years ago has made them the primary supplier to Europe for several years now, but they’re not ready to face competition with British suppliers again. Chances are there will be a recession in Germany.”

Harry let out a mental sigh. Being poor sucked, but being blown up was worse. If Germany’s punishment was strictly financial, Harry wasn’t going to utter a single complaint.

“Of course,” Voldemort said, “Recessions make for very bitter, angry citizens. I doubt this little slap on the wrist is going to be the end of the matter.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Diagon Alley was crowded with students and their families, as was typical at the beginning of August. There was something festive about the gathering, like a carnival with shops instead of rides or Christmas shopping without the dreary weather. There were even street vendors standing about selling funnel cakes and popcorn, and colorfully dressed men singing out the inventory of their particular shop, enticing buyers to enter. Cages with owls, cats, rats, snakes, or other sorts of familiars were carried about by eager looking first years, who grinned and cooed at their new pets lovingly.

It was amazing considering only a month before people were practically frantic over the due date of Voldemort’s ultimatum. It turned out the first strike against Germany, had led to nothing short of prosperity for the UK. With the 1995 Treaty of Paris (also nicknamed Potter's Treaty and the Werewolf Treaty), the demand for goods had skyrocketed, leading to a rise in cauldron prices and potions ingredients, but also to a high demand for new employees. The unemployment rate had dropped nearly twenty percent in a month and expected to drop another fifty percent during the holidays, and Gringotts Bank was practically throwing out money for starter businesses.

Everyone was brimming with enthusiasm for the future, and it showed in the faces of the people.

Ira watched it all from the corner of Banikey's Books, trying not to hover as Harry and Professor Snape's godchildren hunted the store for their school books. Snape himself was at Olivander's, escorting several first years as they acquired their wands, and had Ira had offered to keep an eye of them. She had made the mistake of mentioning it to her mother, who had quickly invited herself along.

"I have barely seen you at all this summer, Ira. I've missed you. This will be a perfect time to do a little shopping together," she insisted, but Ira knew better. Her mother was nosy and always would be, and the fact that Ira actually was involved with the daily affairs of interesting people had presented a temptation she couldn't pass up. Especially not since Snape had come back from Paris with gift.

The scarab brooch was iridescent green, like the real beetle, and masterfully crafted. It was worth several galleons, and no one had been more surprised than Ira when Snape had given it to her. He had called it a 'thank you' present, and it probably was, but her mother insisted it meant more.

"When a man starts buying a woman jewelry, expensive jewelry from Paris, it means more than just 'thank you'," Susan said to her daughter knowingly. Ira kept looking out at the street and pretended she hadn't heard her. "It means, 'I want you to wear something I gave you so everyone will know you're mine'."

Ira immediately turned bright red, and looked around quickly to see if anyone heard her.

“Honestly, mum, you’re making something out of nothing. He was just being thoughtful. Harry probably put him up to it.”

Ira immediately looked back towards the store, and spotted Harry’s black cloak immediately. The boy had taken to wearing the hood up while out in public to avoid being recognized, even though he looked more than little conspicuous. His friends, Draco, Hermione, Natalie, and Clyde, were doing the same thing, partially to tease him and partially because it made the hoods look less suspicious and more like fashion statements when they all did it. She couldn’t help smiling as she watched them together, laughing and stealing each other’s books out of their baskets and pretending to be vampires.

Harry had a difficult life, filled with stress and intrigue and unscheduled international travel, but he also had wonderful friends. She wondered how Snape, whose life was likely just as difficult, perhaps even more so, managed to keep it all together with seemingly no friends at all.

“Posh. I’m telling you, Professor Snape likes you, he’s just stoic. That’s why he asks for your help all the time. So he can have your company and not be labeled a sap. Andreas is the exact same way.”

Ira rolled her eyes. Snape didn’t ask for her help. She offered it without him having to ask, and he just never bothered to turn her down. She enjoyed both Harry’s and Snape’s company for different reasons. Harry was sweet and interesting. Snape was frank and interesting. She had some of the most enjoyable conversations of her life this summer, and she would miss them terribly when the summer was over.

“Mum, that’s not how it is. For heaven’s sake, he lost his fiancé little over a year ago. Besides, even if he were interested, it would never work out.”

“Never work out? Of course it would! You’re perfect for each other. Quiet, academic types, the both of you, without an ounce of romance between you. He’s a highly respected professor and war hero, obviously ready to settle down if he was intending to marry. I don’t think you could do any better if you tried.”

Ira said nothing for a moment, a deep depression settling over her. She did like Professor Snape. She found his taciturn manners strangely charming and his dedication to his duties was admirable, but she couldn’t give him what he really wanted.

“He wants children,” she said.

This stumped Susan for a moment. “...Are you sure? I mean, he doesn’t really seem the type...”

“He does. His house... it’s made for more than just him and Harry. And sometimes, I’ve seen him looking at families with this... longing? Maybe? I don’t know. But I can’t give him that. Winston made sure of it.”

She tried to hide her bitterness at that man’s name, but it leaked through anyway. Her mother fidgeted uncomfortably. She never liked to discuss Winston. She would like nothing better than to forget he ever existed, and Ira would too if it were at all possible.

“Maybe he would be willing to adopt?”

“Mother!”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

“All hail Harry Potter, King of the Werewolves.”

“Do shut up, Weasley,” Harry said cheerfully as he squeezed into the train compartment, and sat next to Natalie. He handed her Inana’s basket, which she happily accepted. The compartment was crowded with his friends (and Ron), but he wouldn’t have it any other way. The summer was over and he was going to his true home. His political career was officially on hold until the end of term.

Perhaps the only one more excited about the upcoming school year was Hermione, who was practically buzzing in her seat. She was now the official editor of the Hogwart's Herald, and couldn't wait to get started. She was looking through her notebook and stressing about her first meeting with her staff and their first paper.

"Hey, Harry, you're not going to have to repeat the year, are you mate? I don't think I could get through potions without you," Clyde said, looking genuinely terrified at the thought.

"Nope. No repeating for me. It's not like I wasn't learning anything while I was away. The professors are going to test me individually to see if I've fallen behind on anything then work something out if I have to catch up. Things are going to be crazy this year though. Make up classes, quidditch, Dueling Club, and O.W.L.s."

Draco merely smirked at him. "Don't worry, Potter. I'll make sure you don't have worry about the final quidditch match while studying for final exams. We're going to kick your ass this year."

"Dream on, Malfoy. If I can beat Krum at quidditch, I can beat you."

Harry instantly regretted his words, his eyes immediately darting towards Hermione, who was still looking at her notebook, but not reading it. Inwardly, he called himself several unpleasant names. One of the few things Hermione and he had not been able to bring themselves to talk about was Krum. He had betrayed them both, in different ways, and they were both too conflicted to talk about him even with each other.

"Ha!" Ginny but in, rescuing the companionable atmosphere. "You can't even guarantee your spot on the team this year. I'll be trying out for Seeker, this year."

Natalie made a rude sound and rolled her eyes.

Harry blinked at her. "You play quidditch?"

"Of course I play quidditch. Everyone in the family plays quidditch! Even Ron plays a pretty good keeper, once he stopped falling off his broom."

Ron just scowled at her then resumed his previous silence. In fact, he seemed to be all out brooding, which was a step up from his usual sulking, but not much.

"What's with you, Weasley? You're... quiet."

"Shove it, Potter. I don't care about this stupid shit," he snapped, then stood up and walked out. Everyone just stared after him, then back at each other.

"That was... different," Harry said.

"And the Asshole Award goes to..." Clyde muttered.

"Shut up," Ginny snapped, surprising everyone all over again. She bit her lip, and looked down. "It's not his fault. He's just... he visited dad a few weeks ago. I think... It was really bad. So just give him a break, okay?"

They stayed silent for a bit. They all knew Arthur Weasley was in Azkaban, and had been for the better part of eight years, and his was not an enviable fate to even most depraved masochist.

"Of course," Hermione said first, then nudged Draco with her elbow.

"Hey, don't look at me. If I start acting all sympathetic it'll probably induce a stroke."

"Draco!"

“Fine, fine! I won’t go poking him with sticks or whatever. I’ve survived more than one of his little pissy fits before, thank you very much.”

“Thanks. I think,” Ginny said.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Snape stared at the once mysterious little plant, that was now not so little and not so mysterious. Concealed in one of his many secured cabinets in his private Hogwarts laboratory, the Body Tree stood taller than him and was lush with reddish foliage. He had finally discovered the plant’s identity in France, finally left alone to pursue the mystery.

McGunny was still missing, and he had given hope of finding the boy on his own. If he had managed to slip into the muggle world undetected, the chances were he could go underground for years and Snape would never find him. He had neither the time nor the resources necessary.

Discovering McGunny’s intentions was a different matter altogether. Because, right now the Body Tree was bearing a ‘fruit’. Fruit that was looking very much like a complete human fetus.

Now what exactly would someone want with that? he wondered. A thousand different possibilities came to mind, and none of them good.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

1. Lily Evans was 100% muggleborn. Tom is lying through his teeth in order to win Katarina’s trust. Suggesting he is Voldemort’s son and proving it with the use of Parseltongue is a good way to do that.

Book V

Chapter 11: The Courtier

Entering Hogwarts for his fifth year was as strange and overwhelming to Harry as it was during his first. He knew each hallway and tower, almost all the other students' faces (if not their names), and the thousand little tricks that allowed veteran students to bypass or take advantage of the schools innumerable eccentricities, yet he felt everything had shifted into something slightly different since he was taken and all the certainties of the previous year were now frail as spider silk.

The hallways and towers held the history of the second semester he had missed, the stories of battles and gossip and couples sneaking kisses. The students all looked strangely older and keeping their company, however brief, was strained and awkward, as if he had been gone for nine years and not just nine months. Most seemed genuinely pleased that he was alive and returned safely, but his celebrity status in the political world had left them baffled on how to approach him. What did you say to a guy who blended into the sea of students more often than not and at the same time held the influence to sway the vote of the Wizengamot? Talking about the next quidditch match or the merit of noblesse oblige each seemed to present their own pitfalls, and they were as confused on how to treat him as he was them.

There were new tricks to the castle that hadn't been present before either. Giant stone gargoyles now guarded the entry way to the castle; their cold eyes followed him as he stepped through the castle portcullis with Hermione and Draco.

"You get used to it," Hermione said, catching his uneasy look. "They're enchanted to guard against invaders. Hogwarts had some like this already guarding the towers, but LeStrange started having a whole bunch of them put in last spring. I wish you had been here then. I think you would have made some really nice ones. All mine look like demented monkeys."

“Make them? You mean the students made these things? How many are there? Why not hire professionals?”

“And waste perfectly free student labor?” Draco sneered, obviously bitter about the matter for what ever reason.

“What’s going on?” he asked. Hermione sighed.

“There’s been work done on the castle in the last months of second semester, and a lot of it was done in the guise of student coursework. Draco isn’t the only one who feels we were taken advantage of. Some of the things we did would have earned an artist or professional enchanter several galleons, and all we got was the threat of failing a class. The gargoyles aren’t the half of it.”

“And what do you think?”

“...I think we learned a lot of practical and useful things we wouldn’t have otherwise,” she said, ignoring Draco’s irritated snort. “But I also think we should have been compensated in some way. Not necessarily money, but... I don’t know. A party? A special field trip? Something to acknowledge what we did for the school.”

Harry wondered if he could have done something he had been there. Blackmail Lestrage? Technically, he still had her last attack on him hanging over her head, and that had kept her successfully away from him but would it have been enough to force her into making concessions? He didn’t know, but with his latest successes in politics he might have the power to do something if she tried to take advantage of everyone again.

He was jarred from his thoughts when someone rammed against him, knocking him to the ground and nearly tripping up Hermione as well. He landed heavily on all fours, the stone floor bruising his knees and scrapping his hands painfully.

“Watch where you’re going, Potter!” someone sneered.

“You’re the moron who ran into me!” Harry snarled, jumping to his feet and spinning around. Dorian Whitmore, possibly the biggest boy in the school towered above him, his beefy arms crossed over his chest. Whitmore was a sixth year Gryffindor last year, although not the sort that particularly impressed Harry. He was a big and moderately intelligent, which led him to be something of a bully, usually to Slytherins but occasionally Hufflepuffs and Ravenclaws as well. It appeared as if he had decided to include Harry to his list of targets for whatever reason.

“Sorry, Potter. I didn’t see you there. I would have thought with all the time you spend with werewolves, you might have gained a little of their reflexes and instincts but I guess not,” he said, his voice dripping with condescension.

Harry just looked at him like the idiot he was. “Riiii-ght.”

Hermione gave him a warning look. “Don’t, Harry.”

“I didn’t do anything.”

“Yet,” she said knowingly.

Students were starting to slow down their trek to the Great Hall in order to watch what was going on. Whitmore was still standing there as if he expected something, and Harry had no intention of walking around him. His pride wouldn’t allow him to surrender the unspoken challenge the larger boy had set down.

“What do you want Witless? I mean Whitmore. You’re blocking the hall.”

Whitmore stepped up to him, towering nearly a two heads over him, and leaned in so that their noses nearly touched. Hermione instinctively stepped away, but Harry held his ground and stared straight back at him. If the fool thought his physical stature would intimidate Harry, he obviously hadn’t considered the sort of people Harry hung out with on a routine basis. This guy had nothing on Fenrir Greyback. Or Snape for that matter when he was in one of his moods.

“I want you,” Whitmore hissed, too low for most of the other students to overhear. “To spend a full moon with your fucking monsters and then tell me they deserve to live. If you’re still alive to tell anyone anything.”

Harry burst out laughing, causing Whitmore to jerk back in surprise.

“A full moon, Whitmore? I’ve spent more than one full moon in the company of werewolves. Did you know their fur feels like a real wolf’s? The top coat is wiry and rough, but the undercoat? Soft as rabbit.”

The larger boy paled.

“You... you freak!”

It had been years since anyone had called him that, not since his three year stint with the Dursley’s, but it felt like peeling off a scab. Hermione’s hand tightening on his shoulder was probably the only thing that saved Harry from doing something very foolish... in front of McGonagall no less.

“MR. WHITMORE!”

Everyone turned at once toward the other side of the hall. McGonagall’s tall, rigid frame was easy to make out amongst the sea of students, and her expression was livid. She cast piercing look at the students loitering about, and they quickly began moving again towards the Great Hall, stopping only to let her pass as she made her way towards the two troublemakers.

“Mr. Whitmore, I would remind you that as a new seventh year, you set an example to all your underclassmen, and that example should not involve juvenile name calling. Since you seem to need some reminder of proper seventh year conduct, we will discuss it further in detention. Monday, 5 o’clock sharp.”

The older Gryffindor's ears burned with her chastisement, and he mumbled a quick 'yes, professor', before hurrying off. Harry smirked, but quickly hid it when McGonagall turned her displeasure on him.

"What precisely was that all about, Mr. Potter?"

"Er... Political differences, Professor. I don't think he cares for werewolves very much."

The old witch pursed her lips. "Ah, that would explain it. I doubt he will be the last to confront you. For now, I will simply remind you that while you are entitled to your opinion and they are entitled to theirs, you must still conduct yourselves appropriately. I better not find you started tossing around hexes in the hallways because of someone else's careless comments."

Harry shrugged. "If anyone starts tossing hexes, I won't be the one to start it."

"See to it that you are not. What I said to Mr. Whitmore about setting a good example applies to you as well, more so, in fact, than it does him. Carry on, Mr. Potter."

"Thank you, Professor."

Harry continued on with Hermione and Draco, who was glaring back at McGonagall but didn't say anything.

"You know she's right," Hermione said, earning her a sour look from both boys. She just rolled her eyes at them. "You're famous, Harry. Lots of people looked up to you before... what? They did! All the rookies in Dueling Club adore you! Not to mention... anyway, you do need to watch how you behave. If you start having fights with every Whitmore who tries to start something, others are going to start doing the same thing just to impress you."

"It's true," Draco said, surprising Harry. "Luckily you already killed that last dragon or we'd have a lot of very crispy classmates."

Harry rolled his eyes. They made it to the Great Hall without further incident. There was the predictable amount of staring and whispering at his back, but this wasn't the first time he had been forced to deal with it. Freak echoed in the back of his head, the voice a mixture of the Dursley's and Whitmore's. He did his best to ignore it, and once the Sorting Hat began started off the night's sorting, it was easy enough to drown it out with cheering and clapping for the new first years.

At the teacher's table Harry could see Lockhart, but also a few other faces he did not recognize. One was a middle aged man, his expression benign, his shoulder length hair a few shades darker than Weasley red. He wore Druidic robes, and Harry felt a pang of grief when he realized that he must be Brennan's replacement. Sitting beside Snape, was another stranger, dressed rather lavishly for a teacher in a tailored suit and robes that complimented even his rounded physique and an impressive walrus-like beard that distracted from his shiny bald head. He had to be the new DA&D instructor, and looking at his less than impressive physique gave Harry a sinking feeling that he had been sent by the Court just as Umbridge had. He would ask Hermione what she knew about him later.

With the first years sorted, it was finally time for the Headmistress to address the students (Voldemort was too busy for once to make an appearance for which Harry was secretly grateful). There were the usual warnings to the first years about the Forbidden Forest, an announcement that internal construction on the new Hogwarts wing would be continuing and certain sections of the castle were off limit to all students, and quidditch would be resuming as usual this year. Then she finally got around to introducing the new teachers.

"With the re-opening of the DA&D position, I have been forced to do a little rearranging with the professors. Professor Severus Snape will now be teaching Dark Arts and Defense, and Professor Horace Slughorn, our previous potions professor, has come out of retirement to take up his old post."

There was round of uncertain applause. Potions without Snape appealed to most students, but having him in a class that likely involved curses was more than a little unnerving.

Harry blinked in surprise and turned to Snape, who was smirking at him. The sneaky bastard! He hadn't mentioned this at all! He tried to imagine what DA&D would be like under Snape. It couldn't be too different from Dueling Club could it? Except with homework. Mountains of homework.

He looked to Slughorn to reassess him based on this newest information. He too was looking at Harry, but it was with an expression he didn't know how to read. Uncertainty, maybe?

“Admiral Gilderoy Lockhart is on loan to us from the British Assembly of Cultural Preservation and Protection to teach a new class, Introduction to Military Training, open to all seventh years interested in becoming Sentinels or soldiers.”

Lockhart stood and beamed at the gathered students, preening as several girls let out longing sighs and the hearty round of applause. Harry was seriously tempted to chuck a roll at him. He very briefly considered doing that to Snape, but even in his head his sense of self-preservation told him what a very bad idea that was.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

McGunny walked through Valkyrie Square, soaking up the sun and trying to banish the corrupting darkness of the vampire world he had been subjected to. Tom's power over him had increased, and the nights now belonged to the charming devil as he looked on through eyes he no longer controlled. He had seen things in the last month that he had never imagined, and never wanted to.

We're not here to sightsee, Horace.

“Shut up, Tom,” he muttered under his breath. “You might enjoy living like a ghoul, but I don't. I'm going to enjoy myself while I can.”

He purposely spent several minutes watching the large fountain at the center of the square as statues of giant winged horses frolicking and splashing playfully at its center. He took what meager satisfaction he could out of Tom's growing impatience.

This was the first time he had been let out of the apartment. Not that any of the vampires could have kept him there against his will, being weak as kittens during the day and vulnerable to magic. It was just the first time he had a legitimate excuse to leave the protection of Katarina and her clan, having been provided with all that he could possibly require. It was also the first time he felt legitimately alone enough to talk to Tom. No one bothered him during the day, but he never felt comfortable speaking out loud even in an empty room. Vampire strength waned during the day. Vampire hearing did not.

"Are you really Voldemort's grandson?"

Tom howled in laughter, making him feel small and absurd for even asking.

No, absolutely not. As if he would have associated with filthy muggle whores. I am actually older than Voldemort, at least as you know him now.

"What does that mean?"

He killed me, Tom growled, sidestepping his question. I have a right to take revenge.

That certainly explained any animosity the spirit held against the Dark Lord.

"How exactly? How does tricking the vampires into serving him help you do that?"

I am going to take his place. I'm going to take the Dark Lord's body and rule in his stead. It will only help me to strengthen his position in the world until I destroy him from the inside.

“You’re mad. He’ll destroy you. He’ll destroy all of us,” McGunny said, terrified and hopeful all at once. He didn’t want to be a part of Tom’s grand schemes, and the more he uncovered them the more appealing self-destruction was starting to look.

The vampires will provide me the opportunity and the resources I need to get close to the Dark Lord. They will produce the chaos necessary to create opportunity.

“How?”

You’ll see. Now go over there, to the building with the statue in front of it. I think that’s where we’ll find what we’re looking for.

McGunny sighed and did as instructed. He didn’t really know what Tom was looking for or why, but if it left him free to spend a majority of the day outside in the sun, surrounded by people of the living variety he was willing to run a few. Even if he had a feeling he was going to regret it later.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Settling back into his old school routine was difficult even before it had really started. Once ensconced in the familiar surroundings of Gryffindor tower, his entire House had seen fit to pounce on him for a full debriefing regarding his kidnapping and eventual escape, keeping him up well into the night until McGonagall had shown up and sent everyone to bed. He had been grateful until he climbed into bed and discovered it had an Itching Curse on it. It was a petty prank and easy enough to fix, but it left him paranoid for the rest of the night. He suspected Whitmore, but it could just as easily been someone else, even his own dorm mates.

He barely slept, and the first thing he did upon awakening was reward his trunk and place protection charms on his bed. The same ones he’d used at Durmstrang, and the idea that he might have to live like that again did as much to exhaust him as his sleepless night.

He met Natalie in the Great Hall for breakfast, both of them being some of the first students up. Natalie was now a prefect, which shouldn't have surprised Harry as much as it did. She was an excellent student and more than happy to boss people around. Draco and Hermione would also have been prefects again, but they had other activities that made the additional responsibility impossible.

"Do you want me to bug him?" Natalie asked after he told her about his confrontation with Whitmore. He hadn't mentioned the Itching Curse. He didn't want the culprit to even know it had worked, let alone was still bothering him.

Harry grinned at her. "So you can get in my good graces and still deduct points from Gryffindors? I don't think so. Besides, don't you think it's a little earlier to begin abusing your authority?"

"Don't you think you're playing the martyr by not letting your friends help? Opportunity only knocks once."

"Thanks, but I think McGonagall has seen that justice was served."

She let it drop and they discussed classes they were interested in taking. It was a lot more fun to do this with Natalie than with his other friends. Hermione took everything too seriously, Draco too contemptuously, and Clyde was clueless more often than not. They talked and laughed over simple school things, and Harry forgot about his worries for at least a little while.

Harry was a bit annoyed to find he had potions first thing in the morning with Professor Slughorn, who he still had reservations about. Hermione only knew that he had taught at Hogwarts for nearly fifty years before his retirement during the war. He had kept a low profile during the fighting and after until he had shown up last night.

"I'll write to Narcissa to see what she knows," Hermione said. "He had to have taught when she was going to school."

Draco had a somewhat better idea. "Don't bother. I'll write to father myself, and then we can get a reply from the both of them. Uncle Severus might know some things, but I doubt he'll have kept tabs on him after he graduated."

"You're all paranoid loonies," Clyde said, exasperated.

"Considering Oblitz was a spy, Larousse wanted to adopt me, McNair was pure evil and Umbridge was a pink toad, I think I'm entitled to be concerned about Headmistress's hiring standards," Harry pointed out. Not to mention Brennan used me to try and assassinate the Dark Lord.

"Touché, mate."

They entered the potion's lab, and immediately hesitated. The dungeons had always had a gloomy chill to them and the potion's lab was no exception... until today. It was still cool, but it was of the pleasant variety and the classroom somehow seemed a little brighter than anyone remembered it. It almost looked... non-dungeon-like.

"Holy Hellhounds," Clyde remarked, baffled by the change in atmosphere. "If Snape's absence affects the dungeon's this much, I wonder what his presence has done to the Dark Art's classroom."

"You'll get your chance to find out, Houghton," Draco sneered.

"Is that young Mr. Malfoy I hear?" came an unfamiliar voice, which was soon followed by Professor Slughorn stepping out from behind a cabinet door. "Ah, and gracious me you've brought friends."

He looked at each of them, his thick mustache curled up in an affable smile. Harry stiffened. People who were happy to meet him for the first time brought up nearly as much suspicion as those who presented too much hostility.

"You've all arrived here ahead of your classmates. A sign of ambition and studiousness if ever I saw one. Traits that deserve encouragement. Why don't you sit down and take out your books. There's something I'd like for you to do."

They gave each other uncertain looks but did as he instructed. Draco and Hermione sat at the front middle table and Harry and Clyde sat to their right. When they all had their books out in front of them, Slughorn spoke again.

"Now then, since you four are the first of my students to arrive, I am going to have you help me decide on the lesson for today. I would like each of you to select a potion from your book, any potion at all before chapter twelve. When the rest of the class arrives they will vote among your selections. Keep in mind you will be able to keep any potion you brew after it has been graded. You have five minutes."

They each shared a quick look, then quickly sorted through their books. In the five minutes that went by, half of the class finally arrived, but aside from looking at them curiously they didn't express any real interest in what they were doing..

"Time's up," Slughorn said. "Have you made your selections? How about Mr. Malfoy? Ah, the Belfax Heating Potion*, a tricky potions sure to impress even your father and Professor Snape, both men known for their exacting standards. You Miss Granger of Malfoy? Evergreen Potion, I should have known. By far the most ingenious potion in the whole book. McGonagall said your desire for ever greater heights of understanding were limitless."

Draco smirked and accepted the praise with his usual ungracious preening, while Hermione flushed with pleasure. Slughorn turned Harry and Clyde.

"I'm terrible sorry, young man, your name is one the tip of my tongue but I just can't quite," he started staring at Clyde who was closest.

"Er... Houghton, Clyde Houghton of the Stone family, sir."

“Oh, of course! I know your grandparents. Bernadette and Xavier! Tell me, does your grandfather still make those beautiful grandfather clocks? You know he gave me one when he first started his business, and it still runs perfectly.”

Clyde blinked at him in surprise. “Why, yes sir, he still tinkers. It’s more of a hobby now. He leaves most of the work to his apprentices, but he’s still making designs.”

“Well next time you see or write to them, tell them Horace says hello. Now what did you pick? Recitation Draught? Ha ha, hoping to quote some poetry to one of the bonnie lasses, are you? Ha, ha.”

He looked to Harry, who was regarding him suspiciously. There was a moment of hesitation, but not exactly fear, merely a moment to plan his approach. Harry pointed to the potion he had selected from his book.

“Wound-cleaning potion? Hhhmmm... that’s a bit middle of the road. Any particular reason you would choose that potion, Mr. Potter?”

“I want to send it to my godfathers.”

Slughorn blinked and then smiled. His expression was more that of relief than the friendliness he had shown to his friends, and Harry wondered if he hadn’t just passed some unspoken test. “I see. You know, when I taught your mother to brew Rhumid’s Draught, the first thing she did was send it to her grandmother? The Ministry nearly had a conniption fit when they found out she had tried to send a powerful potion like that to a muggle. She never did apologize for it either. She cared for her family as fiercely as any pureblood I ever new, and never would have apologized for it. I see you take after her in that respect.”

Harry’s voice caught in his throat, his eyes widening. Slughorn knew his mother? Of course he did, he was teacher at the time she was at school, but so were McGonagall and Flitwick and even Snape had been in the same year as her and they never spoke her like Slughorn did. No one talked about her, period. He wondered for a moment why he had never asked.

Harry fell into a daze. Hermione noticed right away and quickly changed places with Clyde so they didn't end up blowing each other up. The rest of the class arrived and voted on the Recitation Potion, likely for the same reason Clyde picked it. It was the easiest of the four choices. There was a brief lecture on the potion, and then the potions master set them off to work.

Harry prepared the ingredients, endless detentions with Snape making the preparation a thoughtless process, and wondered at Slughorn's reference to his mother. It took him a while to realize it was a calculated maneuver on his part, just like the flattery of his friends had been calculated. Once he realized this, he began to take watch Slughorn out of the corner of his eye and listen to him with half an ear. The potions teacher wandered about the room correcting or complimenting a potion with the same genial tone, easing the students' minds as he went. Every so often he would stop at a particular student's work station and make brief conversation over the person's family or school achievement. There was nothing sly or misleading in his approach, and for all intents and purposes he just seemed like a friendly guy interested in his student's lives.

It made Harry nervous.

"Harry, are you alright?" Hermione asked quietly, as they waited for their potion to start boiling before they could add anymore ingredients. "You've been really quiet since he mentioned your mother..."

Harry shook his head. "I don't know... I don't like him trying to use her as a conversation piece."

"Oh, Harry, I don't think he... I don't think he meant to be disrespectful. He seemed genuinely sad that she was...gone."

Yes, he got that feeling too, which was half the reason he couldn't sort himself out. It was one thing if Slughorn was just sharing story about his mother out of genuine fondness, but something else altogether if he was trying to express some false sympathy with him.

With Hermione's help they managed to finish a successful potion. They bottled their brews and turned them in on Slughorn's desk, but before Harry could walk away the potions master stopped him.

"Just a moment, Harry, before I forget. The Headmistress informed me that I would need to perform an assessment to make sure your potion instruction at Durmstrang meets Hogwarts's requirements. Are you free this Thursday, around seven?"

Harry's thoughts scrambled at the unexpected approach. His first instinct was to say no, to prevent being trapped alone with a stranger, but he did need to do his assessment and he couldn't think of any reason why he would need Thursday evening off during the first week of school.

"Er... sure. Thursday at seven is great."

"Excellent. I'll see you then."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

"Are you alright?" Natalie asked, looking across the checkered blanket at Harry. As per tradition, they were all enjoying their first lunch at school outside. Hermione had already left for some lunch meeting with the Hogwarts Herald staff, and Clyde was running away from Draco across the lawn for some rude comment on his hair style. Ron was there as well, but was quietly looking off in the distance across the lake. Anger had faded to apathy for the youngest Weasley son, and that was something they were all more comfortable dealing with. Ginny had come and gone, stuttering something about Gerald St. James, a sixth year Hufflepuff she was apparently dating. That left Harry and Natalie to make conversation. He was enjoying himself, the warmth of the sun and the company around him doing much to lighten his mood, but he still felt distracted by what happened that morning in potions. “Did Slughorn say something to you? You looked bothered when I arrived. I don’t think you even noticed I was there.”

He smiled apologetically to her. “Sorry, it’s nothing. I’m just wondering if I can trust him or not.”

“You think he might be another psycho teacher?”

“Psycho? No. Manipulative? Yeah.”

“He is a charmer. You should ask Snape about him. The guy was his Head of House once upon a time.”

Harry frowned. He had resolved that the next time he saw Snape he’d give the greasy git a piece of his mind for not warning of the abrupt faculty change. If he was going to ask for the man’s advice, he was going to have to give up the opportunity to vent at the man first.

Discussing the matter with Hermione on their way to DA&D brought things into perspective.

“Are you really to go up to Professor Snape and demand an explanation for not receiving special treatment? I think you’re pushing it just asking him about Slughorn. If he thought the man was a threat he would have told you in advance.”

“Not necessarily,” Harry muttered. “Snape tends to wait for me to approach him rather than volunteer information. Either it doesn’t occur to him to tell me or he gets some sort of power kick out of it.”

Hermione just rolled her eyes and called him a dramatist.

Entering the DA&D classroom was even more jarring than entering the potion’s lab. It was still recognizable, the desks and the various displays of Dark Artifacts and cabinets chained shut, but there were some changes. For one, there were several new displays, including a chart on plants commonly found in poisons, several glowing orbs about the size of tennis balls, and many more items Harry couldn’t identify. The back of the room had been expanded and emptied of everything except some mats on the floor and walls, which he suspected would be used for practical displays. Most striking of all was the desks.

They were radiating magic.

“Hermione, wait-”

Too late he turned to warn Hermione, but she had already sat down. He stared at her wide eyed, and she frowned at him in concern. She opened her mouth to say something but nothing came out. Her eyes widened as well.

It wasn't till then that they noticed the dozen other students already sitting down and staring at them glumly. Hermione tried to get up from her seat, but found herself stuck.

“I do believe the desks have been cursed, Hermione,” Harry said, trying very hard not to laugh as she bounced in her seat trying to break free. She glared at him.

“You are correct, Mr. Potter,” Snape said evenly, although there seemed to be some underlying irritation. Harry suspected he was disappointed that all the Gryffindors hadn't been forced to sit down and shut up. “I should like to know how you figured it out so quickly.”

Harry smirked. “I can feel the magic. Like feeling humidity or smelling ozone before it rains.”

“Magus hypersensia. The ability to detect magic as one or more of the five senses. A very useful skill. Have you been drinking any potions lately?”

“Er... not that I know of. Why?”

“You will find out during lecture. Now take your seat.”

“But they're all-”

“Cursed to make you sit silently. Oh, the horror.”

Harry glared at Snape’s back as the man returned to his desk. He turned to a desk next to Hermione, and cast a few curse detection spells he had learned during his semester of Curse Breaking at Durmstrang. Sure enough he found a silencing curse and a sticking charm, and deactivated both before sitting down and casting the same thing on Hermione. She let out an irritated huff.

“Of all the silly...” she muttered, but didn’t finish. She looked at him speculatively. “I didn’t know you had magus hypersensia. When did that happen?”

“You make it sound like have some sort of fungal infection. And I don’t know. I always thought I had it, but I’ve only been able to sense magic consistently since...”

Since the Winter Solstice Ritual.

“...second year, I think.”

She looked ready to question him further, but Snape was already starting class. As Harry predicted, Snape ran DA&D the same way he ran Dueling Club, emphasizing a disciplined and thorough approach as highlighted in their syllabus with a heavy dose of personal responsibility for ensuring their own safety. Getting stuck to their desks and silenced definitely ensured that everyone paid close attention as he lectured, especially when he assured them that there would be similar tests in alertness throughout the year and not all of them would be as painless.

“For the next three weeks, we will be studying the various ways of detecting curses and defensive charms. There are many resources available that will help you avoid the situation you currently find yourselves in,” Snape said, smirking a bit at the angry students squirming in their seats. “Finite Incantatem omnis.”

There was an audible sigh that rang through the classroom as they were all released from the spells.

“Perhaps the most convenient means is magus hypersensia, the ability to sense magic as one or more of the five senses, which allowed Mr. Potter to avoid your unenviable fates.”

Harry stiffened in his chair as he felt several eyes fall on him, none of them particularly friendly.

“Magus hypersensia can be induced temporarily by ingesting certain potions and through the use of magical artifacts. There are spells that have some limited success but are ultimately unreliable. Many witches and wizards, particularly those who practice the Dark Arts or are frequently exposed to strong magic, develop magus hypersensia naturally, theoretically as a subconscious survival mechanism against harmful magic. A rare case does emerge every so often where a witch or wizard is born magically sensitive, but this usually occurs along the bloodlines of Seers and Prophets.”

I guess it makes sense, Harry decided, that I would be sensitive to magic after screwing around with gods.

The rest of the lecture went on to other detection methods, many of them Harry was already familiar with from Curse Breaking. The last half of the lecture was a practical in the use of Orbis Comperius, the magical orbs Harry had noted at the beginning of class, that could not only sense spells but would turn different colors depending on the type of spell and ever darkening shades depending on how strong the spell was. They were made to go around to a dozen magical objects that had different spells on them and write down their color and intensity, informed by Snape exactly what spell was cast on each object, and then made to write a brief explanation on why the orbs turned that particular color for that particular curse according to the information in their books. On top of that, they were given another assignment to find three different methods of detecting curses that they hadn't discussed in class.

By the time the lecture was done, everyone was tired and bitter with their long assignments on the first day of class, except for Hermione of course, who was all enthusiasm and Harry who had had nearly identical assignments at Durmstrang.

“Professor.”

Snape didn't even bother to look at him as he proceeded to re-curse the desks for his next class. This time it was a Sneezing Curse.

“What Potter?”

“I was wondering if I could talk to you about Professor Slughorn.”

Now Snape did look at him, his expression shrewd.

“What about him?”

“I...Is he a trustworthy person?”

The potions master's expression became very bland, very quickly.

“I mean... he said something before potion's class today... about my mother.”

“What precisely did he say?” Now the professor's countenance had shifted to alert and defensive, a complete turn around from the moment before.

“He said she cared about her family and would never apologize for it, and he told some story about her sending Rhumid's Draught to her grandmother.”

Snape smirked, and looked away. “Yes, I remember that. The Ministry threw a fit. They wanted the Headmaster to suspend her, but he never did. All the teacher's loved her.”

“Did Slughorn?”

Looking back to Harry, his expression hardened again. “I think what you're really asking is if Slughorn means to use your parent's memory to harm you. I can honestly say it is unlikely. He is not a cruel or vindictive man, but he is a manipulator. He will use your vulnerabilities and your pride to collect you.”

“Collect me?”

“Yes. He enjoys collecting people. It’s a very lucrative hobby of his. Voldemort brought him out of retirement specifically for his collection skills.”

“Why?”

“For social networking purposes. Hogwarts is thick with talented and powerful witches and wizards, boys and girls who will graduate to run the country. Professors, researchers, politicians, sentinels, writers, athletes, businessman. People who will go on to influence and lead hundreds, maybe thousands of others, and who will only grow more powerful by the associates they make here in this school. Hogwarts itself works hard to promote loyalty to the Dark Lord and Britain, which makes its students’ influence on the rest of Britain that much more desirable. You in particular would benefit from the support of your peers now and in the future.”

Harry blinked. Whatever he had been expecting it certainly hadn’t been this. He didn’t quite know how to react to it. Snape turned away from him again to continue with what he was doing.

“You would do well to take advantage of his interest, which will bring mutual benefits to you both. The Dark Lord desires it.”

“Oh, well, since it’s what the Dark Lord desires,” Harry said sarcastically. Then he thought of something. “Did bringing in Slughorn force you to take the DA&D position?”

Snape stiffened.

“You should go now.”

Harry very wisely made his retreat.

Seibligg didn't appreciate it one bit.

"You... You, self righteous old fool! The Triwizard Tournament was your idea! Potter escaped because of you! You got me into this mess, you damn well better get me out again," he snarled.

"The matter of the Triwizard Tournament was barely an issue until you threatened Mr. Potter and sent him running back to Britain and called the whole matter into question. Likewise, your persecution of the werewolves was ill planned. The initial enthusiasm for tightening werewolf restrictions quickly turned to disgust as the public was forced to face the consequences of their own petty fears. Saying you will hunt down Death Eater werewolves is one thing. Publically beating women and children in the streets is something else altogether. Voldemort's treaty with France, on the other hand, was sheer genius on his part. Not even I had realized he had an ongoing dialogue with the Queen."

Seibligg could only sit there and glare, disarmed by the truth. Dumbledore wasn't going to help him. His offer to protect him was flimsy at best. Once he stepped down, Dumbledore would likely throw him to the wolves in order to promote the candidate of his choosing. Maybe he would even run for Minister himself, even without the little technicality known as citizenship.

The only way to save himself was to stay in office long enough to organize a turn around.

"Minister, you've made a mess of things and you are not capable of fixing them. For once in your life, do something for the benefit of your countrymen. Step down before you're dragged down and take everyone else with you. A legal re-election could reunite the country and bring about an administration fit to deal with the current political climate. If you wait any longer, you will only bring chaos and civil. That is just what Voldemort wants."

"Get out."

Dumbledore just looked at him, looking neither surprised or angry. Finally he stood and left, leaving Seibligg feeling more desperate than before. Why hadn't the old man begged? He should have begged for him to reconsider, to think of the people, to relinquish his power. He hadn't though. Perhaps Dumbledore didn't think he had enough power left to beg for.

"I'll show you," he snarled under his breath. "I am the Minister. No one has more power here than I do. It's about damn time everyone else remembered that."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

By the end of the week, the awkwardness of Harry's new celebrity status had faded into tolerable levels. There were a few confrontations and snide remarks about werewolves from others, but nothing he couldn't forget about at the end of the day. If anything the sudden increase of female admirers was harder to handle. More than once a girl had pulled him aside to ask if he had plans for the weekend or knew who he was going to the Halloween Party with, and he could do little more than stand there and ogle them until Hermione or one of his friends rescued him (although the Weasley twins following him around and pretending to be his secretaries in charge of his social calendar for most of Friday had been more annoying than helpful).

His assessment with Slughorn hadn't been as painfully awkward as he thought it would be, and he left the man's office with a few more stories about his mother and the assurance that he wouldn't need any additional tutoring for potions.

His other classes had mixed results. He would essentially have to retake the second half of fourth year History of Magic and Astronomy (it was so overcast at Durmstrang most of the time that the subject wasn't even offered there). He only got through runes because he had a strong enough knowledge of it beforehand that he was about even with everyone else once he returned. He also broke even with transfigurations and herbology. He was actually ahead in charms, arithmancy, and DA&D (but then almost everyone in Dueling Club was). He had already elected to take Introductory to Magical First Aid again since he had missed it the year before, and Introduction to Magical Theory. Second semester involved a mandatory Sex Education class that Harry was dreading.

He had dropped Celtic studies. He went to one class, and knew immediately he couldn't stay. The new teacher, Professor Alexander Seamus, had looked at him through the entire class as if he had killed Brennan himself.

It was just as well. He had moved beyond what someone like Seamus could teach him.

Now it was the second Wednesday of the school year and Harry was at the first varsity Dueling Club practice of school year. Cedric Diggory had been forced to step down as team captain because he was too old to participate in competitions and Ron had lost his captain's status with the rollover, leaving Angelina Johnson in charge. The attack she had suffered during Harry's second year had made her almost semi-paranoid and an avid fan of self-defense. If he had been impressed with her on the quidditch pitch, it was nothing compared to his admiration for her on the dueling platform. She was efficient, ruthless, and adaptable.

He was less impressed when he found out Lockhart was sitting in for Snape, and was already making things unbearable.

"While I've never officially been a part of a Dueler's Association, I am an Admiral and you don't get that sort of position without knocking a few heads together," Lockhart preened, walking up and down the dueling platform like a model on the catwalk, soaking up that dazed, smiling faces of adolescent girls.

Harry seriously hoped he would get over himself in time for them to actually get some practice in. Beside him, Hermione was scribbling ideas in her notebook for the first edition of Hogwarts Herald due next Sunday and next to her Draco and Natalie (she had quit Riding Club after rather nasty fall off a Hippogryff) were having a thumb war (which she won by stabbing Draco with her nail).

“I’ve found that fighting with a bit of a flare does wonders for increasing your chances of winning. A show of absolute confidence will intimidate your adversary... and impress anyone who just happens to be watching,” Lockhart laughed, flipping his wavy, golden hair over his shoulder. Harry quickly looked elsewhere before he got violently ill.

His gaze found Ron, at the other end of the Dueling Hall, casting spells at his dummy. He wasn’t saying the words out loud, just moving his lips, which was the only reason no one else had noticed him up until now. Harry felt himself reluctantly admiring his cleverness, but quickly realized the other boy wasn’t having much luck. Whatever he was casting didn’t seem to have nearly as much strength as his spells cast out loud, and his dummy just wobbled a bit on its stand and nothing else.

“Now who would like to come up and have a match with me? Anyone? I promise not to be too hard on-”

“Spira mobilis!” rang out through the hall as Ron, finally fed up with his failed attempts at wordless magic, finally snapped it out. The dummy he sent the hex at spun around like a top for several seconds and fell over. Everyone turned and stared. Ron looked back them and scowled.

“What? I’m not allowed to practice?” he snarled.

“Well,” Lockhart said, his tone a bit irritated after having his limelight stolen. “Why don’t you come up here to practice with me since you are so eager?”

Ron smiled unpleasantly. “I’d be honored.”

Lockhart actually smiled at that, completely missing the sarcasm. Harry looked to his friends. Hermione shared his worried expression, but Natalie and Draco looked more than happy by this little turn of events.

“Oh, this should be fun no matter who loses,” Natalie chuckled.

Ron and Lockhart both got into position, and saluted each other. Lockhart, however, was almost immediately distracted by someone shouting 'go Lockhart!' and Ron's hex hit him before he could get a shield up.

"Spira mobilis!"

The spell sent Lockhart spinning like a top and when he stopped he was dizzy and staggered and sent a Petrifying charm straight into a window.

"Turbulentus!"

The platform beneath the admiral surged up and knocked the man off his feet and painfully onto his back.

"Amburo!"

"Ron, no!" Hermione shouted, jumping to her feet. It was too late. Lockhart's robes had already caught fire, and the wizard panicked and flailed about trying to beat out the flames. Harry stood, ready to cast the counterspell, but before he could someone beat him to it.

"Madefacio!" The Soaking Spell washed over Lockhart, dousing the flames with a loud hiss. Snape stalked across the room and onto the stage, snatching Ron's wand out of his hand as he passed. "You will get this back after we discuss the merits of self restraint, Mr. Weasley."

He moved on to Lockhart who remained on his back, too dazed to move. His robes were scorched and wet and thoroughly ruined, but he didn't appear hurt. Snape didn't look the least bit sympathetic.

"Are you injured, Professor?"

"Er...I... don't..."

“Yes, Mr. Weasley is something of a spitfire. I suppose I should have warned you,” he said, then looked around at the students who had all gotten to their feet. “I need volunteers to take Admiral Lockhart to the infirmary.”

Several girls raised their hands, but Snape ignored them and selected Cedric another seventh year boy to help carry him away. Harry glared up at Snape suspiciously. It seemed more than a little convenient that the man should just happen to show up when needed, especially when he had told Lockhart that he wouldn't be able to attend practice at all that day.

He turned to Hermione to ask her opinion, but she was gone, disappeared amongst the crowd of students during the excitement. He searched for her, but never did find her.

It wasn't until he made his way back to the common room that he realized he hadn't seen Ronald Weasley either.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

“Will you hold on for just a second?!” Hermione demanded, practically jogging to keep up with Ron's long strides. He turned back to glare at her but didn't slow down.

“I don't need a lecture from you, Granger. I'll get one from Snape soon enough.”

“I'm not here to lecture you. I'm here to find out what is wrong! You've been acting weird ever since the train. What is going on?”

He stopped abruptly, his face pinched in frustration and hands clenched. Throwing caution to the wind, she stepped closer to him. She did not honestly believe he would hit her. He could be an absolute racist idiot, but there were certain lines he never crossed. Using his physical strength against girls was one of those lines, and there had been times when Natalie had made particularly acidic comments where even Hermione thought a slap had been deserved.

“You’re not my friend. I might hang out with you because of your brother sometimes, but I’m not about ready to spill my guts to you just because you make with the puppy dog eyes.”

She rolled her eyes. “Bollocks!”

He jerked in surprised. Hermione never swore.

“We’ve been friends since we were primary school together... even after you turned into a grade A jerk, and I’m worried about you. I’m not my brother and I’m sure as hell not Natalie. I’m not going to laugh at you or use whatever’s bothering you against you later. You obviously need to tell someone because you can’t keep going on like this. Why not me? I promise I won’t tell.”

He grimaced, but didn’t immediately shout at her or stalk away which she took as a good sign. His faced twitched and shifted, running a gamut of emotions she could just barely catch before it changed again. Frustration, anger, sadness, disgust. Finally, he pulled away and walk around her.

“Just leave it alone, Granger. It’s none of your business.”

She let out a frustrated noise but let him go. He obviously wasn’t ready to talk to her, and if she kept trying now she’d only drive him further away. She would try again later, after they both had time to cool down. After all, she was nothing if not persistent.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Belfax Heating Potion- a tasteless and non-toxic potion. Adding it to water can cause it to heat up. Can be used for cooking when a fire cannot be built, to keep beverages hot, or for heating bathwater for example. Belfax is the inventor of this particular potion. There are other heating potions used for other purposes, such a raising a person’s body temperature due to hypothermia or to turn metals into their molten liquid state. Evergreen potion- is used to keep flowers and plants from wilting after they have been cut and placed into vases. It's use is simple, but it's brewing is difficult. It's also highly toxic if ingested, and is not used to preserve anything other than ornamental plants. Recitation Draught is used to help the drinker memorize what they've read for perfect recitation later. Great for making speeches or like Slughorn points out, quoting poetry to your sweetheart later. It is the easiest potion to brew in the entire book, which is the real reason Clyde picked it (and Slughorn knows it). Wound-cleaning potion is exactly what it sounds like. Rhumid's Draught is used to treat arthritis. If you're wondering what happened to Felix Felicis, it's being used as a reward for Advanced Potions, not fifth year potions, just as it was in canon.

Book V

Chapter 12: Lords of War

Snape stared at the six vials of potions, flabbergasted by his results for the first time since he had graduated university with his mastership in potions. There was not an error. Three of the six vials showed the intended result; names in silvery script floating in a solution of dark blue.

Severus Snape

Harold Potter.

Cedric Diggory.

He had collected a vial of blood from each of them, including himself, presumably to use in a demonstration of blood curses in DA&D. Not entirely false, but he had taken a few drops specifically to use in this experiment, as controls to ensure the potion worked properly. And it obviously had.

Which left him wondering why the other three vials had turned black.

The Blood Identification Potion was a standard potion in both medical, legal, and law enforcement fields and he was well familiarized with it. He taught it to his Advanced Potions students nearly every year.

Well, he had when he was actually the potion's professor.

And wasn't that just a bitch? Lestrangle had had quite the gloat-fest when she had handed down the Dark Lord's intention to substitute him with Slughorn. One day he intended to get even by replacing her as headmaster, but that time was not quite yet.

He needed to figure out who or what the Body Tree was growing at this very moment in the secret room in his living quarters. He had a sneaking suspicion it was a copy of Harry. It would explain why McGunny had helped the Germans escape with the boy. Having the public lose track of Harry, and then replacing him with a replica could serve any number of purposes, not the least of which was getting close to Voldemort.

But the blood he had collected from the fetal 'fruit' had not revealed a name, and in fact the corruption of the potion suggested it wasn't even human. Could it be some human-like creature, a fae of some sort or veela? Or was it a copy of a biological construct such as a golum? Maybe a being that started out looking human and matured into something else like a changling?

If the thing possessing McGunny had not originally been human, it would not be unreasonable to assume that the new body it was attempting to create for itself would not be human either. Even if it intended the body to look like a specific person did not mean it needed the person's exact internal body specification. There were definite benefits to creating a body that was more than human.

Confusing the hell out of Snape himself being one of them.

With a wave of his wand, he vanished the potion and all proof that he had brewed it. He would need to perform more experiments to determine the species of his current project, but not tonight. He had essays to grade.

He secured the supply cabinets and ingredient's cupboard, and stepped out of his private laboratory. Lestrangle had tried to deprive him of this too, but Slughorn had insisted he keep it. For all that Snape resented his removal from his position he could not bring himself to resent his former mentor, who had done much to foster his self esteem during his school years and even now the man's positive regard acted as a balm to his wounded pride.

His rooms were still in the dungeons as well, but there had been no question of Slughorn staying there. He enjoyed his creature comforts more than his privacy, and was housed beneath the Ravenclaw dormitory. Yet even the forbidding gloom of the dungeon's was not enough to ward off everyone, as was evidenced by the envelope poking out the side of the portrait that guarded his rooms.

He immediately noticed Draco's sharp, elegant scrawl and after a simple revealing charm proved the letter devoid of magic, he grabbed the letter and brought it in with him. The missive inside was simple and short.

Uncle Severus

Mother would like to invite you to see a play next Saturday. Benjamin and Bailey*. Bring a date. – Draco Snape smirked. Narcissa, for all her class and breeding, lacked the ability to extend invitations graciously or even courteously more often than not and Draco had inherited her lack of tact. She was fortunate, however, that he actually liked that particular play and that he could actually think of at least one woman he wouldn't mind bringing along to see it.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

"I swear if that...girl tries to slip one more article under my nose I'm hanging her by her thumbs in the dungeon," Hermione snarled, throwing down a stack of parchments on the table and taking her seat. Harry and Ginny, who had been discussing the upcoming quidditch tryouts, blinked at her.

"Are you referring to any girl specifically or should all the resident females fear for their auxiliary digits?" Harry asked. He grinned at her, pleased he even managed a sentence that clever on the fly.

"Trudy Sabbat. Second-year Ravenclaw and know it all. She wasn't even a part of the staff last year and when she joined she just knew she was the paper's rising star. As if we have or need a star to begin with, the little snot."

Harry couldn't help but smile. Hermione was one of the most tolerant people he knew, and even people she didn't like tended to get some sort of rationalization. It took a rare soul to get her to spout out insults about them.

“Don’t laugh. She’s convinced that her success rides on making you out to be some sort of insane monster bent on over running the wizarding world with werewolves.”

“Oh, her,” Ginny said, her eyes widening in recognition. “She came up to me in the library and had the nerve to ask me if I’d made a pledge to you to become a werewolf once I graduated. Of all the stupid things?”

That was funny too, but suddenly Harry couldn’t bring himself to laugh. Someone had tried to get into his trunk two nights ago, and when they failed they settled for writing nasty things over it. Prior to that he’d had a homework assignment stolen in the library while he was looking for more research materials, and found it replaced with sheet of paper reading ‘Traitor To Your Species’. He would like to blame Whitmore, but Harry suspected it was more than one person. There had been more than few hostile stares in the three weeks Harry had been back in Hogwarts.

Why exactly had he thought coming home would be easier?

“She’s not very bright for a Ravenclaw,” Hermione admitted, “But she is persistent. Eventually she’s going to figure out she can’t write a story without facts, but she can write an opinion piece. I might have to print it to keep from being accused of being bias. The first edition came out so perfectly, why is everything turning into such a mess now?”

The first edition of the Hogwarts Herald had been a raging success, assuaging the fears of many of the students that the paper would get dull after being taken over by its new, bookish editor. Hermione had been a high-strung, yet happy mess until the day it was handed out in the great hall. Now she was just high-strung.

“The solution should be obvious, Granger.”

“Ron!” she blurted, then cringed. She hadn’t meant to use his given name in public. He was looking as angry and irritated with the world as ever, arms crossed with some parchments in his hand. He moved in set them on top of her pile.

“I want to write the article before Sabbat does and embarrasses the rest of us. I actually have some legitimate questions I’d like to ask Potter.”

There was a glare directed at Harry, who just smiled back stiffly and raised his glass to him. Meanwhile, Hermione was looking over his proposal, her pinched features relaxing into interest.

“This is really good. Really really good. Do you think you could have this ready by next Monday?”

“You can’t be serious,” Harry said. “I might not trust Sabbat to write a fair article about me, but you want me to trust him to do it?”

Ron sneered. “Get over yourself. I’m not writing a story about you. I’m writing a story about Proposal 4-66 and the treaty with France. You just happen to be the only first hand source available.”

“Which means anything negative you write about them reflects back on me. No thanks.”

“Harry,” Hermione broke in. “A lot of people have very real concerns about the influx of werewolves, and even if you don’t share it, it doesn’t make their concerns any less valid. You have a responsibility to answer their questions as best you can. Even if it makes you uncomfortable to do so.”

“What she said, Potter.”

Hermione glared at Ron. “And I will be present during the interview to make sure the questions are on subject and not taken out of context.”

“Whatever you say, luv.”

Ron grinned cockily and strutted his way towards the Slytherin table. Harry gave Hermione a dirty look, which she returned. “Don’t be such a baby, Harry. You've done this sort of thing loads of times, and you could do a lot worse as far as reporters go. He always writes a well balanced article."

"Please, Harry," Ginny said, "Don't be stubborn about it? I know you and Ron don't get along, but this might be just what he needs to snap him out of this funk he's been in. A non-funky Ron has to be better than a funky one, right?"

Harry chuckled at her description of her brother, but nodded in agreement. They were all right. He did need to face the other students and their questions. If he were lucky maybe it would stop the harassment he had been getting. For once, he would just have to bow to the inevitable.

By the next morning he had managed to stir up some enthusiasm for the upcoming interview. It couldn't hurt to work on an open dialogue with the rest of his peers. If only to remind them that he was still Harry, and they could still talk to him and not be ignored or dismissed. He missed a lot of the easy banter he had held with his classmates and Dueling Club partners.

His optimism for the day was dashed, however, when Snape handed him letter from his godfathers over breakfast. He read the letter. He read the letter again. Then a third time.

"Harry, what is it?" Clyde asked, "You look like someone killed your dog."

"Huh," he laughed, wrung from the irony of his friend's words more than any humor in the situation itself. "Sirius and Remus are going to France."

Clyde blinked. "Oh... Sorry, mate."

"Yeah..."

"Does it say how long they'll be gone?"

Harry shook his head, still trying to wrap his mind around the idea. It shouldn't be that disturbing. It wasn't as if he would have been able to visit them until next summer, and letters from France only took two or three days more to reach him than those from the Goddess Colony. And yet...

Britain would feel a little less like home when they weren't in it.

According to the letter, it didn't sound like they would be back any time soon.

He was distracted and depressed for the rest of the day, turning his toad into fish rather than an ottoman (when precisely would that ever come in handy?) in transfiguration and charming his tea set to electrocute rather than warm beverages in charms. Hermione was even getting frustrated with him, until Clyde tipped her off in Arithmancy, and then she became all quiet and sympathetic which was worse in a lot of ways.

"Do you need to talk about it?" she asked during their study period together.

"No... I... I just need to get used to the idea. Maybe..." he paused, a thought occurring to him. "There's something I need to do. I think you might be able to help me with it, but not for a few days."

She asked him what he needed to do, but he wouldn't elaborate. She wouldn't understand until he showed her. None of his friends would.

The next day was Friday, the evening of the interview. Ron had spent the last few days going around the castle and asking people if they had any questions they would like to ask Harry about Proposal 4-66 and the 1997 Treaty of Paris, and had quite the list when they met in one of the abandoned classrooms.

Sensing they would be there for a quite a while, Hermione had transfigured the desks into soft easy chairs and Harry brought up some snacks from the kitchens (the castle house elves still regarded him as their hero and had been tittering happily to themselves at his personal request). They made themselves comfortable and got down to business.

“Who came up with the idea of Proposal 4-66?” Ron began.

“I did. Or at least, I suggested helping France with the werewolves they were getting from Germany. Most of the actual plans were thought up by Lord Voldemort, Fenrir Greyback, and Voices for All. Personally, I thought most of their ideas were quite ingenious.”

“And why did you make the suggestion? How did you even know what was happening? Britain did not seem aware of the situation until a few days before Proposal 4-66 was made.”

“I had received a letter from a friend in France. This person was aware of my connection to werewolves, particularly that my godfathers are werewolves and that it was a werewolf family that helped me get back to Britain safely. The letter contained a German article about the ministry attempting to round up werewolf ‘Death Eaters’ conspiring with Lord Voldemort. It was all lies. Even Stephen Canis, the werewolf who helped me, was painted as some sort of lone rebel bent on toppling the government, when the truth was that he’s just a father trying to do what’s best for his wife and children. When I realized what was happening, and that they were using my escape as an excuse to persecute innocent people, I went to Lord Voldemort.”

The interview lasted for nearly an hour and a half, with only a ten minute break for snacks and drinks, and it was by far the longest interview Harry could ever remember doing. Ron insisted on asking every question he had been given, everything from where the new colonies would be located (Ireland, where there aren’t enough wards to safely protect wizarding folk against the native fairy population) to his belief in werewolf equality (equal, yes, the same, no- who could they? They had completely different cultures) to granting citizenship to non-British or Irish werewolves (no, once the colonies in France are set up, they’ll return there, unless they find mates and wish to stay).

“Okay, last question,” Ron said, his voice starting to go raspy with talking. “There are several people of the opinion that taking in the additional werewolves presents far greater risks than it does benefits. What would you say to those people?”

“I’d say they’re entitled to their opinion, but I hope they have something to back it up, because I’m not too impressed with it right now. The same safety features that have kept werewolves and humans from harming each other in the last fifteen years are still in place, and the benefits from our decision to aid the werewolves have led to a friendship with France, which can only help us.”

Ron wrote out his response in the short hand gibberish that only he could interpret and snapped his notebook closed.

“That should be it. I’ll write the article up Saturday. Front page stuff this is,” he said, waving his little notebook. Harry rolled his eyes and got up to go.

“If that’s all then, I think we should get back to our rooms. Curfew’s almost here.”

“Actually, Harry,” Hermione said, “I need to talk to Ron. About the paper. So... you should probably go ahead without me.”

He felt immediately suspicious, but didn’t push. If she wanted to talk privately with Ron, he wasn’t going mother hen her. He wasn’t Draco. He did, however, linger for a minute behind the door. It didn’t take long for the conversation to start up again.

“I’m not going to talk about it with you, Granger. And stop calling me Ron.”

“I’m not calling you Weasley, and I didn’t ask you to talk to me about the ‘it’ you haven’t defined. Unless ‘it’ is your article. At which point, I’ll talk to you about it as much as I want. That’s the benefit of being the editor.”

“Playing dumb doesn’t suit a know-it-all like you. Knock it off.”

“I’m just worried.”

“You’re just nosy. I’m fine. Look at me, productive member of society, writing for the school paper and not setting anyone on fire for a whole week.”

Harry walked away after that, rolling his eyes. If arguing with Ron is what she wanted, she could have it.

oo
oo

Snape glowered at the small package on his kitchen table, and considered forgetting about it for the day. It had arrived at his breakfast table via owl post, and even before checking the address he could tell its source by the eager way Harry had watched the package land. He really did hate being that boy’s private postman.

He performed the usual curse detection spells and opened the package. There was a spear head inside, wrapped in a piece of paper.

‘For use in spell. Don’t touch.’

What was that boy up to now? He put the spear head back in the box, careful not to touch anything other than the paper. He’d give it to the boy later. Maybe. After he found out what it was for.

He spent the rest of the morning in his lab, brewing potions to help him identify the Body Tree fruit, which had developed from ‘fetal’ to ‘infant’ with a healthy crop of fine dark hair. By three he was finished for the day, and would not be able to continue his potions for another twelve to sixteen hours. He set them aside, and headed above ground to one of Hogwarts’s many towers. He found McGonagall already pouring herself a cup of tea and set himself down across from her.

She always had her tea here, everyday at the same time, and while he didn't always join her, he knew he could always depend on intelligent company for at least an hour out of any day. She poured him a cup of Earl Grey, and a bit of milk but no sugar, just as he liked it. He smiled his thanks, thin and strained as it was. The tea set was Larousse's. It had been donated, along with most of her belongings, to Hogwarts and Snape had made it a point to instruct the castle house elves that it should only ever be used by McGonagall or himself. He didn't think of it too much at the time, but he wondered now if he hadn't been a touch mad when he done it.

"Hogsmeade weekend is next week," McGonagall said, skipping over the pleasantries. Snape cringed, and shook his head.

"Has it really been that long already? I suppose I'm on gate duty this time."

"I'm afraid so. Lestrage really seems to have it out for you lately. I think she's jealous that you got to go to Paris."

"I don't know why. It's a dirty city, everyone smokes, and the women all dress like muggle hookers."

"By what you're describing it's possible that what you saw were muggle hookers. Wizarding and muggle Paris are a lot more interconnected than wizarding and muggle London. I hear the art district is nice."

Snape shrugged. He hadn't ventured far into that part of the city. He had only stopped at a jewelry booth on his way to one of Paris' many historic libraries when he had seen the beetle brooch and been reminded of Ira.

"I have a date," he said, now that he had been reminded of the woman. McGonagall blinked at him, her honest surprise more than a little unflattering.

"A date? With a woman?"

“I believe so. I’ve only ever seen her in a dress, although Ira is more traditionally a man’s name.”

“Ira? She doesn’t sound familiar.”

“Ira Beadle. She never went to Hogwarts, but she must have done alright for herself. She’s a research assistant at the University of London. Entomology.”

“Really? What’s she like?”

Snape nearly smirked at her dubious expression. No doubt she had in her mind a pure-blood intellectualist, Voldemort-approved, and greedy for Snape’s influence with Harry and the Dark Lord.

“A Hufflepuff if ever I met one.”

McGonagall blinked. “You haven’t imperio’d this poor woman, have you?”

“Amazingly enough, no. Something about a bachelor and an orphan living alone together tugs at her maternal instincts, and I haven’t been able to get rid of her since.”

“So you decided to go on a date with her in an attempt at reverse psychology?” she asked, smirking herself now.

“Narcissa invited me to a play I actually liked on the stipulation that I brought a date. No offense Minerva, but you’re a bit old for me.”

She chuckled into her tea. Severus was a strange, infuriating, funny man. Any answer he gave you that was longer than ‘yes’ or ‘no’ was never straight or un-mined. Conversing with him resembled dancing more than anything, and one misstep sent you falling all over yourself.

Sometimes it was necessary to change the song.

“How do you like DA&D? I have to say I’ve never seen so many students afraid to sit down in their desks in all the time I’ve taught here.”

Snape tilted his head. “I see now that it’s a good thing I was transferred. Their knowledge is spotty at best. Too many teacher changes half way through the semester, and Quirrel’s been too lazy to do the job properly since his supposedly last year of teaching. There’s no discipline to it, and they’ve forgotten almost anything useful they learned from Larousse and Oblitz. I don’t know how any of the previous seventh years managed to pass their NEWTS.”

McGonagall nodded. She often wondered the same thing.

“Then it is certainly a good thing that you are there to guide them. I suspect the knowledge to protect themselves will become increasingly important in the coming days. I have to say, I’m particularly impressed with what you’ve managed to pass on to Mr. Potter and Mr. Weasley. I saw them at the Junior Dueling League Championship. They were both amazing. All of your duelists were.”

Snape acknowledged the compliment with a nod, inwardly pleased. McGonagall and he had not been friends for long, but he knew she was hard to impress and offered her praise sparingly.

“Speaking of which, what has Lockhart been up to? He’s been avoiding me lately.”

McGonagall took a sip of her tea to hide her less than polite smile, and set it down again once she had regained her composure.

“Yes, well... I do believe he’s rather afraid you’ll ask him to step in for you again, despite the fact that he was playing down his own defensive capabilities in order to build up Mr. Weasley’s self-confidence. Aside from that, I suppose he’s doing a pretty decent job. Most of what he does is show his ‘recruits’ how to take care of their uniforms and perform drills so that they look impressive. There’s very little spellwork involved, and for that I’m sure we’re all grateful.”

“Count our blessings, as the saying goes.”

“Exactly so.”

oo
oo

It took some convincing on Harry's part to get Remus' package from Snape. He had to go from the Great Hall back to his dorm room and then back to the Great Hall to get the book containing the spell he wanted to use the arrowhead in. It had taken another twenty minutes explaining the basis of the ritual magic and reassure the potions master that the spell was perfectly safe and would not end up transforming him or anyone else in the school into pigeons.

It took some convincing, but he had it.

“What precisely are we doing?” Natalie asked, voicing the question all their friends were wondering. “And where did you get a bucket of cow blood?”

Harry had asked his friends to help him with a spell, but it was the sort of spell none of them had any experience with. It involved the Old Magicks, which they only knew of from history books and fairy tales. Most of them were only half convinced it would work.

But they were his friends, and they were curious. So Natalie, Hermione, Draco, Clyde, Ginny, the Weasley twins, and Ron (because once he started following them there was no shaking him) had helped him gather the supplies from around the castle and followed him for nearly an hour out across the lake where they would be assured their privacy.

“Did you know the house elves butcher most of the meat we eat?” he said, glancing back at them to make sure no one had fallen behind. “They've been very helpful. I never would have found half of this stuff without them.”

“And what is all of this stuff for?” Ron snipped. He would have guessed Dark Arts with the blood, but he had learned enough from DA&D to know most of their supplies were perfectly harmless. Candles, white linen, mason jars of grains, wine, and milk. They may as well be coming out to have a really weird picnic.

“A protection spell for my godfathers. I told you that already,” he said, then pointed to a spot a little ways in the distance. There was a rocky beach with plenty of room for all of them.

“Why not just cast a protection charm on them and be done with it? Or give them one of those protection relics are something?” Draco asked, perhaps the most put off out of all them. He didn’t own the sort of shoes this sort of spelunking required.

“Too weak. Much, much too weak and they fade too quickly. I need to cast a spell tailored specifically for them that will last over a year. One that won’t be canceled with a simple finite incantatem. Don’t worry, Draco, I promise I’ll make this worth your while. You’re going to get such a buzz from this.”

“So that’s why you needed the mushrooms,” Fred laughed, shaking his jar of dull brown fungi.

“I am so not eating those,” Ginny insisted.

“Don’t worry, they’re not for eating. They’re an offering to Raecellos, the God of Traveler’s. He’ll carry the spell to France once they leave Britain.”

There was a moment of silence, and then Ron spat out, “Are you fucking serious? You’re a loon.”

“If you really think so, you can go. You invited yourself along if you’ll recall.”

No one said anything else as Harry had them help lay out the white linen for his spell. They spread it out over the rocky beach and weighted down with stones. Harry then stripped down to his pants and undershirt and had everyone step back towards the edge of the trees. Out of all of them, only the Weasley twins looked more eager and curious than uncertain and skeptical. It didn't matter; Harry thought to himself, they would understand when they experienced it themselves. He should have shown them last year, but at the time he had been so concerned with other things and paganism had seemed more like a secret club than a way of life.

He took his keystone from Hermione who had been carrying it and showed it to all of them.

"This is my keystone. I've been storing up magic inside of it for months. I'm going to use it to charge the cow blood with my magic. It will take the place of my own blood."

The keystone had been set to absorb his excess magic, but it only took a moment of intense concentration for him to reverse the flow. Immediately, he could feel his magic flowing back into him and he could tell by everyone's expressions that they felt it too. Quickly, he dropped it into the bucket of blood, and watches as it rippled restlessly for several seconds, refusing to settle with the steady current of magic pouring into it.

"Whoa."

Harry grinned at them. "You haven't seen anything yet."

He took the bundle of sage from Clyde and lit it, releasing a fragrant smoke into the air. He spread it around the white linen, himself, and his friends.

"This will purify the area of malevolent energies that could influence the spell. It also keeps several sort of spirits away."

"Spirits?" Hermione asked, "Like ghosts?"

"No. Like wraiths or unseelie fairies. We're so close the Forbidden Forest, I have to be extra careful. I'd keep your wands ready, just in case."

They shared uneasy looks and brought out their wands. Harry grabbed a paintbrush, twice the width of his thumb, and the bucket of blood and carried it over to the white sheet. He dipped his finger into the blood then brought it up to draw a line across his forehead.

“For concentration,” he said, without looking at the others, then dipped in his brush and applied it to the white canvas. The brush did not drip, the lines were perfectly straight where he needed, curved where he needed, and when he was done his diagram was more precise than anyone without a specific spell should have been able to manage. This was no artistic skill on his part, but the blood itself was now an extension of his will, and he had willed it to be perfect. The diagram itself was three overlapping circles, a symbol for eternity. From Ron he took the jar of milk, added a drop of blood to infuse it with magic, then poured it out in a circle around the blood circles, and then a little at its center. He drank the rest.

In the spaces between each of the lines of the circle, he began to spread out his offerings of grain, wine, honey, mushrooms, fruit, three silver sickles, three fishing hooks, and three small fish. Symbols of bounty all. All native grown or forged, making them symbols of home. At the edge of the circle, three short, fat white candles were set the exact same distance from each other and remained unlit. At the very center of the diagram he placed two items. The first was Sirius’ fang and claw necklace, the one he had been given the summer before his first year and the only item he had that was completely untouched by anyone’s magic but Sirius’. The second was Remus’ spearhead, forged and fished with by him personally for several years now.

Harry stared at his work for several minutes, double and triple checking to make sure it had been put together perfectly, and then turned to his friends. Their expressions were all the same now. The skepticism, uncertainty, and curiosity had all been replaced with fascination. They didn’t understand what he was doing, but deep inside their magical core hummed and brought forth instincts of ancient days before wands and textbooks, when even the most powerful could only unleash their magic at the will of the divine.

“Whatever happens from here on out, you mustn’t interfere. I’m not entirely sure how this is going to look to you, but I don’t want you to be afraid.”

By now the sun was low on the horizon, and the shadows of the surrounding trees had blanketed them in shade and the half moon rose pale in the sky. Across the lake they could see distant towers of Hogwarts and the flicker of torches being lit. Harry removed his shirt and set it aside, earning a gasp from several of his friends. They all knew about the crescent mark tattoo, but none of them had seen skeletal hand print that now surrounded it, courtesy of one very irritated Dark Lord. He didn’t think now was the time to explain (or lie about) it. Natalie held the very last item that he required, and as he stepped towards her she hastily drew out the carved wooden box. He opened it and pulled out the sacrificial knife. Her eyes grew huge.

“What are you-“

“You’ll see. Don’t be afraid.”

He turned his back towards them and stepped into the center of the diagram, his feet straddling the necklace and spearhead. His keystone would ensure the blood he was using counted as blood sacrifice, but a little pain was still required. With the dagger he pricked the tip of first finger and held it over one of the circle so that it would dripped down into it.

“I call upon Madris, The Queen Goddess of Home and Family, to alight upon me a blessing of protection. Before thee I make an offering of my blood and the bounty of my hearth. If this pleases you, I beg of thee a sign.”

Around him he could see and hear and feel the stones along the beach rattle and shake, and one of his friends gave a little shout of surprise. The candle at the edge of the circle directly in front of him suddenly lit itself. One blessing down. Two to go.

He turned himself to another circle and pricked another finger to bring new blood.

“I call upon Rhiannon, Goddess of the Moon and Inspiration, to alight upon me a blessing of creativity in the face of many difficulties. Before thee I make an offering of my blood and the bounty of my hearth. If this pleases you, I beg of thee a sign.”

At the edge of the shore, a wave suddenly drew up and crashed against the beach; bring water up to the very edge of the white linen, like a tide pulled in by the moon.

The second candle lit.

He turned to the final circle and pricked his third finger.

“I call upon Raecellos, God of Traveler’s, to bare these blessings to Sirius Blackbone and Remus Slivermoon upon their journey and until such time as they return to their native soil. Before thee I make an offering of my blood and the bounty of my hearth. If this pleases you, I beg of thee a sign.”

Raecellos apparently wasn’t as into large gestures. Yet out of all of the signs he had received, Bobby landing on his shoulder was definitely the most startling.

“Little scrapper,” Bobby laughed, ruffling his feathers. “You know you interrupted a very interesting exploration of the Selkie Coves off Malin Head?”

“Missed you too, Master,” Harry hissed under his breath. He glanced at his friends, but they didn’t seem to realize the raven was talking. He looked back towards the edge of the circle to see the third candle was lit. The ritual was over. He had all three blessings.

“Well, back to France for me then,” Bobby sighed. “I’d barely touched Ireland. I hope you’re happy.”

“Ecstatic. Now off with you. You’ve got some blessing to deliver, don’t you? My godfathers are leaving tomorrow.”

“Yes, yes, big hurry and all. You owe me one.”

Bobby dove from his shoulder and onto the ground, where he quickly snatched up a silver sickle from Raecellos’ circle and flew off with it. Harry let out a sigh of relief and stepped out of the circle. The evening air settled over his skin, making him shiver and he quickly moved to redress. It wasn’t for some moments that he noticed that his friends were being awfully quiet. He turned around and blinked.

They were crying. Shimmery wet trails fell down their cheeks, their eyes staring at him with disbelief and amazement. He was stuned. Had this been what he looked like to Voldemort when he had first felt the touch of the Earth? The way he and Fleur had felt when they had seen the blessing* of unicorns?

“What’s wrong? Are you alright?”

His words seemed to pull them out of their shock, and immediately hands went up to their faces to wipe away the tears there and everyone avoided looking at each other in embarrassment. Natalie pulled herself together first, and a few snuffles later you wouldn’t have known she had been crying at all.

“What was that? It felt all.... Weird. Tingly and weird.”

“That’s three gods dropping by to say hello. Well, them and one rather obnoxious messenger. Is everyone okay? We really need to leave the area now.”

“Why,” Ron said, his voice still rough with emotion. “What’s going to happen?”

Harry pointed towards the white linen piled with offerings.

“That all belongs to Them now. They’ll send their followers to collect it here shortly, and those tend to be fairies. Just leave it all here. I’ll come back tomorrow and pick the jars.”

That got everyone moving quickly off the beach and back towards Hogwarts. Harry followed at the rear, taking a moment to wash off his keystone, forehead, and knife in the lake. He wasn’t even completely out of sight before he saw the first scavenger arrive, a deer-like animal as black as coal with red antlers pulled itself from the shadows of the trees and began to eat of the grain offering from the Rhiannon’s circle. He didn’t call the others back see. He had no idea how safe they all were while painted in divine magic.

No one said anything on the walk back to the castle, and Harry was starting to think he made a mistake in showing them this. He hadn’t wanted to frighten them. More than anything he just wanted them to understand this part of his life that was so important to him, that had brought him home to them in the first place. As they reached the edge of the castle portcullis, the sky now sunless and burning brilliant pink and orange, Harry broke the silence.

“Someone say something.”

As one, they all stopped and turned to him. There was no more tears, but their expressions weren’t entirely clear. Hermione stepped around the others so she could stand directly in front of him. She looked pained and he felt his heart clench.

“I had no idea,” she said, “I knew you were a pagan, I knew you did magic that was different than what we learn in class, but I didn’t... I never even imagined magic could be like that. It was so...so... raw and organic. And you just...you were so in tune with it and... and...”

And her arms were suddenly around him, holding him tightly as her entire body shook with tears all over again.

“You were so beautiful, Harry.”

oo
oo

“Poor Bailey,” Ira sighed, settling into the carriage seat across from Snape. It was very nearly midnight, and while they had each enjoyed the play they were now more than a little tired. Snape hid it well, but then being naturally irritable had its advantages.

“I’m afraid I don’t know what you mean, Miss Beadle. Bailey got the girl in the end.”

“Yes, but he could have gotten Agatha years ago if he had known how to give a simple compliment. He would have had friends too. And maybe avoided being accused of murder.”

Snape smiled at this.

“Do you think his life would truly have been any better? He was not a pleasant person, but he was an honest one and he wanted others to be honest with him. Agatha couldn’t have appreciated his honesty until after Benjamin betrayed her. She wasn’t mature enough for him yet. Likewise, if he had made friends like Benjamin did he would soon be disappointed by them. Did you not see how quickly Judge Kendell and Arietta turned on Benjamin when they realized the compliments he had given them were fake?”

Ira thought about what he had said, and felt a smile growing.

“You are a real Bailey, aren’t you? That’s why you like the play. He’s just like you... and still gets the girl in the end.”

Snape snorted.

“I assure, madam, I am both Benjamin and Bailey. I’m unpleasant to be around for the honest and dishonest alike.”

“I like being around you,” she said.

“Well, then maybe I’m a Benjamin, and you just don’t realize what you’ve gotten yourself into.”

“I don’t think so. I’ve known a Benjamin in my time, enough to appreciate a Bailey.”

“Do you fancy yourself an Agatha?”

She ducked her head. “No, I’m not pretty enough to be an Agatha. Maybe the barmaid... just not as buxom.”

Snape chuckled. The barmaid had been one of the funniest and most jaded characters in the play, refusing to be charmed by Benjamin or anyone else for that matter. He was feeling uncommonly relaxed. He’d had a wonderful evening, even with Lucius throwing thinly veiled barbs at him about Lestrangle and Narcissa’s obvious disappointment in his choice of dates. Ira had been charming and witty, any associated arrogance muted by her nervousness to be dressed to the nines in a demure but tasteful black evening dress. He felt strangely pleased to see she was wearing the brooch he had given her, the back clasp transfigured so that she could use it to pin up her hair. She had a very graceful neck, he noted.

“I’d like to do this again,” he found himself saying, completely unplanned. He waited for the usual feeling of regret when he spoke without thinking. He noticed her stiffen, and felt the urge to kick himself.

“You mean see a play?”

“I mean, go on a date,” he clarified, figuring since he had mucked things up already he’d do the Bailey-thing and bury himself with his own honesty. A blush stole its way across her face, and he wondered if he hadn’t completely overstepped his bounds after all, when the carriage came to a stop in front of her flat.

“I... I really don’t think that would be a good idea, Professor,” she said quickly and scurried out of the carriage without waiting for the driver to open the door for her. He watched her entire escape from his seat, saw her stop twice as if she were going to turn around and rush back, but eventually she passed through the front door and disappeared.

“Well, that went just splendidly,” Snape sneered to himself. “It could have been worse I suppose. She could have said yes and I would have had to put up with this lunacy on a regular basis.”

She had wanted to say yes. He could tell that much, but that didn't illuminate her reasons for refusing. Maybe she really was a man. Maybe she was seeing someone else. Snape snorted and rolled his eyes. It didn't matter. This was their first and last date, and since he had enjoyed it for the most part it wasn't as if the evening had been wasted.

Just unpleasantly concluded.

There was always tomorrow. Stupid bloody optimism.

oo
oo

What are you doing?

Tom frowned behind his mask, but gave no indication to the vampires, two on either side of him, that anything was wrong. He stood on the roof of a town house and stared down coldly at the domicile across the street. It was nearly midnight, and this far into October the air was cold and damp. He could feel his excitement growing, and perhaps that was what had roused Horace from his sleep in the quiet corner of his mind. He tried to gently push the boy back into the world of dreams, but now that Horace was awake he resisted.

What are we doing here? Why are they wearing masks?

He could not answer him, not with the Katarina and her minions standing on either side of him, waiting for his signal to start. He wished he could though, knowing the truth might be enough to send the boy scurrying into the shadows to hide from what was about to happen. To hide from what he had made possible by going the Ministry of Magic and pulling the information he needed from the Department of Public Records.

It really was amazing the information you could find just lying around. Names, occupations, criminal histories... addresses.

“Now?” Katarina asked, her expression a mystery behind the full white Venetian mask but her voice thick with impatience..

“Midnight. Not a minute before and not a minute after. We cannot give the Aurors time to gather themselves and-“

A bell rang, deep and low, through the night. Tom stiffened, and so did Katarina. He turned back to the house and with a few violent slashes with his wand, wordlessly destroyed the house' protective wards.

“Now. Quickly.”

If vampires were anything, it was quick. Katarina leaped off her perch and landed lightly onto the house across the street, her brood following closely behind. From here they looked like dementors, their black cloaks floating behind them as they ghosted over the rooftop. It only took them five seconds to find the unlocked window and slip inside.

What are they doing?

“What do you think they're doing?” Tom whispered.

The silence that followed was answer enough for the both of them.

“You should go back to sleep, Horace.”

Why are you doing this?

Tom closed his eyes. If he listened very closely, he could hear panicked shouting but it only lasted a moment. When he looked up, he could see the full moon staring down at him, yellow and wicked. He smiled.

“This is what I do, Horace. I tear things apart so that I can build them anew, better than they were before. You don’t have to understand it, but you would do well to respect it.”

Monster.

“Yes, now be quiet. It’s almost over.”

He felt Horace attempt to push him back into the darkness, but it was weak. His host had grown complacent, giving him too much power at night and now he could not take it back. If he wanted to, Tom could steal his days as well, but that sort of continuous concentration was more than he was willing to pay for a luxury he didn’t need. Eventually, Horace gave up, but he did not retreat. Perhaps he was waiting for a moment of distraction on Tom’s part or even to see exactly what atrocity had been committed below them.

It only took three minutes for Katarina to complete her mission and return to his side. Her mask was painted in blood. Tom spared her cool grin.

“Did you enjoy yourself, my Lady?”

She gave her answer by lifting a bloody finger beneath her mask sucking it clean.

“Charming,” Tom muttered, and apparated back to Vampire Row. He intended to be there when the other minions he had sent out returned to report their mission’s outcome.

oo
oo

“She’s pretty flashy for a wallflower,” Natalie groused, glowering at Ginny Weasley as she flew circles around the pitch, attempting to catch the Snitch. Harry was in his usual top form, but though Ginny lacked his flying precision she was an aggressive flyer and had kept him from grabbing the Snitch twice. They had been going at it for nearly twenty minutes, and she was starting to get anxious about the outcome. There was no way Harry could ever lose to a nobody like Ginny.

“It must be that new boyfriend of hers, I think that’s him over there. She just wants to impress him.”

That consoled Natalie, but only a little. It had been a little over a week since Harry had shown them the true strength of his magic down by the lake, and she was feeling decidedly territorial over him. Hermione had been right. Harry had been beautiful, his power flowing over them like a warm bath even as the scarier magic of something else had cackled in the air like unborn lightening. For a few brief moments, Harry had been more than himself, a representation of something magnificent and untouchable and powerful, like a phoenix in rebirth. He had glowed with benevolent magic.

For the briefest moment she had thought him an angel.

And wasn’t that a sacrilegious thought considering?

They had been too shocked to react immediately after, but as the days passed the surprise faded and was replaced with a renewed sense of affection. Harry had been magnificent, but in the end he had looked at them with those wide green eyes that just begged for their acceptance. It wasn’t hard to give. In fact, it was probably a lot easier than it should have been.

She was getting rather fed up with competing with the rest of his friends for his attention. Even Ron was being nicer to him...well at least he wasn’t as much of a jerk. In fact, he was the one she was most irritated with. Not only was he being friendlier (sort of, in a Ronnish way) to Harry, he had written that article for the Hogwart’s Herald that had boosted Harry’s popularity all over again so that everyone and their cousin was trying to talk to him during meals and in Dueling Club and the hallways and in the bloody bathroom about the silliest things like whether his French source was that gorgeous Fleur girl or the Queen herself!

She could hate Hermione instead, but there was something about Ron that was just so satisfying to hate. Harry was less likely to hold it against her too.

A loud shout drew Natalie out of her sulking, and Draco was already out of his seat and rushing towards the edge of the platform. She hurriedly followed, and felt a bolt of panic when she couldn't immediately spot Harry.

“What happened?”

“Ginny hit the pole and fell off her broom. Harry tried to catch her but got hit by a bludger and fell too.”

They quickly climbed down the platform and made their way onto the pitch where the rest of the players and audience was now flocking. They were closer than most of them, but not quite fast enough to stop what happened next. Harry was crouching beside the youngest Weasley, holding her hand, and didn't appear to have been hurt.

“Oh, God, what is Lockhart doing?” Draco groaned, watching with growing trepidation as the man lifted Ginny's shoeless foot. They didn't hear the spell he cast, but they did see the result. Ginny's entire leg suddenly became as limp as a noodle. She let out a ear piercing scream, which sent both Lockhart and Harry into a panic. The admiral lifted his wand in an attempt to fix his mistake, and Harry dropped Ginny's hand and used his wand to blast Lockhart several feet across the field. Natalie gaped, not sure whether she should laugh or scream. This was getting very bad, very quickly.

At least Ginny stopped screaming, and had settled on whimpering instead.

“Oh bloody, fucking hell,” she moaned, staring at her useless leg. Someone reached out to poke it and she gave them a look that promised instant death. Harry gave her an apologetic eyes, which she ignored. Professor Grimms, who had been standing on the sidelines, finally reached them. He gave Ginny's leg a weird look but assured her it was completely fixable, and then went to check on Lockhart.

“Gin?! Ginny?! Are you alright?”

“Gerry?”

“I’m here, luv. Sorry, I was on the other side of the field. How do you feel?”

She tried to smile at her boyfriend but it came out as more of a grimace. “Well, it doesn’t hurt anymore. Lockhart didn’t lie about that.”

Natalie had to fight back a chuckle. It was awful and mean, but it was damn funny too. Harry, however, was looking horribly guilty. She best get them all sorted out before this turned into a teenage angstfest.

“St. James, why don’t you take Ginny-“

Before she could even finish her sentence the Weasley twins appeared on the field with a stretcher and quickly shuffled her onto it, then carried her off the field.

“What a way to start the season, little sister,” Fred said cheerfully.

“Nothing to worry about, though. Harry got that bad, bad man,” George laughed.

Gerry, however, didn’t agree. “It’s Potter’s fault she was knocked off her broom in the first place!”

Harry grimaced, following the procession off the field towards the infirmary. Behind them, Grimms was pulling a dazed but otherwise unharmed Lockhart to his feet.

“It wasn’t his fault I couldn’t make the bloody turn,” Ginny snapped, at her boyfriend. “I knew better, but I tried it anyway, and then he got hurt trying to save me. How’s your arm, Harry?”

“Just a bit bruised.”

“What a minute!” Gerry protested, “I saw him. When he turned he knocked you into the post with his foot!”

Several eyes turned to him at once, wordlessly warning him about continuing that train of thought, and he kept his mouth shut until they reached the infirmary. Ginny’s prognosis was good, but she was in for an unpleasant night. Gerry glared daggers at Harry the entire time. Madam Pomfrey gave Harry a pain potion and some salve for his arm, and released him to the care of his friends while Gerry and the twins remained behind to keep Ginny company. Harry left a message with George that he would be back to visit when her boyfriend wasn’t hovering, but otherwise was completely silent.

“So what happened exactly?” Draco asked as they made their way towards the Great Hall. Harry ducked his head in embarrassment.

“I didn’t mean to knock her into the pole. She was hovering so close to me I sort of freaked and kicked the end of her broom to put some distance between us, but she ended up veering. Shit, I didn’t mean to get her hurt.”

“We know that,” Natalie said, “And so does Ginny. Quidditch is a rough game and accidents happen. It’s not your fault.”

“Well, technically,” Draco contradicted, “It’s illegal to kick or punch another player or their broom in Quidditch, so you’ve probably lost your spot on the team this year.”

“Shit... I suppose I deserve that after putting Gin in the infirmary.”

“Oh please, Lockhart’s the reason she’s stuck in the infirmary. Don’t beat yourself up over it. It’s kind of annoying.”

In typical Harry fashion, their Gryffindor friend brooded the rest of the afternoon over what happened. It didn’t help that news had already spread about Ginny’s fall, and the story had already mutated several times to include Harry intentionally shoving her into the pole and breaking her leg. Draco and Natalie had forced him to remain in the Great Hall playing cards with them and pretending nothing was wrong. Hiding would only serve to imply his guilt. So he stuck it out, trying not to flinch or glare at those who stared and whispered as they passed. Eventually, apathy settled over him and while he couldn't gain any enthusiasm over cards, he could ignore the extra attention.

That is until McGonagall stalked into the Great Hall looking for him.

He very nearly bolted, but quickly realized how stupid that would look. Instead, he just sat beside Natalie and tried to look contrite. The transfiguration professor spotted him quickly.

"Mr. Potter, if you would follow me please?" she said seriously, and escorted him from the Great Hall. Natalie squeezed his arm comfortingly, and watched him disappear.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

"I swear, Professor, it was accident!"

McGonagall looked back at Harry in confusion. "What are you talking about, Mr. Potter?"

"Ginny and the quidditch tryouts... isn't that why you're here?"

"Heaven's no. I talked with Ms. Weasley earlier. It was obviously an accident. As for what happened with Admiral Lockhart, however..."

Harry cringed. He had nearly forgotten about that. Hexing a teacher had seemed a small issue in light of hurting his friend, but now he realized how much trouble he really might be it.

"...we'll consider that an act of defending your friend just this once. There's no telling how much more harm he would have inflicted if you hadn't stopped him."

He released the breath had been holding. "Thank you, but if that's not why you're here than why did you...?"

McGonagall's dismissive attitude vanished, replaced by a hard expression. The change in demeanor caught Harry off guard, and he stepped back instinctively. It wasn't until he nearly ran into a familiar suit of armor that he realized they were heading towards Voldemort's office.

"He's back? The Dark Lord, I mean?"

"Yes. He arrived about half an hour ago and demanded the Headmistress' presence and then Professor Snape and yours. I am afraid I don't know what it's about, but it appears very serious. He was definitely agitated."

Harry nodded, and tried to think what could be bothering the Dark Lord. He hoped it wasn't something he had done personally, like the protection spell he'd done last week, but at the same time he was afraid of what anything more serious might mean. She escorted him the rest of the way, but left him at the entrance. She had not been invited and more than likely she didn't want to be there. He entered the office and found himself the last to arrive.

Voldemort stood at the window, his expression sour and his fists clenched. Snape was in his usual spot, leaning against the door and Lestrangle had taken residence on the sofa. Harry couldn't help but note that they had both positioned themselves as far away from the Dark Lord as possible. He made it a point to stand in the middle of the room.

"What's happened?"

Voldemort turned away from the window to glare at Harry, but the brat just glared right back at him and waited. Lestrangle made an involuntary hissing sound that could either have been anger or surprise.

“I have just received word of attacks in Germany. Attacks Minister Seibligg is blaming on werewolves and myself, which would be all well and good except I have no idea what he’s talking about.”

“Attacks? What sort of attacks?”

“Twenty two Ministry officials and their families slaughtered in the middle of the night during the full moon. All of the officials worked in the Berlin offices and all of them were killed within ten minutes of each other. The current death toll is thirty seven, but it’s likely higher. The Aurors are apparently having difficulty adding up all the body parts together.”

Harry felt suddenly dizzy, and quickly moved himself into the nearest chair, which happened to be in front of Voldemort’s desk.

“Merlin...”

“Yes,” Voldemort agreed solemnly. “It’s an obvious act of war, but not one that I authorized. Who ever did this is well organized and intelligent, but self-serving. Rebel werewolves are the most likely culprits, but they had to have had outside resources. They don’t have the freedom of movement necessary to organize this sort of thing, especially not now.”

“Aside from the violence,” Harry said, trying to shove aside any horrific images that tried to fight their way through his imagination, “Why do they think it was werewolves? Why do you? I doubt the Ministry has a short supply of enemies.”

Voldemort nodded his approval over the question, and explained.

“Over a quarter of the officials made up a part of the campaign to hunt down the supposed ‘Death Eater’ werewolves. In fact, aside from the Aurors who did the actual grunt work, all the primary organizers are dead.”

Harry fell silent, and closed his eyes. He would like say he didn’t believe it, that the werewolves were incapable of slaughtering entire families, but deep down he knew better and even understood. They had been pushed and pushed and finally cornered, and when they finally retaliated it was deadly.

“I needed you to be aware of the situation,” Voldemort continued. “There are still werewolves coming into France from Germany, and there will more than likely be several who were involved in the attacks coming through seeking refuge. The Germans are going to make a royal stink of it, and try to earn sympathy from their neighbors by painting Britain as the nasty bully who smacked them and ran away. There will be questions about whether we can justify the sheltering of potential terrorists, and I will need you to be prepared to face them.”

Harry nodded. He didn't have a choice. Some werewolves had done something awful, but a majority of them didn't deserve to be punished for it. He didn't honestly know if all the werewolves who had attacked the officials deserved it either. In a way, it had been self-defense in a war the Ministry had started.

“Good. Voices for All will be sending a representative this evening to discuss the stance you want to take on these attacks. Professor Snape will supervise. We will likely meet again in the next few days.”

He nodded again and stood, recognizing the dismissal. The weight of the world was bearing down on him, but he squared his shoulders and went to face it. When he was gone, Voldemort turned to his other two servants.

“Seibligg's previously tenuous political hold has now been reaffirmed, his stance against the werewolves and myself vindicated. The opportunity for attack during a moment of political unrest has already passed. Seibligg will use the national outrage to launch an offensive attack against us and further entrench himself in military and political power. I am in a rather unfortunate position. If I attack before him, Germany will gain the sympathy of its neighbors and even Queen Ophelia will have reason to question my motivations. If I wait for us to be attacked first I lose face and the confidence of my people, as well as face potential losses.”

“My Lord,” Lestrage said, “It would seem a wiser course to wait and be attacked. Yes, you may lose some public favor, but it will galvanize them in a fight against the Germans. You can easily regain public confidence during your retaliation and be justified in the eyes of Britians and Europeans alike.”

Voldemort nodded. He had been thinking the same thing as well. He turned to Snape who didn't look too pleased with the idea.

“Anything to add, Severus?”

The potions master hesitated, but nodded.

“If at all possible... I would use your military force to intercept any attack here or in France. It may not galvanize the public fervor like the burning of a fort, but we will still have enough justification to retaliate against Germany and likewise would demonstrate your military strength and foresight. Once the war is in full swing, there will be plenty of opportunities to demonize Seibligg and his army of Aurors.”

That was also a good idea, but dependent on his own admittedly limited spy network in Germany. It might be worth the effort though. It would be best if he didn't loose any of his new forts in France or one of the wards in Ireland that protected England and Scotland if it could be helped.

“I will take your words into account, but I did not summon you here simply to ask your advise. Like I said to Potter, I need you both to be prepared for what is to come.”

Snape and Lestrage shared an uncertain look, but quickly re-focused on their master.

“Hogwarts has always been a symbol of the glorious youth of Britain, and with Harry's growing fame in the national arena more attention than ever is being directed here. When the time comes I intend to use this school as springboard for a few of my more ambitious projects, primarily the use of public schools to help supply my army and supplement national security.”

Lestrangle frowned, "My Lord, we are your servants and will do whatever you ask, but I'm not exactly sure what it is you are actually asking of us."

"I'm asking you to do exactly what you did last semester. Your use of the students to create and install those gargoyles not only increased the security of the school, but saved several hundred galleons in the school budget. I would like you to set up similar programs that will benefit the army. The creation of medicinal potions for the military hospitals and charming uniforms to remain clean for example. Simple things that will save taxpayers billions in the long run and create an air of patriotism amongst the students. Establishing such programs here will inspire other schools to do the same."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Benjamin and Bailey is a wizarding play, the plot premise being two wizards after the same witch. Benjamin is a wicked trickster, but appears good and kind because of his friendly and complimentary manner, and Bailey is good and honest, but comes off as cruel because of his sharp words and uncompromising disposition. They are both interested in the local judge's daughter, Agatha, and each pursues her in their own way. It's a story about character vs appearances, and it's something of a dark comedy.

A quick reminder. Raecellos is Bobby's patron god. It's why Bobby explores so much and knows all these secret routes, so that he can lead travelers to safely or help them find a place or take a short cut. Raecellos is a god in Madris' court, but sometimes it's safer to ask for one favor per god than two favors of one god. Also, three is a sacred number, and Harry's repeated use of threes adds power to the spell. Raecellos is not one of Harry's patron gods, merely a god he is making use of at the moment. This may or may not change in the future.

A herd of unicorns is apparently called a blessing. I honestly didn't know this until last week.

Also, Tom's attack on the house did not occur on the same night of Harry's ritual and Snape's date, but about a later. The clues are timing clues are subtle so I thought I'd clarify for those who missed them.

Also a reminder, Ginny's boyfriend is Gerald St. James, and she calls him Gerry.

Book V

Chapter 13: Bad Omens

“I’m really sorry, Ginny,” he said, for what had to have been the sixth time in the last hour. The little redhead glared at him from her hospital bed, white as a sheet and sweating from the discomfort of re-growing an entire bone. He sat next to her in a chair, ramrod straight and struggling to look at her.

“Will you shut up about it already? I assure you I’m quite bored with the subject right now,” she snapped. She had spent all day putting up with her boyfriend insistence that she tell McGonagall or the school paper that Harry intentionally hurt her, and her sympathy had gone the way of her patience. “Talk about something else. Where were you earlier? You said you would be by after Gerry left and that was hours ago. And stop looking guilty, I’m not accusing you of anything.”

“Voldemort’s in the castle.”

She waited for him to elaborate, but his silence dragged and told her clearly that something important had happened and was now bothering him. He looked tired and strained, worried in ways that reminded her of her mother when the season’s crop failed. Finally, he continued.

“There have been attacks in Germany, and the minister is blaming werewolves. He’s probably right this time.”

“Oh, Harry...”

“There’s more. I’ve been given the rather unenviable job of justifying Voldemort continued support of Proposal 4-66, even though it will lead to war. I spent nearly two hours with a Voices for All rep trying to figure out how.”

She blinked at him. That was... absurd. How could the Dark Lord make Harry take on that burden on top of everything else he did already? It was so unfair.

“I’m really scared, Ginny. It’s gotten ugly so fast, and it’s only going to get worse.”

“I’m sorry.”

He smiled weakly at her. “Will you shut up about it already? I assure you I’m quite bored of the subject right now. Let’s talk about something else. So how did you hook up with Gerry?”

Ginny rolled her eyes, but obliged him. They both needed a distraction, something lighter than the other person’s problems.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Snape sat in the Great Hall, looking for all the world like a man not enjoying his company or his dinner. Harry was in London again to be interviewed. The Dark Lord was accompanying him personally this time to make it clear that both he and Harry were in moral and practical agreement of their continued support of France and the werewolves, even as they condemned the Berlin attacks. Voldemort’s attendance on Harry meant Snape was allowed to stay behind and gauge the castle residents’ reaction to the news that had just barely been outlined to them in the morning post. Their feelings varied.

The staff was naturally suspicious of Voldemort’s possible involvement in the attacks, but for the most part seemed to agree there was no point in punishing all the werewolves or their French allies by retracting their support to placate an already hostile country. McGonagall was in a bitter mood that afternoon, and displaying definite resentment towards Snape after Harry had been dragged off to deal with the Dark Lord’s political mess. Lockhart, being a living propaganda pamphlet, was the only one who believed whole heartedly in Voldemort’s innocence, and said as much to anyone who would listen (or pretend to listen). Toure didn’t think Voldemort was innocent, but his move was brilliant nonetheless.

The students, however, were a mixed bag. Those who had been against Proposal 4-66 were now shouting they had been right, waving their newspapers at their opposition like it was a bloody flag. Whitmore and Sabbat were the most vocal and obnoxious, and they were meeting very little resistance so far. Most of the students didn't know what to think. The news they had received was woefully incomplete and painted a frightening picture, and with Harry away and their teachers offering no guidance they were scrambling for reassurances. It was obvious what Harry's stance would be, but he had suffered a very recent fall from grace because of the quidditch debacle, exacerbated by Gerald St. James and other 'Harry-haters' and Ginny Weasley's inability to clarify while she continued to rest in the infirmary. The Weasley brothers' continued support softened the recrimination, but also left people more confused than ever.

Snape hoped things would improve the next day with Voldemort's solid stance and Harry's own idealistic moral compass made available in the morning post, helping to re-orient a deeply confused and frightened public. Ginny Weasley would be out of the infirmary and Harry would be back, allowing for students to witness their reconciliation and hopefully silence the rumors that propagated in his absence. From there it would be up to Harry to win over the student body, and Snape didn't envy him in the least.

Hermione could have been a great asset with her pull in the school paper, but her Gryffindor ideals crippled her from taking full advantage of it. Draco had great sway in Slytherin from first years to seventh, but he understood well enough that too much support of Harry from his own house would weaken his friend's relations with the other three, and had wisely kept his followers neutral in public. Gryffindor had no strong single leader, leaving it divided and shifting in its opinions and Ravenclaw was the same way. Diggory had been supportive of Harry, but his former classmates had all graduated and left and he was now too old to participate in either quidditch or Dueling Club (except as a supervisor which Snape was more grateful for than he would ever admit) where he could demonstrate his leadership skills, leaving him in an awkward position of a has-been.

Snape's assessment of the Hogwart's political climate (which he often found mirrored that of Britain as a whole), was interrupted by a butterfly. It was black and yellow, and nearly the size of his hand. How exactly it had gotten inside, as all the windows and doors were closed against the cool autumn night, was a mystery but its source was not. It landed on the edge of cup and promptly transformed into a letter, yellow with thick black script. McGonagall, who had observed it, couldn't help but offer her professional assessment.

“Very elegant, but she needs to follow through with the spell. The final product is hardly subtle.”

“How do you know it was a ‘her’?” he asked.

“A man would never use a butterfly... not unless he didn't care about you questioning his masculinity.”

Snape spared her a smirk, and turned to the letter.

Dear Professor

I apologize for my behavior last week. It was unspeakably rude and melodramatic, but I'm afraid you caught me off guard and I panicked. I am sorry. If you can forgive a lady a moment of silliness, I would like to see you again.

Sincerely,

Ira Beadle

Well, look at that. Snape smiled, inexplicably pleased. It seemed Ira had come to her senses and even sacrificed a bit of pride to apologize. This was the first good news he'd had all week. Except now he had to figure out where to take her next. Nothing immediately came to mind. He hadn't been on a date since... well, Larousse, but that didn't count since she usually picked the place.

“Why, Severus, I didn't know you had it in you!”

Snape mentally winced as Lockhart's congeniality stabbed his brain. Cautiously, he turned to see the man beaming down at him over his shoulder.

"Lockhart," he acknowledged coolly.

"Oh, no dear sir, call me Gilderoy. I couldn't help but notice you seem to have the affections of a lady friend."

Snape couldn't remember the last time he had blushed, but he'd be damned if he did so because this idiot had no sense of tact. He didn't have to struggle with it long, as Lockhart sat himself next to him, and his mortification was soon replaced by annoyance.

"Congratulations!" the blond man said, "Love is a many splendored thing. Is she lovely? Of course, she is. What am I saying? You're a man of taste. I heard about Vesper, poor dear. Magnificent woman though. Anyway, I just thought I'd offer up some advice. I have quite a bit of experience charming the ladies, if you get my meaning, and I thought you might like a few pointers. For instance, you hair..."

Snape tried several times over the next hour to interrupt or walk away, but every time he tried the man interrupted his interruption and when he got up to leave, Lockhart blindly started following him without taking the hint. If he didn't possess a strong self confidence, he would be suffering a supreme sense of self doubt after the man's less than flattering list of recommended improvements ranging from his hair, his teeth, and his potion-stained fingers to his choice of residence in the dungeon and preference for plain black clothes. Luckily, he did possess self confidence, but unfortunately for Lockhart, he also possessed a Slytehrin's enjoyment of revenge and once he had finally escaped to his rooms he went to his private library and pulled out his favorite book of poisons.

oo
oo

Fleur polished her shoes by hand, and tried her best not to smudge her fingers. A musketeer's uniform was a symbol of their pride, and she had been taught the importance of its upkeep from day one. Master Bodine, her teacher and mentor, was busy polishing his sword, also by hand.

This was one aspect of her service that she had not anticipated. A musketeer abstained from using their magic whenever possible, building up their reserves until it became necessary. It startled her how used to using spells she was, and how complacent she had been about it. She had never had to polish her own shoes or iron or wash or mend her clothes, having servants and then magic take care of those menial tasks, and if it weren't for potions she wouldn't even know how to boil water to make spaghetti. During school, she could have used a dozen spells before breakfast and another fifty before the day was through, and she hadn't realized how much magic she had been wasting in the process. Bodine had been quick to teach her by refusing to let her touch her wand for nearly a week. It had been an exceptionally humiliating week, learning how to do tasks a muggle child would probably have been able to do.

After a few months, however, she was proud of her progress and even proud of something other than her magic for once. She could sew a mean cross-stitch. Right now, however, she was not thinking of magic or cross-stitching.

"What is it, princess?" Bodine asked, tacking on the moniker she still loathed even now. "You have been very quiet. You didn't even complain when I burnt the toast this morning."

"Of course, I didn't. I fed it to Chopin* when you weren't looking."

"Now you're just being facetious. What's troubling you? Are you getting split ends?"

She glared at him. A musketeer's uniform was his pride, but the man seemed bound and determined to break her of any lingering vanity through mockery. She didn't appreciate his efforts in the slightest.

"I'm just thinking about the attacks in Berlin and what it means for us."

“A whole lot of fun.”

“Now who’s being facetious?”

“I assure you I am perfectly serious. These are the sort of times musketeers dream of. Battles and intrigue and spying and clandestine affairs. It’s going to be glorious. We just have to be a little bit patient.”

“That’s awful!”

“That’s opportunity. You are a very lucky girl to come into the ranks when and how you have. You are friends with that young man, Harry, who’s turning into a regular prince charming and is growing in power with every passing day, you already have a reputation from the Triwizard Tournament, and now a war is coming where you will be able to prove yourself to Queen and country. Play your cards right and you’ll rise through the ranks in no time. Besides, it really is a lot of fun this whole war business. There’ll be a few scares, mind you, but over all it’s really exciting.”

She shook her head, but it was a token gesture. If she were honest with herself, she was looking forward to the fighting. She wanted a little payback against the German Ministry that had hurt Harry and all those innocent people. She did not know any werewolves herself, but being part-veela she had a personal interest in the treatment of those not entirely human. Madam Maxime had taught her the importance of standing up for others as well as ones’ self.

“You’re just worried about being too busy to see that boyfriend of yours,” Bodine laughed. “Don’t worry about it. When things get interesting you’ll be traveling a lot. Make a boyfriend in every town you stop at and you’ll never be lonely!” he guffawed.

oo
oo

“Espiritus dolor!”

Harry ducked the spell, and flung out a Cooling Hex, but it was blocked and reflected back at him. He performed a blasting spell that propelled through it and into Ron's shield charm, but didn't penetrate. This was perhaps their most intense duel since his second year, and looking back he could see how much further he and the other boy had come. Angelina could hold her own against them more often than not, but even she wouldn't dare challenge them in their current mood.

Harry was frustrated, angry, and stressed with the way things had been going lately. London had been a nightmare, with rooms crowded with reporters and streets crowded with people, all screaming for answers or screaming accusations and there was nowhere to just stop and breathe and think. Coming back to Hogwarts hadn't improved things. He had known people would question him about Ginny and the quidditch tryouts, but too many people had assumed him guilty and his admittedly short temper hadn't done anything to placate them, and he refused to speak another word about the werewolf attacks in Berlin. Ginny's casual presence may have relieved much of the suspicion, but none of the questions and still some refused to believe it to be an accident. Someone had put a hex on his tooth brush, and he very nearly swallowed three of his own teeth. He had resolved to truly hurt the person responsible.

Ron, who had appeared to be recovering from his severe case of assholitis, had suffered a relapse after learning Ginny had been hospitalized and getting in a particularly vicious row with Hermione about publishing an article on it and then about the other articles he had promised and not delivered over the last week.

They were both out for blood today and neither of them felt like obliging the other. Snape was standing off to the side, watching them like a vulture just waiting for one of them to fall.

"Sanguis acus!" he snarled, sweeping out his arm.

"Clipeus!" Ron shouted, throwing up a shield charm. The charm blocked the worst of the curse, but a few barbs still managed to penetrate, catching the redhead in the cheek, neck, and chest. He shrieked in surprised pain, and hastily tore out the sewing needle sized pins. The other duelists gasped. Despite their sport, blood wasn't that common. Bruises and pain and weird spell affects, yes, but very rarely blood.

"The match goes to, Potter," Snape said quickly, before the other boy could think to retaliate with something truly nasty. "Well done, the both of you. Granger, take Mr. Wealsey to the infirmary to get patched up. Potter, help Mr. Diggory supervise for the rest of the practice."

Banished to their respective tasks, the two duelists spared each other one last glare and climbed down the platform. Natalie was waiting for Harry when he reached the bottom of the stairs. She didn't look happy, but he wasn't in the mood to be lectured and stalked passed her. Not liking to be ignored, she kicked him in the back of the knee and knocked him flat.

"What the hell was that for?" he snapped. She wasn't the least bit cowed.

"What is your issue?"

"I'm in a bad mood. Is that all right with you? Leave off." He stalked away, and this time she didn't go after him.

oo
oo

Hermione managed to keep her mouth shut for an entire five minutes after they left the Dueling Hall, but eventually Ron knew she'd just have to say something.

"Is it because of your father?"

"Shut up, Granger. It's none of your damn business."

"It wouldn't be if you didn't keep making it my business and everyone else's with the way you've been acting. You've got two options, Ron. You can either talk to me and get yourself sorted out or you can continue to make yourself and everyone else around you miserable. And I'll still keep bugging you about it."

"Merlin, you're annoying, Granger."

He remained stubbornly silent until they were just outside the infirmary, rubbing away at the blood beading up on his exposed neck and face, and then suddenly paused a few steps away from his destination. He thought for nearly a minute, and finally came to a decision.

"You tell anyone what I'm about to tell you, and I will find ways to make you suffer, do you understand?"

"I told you I wouldn't tell anyone, and I won't. No need to get nasty."

He glared at her, reminding her that nasty seemed to be natural state.

"My father is dying, some sort of wasting disease. I doubt he'll make it through the winter, but they won't let him go. Still has five years left on his sentence, so even if it kills him they won't let him go."

His eyes moistened as he spoke, but he fought back the tears even as he could see Hermione's growing wide and wet in sympathy. Silly girl, it wasn't her father who was dying. He took a deep shaky breath and continued.

"But it gets better. When I saw him this summer, he told me who had him sent to prison. We never knew you see. The court was all hush-hush about it, called it a division move, but it wasn't. Someone pushed for it. Someone wanted to make my father suffer and destroyed my family. And it's such a fucking mess. I know them. I've shaken their bloody hand once."

He had to stop talking, or he really would start sobbing, or throwing curses in anger and grief and frustration. Hermione stepped towards him, to offer him comfort no doubt, but he stepped away. He couldn't let her do that, or he really would turn into a big sobbing mess and he didn't think he could stand that sort of humiliation right now.

"Who?" she asked.

He shook his head. "Some rich government bureaucrat. What does it matter? They're out there making the world a more miserable place and my father's rotting on some rock, and I'm supposed to be okay with that? I'm just supposed to act like it doesn't bloody matter to me? Well, I'm sorry but I can't pretend everything's fine. I don't bleeding want to."

Hermione said nothing, taking a moment to respect the weight of the burden he had just unloaded onto her. Finally, she added her own bit of empathy.

"My parents don't know I exist," she said. "I was four when I was taken from them, and their memories of me destroyed. I can't really remember them either, but I know they existed. I know I was happy. And I know my foster parents will never give me what I had with them. Lucius hates me, and Narcissa treats me like a pet. I'm not okay with that and I never will be, but I have learned to move past it, to keep the resentment from strangling out the good things I've found. You need to do the same thing. It doesn't do your father or your family or yourself any good to hold onto this anger. It's going to rot you, Ron. It's going to rot you from the inside out, and it's such a waste. I think you could do incredible things."

She moved forward and this time he didn't back away, letting her wrap him in her arms and as he predicted he cracked, tears and blood falling into her hair and shoulder. Relief was overwhelming the humiliation, eased by the fact that she was crying too. He knew he could trust her now, implicitly, the way he could never have trusted Draco or even his siblings. She had come to him, seeking a way to heal him where others had simply ignored. He didn't know if she would succeed, but she was trying. It counted for something.

"Dammit, Granger," he cursed shakily into her hair, "if anyone catches us like this, we were snogging, got that?"

“I don’t know how you talked me into this,” Harry muttered, trying to keep from falling asleep in his soup. Hermione kicked him under the table, reminding him that they weren’t the only ones present at Slughorn’s dinner table. There were nine occupants total, several of them acquaintances of Harry. There was Blaise Zabini, Draco, and Natalie from Slytherin House, Hermione and himself from Gryffindor, and Andrea and Terry Borgen (cousins and competitors) from Ravenclaw, and Lawrence Hout who Harry had never heard of before today. Slughorn presided over them at the head of the table, the picture of amicable host.

“I can’t honestly say. I can’t remember much aside from people screaming things at me and lots of camera flash. The hotel was nice though. The West Dalton, have you heard of it?” he asked, taking pity on the man.

“And hopefully the Germans won’t blow it up,” Zambini said blandly.

“What was Paris like?” Andrea asked Harry, from across the table. Out of everyone, she seemed the most enthusiastic with the dinner table conversation.

“I didn’t actually see Paris. I stayed inside the Palais Royal the entire time. Now that was magnificent. You could fit three Hogwarts into that place. The queen was... impressive.”

“I heard she’s fat,” Terry said bluntly. Harry glared at him.

“She’s not fat.”

The boy quickly busied himself with his soup. Hermione kicked him in the leg again, then Draco who was snickering into his napkin. The conversation turned to travel, which was a safe and neutral subject with few pitfalls and even a few interesting insights. At last, the dinner drew to a close, and they said their goodnights for the evening. Harry lingered behind, however. There were some things he wanted to ask Slughorn, privately.

“Oh! Goodness gracious, I didn’t see you there, Harry,” Slughorn gasped, turning from the door he thought he had escorted everyone out of. He smiled apologetically.

“Sorry, Professor. I just wanted to ask you a few things, and now seemed as good a time as ever.”

“Of course, my door is always open. What can I do for you?”

Somehow the man managed to position them in the sitting room, where a coffee set was already waiting for them, complete with biscotti. Harry blinked at it and wondered if Slughorn hadn’t somehow anticipated this discussion in advance. He supposed it didn’t matter. He didn’t think the man meant to poison his coffee.

“I was hoping you could tell me a little more about my parents...”

“Certainly. I’m afraid I don’t know much about your father, I dare say he didn’t like me very much. Thought I was some sort of elitist.”

Harry mentally cringed. Snape had called him an elitist once, and he didn’t like the idea of his father disapproving of him. Then again, there was a lot in his life that he didn’t think his parents would approve of. It made him sad and angry to think about. Their disappointment would hurt, but they had abandoned him in death and didn't have the right to judge how he made his way through life any longer.

"Lily, however, was a good friend, like I said. She had a very kind and gentle spirit, but could be stubborn as a mule when a suitable challenge arose. She did well in potions, but her true strength was in charms and transfiguration. Potions is a rigid discipline, and she had more of an artists soul and she expressed it through the more intuitive arts."

Slughorn smiled, sadly. "If you don't mind my asking... was she happy? I often thought of her and wondered... I'm sorry, you probably don't remember. That was very insensitive-"

"No," he interrupted. "I remember her perfectly. WYRA... I figured out their tricks quickly enough to save most of my memories I think. I remember her as being happy. She could always find beauty in the everyday."

"Yes," Slughorn agreed, "That's just how I remember her too."

They fell into a silence, taking a moment to drink some of their coffee and think back on her. Too soon, Harry felt himself falling into depression.

"I don't think they would like the person I've become," he said, "I'm not... I'm nothing like the boy they were trying to raise. Hell, I work for the very man that drove them out of the country to begin with. I'm more his son than theirs now, and oh, Merlin that's a horrid thought..."

He buried his face in his hands, but jumped to his feet when Slughorn slammed down his coffee cup, shattering it. His amicable expression had disappeared, and without it the man looked far more imposing than Harry had thought possible.

"Now see here, young man, I have known your mother and I have known Voldemort, each in their youth and adulthood, and I know for a fact you are more Lily's child than the Dark Lord's. You may not grow up as your parents envisioned, but that doesn't make your achievements any less worthy. I think your efforts with the werewolves is truly magnificent, and your ability to inspire through your actions and words is breathtaking. You have so much potential, Harry. So much more than I think even your parents could have imagined. The Dark Lord sees it and he has taken advantage of it, but that's no reason to be ashamed in and of itself. He's taken advantage of everyone he could, myself included. That doesn't make me his slave and it doesn't make you his son."

Harry could only blink stupidly at him. "O-okay."

Slughorn settled back in his chair and, cautiously, so did Harry. The man fixed the coffee cup with a wave of his wand and removed the mess with another. That done, he seemed to calm himself.

"I apologize; I didn't mean to snap at you. You've broached several sensitive subjects all at once, and caught me off guard. It is not you I am angry at, but perhaps it is time to draw this evening to a close."

"Er... yes, Professor."

"Come then, Harry, I'll see you out."

He was walked to the door, but by the time he reached it, Harry remembered his original purpose in wanting to speak with Slughorn. He best ask his question now, as he didn't know if he was still in the man's good graces despite what he'd said.

"Um, sir... one question, please," he asked, quickly jamming the foot in the door. The potions master stared at it confusedly, then up at his increasingly rude guest.

"It's getting late, Harry."

"I know, just a quick one, I promise."

"Very well, what is it?"

“I said I remembered my mum, and for the most part I do, but there’s one little detail I’ve forgotten and it’s really been bothering me for some reason. I thought you might know... what was my mother’s favorite flower?”

Slughorn looked even more confused for a moment, but then his face lit up like a 100 watt bulb and he let out a laugh.

“I had almost forgotten about that myself! It was a rather funny joke actually. Her ‘favorite flower’ is called the scarlet pimpernel. A common little weed, unremarkable in every way, magical and mundane alike. The joke is that it’s not the flower itself that she loved so much. The Scarlet Pimpernel is actually the name of her favorite play, and the moniker of the protagonist, Sir Percy Blakeney. She had an enormous crush on the character. I remember Severus used to tease her about it constantly.”

Harry’s eyes widened. He remembered that play! Or rather, he remembered the book version. Bound in red leather with flowing golden script on the front, it had been a part of his small book shelf for as long as he could remember. He couldn’t recall all the details, but he remembered it was a love and adventure story set during the French Revolution, and that the main character behaved very silly in public but was secretly helping aristocrats escape the guillotine. It was the first novel his mother gave him, he was only seven, and they practiced his reading with it for months.

“I see the memory is not so lost, after all,” Slughorn said, patting him on the shoulder. “I’m glad I could help. Goodnight, Harry.”

“Goodnight, Professor.”

He moved his foot and allowed the man to close his door. No sooner then it was shut he sprinted to his room. He was fortunate to encounter no teachers or prefects, but even if he had he wouldn’t have stopped for all the house points put together. Climbing through the portrait, he spared an acknowledging wave to his friends in the common room, but didn’t linger. Once in his own room, nearly empty at eight in the evening, he opened his trunk and pulled out the mysterious box he had despaired of ever opening. He checked his bed for curses (a new and unfortunately necessary routine) and climbed inside, drawing the curtains and casting secrecy spells.

He licked his dry lips and swallowed thickly, then leaned forward to whisper, "Scarlet Pimpernel."

There was a small 'click', and Harry grinned like a Cheshire cat. The lid opened easily. Inside there was a strange shimmery cloth. He moved it around, expecting to find it protecting something harder and more fragile, but there was nothing else. Curiously, he drew out the cloth and draped it over his arm.

His arm promptly disappeared.

He dropped the cloth as if it burned and his arm reappeared, completely unharmed. He picked up the cloth again and started to experiment with, wrapping it around different parts of himself and finally over himself all together. Every time whatever was under the cloak disappeared from sight.

It was an invisibility cloak.

"Wicked."

oo
oo

Dunnan Hill was as primeval a village as you would ever find in any corner of the Old World. A little over five hundred men, women, and children inhabited the area and their population had neither grown nor shrunk noticeable in seven-hundred years. Most wizarding folk would call the place a 'boonie' town, but the people there took pride in their simple ways and the peace it afforded them. They grew most of their own food, spun their own wool, brewed their own potions, and knew every one of their neighbors by name, family, house, and profession. A quarter of the population lived in cottages scattered in the fields and pastures surrounding the village, but the rest lived closely together in rooms above their shops or family houses or inns. It was for safety's sake more than convenience. The land was thick with Otherfolk, and the massive black keystone around which their village had sprung protected them from their mischief, the closer the better.

"Don't like it," Brigham announced to his old friend, puffing on his pipe and wrapping his blanket tighter around his boney frame. As he had done almost everyday for the last hundred and seven years, he was enjoying his evening tobacco with his childhood friend, Norman, and discussing news about places that had nothing to do with them. "Ain't ever going to like it. Damn werewolves, too much like them fairies. You know the pointy-ears don't even bother them? Ain't human enough to bother with. Already got their demony taint, so there ain't not point in nabb'n 'em."

Norman, who was the village school teacher for nearly sixty years, took a more liberal view of the matter. "It isn't their fault they're like that. Just bad luck. If they want to live as normal a life as possible, I wouldn't begrudge them that. It's not as if anyone but the fairies are using the land up there anyway. It's a waste, and I'm glad for one that someone found a good use for it."

They fell silent for a bit, enjoying their pipes and surveying their home. From the center of the square, they looked up and down the two main streets and saw the entire village. Mid-October at eight in the evening and the sky was dark, but the windows were all bright and smell of baked goods and burning wood was still fragrant in the air. Along the streets, pumpkins had been piled in preparation for the upcoming Halloween festivities, paper skeletons and ghouls floated from the corners of houses where children had hung them a few days ago. There was some raucous laughter from the town's only tavern, but aside from that things were quiet and homey.

"Still don't like it," Brigham complained. "Ain't that far from here. What if one 'em decides to run off and just happens to wander a bit too close?"

"If it hasn't happened anywhere else in the last ten years, I doubt it's even an issue. Besides, it's not like they wouldn't know if someone tried to run off."

Brigham just snorted and took another puff from his pipe.

“Still don’t like it.”

A harsh, booming caw startled both men from their leisurely thoughts, causing Brigham to drop his pipe. A raven swooped down low over their heads, sending them both ducking. It cawed and swooped again, then flew off. They stared after it, stunned.

“What was that?”

Norman frowned, staring off into the night the bird had disappeared into. He felt uneasy. He took a closer look at the sky, found mars bright, and the faintest impression of a rainbow haloing the quarter moon.

“Bad omens,” he said, grimly. “I think we’d better go home, now.”

“Maybe you’re right.”

Brigham leaned down to pick up his fallen pipe. Another booming sound, but this time it was no crow. Something heavy and sharp smashed into the side of his head. When he opened his eyes again, he could see Norman staring down at him, one of his eyes burned shut and covered in blood. He couldn’t hear him, although he could see he was shouting at him, and then slowly he felt himself floating upward, above Norman and his own body, which now lay in a broken heap in Norman’s arms. Weightless, he hovered a few feet above the ground, and from there could see a nightmare play out before him.

The village was on fire.

There was screaming and people panicking in the streets and roar of flames, all a dull throbbing sound in his ears but no less horrific. Parents tossed their children through open windows, out of the flames and into waiting arms if they were lucky, while others tried to douse the magically induced fires with strongest spells they knew but doing little good, and those who had freed themselves from the flames were looking frantically for escape.

Brigham watched helplessly as the school he had attended in his youth collapsed into cinders, his cobbler shop and home burn like so much dry hay, and the church he had been married in burn the brightest and most tragically of all. More horrifying was the fate of his family, his neighbors, his friends, and daily acquaintances struggling for their lives and lives of their loved ones all around him. There were bodies in the street, hanging out the windows, dead or too injured to move.

He didn't understand. What was happening? Had he died? Was this hell?

Slowly, he felt himself being drawn upwards, the horror and carnage below him growing more distant and vague until at last it seemed nothing more than a warm glow against the black earth. A light enveloped him, swallowing his grief and horror and replacing it with peace. His last unpleasant fault was-

“Why the hell did that have to be my last memory?”

oo
oo

Harry bolted up in his bed, gasping in the wake of a nightmare that disappeared before he could grasp it. He sat there for a long moment, listening to the sleeping sounds of his dorm mates, and tried to remember. Nothing presented itself, and nothing in the room seemed sufficiently threatening to wake him. Elsbeth's lantern-like eyes turned towards him and she hooted softly. He smiled at her and settled back in his bed, preparing to fall asleep again when another eerie feeling came over him. He bolted upright again and grabbed his glasses and wand from the nightstand.

“Lumos,” he whispered, and the tip of his wand glowed dully, just enough to see by without waking up the other occupants of the room.

Bobby stood at the foot of his bed, his inky black feathers making him barely visible in the darkness of the room. Harry smiled at his friend, but it quickly died. There was something off.

“What is it? Are Sirius and Remus okay?” he whispered.

“They’re fine... others were not so lucky. It’s started.”

“What’s started?”

“The war.”

oo
oo

1. Chopin is Bodine’s dog. If you’re wondering what’s happening right now with Fleur and Bodine, she is living with him in his house. It’s like military assigned housing, small but close to work and next to other musketeers’ homes.

Book V:

Chapter 14: The Land to the West

Snape was awake when the knock came. He had just gotten done recording the results of his latest experiments on the Body Tree whose fruit had matured to that of two year old. The fruit had loosened from its fetal position and now hung limply from a thick vine protruding from the top of its spine. It was an eerie and disturbing experience to be in the same room with it. However, he could now see that the thing did not resemble Harry after all, though there were some cursory similarities. The ears were different, so was the hair, the shape of the mouth, and the eyes were dark when he had finally ventured to open an eyelid. It didn't look like McGunny either.

It left him with more questions, hence the additional experiments, but he didn't want to try to analyze his results until after he had some sleep. Which was why he was particularly annoyed when the knock came at half past one in the morning. He quickly tucked his papers in the secret room with the Body Tree and closed the door, sealing it with magic then went to deal with his unexpected guest. If someone had attempted Dark Arts on another first year, he was going feed someone to the giant squid.

Harry stood at the door, pale as death, his clothes wrinkled and untidy in his hurry to dress. Snape's annoyance melted as he stared into his wide green eyes, begging without words not to be turned away. With a sigh, he moved aside to allow the boy into his chambers. Once he had closed the door, the Gryffindor didn't waste any time.

"There's been an attack in Ireland. A village called Dunnan Hill. They... they set it on fire."

Snape was stunned, but even stunned his mind raced with what he was being told. Should he believe him? How did he know this? Who had done the attack? When? Was it going on now? Should he contact Lucius or Voldemort first? Why did that name sound familiar?

“Tell me what you know and how,” he commanded, even as he turned from Harry to search one of his many bookshelves.

“I... A messenger came to me tonight. Maybe half an hour ago? He said the war had started, that Dunnan Hill had been attacked. It was quick. They blew up a few things and set everything else on fire. They didn't seem interested in the people specifically, but there are dead. Oh Merlin, why would Germany attack them? They had absolutely nothing to do with do anything.”

“Yes,” Snape agreed, “However, anyone who had anything to do with anything is safely ensconced in the wards over Britain. Ireland was never afforded the same protection. It would have started a war with the Fairy Courts if we had even attempted it. Here we are... just as I thought.”

Snape pulled a thin book from his shelf and opened it.

“What is it?”

“A manual. Several years ago I was assigned to set up the keystones that support the wards over Britain. Ireland doesn't have wards over itself, but the Eastern side of the country does hold several keystones that support the wards over Britain. Dunnan Hill houses one such keystone. It was probably attacked in an attempt to take down the wards over Britain.”

The boy shuddered. Good. It was important that Harry understand the seriousness of the situation.

“I'm going to find Lucius. He probably knows what is happening already, but just in case...”

Snape hurried to the closet and pulled out his outer dueling robes. He didn't have time for the entire uniform, but a little extra protection might be in order. There was a very good chance that once he located Lucius, he would be enlisted to follow him out into the field.

“I want to come too.”

“I can’t imagine why, yet I’m not surprised. You will go to bed and tell no one what is happening until I return and tell you otherwise.”

“But-“

“This is not a fieldtrip, Potter. You look ready to keel over just hearing about it, do you really want to have to see it for yourself?”

Harry flinched and looked down. Snape suspected he was more than a little relieved at being told to stay behind. Gryffindor bravery demanded he act on the knowledge of the injustice he had been given, but he was still child enough to accept adult authority when it was handed down. Only when it was convenient, of course. There was Slytherin in his blood, after all.

Nevertheless, Harry followed him to the castle portcullis, hoping for answers that Snape didn’t have. A pointed gesture sent the boy back towards Gryffindor Tower (hopefully), and Snape continued on to the stables.

Speed was essential tonight.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

“What on earth happened to you?” Hermione blurted out, staring at the rumpled and sleep deprived friend. It was not quite six in the morning, and she wasn’t expecting anyone to be up aside from herself, and certainly not Harry. He near jumped out of his skin at the sound of her voice, and she felt supremely lucky that he had apparently left his wand on his chair along with his charms textbook and several pieces of parchment. How long had he been up? Had he slept at all last night?

“Hermione,” he said, but then couldn’t seem to come up with anything to say after that.

“What’s happened?”

“Nothing,” he lied, feebly. She glared at him, he looked away. She softened a bit.

“Come on, Harry, what is it?”

He looked like he wanted to tell her, but simply shook his head. She decided to let it go for now. If he couldn't tell her, there was no point in making him feel bad about it. Instead, she took him down to the Great Hall for breakfast, the house elves already used to accommodating her unusually early hours.

She did her best to distract him from whatever was disturbing him, giving him several cups of coffee and discussing classes and the details in each others lives they had missed out on with their increasingly differing schedules. It had been a long time since it had been just the two of them, even longer since they had just talked and even with his obvious distraction she was surprised how much she missed it.

“So are you and Ron together now?” Harry asked cautiously, after she had asked him why Natalie was irked at him recently.

“W-what? Of course not! What are you talking about?”

“You've just been spending a lot of time with him is all.”

A blush was flooding her face. “Don't be ridiculous, Harry. I haven't spent any more time with him than usual. You're just imagining things.”

Sensing he had struck a nerve, he grinned at her.

“Oh, really? Then what about-“

“Potter. Hermione.”

Both Gryffindors jumped and turned to the nearest door as Snape strode into the room. He too looked tired, and Hermione couldn't help but notice he was wearing his battle robes. He did not appear hurt luckily, but she thought this might be the reason Harry hadn't slept that night. Had he been worried about her godfather?

Snape came in but it didn't seem he was interested in actually talking to them. Instead, he stole Harry's coffee cup and refilled it with the carafe that had been sitting between them. He drank the whole thing in one swig and then poured himself another cupful.

"Professor," Harry started, "Is everything alright?"

The man snorted and took another sip of his coffee, more slowly this time.

"You know very well it is not, Potter. If you'll excuse me, I have to talk to the headmistress. There will be an announcement in your first period class. You both may seek me out after classes have concluded, but not before."

With that, he turned and left.

"What's happened, Harry?" This time it was a demand, her sympathy used up the moment her godfather proved to have been in some possible danger. Harry looked pained, but he did answer her.

"There's been an attack in Ireland last night. I don't know the details, but Snape went to find Lucius to find out."

Her eyes widen. "Oh, my." Then she frowned. "When did he tell you this? Why did he tell you in the first place?"

"Er... he didn't. I told him."

"Then who told you?"

"A little bird."

"Harry," she warned.

“Alright, a big bird. Seriously. Do you remember the raven from my protection spell? It was one of those. Birds are often messengers for gods, especially crows and ravens.”

Harry had no idea if this was true or not, but it seemed likely. He remembered ravens were the messengers of Odin, and auguries found special significance in them. In either event, he didn't want to betray Bobby by granting his presence significant in and of itself.

“Why would the gods bother telling you?”

Harry shrugged. “Professional courtesy?”

She rolled her eyes. She threw out another dozen questions or so, but it quickly became clear that Harry had no answers to the important ones and she quickly gave up. She did, however, make a list of questions in her journalism notebook to ask later. This was national news, but it wouldn't be the first time such stories had found their way into the school paper. Harry had been serving as a link between school and national politics for years.

They lingered in the Great Hall for several hours, waiting for their friends to make their way down to warn them of the upcoming announcement. Draco had been particularly interested, his position in Slytherin hierarchy bolstered by being the first to know and the most ready to react. He had another, more personal reason to be interested, as well.

“Father will be in the field,” he said softly. “He loves battles even more than politics. He used to talk to tell us stories about all the battles he fought. It's the only time I've ever seen him passionate about anything other than mother.”

Harry wasn't sure what to say to him about that. He did not particularly like Lucius, but then again he wasn't his father. If Draco felt anything like he did worrying about Snape, who he didn't like 75% of the time, he didn't envy the other boy in the slightest. The Malfoy heir didn't want their sympathy, however, and went off to think of ways to take advantage of his advanced knowledge.

Natalie hadn't had anything to say about it, but Harry could tell that it bothered her, perhaps more than she was willing to make known. She followed after Draco, and was soon followed by Ron who seemed to have sensed something was afoot. The Weasley twins took it in stride, but promised not to tell anyone. Ginny and Clyde were as upset as Harry, but also promised not to say anything. First period wasn't long to wait, and there was no point in panicking everyone else with Harry's lack of information.

Harry didn't have the opportunity to hear the first period announcement or the students reaction to it. Half an hour before the beginning of class, Lestrage came down to the Great Hall with a small squadron of Sentinels and pointed him out amidst the crowd.

"Mr. Potter," the leader of the group, a tall, middle aged man a scar running down the left side of his face, greeted. "Lord Voldemort has need of your presence. You are to accompany us at once."

Harry blinked, but nodded and got up to follow them. He kept expecting Snape to show up at any moment and follow him, but the potions master made no appearance, leaving his ward with more than a little separation anxiety.

"What do I call you, sir?" he asked, as they put him on a horse. The others rode broomsticks, but perhaps they were worried he would fly ahead of them?

"I'm Lieutenant Seitler. We will be your escorts to Edinburgh."

Harry nodded. He had very little experience with horses, aside from the one made dash to Hogwarts to stop Moody while he was still high on his magical connection to Voldemort. It made the ride awkward and even a little frightening, but he managed keep in his saddle. Luckily, he only had to ride to Hogsmeade, where a secure floo had been set up. It was a one way floo, and they merely had to step through it without saying a word and still end up where they needed to go.

In this case, the Court of Agriculture, Scottish Division. It was completely empty as they walked through the lobby, resplendent in bronzed trees with copper apples lining the walls and an enormous mural of Scotland beneath his feet, delineating the various farms and their crop type. This was not where they stayed, however. Seitler moved him through a back door, his Sentinels going ahead of them to make sure everything was safe, then surrounding him again as they moved the side alleys and back roads of the Court District until they finally reached Brass Cult headquarters.

Harry stared in wide-eyed fascination as they crossed the threshold of the Headquarters' gates, feeling the protection magic dance over his skin and saw a well organized chaos unfolding before him. Perfectly straight columns of Culties stood at attention as their commanders inspected them, while even higher ups started shouting their field assignments, and behind them all ensigns ran in and out of doorways carrying paperwork and equipment and horses, preparing to supply the hundreds of soldiers with every conceivable necessity and few extras just in case.

More than a few Culties turned to stare at him as he was herded towards the administration offices, but Harry wasn't given the time to linger. The moment the doors were closed, he was searched for any potentially harmful objects and relieved of his wand. He felt another wave of anxiety as Seitler pocketed the wand, and escorted him into Voldemort's newest office.

The Dark Lord looked up, pausing in his dictation to a young colonel. He pinned Harry with an assessing glare, then dismissed the subordinate.

"Tell me what you know."

"Dunnan Hill," Harry said immediately, knowing better than to try and play ignorant. He wasn't protecting anyone in doing so. "It was attacked last night. Snape suggested because of its keystone. The German Aurors burned the town, but it didn't stick around."

Voldemort stared at him, assessing his answers and testing their truth.

“How did you find out about it?”

“A raven told me. I think it was one of Raecellos’. I made an offering to him not long ago.”

Voldemort’s eyes narrowed.

“Does this raven have a name?”

Harry covered his nervousness with irritation. “I didn’t think to ask. I was more interested in the burning village.”

The Dark Lord conceded his point and gestured for him to sit. Harry sat, and waited to be told exactly why he had been dragged out here.

“Dunnam Hill wasn’t the only village attacked last night, only the first. We were unprepared for the first attack and too late to stop the second in Timir. After Timir, we managed to alert the other villages with keystones of possible attacks, and the villagers of Metlow managed to defend themselves long enough for Lucius’ men to arrive and drive them off. The German aurors in Down were completely destroyed before any real harm could be done. They gave up after that and retreated.”

Harry swallowed thickly. There had been more than one attack? One village was bad enough, but four?

“It’s only the beginning,” Voldemort said, “The Germans only managed to take out two keystones in Ireland, but that won’t stop them. We have other keystones along the English and Scottish coast that are much more vulnerable. The attack on the villages was only a piece of revenge, their true goal is to destroy the wards over Britain and I suspect they will accomplish it within a few days.”

Harry’s eyes widened. That meant all of Britain, as well as Ireland, would be vulnerable to attack. What happened last night could repeat itself a hundred times if they didn’t do something. Voldemort smiled grimly at him.

“I know what you’re thinking and let me assure you I will not allow it to come to pass. We are not so weak as to allow foreign invaders to rampage across our lands. The wards were not intended to withstand a long term assault, merely to limit international terrorism and provide some forewarning to more serious attacks. They have done their job and now my military will do theirs. Soon enough the Germans will be too busy trying to protect themselves to worry about harassing our citizens.”

Harry wasn’t entirely convinced. Hell, he wasn’t convinced at all. Voldemort would take his revenge against Germany, he had no doubt, but he didn’t think that would make them any safer. In fact, it would probably make things worse.

“What is it you want me to do now?” he asked, feeling an overwhelming sense of fatigue that had nothing to do with his sleepless night.

“Nothing.”

Harry gave a suspicious look. Voldemort smirked back, knowing his doubt was well warranted. “I just want you to be aware of the situation. You are a leader of sorts, among your peers. It is important that you have a more thorough understanding of events than them so that you can make informed decisions. It is also important that you understand the reasons behind the extra security I will be placing around you and the castle, and resign yourself to certain limitations for the time being.”

The boy frowned, assessing this newest tidbit. “Limitations?”

“You have met Lieutenant Seitler already. He is head of the security team in charge of guarding Hogsmeade and Hogwarts, and I have left him special instructions regarding you.”

“What? Why?”

Voldemort moved around from the desk and towards him, Harry instinctively backed up further into his chair. Their last few meetings had been friendly enough, if business-like, but he hadn't forgotten his betrayal he knew the other man hadn't either. He didn't know how much tolerance Voldemort still had with for his defiance.

The Dark Lord's cool hand touched his cheek, and Harry took a sharp intake of breath at the familiar magic that pulsated against his skin, hot and electric and almost oily. The older man stroked cheek and ran through his hair in some semblance of affection, and Harry felt himself practically melt into his chair. It was magic, but Harry couldn't figure out what kind. It was vaguely reminiscent of the first Solstice Ritual that had so irrevocably bound them together, and yet it was different. Harry blinked.

It was Voldemort's soul, now complete and stronger than ever, reaching out to touch his own but not quite able to connect without the assistance of a divine sort. He stared up at the other man, confused and humbled at once. He couldn't think of anything he had done to deserve this sort of reconnection.

Voldemort's eyes were not soft, they were as hard and intent and possessive as always, but they were mixed with a previously absent anxiety. Finally, he answered Harry's question.

"I don't think you realize what a target you've made yourself. Your rather impressive escape from the auror's and then Germany itself would have been enough to put you on Seibligg's bad side, but your public support of proposal 4-66 means your not only a traitor to Germany but also an ally to werewolves, their chosen enemy. We needn't even mentioned your continued association with myself, and your high public appeal. As far as Germany is concerned you are their most important civilian target. Your age and my possible manipulation of you won't be enough to protect you if Seibligg decides it's not, and I believe he has sufficient reason to hate you. You very nearly ended his career after all."

The hand withdrew and Harry felt its absence as a sudden coldness against face. He blinked and shook his head to clear it, refocusing on Voldemort as he made his way back around his desk.

“Our people need you to be safe, Harry. You are a symbol, and they will turn to you for strength during the war and in its aftermath. You will obey Severus and Seitler’s orders as you would my own. If you fail to do this, it is me who will hand out your punishment. Have I made myself clear?”

“Chrystal, my Lord,” he said, admitting defeat. He did not like the sound of these ‘limitations’, but at the same time he couldn’t argue with the man’s logic. He was in danger (when wasn’t he?), and if he chose to ignore that he might put his friends in danger. He would make an attempt towards obedience.

Within reason, of course.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Harry was only gone from the castle for about two hours, but by the time he returned he may as well have been gone two months. The halls were filled with loud voices, angry remarks and frightened suggestion and mixed in amongst them the occasional sob as some grieved the dead and their own uncertain futures. Several people came to him, hoping for additional information from where ever he had disappeared to. He gave them all that he had, but he was no soothsayer and could offer them nothing about the future.

He spent the rest of the day unable to pay attention in class, and easily got away with it because the rest of the student body was just as bad. Voldemort had given Harry his initial report on the four attacks, which were lacking in a lot of information, but gave the gist of the situation. Dunnan Hill was utterly destroyed, the entire town burned to cinders. Fifteen hundred people lived within the town itself were now homeless, and an estimated two hundred dead and even more wounded. Timir had faired better, but only just. The town was split by a small river, and only one side had been attacked, but it took out the hospital and the three schools, and at least seventy dead. Metlow had faired well considering, losing only a dozen or so businesses in the town proper and a dozen or so killed by the initial attack. Five brass culties had been killed upon arrival, but the some twenty dead aurors had made them the victors in that particular skirmish. Lucius had been ready and waiting in Down when the final attack came. The general had led a counter attack the wiped the German forces out completely, suffering only a few injured soldiers, some superficial damage to the town, and no loss of civilian life. Harry felt a grim satisfaction in that, but it did little to smother the depression he felt for the innocent victims who had lost so much.

Less disturbing, but more personally annoying was Seitler's list of 'limitations'. He was officially off the Quidditch Team, the vulnerability of flying in a dangerous sport surrounded by hundreds, possibly thousands of observers was too great a risk. Likewise, Hogsmeade weekends were canceled, but that was true for the entire school. He mail was being monitored even more rigidly than before. The biggest and most annoying limitation, however, was that the was not permitted outside of the castle at all without an escort and that even inside the castle he had to abide by a strict curfew. It didn't help that he suspected Seitler's crew would be keeping an exceptionally close eye on him. Additional security precautions would arise as the situation dictated, but Harry didn't think it could get much worse short of chaining him to his bed.

He had a feeling his new invisibility cloak might come in handy this year.

A sheet of bright yellow paper inserted itself between his head and the book he had been staring blankly at for the last ten minutes. He snapped awake, looking up to see Natalie smirking down at him. He opened his mouth to say something, but she made a shushing gesture with her finger, reminding him that they were in a library, then pointed down at the flyer.

Dunnan Hill Victim Relief Drive

He blinked and read it over. It was simple enough. It was looking for volunteers to help make potions and transfigure supplies for the villagers in Dunnan Hill and Timir. As an added bonus Slughorn and McGonagall had agreed to let students skip class in order to help.

He looked up at Natalie and smiled, nodding. She smiled back and wrote his name on the tablet she was carrying then moved off to someone else. He looked over the flyer again. Perhaps this was what he needed, something productive that helped to address the problems that had left him so depressed. If he talked to Hermione, maybe there was a way that he could get additional help to Ireland. He was supposedly a big celebrity. It couldn't hurt to have a cause outside of helping werewolves.

oo
oo

Tom couldn't help but chuckle as he read the paper, revealing Germany's first act of retaliation against Britain for attacks it had not committed. It was official. The war had started, and couldn't wait to see how his elder counter part reacted. He looked up from his paper to Katarina, dark and resplendent in the sunset orange taffeta and topaz jewelry. She glowed like a flame, smiling at him with a warmth that defied the chill of her body.

For a while he had feared he would be unable to win her over, but the attacks on the German pigs had done wonders in his attempts to seduce her. Giving something they wanted, something they forgot they even wanted, was a tried and true method of persuasion he would not soon forget. She admitted it had been centuries since she had hunted humans, and then they had been weak muggles. Now she and her kindred had tasted fresh blood, they felt the thrill of the hunt and longed to do it again. They had been hiding and compromising with the wizarding community for so long, to finally cast off the weight of their conditional bondage was liberating and empowering. He promised her the opportunity to do it again. War had all sorts of opportunity.

"Everything is going according to plan," he told her, folding his paper and setting it aside.

Reclining in her chaise, she looked for all the world like a well contented cat. But like any cat, she had her pride and would never allow herself to be too agreeable.

“Yes, I’m quite impressed with how far you’ve managed to get us. Your grandfather must be very proud. But I can’t help but think things will only get harder from here on out. They’re going to figure out it was eventually, especially if we continue to make a habit out of this.”

“It doesn’t matter. We have no official connection to Voldemort, making Germany’s little temper tantrum in Ireland an unprovoked act of terrorism. They’ve gone too far to save themselves.”

“Are you so certain your master will be the victor? Germany seems to be ahead of Britain so far.”

Tom snorted.

“A bunch of aurors against village of sleepy peasants? Hardly an accurate judge of strength. Voldemort has his Sentinels as well as a formal army at his beck and call, an already organized army that will only swell when the public perceives the threat to their homeland. Germany only has the aurors, a highly exclusive group that takes years to properly train, and no formal army readily established. They will be overwhelmed and destroyed, and lucky you, you get to help.”

She couldn’t help but smile at that. “I admit, I am enjoying myself. It’s been a long time since me or my children have hunted like this. We’ve made so many compromises over the centuries, I hadn’t realized how much we had surrendered until it had been given back to us. It really is a shame, what we’ve been reduced to.”

Sensing her accommodating mood, he stood from his chair and approached her, dropping to his knee he held her hand, and kissed her signet ring. “My lady, you may have been resigned, but you have never been reduced.”

He looked up at her again, judging her reaction. She looked intrigued, so he gently turned her hand and kissed her wrist. There was a definitely stillness, of surprise perhaps? But she didn’t pull away, so he kissed her again on the inside of her arm, then slowly trailed kisses up her arm to her elbow then her shoulder. He did not hurry. He had seduced a few vampires in his lifetime and knew they didn’t share a mortal's sense of urgency when it came to sex. To a vampire, foreplay was more important than climax.

As he traveled ever higher, he gently nipped her collar bone and felt her release a shuddery breath. She liked that, which meant she was going to love this. He rose up, throwing his leg over her, but not forcing his weight on her (if she sensed a power play he had no doubt she could send him flying across the room), and leaned over her to bury his face into her hair. She let out a gasp and arched underneath him. He inhaled deeply, taking in her scent. Coconut, lilies, and blood. A delightfully novel scent.

Stop it, Tom! Get off her!

He mentally snarled at Horace's protests, which radiated as a feral growl into Katarina's ear, and she answered with seductive purr.

This is my body! Go practice your perversions in your own damn body!

Tom decided to just ignore the other boy, but he wasn't so easily defeated. A sudden, pounding headache bloomed just behind his eyes. He flinched and drew back. That sneaky little bastard! When did he learn that trick?

Ho, ho, ho... you thought you were the only one who could do it? This is my body in case you've forgotten. I will be taking it back eventually.

To emphasize his point, Horace let another wave of pain radiate through his skull, causing him to grimace.

"What is it, Horace?" Katarina asked, looking confused and perhaps even a little worried. He managed a weak smile at her.

"Voldemort," he lied, "Just sending his regards. Says we did marvelous work and all. Hip hip hooray."

She blinked and then smiled. "So that's how you do communicate. Telepathically. I take it it's not natural otherwise it wouldn't hurt you. Poor dear."

He grimaced, this time from her endearment rather than his own pain which was now settling back. Horace hovered in the back of his mind, ready to raise another fit the moment he tried to continue where they had left off, and just this once Tom decided it was best to yield to defeat. He'd make Horace regret it later. Slowly, he climbed off Katarina, kissing her hand again in a gesture of regret.

"I'm sorry, my Lady, but I'm afraid we will have to continue at another time. I have to speak with him, and I'll be useless to you by the time we're done."

She signed in disappointed but let him go. "If you must. Another time, then."

He returned to his private bedroom, and glared at the mirror.

"Don't think you've won anything. I haven't even begun to play yet."

oo
oo

"How, precisely, did you manage to convince the Dark Lord to let you go from veritable fortress to the middle of a war zone?" Natalie queried Harry as he sat across from her on the train. Hogwarts Express was packed with people, but those few actually from Hogwarts had been given their very own set of compartments towards the front. Harry had settled in one of them with Natalie, Cedric, Ron, and Snape (when he could be bothered to check on them). There about twenty other volunteers from Hogwarts and some three hundred volunteers from across Britain crowded into the train, which had been re-routed from London to a mile outside Dunnan Hill. Harry wasn't exactly sure how they were going to get across the North Sea, but that wasn't for him to figure out.

"Good publicity," Harry said, "And a lot of security."

In truth, it was a lot less honest than that. He's shamelessly manipulated his way onto the train to Dunnan Hill, citing to the press, who had been given access to the castle to report on the schools massive effort to help their neighbors across the country, that he wanted nothing more than to go to Ireland himself and let them know that they had support of the entire nation behind them. Voldemort had written him a scolding letter (literally, he had to go the nurses office to treat his blistered fingertips) for putting him in the very awkward position of sending Harry off to help the victims of the attack (which he had been encouraging people to do ever since the attack occurred) and protecting Harry (which was a lot harder to do traveling into completely unprotected territory than it was in Hogwarts) from his trouble magnet self. He had, however, been impressed with Harry's initiative, and ultimately let him go with Snape, Seitler, several other Sentinels, and a press black out that would not reveal his or anyone else's presence in Dunnan Hill until after they left.

Ron let out an irritated snort, but didn't comment further. The youngest Weasley son hadn't so much volunteered to go to Ireland as been paroled there in order to get out of a rather nasty detention scrubbing out all the castle toilets after slipping puking pills into a Angelina's tea cup (he had been aiming for Fred's, but had miscalculated). Hermione had summarily charged him with writing an article about the experience as soon as he came back, after Narcissa refused to sign the parental release form that would have let her or Draco go. They too were targets, just like Harry, being the children of the high commander of Voldemort's army.

Somewhere on the train, Seitler was running his own security check, stepping on the toes of the security detail in charge of the train and the volunteers, and completely unrepentant. Harry wasn't sure what to make of the man, who didn't exactly hover but was always there in some form or another.

"You know I've never been to Ireland," Natalie said offhandedly. "This wasn't exactly how I pictured my first visit."

Ron glowered at her. "I doubt anyone pictured you doing anything so altruistic. You lose a bet or something?"

Harry bit his tongue to keep from laughing. He had been wondering the same thing for a while. Natalie had practically run the entire charity drive on her own, exercising her rather dubious popularity and exploiting Harry and Hermione shamelessly for promotions purposes, all for a cause she only seemed vaguely interested in. She sniffed at Ron.

“No, I did not lose a bet. As if I would bother with something so plebian. Lestrage enlisted me. She said she allow me to skip classes and give me a hand written letter of recommendation. Do you know what letter of recommendation from the Headmistress of Hogwarts, is worth? Forget the NEWTs, I’ve practically got a free pass straight to Oxford.”

Cedric managed a rather weak smile at that. “Lucky you.”

They talked for a bit longer, but inevitably the conversation faded away. Ron was not really their friend and Cedric was the odd man out while Natalie was unwilling to share her thoughts with Harry while in the other’s company. Harry didn’t mind the silence. As the train slipped into a tunnel, cloaking the passenger cars in darkness, his thoughts drifted to Dunnan Hill and Timir, to Germany, to Seibligg, Voldemort, Dumbledore, and Viktor, to Bobby and Raecellos, Sirius and Remus, and dozen other things that all seemed interconnected.

When they finally cleared the tunnel, nearly an hour later, Harry realized they were Ireland. He felt a shiver run up his spine. The magic here was different, impressing up on the very air a sense of liveliness and danger generally reserved for the primeval forests and mountains. Out the window, a patchwork of green and gold fields and blackish earth rolled out into the distance, stitched together by ancient stone walls older than Hogwarts. Further out he could see mountains and forest, little more than hazy grey shades in the distance.

A knock made all of them jump, and Seitler pulled open the door and stuck his head in.

“We arrive in fifteen minutes. Get ready.”

A sudden wave of anxiety passed through the cabin. Voldemort had assured the public that villages that had been attacked were now safe, each guarded by a squadron of well trained soldiers, but the fact of the matter was it was still a war zone and no one knew if the Germans make a second pass. Even without the threat of another attack looming over their heads, none of them had ever been to a decimated village and had no idea what to expect. Had the dead all be removed or where they likely to stumble across someone's mangled corpse? Were the citizens dealing with their loss or were some turning violent in their grief and frustration? How much could a bunch of school children do to help?

Their own vulnerability was reminded to them as they put on their leather breastplates and gauntlets. It was a small bit of protection, but one Snape had demanded before letting anyone board he train, along with absolute obedience while in Dunnan Hill. Harry's own presence in the village required a bit of extra camouflage, including a notice-me-not charm and some additional charms on his hair to make him blond and on his glasses to make his eyes blue.

The train began to slow and finally rolled to a screeching halt. From their windows, Harry and his companions could make out the burnt out skeleton of the village and even further away rows upon rows of gray tents, people coming and going along clearly marked, glowing green pathways.

“I wonder why everyone is sticking to the glowing parts,” Harry remarked.

“Maybe the Germans left booby traps, and those are the only parts they know are safe,” Cedric speculated.

Somehow, Harry didn't think that was the case. The train was gradually unloaded, Sentinels and Culties first, followed by the adult volunteers and their heavier equipment and then finally the Hogwarts students. Snape led the way, taking them to the very back of the train and then finally out into an open field. Once they were all outside, Snape lined them up in row so that he could take roll of all of them and make sure they were wearing their protective gear. While he was doing this, a Sentinel, young but stern with brilliant red hair approached him and said something no one could hear. Snape nodded at the man, who then turned to the students.

“I’m Sentinel Callahan, welcome to Dunnan Hill,” he greeted, his rich Irish accent strangely muted. “Firstly, the villagers are grateful to you for your assistance, which has been a comfort in a very difficult time. That being said, there are certain precautions you will need to take while here. The keystone, which used to support the wards that protect England and Scotland from trespassing wizards and witches, also support a second set of wards that protected the village from the native fairies. This keystone was destroyed, leaving the village and the surrounding homesteads vulnerable. Therefore, it is imperative that all of you remain together in groups of three or more and never stray from the designated walkways. As long as you can obey these simple rules, you are perfectly safe.”

With that being said, Callahan stepped aside to allow Snape to take over again. The potions master glared at the students in warning.

“If ignore Sentinel Callahan’s advice you better hope the fairies get to you before I do,” he warned, and then lead them to the nearest path towards the tent village. Despite the ominous threat and the less than pleasant circumstances of their visit, the atmosphere in the camp was surprisingly cheerful. Children played hide-in-seek between the rows of tents while adults grouped together to eat or work on some project or to talk, and the air smelled of campfire, roasting meats, and the sharp chemical scents of construction materials. It had been four days since the attack, the dead had been cremated, the injured had been healed or taken to hospitals, and people too busy rebuilding their lives to fall into despair. Their determination was further bolstered by the hundreds of volunteers who had not only brought helping hands, but supplies and expertise.

Most of the volunteers were specialists of some kind. Construction workers and engineers to help rebuild the buildings, craftsmen to replace furniture and finer details, seamstresses and tailors to refit the villagers with their lost wardrobes, cooks to feed a small army, healers to tend the sick and wounded, and many, many more. All of them busy.

Callahan showed them their weekend homes, two large tents, one for the girls and one for the boys, where they quickly stuffed their gear and were then split into four groups of five. Predictably, Harry and his group were stuck with Snape, who were assigned to handle the massive vats of memoracrete, a sort of potion that to the untrained eye appeared to be able to recreate a building out of nothing. It was hot, smelly work keeping the vats hot and pliable, but it was also important and Harry never once felt the urge to complain.

“Do you think they’ll trying again,” Harry asked, following behind Snape as the man examined the large vats, each large enough to boil and entire horse inside of it, for consistency. After looking at each one, the potions master signaled held up a some of his fingers, indicating the cups of sand Harry needed to add before moving to the next one. “The Germans, I mean.”

Snape didn’t look up from his work, but he did answer. “Unlikely. There is nothing here to attract their attention any longer, and they are too well prepared to make the effort worth the risk. The engineers are working to add protection charms into the foundations of the building. This village will not so easily be destroyed again, and its people will not be so oblivious to danger. This one is ready for pouring. Stay here. I will go get one of the engineers. That goes for the rest of you too.”

There were mutters of acknowledgement from across the street, where the rest of Harry’s group was tucked into the shade of a partially collapsed wall, measuring out ingredients for the next vat of memoracrete. The man left, leaving him to guard against the roving hordes of children running around their ruined town turned playground.

“I’ll be. I never fancied Voldemort letting his pet loose out here,” a deep, feminine voice said, and Harry spun around in alarm. There stood an elderly witch, heavy set, the sleeves of her emerald robe rolled up and large white apron designating her as a cook. Harry just stared at her, wondering what she was even doing this far from camp. She glowered at him, reminding him distinctly of Aunt Marge.

“Nothing to say?” she challenged.

“What would you have of me, ma’am?”

She continued to glower at him for a long moment, saying nothing, then she seemed to deflate and what ever semblance she had to the much detested Marge disappeared.

“Are you alright, ma’am?”

“No,” she snapped. “Here I am, a woman of my age, about ready to start a fight with a schoolboy. I’ve really sunk to a new low.”

“Er... well, technically you didn’t actually start a fight, so I think you’re alright, but is there a reason you’re angry with me?”

“You’re Harry Potter,” she stated plainly. He tensed. It seemed his disguise wasn’t as good as he had hoped.

“Well, yes, but doesn’t really explain why you’re mad at me.”

“No, I suppose it doesn’t,” she groused. “And I’m not mad at you. I’m mad at your boss.”

Harry tilted his head curiously. “Well, that makes a bit more sense. Snape should be back any minute though, and you can take it up with him personally.”

“Heaven’s sake, you’re thick as a brick. I was talking about Voldemort.”

For whatever reason, that made Harry smile a bit and her glower deepen even further. “Don’t look so smug. He’d have killed you just as quick as he did my grandson. If you’d been born a day sooner, you’d been sharing a grave somewhere.”

Dread settled in his stomach, a ball of ice freezing his insides. In her vague declaration, an ominous portent unfolded. What she mean by that? Who had Voldemort killed and why did the day of his birth determine his murder?

“Who-“

Before he could finish, a scream rang out, high and shrill and terrified. The witch spun around, her wand drawn and headed in the direction of the scream, but Harry was faster. He bolted past her and to the outskirts of the far edge of the village. It didn’ t take long to find the source of the screaming, which was now joined by the cries of several children.

Harry spotted three children, ranging in age from seven to ten calling for help and pointing out to the field. He followed their pointing fingers until he saw someone being dragged through the grass, their bright white and blue clothes flickering in and out of sight in the long grass. The other children remained behind the softly glowing green, not daring to go after their stolen friend.

Harry was not so cautious. Jumped the line without a second thought, quickly gaining on them. As he drew closer, he could see the victim was a girl, eight or nine years old, her bare arms streaked with mud and blood as she clawed frantically at the ground. Drawing closer still, he finally saw what had grabbed her, and very nearly bulked.

It was a giant salamander, and not the of the dragon variety. Slimy and lizard like, it’s enormous, shovel shaped head was clamped fiercely onto the girl’s ankle as it dragged her backwards to some as yet unseen lair. Harry didn’t dare send out a curse, at the speed they were going and poor angle of their bodies made the chances of him hitting the girl too likely. He needed to get closer-

A suddenly weight tackled him to the ground knocking the breath out of him, and for a second Harry thought he had been caught by a second giant salamander but soon enough he could feel all too human hands pulling him back to his feet. The ground he had gained was quickly lost, and the girl's screams were starting to grow fainter.

"No!" he screamed, trying to break free. "Stop, she needs help! Help her!"

"We can't! It's too late for her," Seitler shouted, dragging him back towards the ruined village even as the monster dragged the girl to her certain death.

"Let go, let go! I can still- Expecto Patronum!"

The force of the spell knocked them both to ground, the silvery ghost of a stag leaping from Harry's wand. He tried to break free from Seitler to follow it, but the Sentinel's hold on him hadn't slackened, and all he could do was watch as his patronus chased after the girl, disappearing over a hill. Seitler cursed and pulled him to his feet, pulling him back towards the safety of the temporary wards as quickly as he could. Harry didn't really fight him, but he refused to look away from where the girl and his patronus had disappeared, listening and watching for any sign of either.

By the time they were safely behind the wards, half the village had arrived, to discover what had happened. Several of the village men and a dozen Culties formed two hunting parties, wands and weapons drawn as they raced past them to hunt the beast down. Harry watched helplessly, knowing if his spell had failed they would not be quick enough to save her.

"What the hell were you thinking?" Seitler snarled. "Chasing after a fairy beast like that into a hill*. And then setting off a spell of that power! It'll attract every sprite and hag for miles."

Harry wasn't listening to him. He was listening for the girl's screaming, for the men's shouting, for some sign that she was alive or dead or just gone forever. At some point, Seitler's ranting was replaced with by Snape's.

“Not even five minutes and you’ve managed to put yourself into a potentially life-threatening situation, Potter. That must be a new record,” he drawled coolly, though Harry could hear the underlying anger.

“Harry?! Are you alright, what happened?” He vaguely recognized Natalie’s voice, felt her slender hands on his hand and his cheek, trying to draw his attention, but he couldn’t look away from the distant hill.

“She’s just a little girl,” Harry said softly, “She was so frightened.”

“You’re in shock, Potter,” Snape said, and a moment later he felt something poured into his mouth. He coughed, his gaze finally torn away from the hill when he was forced to close his eyes as a burning sensation caused his eyes to water. “Ugh.”

A sudden cheer rose up from the crowd at the edge of the village, and though Harry couldn’t see clearly what was going on his heart swelled at the sound.

“Is she?”

“She’s pretty banged up, but she’s okay,” Natalie told him. “Now sit down before you fall over, you damned fool.”

Slowly, he did just that, dropping to his knees and then to his backside, weak with relief. She was okay. His patronus had gotten to her in time. Weaving between the crowd that was now moving past him, his patronus reappeared, sniffed him curiously for a moment, then disappeared back into his wand. There were several gasps from the crowd, and only now did they realize the source of the spirit animal. It was too spectacular a sight to be distracted by a simple notice-me-not charm, and all too soon Harry was crowded around by villagers and volunteers, shaking his hand, thumping his back, thanking, and even hugging him.

It was all a blur to Harry, who had barely processed the fact that he had done something heroic. Nearby Seitler looked like a museum curator whose prized and extremely delicate manuscript was not being manhandled by an overly curious mob. Eventually, he could take no more of it, grabbed Harry, and made a run for it.

oo
oo

“Hasta sangius!”

Lucius smiled in grim satisfaction at the scream the signified his aim had been true, and watched as the cloaked figure plummeted two hundred feet to the rocky shoals below. All around him, his soldiers herded the few remaining aurors into every tighter configurations, like dolphins herding fish until they were ready to tear them apart. To the north, a storm rolled, thunder and lightening making for a dramatic backdrop for his second battle in a week.

As predicted, the Germans had decided against a second attack in Ireland in favor of keystones on the less protected islands and islets along the eastern and southern coasts off of England and Scotland. Lucius had dementors released in the north, stirring up storms and fog the broom bound aurors would not dare to breach, forcing them to chose targets in the south where he and his men were waiting for them.

It was so easy it was almost disappointing.

A streak of fire shot towards him, but dodged it nimbly before sending out a curse of his own at the quickly darting form of a young Auror who had managed to slip out of the Culties net. The Auror dodged, and broke off the attack in order to flee the squadron of soldiers that now targeted her. Lucius contemplated joining them, but ultimately decided to let his men have their sport. The battle was already won, as far as he was concerned.

A warm tingle spread over his left arm, the Dark Mark squirming along his skin. Lucius let himself enjoy it for a moment. It had been a long time since its use. Peace time had made the necessity of the Dark Mark wane as he had been bound to his office more often than not and easily reached, but its familiar burn was a welcome reminder of the more glorious days of his youth. He signaled to his second in command, who was at his side in an instant.

“I am being summoned by our Lord. Finish up here and report back to base. Allow the men some time to celebrate, but try to keep the whoring to a minimum. There are likely to be reporters about.”

“Yes, sir.”

He apparated to their base of operation, an abandoned lighthouse that allowed them a convenient and dry look out point, and a place to store the special floo that took him straight to headquarters in London. The soldiers all straightened and saluted, and he felt a his pride swell at the blind and complete obedience. The military was a truly marvelous thing, and he was fool for ever thinking otherwise.

Voldemort was observing the battle and its conclusion on an enormous map that covered the entire back wall of the general's office. The Dark Lord glanced over at his servant and offered him a rare, congratulatory smile.

“You've done very well for yourself, Lucius.”

“Thank you, my Lord.”

They shared a glass of brandy together, basking in their own supremacy as they watched the green dots swarming the red ones on the map, and sharing a toast as the last red dot disappeared altogether.

“I don't know why, but I thought this would be a lot harder,” Lucius lamented.

“I wouldn't worry yourself, my friend. It's only the beginning. When they start to become truly desperate, that's when things will start to get interesting. You remember what the last war was like.”

A bit of Lucius' amusement died. He did indeed remember. There was much to be said about that period in his life, and not all of it good.

Narcissa had nearly been killed while pregnant with Draco during a Ministry raid after the minister finally acknowledged the truth of Lucius' treachery, and Rudolphus, one of his best friends, was poisoned at a bar while celebrating a victory and Regulus Black had simply disappeared without a trace. He, himself, had nearly died several times, and not one of them particularly dignified.

Voldemort continued, pulling him out of his dark thoughts.

"Lucius, now that you've thoroughly trounced Seibligg's pathetic army, I want you to go back out and destroy the wards off Kent and Suffolk. It should be enough to take down the protection over the southern half of England."

Lucius blinked at him. "My Lord...I'm not sure I understand? You want me to intentionally weaken England's defenses?"

The Dark Lord nodded. "Yes. I have already gained sufficient revenge against the aurors that attacked Ireland. Now I need a justifiable excuse to attack Germany itself. Preventing them from attempting to invade our now vulnerable homeland is sufficient cause. We will simply tell the public that although we managed to defeat the German Aurors, we were not quite quick enough to save the wards."

"That's... dastardly clever of you," the Malfoy patriarch acknowledged, tipping an imaginary hat to him. He took a last sip of his drink and set it down. "I best do it now before the men return to headquarters. If you'll excuse me, my Lord."

Voldemort waved him off, turning his attention back to the map. In his mind, he could see countless future battles dancing across the paper in so many dots, green and red and eventually new colors as allies and enemies joined the fray. Many of them would happen over the next few years, others would not occur for decades even centuries. He had millennium to build his kingdom, and he intended for it last well beyond that. He lifted his glass to the map and all the imaginary and future battles therein.

"Cheers."

oo
oo

Ceara Colm would not fall asleep until she saw the boy who had rescued her and, more importantly, the silvery stag he summoned from his wand. It took a lot of searching by the villagers and a bit of arguing with the vulture-like teacher from Hogwarts and even more arguing with the dour Sentinel, but eventually the village elder managed to bring him to the Healer's tent.

He looked different from the last time she had seen him, his hair was dark now and his eyes a brilliant green. Ceara could not for the life of her believe that she had been rescued by a prince. No one had even realized he was in the village until after the attack.

"Are you really, Harold Potter?"

He smiled down at her, and even with the glasses he looked handsome and strong to her. Beside him, the stag he called his 'patronus' stood at ease, casting a pale glow against him.

"I really am, but my friends call me Harry."

"Harry..." she said, smiling until her mouth opened in an enormous wand.

"You should sleep. You've had a hard day."

She shook her head. "I'm afraid. I close my eyes an' I keep think'n I hear it coming for me... Mum's in the hospital, and Da's gone to look after her. Gran ain't strong enough to fight off the hill monsters no more."

"Would it help if I stayed, at least until you fall asleep?"

She thought for a moment. "Maybe... maybe if it stays," she said, pointed to the stag who sniffed her finger, causing her to giggle.

“Then we’ll both stay, but you have to try to sleep, okay?”

She nodded and closed her eyes. Sleep did not come easy to her, even with the comforting presence of a prince and his magic hart. Her ankle still hurt despite the healing draughts, and the healing salves they’d put over her cuts had dried and now itched against her already sensitive skin. But she tried and as tired as she was she very nearly succeeded, but the soft murmur of voices drew her back from the brink of dreams.

“It’s time to go,” came a rich, masculine voice.

“Just a few more minutes. I want to make sure she doesn’t wake up again.”

“No, we’re leaving now. There’s been another attack on the wards over Britain, this time off Suffolk.”

“Was anyone hurt?”

“No, but the situation is serious enough that the Seidler wants all the students back at Hogwarts. Your little romp this afternoon likely didn’t help matters.”

“I’m not sorry.”

“Which is exactly why you cannot be trusted to remain here,” the man all but snarled. There was a moment of silence.

“Fine, I’ll come. I’ll leave my Patronus behind. It should be enough if she wakes up. She’s more impressed with it, then me anyway.”

“You can’t maintain a spell of that level for an entire night over hundreds of miles. You’ll be dead by morning.”

“You’re such a cheerful fellow, Professor.”

There was the sound of movement and the rustle of the tent flap, then silence. Fearfully, she opened her eyes, expecting nothing but darkness. Instead, the patronus still stood in the middle of the room, his ghostly form standing guard over her. Tears welled up in her eyes and she sniffed them back, a smile steeling across her face. It had been an awful week. Everything she had ever known had gone up in smoke, and her family was now scattered and she was alone. She'd never felt so much hatred for anyone in her life, as she did for the Germans who had attacked her home.

But other people had come. Good people. People with medicine and tents and food and kind words. Strong people who had helped others feel strong, kind people who reminded her they were not alone. Brave people, like Harry, who proved the darkness didn't always win. She closed her eyes tight and hugged her pillow, summoning up dreams of her parents wrapping her in their arms and of a future where the monsters stayed in their hills and village was more than just burnt up sticks and mortar.

oo
oo

1. Hillsides are commonly the homes of fairies, particularly hollow hills or hills with unusual shape or characteristics.

Book V

Chapter 15: The Crusade

Harry had figured he was in for a canning when he got back to Hogwarts, and he was right. But, instead of the anticipated thirty (or was it forty now?) lashes, he had received only five.

“You have a knee-jerk reaction to save people,” Snape said, sitting him down at a table for this particular lecture. Harry cringed when the back of chair pressed his bruises, but considered himself lucky that it had been only five. “This can’t be beaten or lectured out of you, at least not after the deed is already done. You saved the girl, you won the day, and the punishment makes you the martyr, not the transgressor. So the next time someone cries out for a hero, you’ll run in again without thought. And it won’t take long for your enemies to realize this and use it to their advantage. I can almost guarantee the fae are now aware of your weakness, and once the press releases your latest stunt, the rest of the wizarding world will know as well.”

Harry swallowed thickly, and looked down. Snape was right. He didn’t regret going after the girl, not even knowing he’d exposed a vulnerability. But if it hadn’t been this, it would have been something else... his love for his godfathers, his sensitivity to storm summoning magic, his moon madness. There were so many points of attack, and Harry would have to wrap himself in a veritable bubble to protect himself on all fronts and it just wasn’t worth it.

“So what should I do? I don’t want to go through my life ignoring people in trouble. I’m not... I can’t be that cold. I don’t want to be.”

Snape regarded him blandly for a moment, but did consider his dilemma.

“If this is truly going to be a long standing issue...” the man conceded, “I will talk with Voldemort about teaching you to apparate early and with Seitler about getting you some defensive equipment. In the mean time, you are not to leave the castle at all for the next two weeks. You will also be assisting me in Junior Dueling Club for the next month, as I am short of volunteers.”

“But I thought-“

“You thought because I was so understanding, that I’d let you off with a couple of smacks and a pat on the head?” Snape smirked. “Do not mistake my understanding for tolerance, Potter. I understand why thieves steal and why arsonists burn; it doesn’t mean I condone their actions. Go. You have homework to complete.”

Harry left, too tired to put up a fight he knew he couldn’t win. He did not go back to his dorm though. By now Ron would have told Hermione what had happened in Ireland and the other volunteers who had been there would have spread the tale to the rest of the school, and the typical flurry of inquiry and rumor-mongering would begin yet again, swallowing up the just abating accusations of assault against Ginny and stealing away any possibility of getting something productive done. By tomorrow the national press would be printing their stories, and despite what Snape had said he figured he’d be back in London to give the official interview he had dodged in Dunnan Hill.

Or maybe not.

Snape had said the wards over England had been torn down. Scotland’s still held, but it would be easy enough to cross through from England, and who knew when Scotland’s wards would fall completely as well. Harry didn’t quite know what this meant for Britain, except that it made them more vulnerable to additional attacks. He wanted to ask Snape and at the same time he didn’t. If Voldemort was truly worried about Harry being a target, he may keep him cloistered within Hogwarts’ defenses, and if he did perhaps Harry could bury his head in the sand long enough to sort himself out.

He headed up to the astronomy tower, taking the back ways and secret passages where ever possible until he reached the open air of the observational mezzanine. No one would think to look for him here, and in the clear autumn day he could see for miles in every direction. This was as close to freedom as he was going to get for a long time.

“I heard about the girl.”

Harry didn't bother to turn around, a tired smile coming to his face. Bobby's voice was unmistakable in its cheekiness.

“You did good. Even the Seelie Court is impressed. No one likes Mud Dogs. Of course, now they want to meet you.”

“I just bet. Unfortunately, I won't be going anywhere for a while. Unless you're here to inform me of some other disaster?”

Bobby said nothing, and Harry turned to look at him. He was perched on the rail of the mezzanine, his ink black body silhouetted against the setting sun. He seemed oddly stiff.

“Are you alright?”

“I'm fine, it's just... I don't wish to bring you bad news, but I...”

“Has something else happened? Is this about the wards coming down?”

The raven shuffled from foot to foot, as if not entirely sure if he should fly or stand, his feathers ruffled as he tried to sort out some internal debate.

“No... I don't know. There's been... portents... omens.... Something is going to happen soon and it's going to be bad.”

“As bad as Dunnan Hill?”

“Worse... no one knows just how exactly... it may not have anything to do with wizards at all.”

Harry was close to laughing at his vagueness, but this was as serious as he'd ever seen Bobby and he didn't want insult the only connection he had to the world at large.

"If we don't know what will happen, we can't stop it," Harry said, "We can only deal with it when it comes."

Bobby tilted his head, and nodded. He didn't look any happier, but he did seem less anxious.

"I didn't come here to frighten you, but to warn you about the Seelie. They'll bother you through Samhain most likely, but rest during the winter, so just keep your head about you until then. Don't go following strangers or accepting gifts from people you don't know, and you'll probably be fine. Probably."

His last words held a touch of his old humor. The raven made a little hop and glided away with a cheerful 'wwweee!!!' Harry shook his head and watched as his friend disappeared into the Forbidden Forest.

Yet another things to worry about on top of everything else.

He wasn't prepared to face the other students or Snape or his school work (he was WAY behind) or Slughorn's latest dinner party or Hermione's lecture or Natalie's irritated scorn or the press or his godfather's next letter or Voldemort's latest scheme or another attack or...

He squeezed his eyes shut and tried to block out the mountain of concerns and stresses that were starting to crowd into his brain, shoving and kicking for space until he couldn't think anymore. His arms began to shake, and he felt himself weaken and slide to the floor. His breathing became rapid and erratic.

Not again, he begged himself. He hadn't had a panic attack since last year, and only that once. He thought it had been a freak occurrence. After all, nothing else had triggered it, not even the abductions or the attacks, but it was back and just as debilitating as he remembered.

This time there was no one there to talk him down, and tried to remember what McGunny had said, but all he could remember was to cup his hands over his nose and mouth to keep from hyperventilating.

When Harry came back to his senses, it was dark and cold. He was shivering, his damp skin having soaked through the protection of his school robes. It was not the cold, however, that woke him, but the familiar burn of his watch in his pocket. Quickly, he pulled it out with trembling hands to check the time.

Dinner had already started, and though the idea of food made his stomach roll, he knew his friends were likely worried about him by now. At the same time, he couldn't see them like this. He was a mess, and freaking out on them in the middle of the Great Hall wasn't going help his current situation. Moving slowly and secretively, he left the astronomy tower and headed for the infirmary. If he were lucky, he could filch some calming draught from Madam Pomfrey's cabinet (the Weasley twins had told him the technique for unlocking it without the medi-witch knowing) with her none the wiser, and if that weren't possible then complaining of sleeplessness wasn't going to get him locked in the infirmary. He might have to brew some of his own eventually, if he couldn't get his emotions under control. If he kept going back to her with the same request, she was going to figure out what was going on and probably tell McGonagall or Snape. The one thing he didn't need was people thinking he was going crazy.

Even if he might be.

oo
oo

"For a historian, he didn't seem to know much before the Romans arrived," Snape said, letting his irritation show through. "I could have just as easily looked up the information he offered. I was hoping for something a little more austere."

"I don't know," Ira said, walking close beside him to avoid bumping into the small herds of university students milling about the campus after sunset. Bars and cafes, clubs and boutiques, lined either side the street and the air was filled with the dull roar of a conversing crowd and the festive tune of a street band. The evening was cold, perhaps cold enough to snow even, but the people and the warm glow of the street lights made the atmosphere warm and intimate. Snape was glad he had thought to take her out to eat instead of taking her directly home. The lecture on Defensive Magic Through the Centuries had been interesting, but not particularly romantic and it was the walk and the dinner afterwards that he was counting on to make the evening worth while.

“In terms of practicality, I thought Professor Haubert’s lecture was very insightful. Pre-Roman materials are hard to study anyway. The Druids and Celts who practiced magic handed it down orally, and modern Druids are notoriously secretive to outsiders. Anyone wanting to practice their particular type of magic would probably have to be Druids themselves.”

“True enough. I have seen the textbooks for Celtic Studies at Hogwarts, and they are supremely vague in regards to magic, but highly explicit in regards to their culture and religious deities. I suspect much of the magic is taught informally. Potter seemed to have a strong grasp of it despite having only formally studied it for half a year. Perhaps that is Lord Voldemort’s influence though.”

Ira looked at him curiously. “Harry practices Druidism?”

The potions master made an odd expression, and she had to cover her mouth to keep from laughing. “I honestly don’t know. I don’t think he follows custom close enough to be called a Druid, but... I don’t know. It’s too bad though. If Professor Haubert had any ideas about ancient defense techniques I was hoping Potter might learn some that no one else would be able to counteract. He never seems to run out of trouble to find.”

Ira smiled. She had heard about the rescue of the little girl in Dunnan Hill in the paper. It was a fluff story, through and through, but the press was eating it up. With all the suppressed hysteria about the collapsed wards, a little fluff made a good counter point to the doom and gloom hanging over them.

And as if circumstance were reading her thoughts, a loud trumpet call cut through the air, drowning out the musicians and conversationalists and revelers. Snape's wand jumped into his hand, giving Ira a start. She quickly touched his hand and shook her head.

"It's just a campus announcement," she explained. "They do this every evening once an hour from sunset to midnight."

Sure enough, once the trumpet call had died a voice came over the speaker.

"Attention students and faculty. As announced earlier this week, all campus businesses, offices, and libraries will be closed at ten and all persons shall return to their domiciles by eleven. Anyone caught outside after curfew will be escorted off campus to the closest Sentinel Station. Thank you, and have a safe and pleasant evening."

After a second or two the conversation began to pick up and then the musicians started to play again, until it seemed as if the announcement had not occurred at all. Snape, however, was left feeling a bit disoriented. He could remember his own college years, and outside of classes, his most memorable experienced occurred well after midnight on and off the campus. Even back in the seventies he could recall the area being active till at least three in the morning.

"It really is a shame," Ira lamented beside him, releasing his hand and continuing to walk towards their intended restaurant. "The libraries all used to be open until one and you could work in a laboratory for as long as you liked if you had permission. The astronomy lab has been shut down completely for the semester and there's no telling when it will be allowed to open again. This curfew is messing with a lot of people's research, student and faculty alike, and we can't really do anything about it. It's for everyone's safety after all. The dormitories are the only buildings with any real protection spells on them."

"What? Are you telling me the campus has no protections on it?" he said, disbelieving. Yet the more he thought about it the more obvious it was. The University of Magic in London was not Hogwarts, not a single building designed to hold out against Roman magicians and Vikings and the fae. The university had sprung up during the renaissance, long after the threat of Romans and Vikings had passed and the fairies had all been driven back into the countryside, as a series of buildings built to blend into Muggle London, and had not been fully separated until 1666, when the Great Fire of London made it necessary to cut off the campus from the rest of the city or let it burn to preserve its many secrets from muggles. There had been riots during the civil war, but aside from petty vandalism, there had been nothing to suggest the application of powerful protective wards was necessary. In fact, this was probably the case with most of the public places and non-ancestral homes in London.

“I wouldn’t say completely unprotected, but nothing like Hogwarts or even the Court Offices. Morgan proposed setting something up, but I doubt it will pass. Things will be expensive enough just maintaining current defenses and taking care of the army...”

He had to ask her something before she continued. “Ira.”

Her wide brown eyes turned to him, betraying more sadness than anxiety. She was naively unconcerned about her own vulnerability.

“How protected is your home?”

She smiled at him. “As sweet as your concern is, I assure you my home is very well protected. It does belong to Morgan after all.”

Snape didn’t look convinced. “And the rest of the neighborhood? Do you have many established families living there?”

Her smile slipped away. “I... no, not really. It’s relatively new housing district. Most of us work at the Court offices and moved there to be close by. I don’t really know about their defenses... why?”

“I’ve been by your house before,” Snape said. “Very lovely neighborhood, but there’s nothing more than anti-burglary charms anywhere. It’s as vulnerable as Dunnan Hill.”

She looked away, irritated. "Are you just saying this to frighten me?"

Before he could even think about it, he reached out and grabbed her, drawing her to a halt. She blinked down at his hands, thin hands stained from years of brewing and yet oddly elegant wrapped around her little wrist. Looking up at him, she could see his eyes, dark and fierce as ever but lacking that sardonic humor he always maintained.

"No, I don't want to frighten you. Not unless it makes you more cautious, more aware. I think you should leave London."

She blinked at him. "What? What are you talking about?"

"I want you to go to my house. It's completely undetectable except to those who have been invited, and is thick with protective spells. You would be quite safe there."

Judging from her baffled expression, she still didn't seem to understand what he was saying, so he simplified it yet again. "I want you to be safe."

She blushed. "I don't know what to say. I... I can't."

"Why not?" he asked. He was prepared for a refusal, at least initially, but was certain he could talk her into it. He knew she liked his house and the village nearby more than London, and her initial response would be out of surprise rather than true reluctance.

"I have a job for one," she reminded him. "And for another... I might not be very brave, but I'm not a coward. I'm not going to run away from shadows."

Well, those were good points, which was extremely annoying. Her expression softened as she read his disappointment.

"But," she conceded. "If something does happen, and I don't feel safe in London anymore, then I will consider going to your house... with my mother."

Snape winced at the mention of Mrs. Susan Morgan, a busy-body if ever he met one. Oh well, it wasn't as if they'd be in around her very often until the school year ended. If Ira even decided to go. He nodded. It was as good as he was going to get at the moment, and he didn't feel like ruining the mood over a fight. He could work on convincing her to leave later, spreading out his arguments so that he would come off as more concerned than pushy. He had a feeling she would run if he tried to be too forceful, but she was reasonable more often than not, and could eventually be swayed. The obnoxious security measures that were being implemented lately (and would likely get worse as other battles erupted within the UK's borders) might serve as a viable argument.

Suddenly, his thoughts drifted back to his lab, where the Body Tree was continuing to mature behind the secret door in his laboratory. He had not yet figured out a way to move it where it would be found, and its significance understood without betraying his own involvement and he was wondering if he would have to just destroy it and hope it didn't come back to bite him in the ass. An idea was starting to form, however. Little pieces of fact like McGunny's apartment being two blocks from the campus and the patrols by campus security after eleven and the abandoned astronomy laboratory were floating lucidly in his mind and waiting to be assembled into a coherent plan.

oo
oo

Harry circled the astronomy tower; his fur cloak spread out around him, letting the icy cold air slip passed its defenses. His gaze never left the Southern window, which yielding no view but that of a starless sky, shrouded in clouds. He knew the Moon was there, full and powerful, but Her absence from his sight left him irritable and restless. The night was thick with anxiety, the usual reckless abandon the full moon brought stubbornly elusive.

How this night so resembled his days.

Halloween, a holiday he had always loved even before he had known about magic, was only a week away yet he felt none of the festive merriment he remembered from years past. Instead, he was trying to make it day to day without anyone realizing he was starting to come apart at the seams, dosing himself daily with calming draughts and spending as much time alone as possible, focusing his mind on nothing more complicated than arithmancy homework.

He had hoped this night the moon would wrap him in her affections. Instead, he felt abandoned and rejected. Why had she forsaken him? Now of all times? Should he have made an offering to her?

From the center of the room, Seitler followed his movements around the room, so still and silent Harry could easily forget that he was there. Snape had wanted to sleep through the full moon for once, and had handed him off to the Sentinel for the night, giving him a rather flimsy explanation of what he should expect. Seitler wasn't a baby-sitter, but even he was intrigued by this peculiarity from Voldemort's golden boy. There had been rumors for a long time that Potter had lycanthrosis, but even Seitler, who was by no means a werewolf expert, could tell that wasn't the case with Potter. There was nothing animalistic about his behavior, but something was definitely happening.

Harry suddenly paused, squinting into the darkness beyond the tower that his lone flickering candle couldn't touch. He moved out onto the mezzanine, and held out his hand. There was a touch of cold against his skin.

"It's snowing," Harry observed, frowning. It was too early for snow. It shouldn't have started until late November, but perhaps it was to be expected. Voldemort's dementors were still patrolling the Northeastern coast of Britain, drawing in storms and throwing off the local weather patterns. There had been talk in the Great Hall just that morning about the likelihood of having a truly abysmal winter this year.

Maybe that was why he was feeling so out of sorts. If this snow had been brought in by the influence of dementors, he would be more sensitive to the corruption than most. He wiped the wetness from his hand quickly at the thought.

“I’m going back to the Common Room,” he said, drawing away from the window.

“Do you think you can sleep now?” The Sentinel’s voice was even, but Harry could hear the skepticism anyway. He didn’t blame the man. He had been pacing for nearly three hours and hadn’t shown any sign of winding down.

“Maybe not, but the Moon will not show tonight. I may as well attempt to get some homework done.”

Seitler didn’t argue the point, but he did follow Harry all the way to his Common Room, then perched himself outside the portrait in a very obvious fashion. Harry ignored the expression of distrust, and went inside. It was just after midnight, and being Tuesday, everyone else was asleep. The lone Gryffindor entertained himself with building a fire for a few minutes, but once that was done he found himself pacing again.

What was wrong with him? Why could he settle or find some suitable distraction?

He wanted his godfathers. He wasn’t sure where the thought came from, but now that it had sprung up it didn’t want to dissipate. He wanted to see them, in their wolf forms, run his hands through their thick wiry fur and feel their hearts pounding beneath his hand. He wanted to hear their songs, howled to their goddess in a single mournful note, and smell their earthy scent mixed with the cold air.

He wanted his pack.

On the far end of the room, the grandfather clock struck one and chimed softly, startling Harry from his thoughts. Only five or so more hours to go, he tried to assure himself.

The sound of shattering glass, startled him, as well as the rest of tower most likely, but he didn’t have long to question it. From the staircase to the boy’s dormitory, Bobby came swooping down, darting around Harry’s head.

“Hurry,” the raven said, his voice high with a panic Harry had never seen in him before. With that, he flew straight for the portrait with such speed he would have surely broken his neck against it, if he hadn’t called out a spell causing it to fly open. Harry bolted after him, jumping through the open doorway and nearly tripping over Seidler, who had been thrown across the hall by the swinging portrait. The Fat Lady gave a terrible shriek at the abuse she was suffering, alerting half the castle that something was happening. Bobby was nearly out of sight, and he didn’t have time to wait around and explain anything. He ran as fast as he could, feeling at last the touch of his goddess and she poured her strength into his legs.

His feet barely touched the stairs as he leaped down them, taking them three or four steps at a time and jumping the banister more than once as he fought to keep sight of dark feathered guide and he thought he had lost him more than once when made a sudden turn, but already Harry knew about where he was going.

The main entrance to the castle was sealed shut, but it had been designed to keep people out not in, and Bobby managed to force this door open as easily as he had the Fat Lady’s portrait, shattering the locks in the process and raining down a shower of splinters. Harry didn’t even slow, and dashed forward until he reached the castle portcullis, and finally drew to a sudden stop.

In the light of the burning fires that lit the entry into Hogwarts through the night and through a heavy veil of snow, Harry could see a shape at the end of the castle drawbridge. It was about Harry’s size, but hunched over, supported on three legs, the fourth he assumed tucked into its body. It only took a moment to realize what he was looking at. Cautiously, remembering Snape’s warning about traps and fairy tricks, he stepped out onto the bridge. On either side of him, the massive stone gargoyles growled, their stone eyes bright as hell fire at the sight of the potential threat to the castle, but not yet attacking while the creature didn’t attempt to come any closer. Harry drew closer, details gradually beginning to form as the veil of snow grew thinner.

The first thing he noticed was that the werewolf was wounded, its left arm soaked in blood and dripping heavily onto the snow coated ground. Yellow eyes regarded him tiredly, the faintest hint of recognition, and a lack of aggression. The coat was lighter than the typical werewolf, more light grey than black or brown, and it was too small to be fully grown. It didn't snap into place who exactly he was staring at until he realized the werewolf was female.

"Luna?"

A pitiful, heart wrenching whine escaped her and finally giving into her injuries, she collapsed in the snow. He rushed to her side, bending down next to her. His hands searched her for injuries in the semi-dark, and it didn't take him long to find what he was looking for. Her left arm was badly torn as he had already seen, but further investigation revealed that almost all of her left side was shredded as well, and snatched his hand back when he felt his fingers brush the smooth hardness of bone.

"Oh, god, Luna!" His wand was still blessedly up his sleeve, and he spouted off the few healing spells he had gleaned from Dueling Club practices. They weren't enough, not nearly enough, but they helped to slow the blood loss at least. He draped his body lightly over hers, making sure his cloak covered her as much as possible, before turning back to entry way. "HELP! Someone help me! It's alright, Luna, I've got you now. I'll get you fixed up. Help! Someone get the nurse!"

Luna whined weakly beneath him, but didn't try move. She was so weak, and he was so warm and safe. Her eyes began to drift shut.

"NO! Stay awake, Luna! You can't fall asleep!" Harry shouted, drawing her back from the precipice of sleep. She tried to focus again, and soon realized they were no longer alone. Her vision was blurry, but her sense of smell hadn't yet failed her, bringing her the scent of human prey (predators?) by the dozens. They spoke, angry, frightened voices, but Harry's was the only one that made sense to her.

"No! She's been hurt and needs help! Just get me the right potions and I'll give them to her! She won't harm me."

“Good god, boy, that isn’t a bloody puppy!” Seitler was screaming, the closest he had ever been to a heart attack as stared down at a fifteen year old boy snuggling with a werewolf, and injured werewolf no less and refuse to let go until some sort of aid was provided. Seitler couldn’t even begin to guess where he would find help for a fully transformed werewolf. Did he get the school’s medi-witch or call the veterinarian? Did healing potions for humans work on werewolves? If Potter tried to force them down the beast’s throat would it bite him? Did it even matter?

“Great Scot!”

“What the devil?!”

Others were starting to arrive now, bringing with them new layers of tension. Teachers and students, still in their bedclothes where following the shouts to the castle entry way, and once there were no more prepared for what they saw than Seitler was. The image was so completely surreal. Boy and beast crouched in the deepening snow, neither moving but staring back at them with unnervingly bright eyes. McGonagal made a move to approach them, but Seitler fixed her with a sharp look.

“Don’t, Professor. It hasn’t shown any interest in attacking Potter, but there’s no telling what will happen if it feels threatened. Keep the rest of your students back until we can think up a decent plan.”

McGonagal frowned, but nodded, turning back to the students. Most of them were Gryffindors, their tower being the origins of the trouble, and amidst the crowd was Hermione, looking pale as death as she stared out at her best friend. Harry had told her once that the full moon affected his judgment, but this was pure insanity she was looking at. Even more insane was the fact that he had not yet been ripped to pieces. McGonagal quickly herded her and rest of the students away from the door, telling them to go back to the common room. No one wanted to leave, but her insistence that their combined presence might provoke the werewolf into attacking. By the time the transfiguration teacher returned to the drawbridge, Snape had arrived and was arguing with his ward.

“Potter, don’t be daft. There’s no way you’re taking a fully transformed werewolf into the school,” the dark man hissed.

“But she needs help! She’s dying!”

“Which doesn’t justify risking the lives of the other students and staff. Think, Potter! How do you expect anyone to help it without risking themselves? Werewolves are notoriously resilient against spells. There’s no telling when a sleeping or restraining spell might fail.”

“Her name is Luna. She’s fourteen years old. She likes strawberry pancakes and dancing, and is going to be a medicine woman when she grows up. And I’m not going to let her die.”

“Er...” Lockhart, who regarding the entire situation with his usual befuddlement and pretending he wasn’t, interrupted. “Perhaps I might-”

“No!” Harry and Snape snapped in unison, then turned their stubborn wills on each other. They glared at each other for a long moment.

“Fine!” the young Gryffindor finally bit out, “We’ll wait until she turns back and then treat her!”

Snape seemed momentarily taken back, but quickly recovered. “Dawn is almost five hours away.”

“Then I’ll wait five hours!” he snarled, and the werewolf beneath him let out a snarl of her own at the perceived threat, but he quickly turned to her and crooned softly, burying his face into her furry neck. Snape glowered at the pair, but knew he had been bested for the time being and turned his attention to Seitler.

“That thing didn’t just wonder off the nearest colony. Something has happened. Get to the headmistress’ office and contact your people to find out what's going on. The rest of the teachers and I will guard the castle and make sure Potter doesn't get his fool head bitten off in the mean time."

Seitler wasn't used to taking orders from civilians, but Snape had a reputation and in this case his reasoning was sound. He abandoned the current drama to search out the headmistress and gain access to her office, the only place in all of Hogwarts anyone could apparate out of (but not into). A werewolf at Hogwarts could mean any number of things, but none of them good.

oo
oo

By dawn, Harry could no longer feel his fingers, his toes, or most of his face. The warming spells he cast were on Luna alone, along with the healing spells he didn't think were working any longer. The moon had been unable to fight through the clouds, and the absence of her light dampened the strength he would normally wean from her. He didn't dare waste magic on himself, fearing at any moment Luna's heart would suddenly stop and he would need all the magic inside him to revive her.

None of the teachers had dared try sending spells at them, as their first attempt had sent the injured werewolf into snarling fit. Only Harry clinging to her, and kept her from limping to her feet and rushing for them. When he had finally settled her again, she was exhausted, and blood was now visibly leaking through her nose and mouth. Harry was terrified that blood was starting to fill her lungs.

All through the night, he petted and soothed and encouraged her, sharing his heat and his strength. All through the night, she leaned against him and whined and licked his bare numb fingers, taking in his warmth and his love. She was so tired, and more than anything she wanted to sleep and forget what she had seen and experienced this night, but Diana had told her to live. She told her to live so that the truth would live, and those who had fallen would not be forgotten.

Dawn came in the dark, the sun as obscured as the moon, but both boy and she-wolf felt it in the very fiber of their being. Harry noticed it first as the gradual weakening of his eyes sight and a bone-deep weariness that settled over him. Luna's experience was considerably more dramatic.

Beneath his hands, Harry felt Luna transform, muscle sliding fluidly over bone that bent and popped and shortened and extended. A strange, almost sickly sweet smell permeated around her as her light gray fur retracted to smooth, sweat dampened skin. Within half a minute, he was holding a very naked, very injured girl.

"Luna!"

Quickly, he pulled off his fur cloak and wrapped her in it, wishing for something that wasn't already soaked with her blood. Her skin, normally so pale, was purple and black from bruises and blood, and he wept at the sight of them. Pale grey eyes stared at him, barely open, barely even alive, with such haunted expression, he feared to know its source.

"Haaa....," she breath roughly what could have been his name, blood tricking out of her mouth and nose.

"Ssshhh... don't speak. I have you. I have you."

She continued to stare at him, and he held her gaze as long as he could, until the other came with their blankets and their spells and their good intentions, pulling them from each other's arms. With the last of her strength, he grabbed his wrist and held fast, forcing out what needed to be said.

"They're all dead..."

Then she let her eyes finally slide shut, her consciousness and her pain slide away until all there was a dark and painless void.

Ooo
oo

This is an EXTREMELY sad and emotional chapter. If you've ever cried for one of my characters before, you'll probably cry again and should be prepared.

Book V:

Chapter 16: The Prince's Lament

The moment Luna was pulled from his arms, Harry was dragged away to the nearest available room by Snape and stripped of his bloody clothes as well as the blood itself with several very unpleasant cleaning charms. The blanket he was given was warm, but not enough for someone already nearing hypothermia and with no shoes to fight the icy chill of the floor, but the potions master refused to get him anything else until he checked underneath his fingernails and his hair and every possible place Luna's infected blood might be hiding.

"Nothing got in your eyes, nose, or mouth?"

Harry just stood there, shaking like a leaf, and unable to speak. Who all was dead? What had happened at the werewolf colony that sent Luna to his front door and in such a state? Could another werewolf have done this to Luna? Was it wizards? He had to know.

"T-t-too-too c-cold."

Snape glowered at him, but dragged him out of the room and towards the infirmary. Several teachers watched them as they passed, but they said nothing as Harry stumbled half blind down the halls and up the stairs. He nearly fell twice, his legs just collapsing beneath him, but Snape caught him both times and finally put his arm around him to support his weight.

In the infirmary, Pomfrey was busy treating Luna, hidden behind a privacy screen. The medi-witches normally immaculate white apron was splattered in blood and she was wearing surgeon's mask, gloves, and goggles for protection. The potions master didn't disturb her from her work, but set Harry on the farthest bed, handing him hospital pajamas to change into and sorting through the potions cabinet himself for something to warm the boy up.

When he turned back around, Harry was gone.

“Typical,” he muttered.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Tricking Snape into thinking he was too weak to move on his own had been simple enough, but escaping the hospital wing and reaching Gryffindor Tower and getting everything he needed was another matter altogether. He might not be about ready to collapse but he was tired and the halls were crowded with teachers who would question why he was running around in nothing but a blanket. Secret passage ways and short cuts only went so far, and then he had to rely on magic and his wits, neither of which was reliable with his abysmal eyesight, shaking hands, and sleep deprived brain.

He did make it though. He suspected Raecellos would be expecting an offering of thanks pretty soon.

Stumbling into the Common Room, it was the usual chaos that greeted him after a misadventure. Friends and gawkers alike, trying to crowd around him and demand answers.

“Harry, are you alright?!” Hermione said, throwing her arms around him, while the nearly forty or so other students hurled questions at him.

“How did you tame the werewolf?! That was a werewolf, wasn’t it?”

“How did you know it was out there?”

“Where are your clothes?”

“Why aren’t you in the infirmary? Weren’t you bitten?”

“SHUT UP!”

The crowd leaped back, including Hermione, and he pushed passed them and towards the stairs, running as fast as he could manage, his hold on his blanket and his wand tenuous at best. Once in his dorm room, he dropped the blanket altogether, and threw open his trunk, pulling on the first things his hand touched and then some warm outer wear after extra consideration. From a hidden compartment built into the side of his trunk, he pulled his invisibility cloak.

“Harry, what are you doing?!” Hermione cried in alarm, storming into the room, and followed shortly after my Clyde, the Weasley twins, and half a dozen others. He ignored her question, and reached under his pillow, pulling out his keystone. It did not have a lot of magic stored in it after the protection ritual, but it would have to be enough to get him where he needed to be.

“Mate, calm down! What’s this all about? Shouldn’t you be in the infirmary? You’re practically blue!” Fred said, grinning like usual, but it was strained, placating. Like he was talking to a crazy person. Harry ignored him, and slammed his trunk shut.

“POTTER!”

Everyone jumped and turned to the open door at the sound of Snape’s voice carrying through the tower. Not half a second later, the man himself stalked in, his face twisted in anger.

“Where is the little gnome?” he demanded.

They all turned to indicate Harry’s presence by his bed, but he had disappeared without a trace.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

That was too close, Harry thought as he slipped through the open portrait. Everyone was so busy staring up that stairs at the rampaging professor they didn’t even notice when it opened and shut on its own.

He ran down to the main floor of the castle. He tried the first window he could find, but a shock ran down his arm when he tried to force it open, so he continued for the main entrance.

It was too late.

The door had once again been sealed, and now McGonagal stood as a sentry before it, staring up and down the corridor with piercing eyes. Snape had worked fast. The castle was sealed. There was no way out.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooo

“Well?” Lestrangle hissed at her long time competitor, feeling a mixture of frustration and joy at Potter’s latest stunt. It would likely cost Snape his job, possibly his life, but it might end up having some unpleasant consequences for herself as well. The over grown bat looked far less concerned for himself than she would have liked. She wondered if he had found a way of blaming her.

Snape sneered, but his voice was as smooth and silky as ever. “If you have done your job and sealed all possible exits, then he will not have had time to slip out. It is only a matter of tracking him down. He may turn himself in when he realized he won’t be rushing to anyone else’s rescue today. The infirmary will be his first stop, most likely.”

She sneered herself, but it wasn’t at Snape. The idea of a werewolf in her castle set her nerves on end, but there was nothing she could do at the moment. Voldemort would want to interrogate it. As soon as it was stable, she would have the Court take it off their hands.

“I’ve done my part. The doors, windows, and all the towers with open access are sealed. No one is getting in or out until he’s found, which I recommend you doing very quickly.”

Snape nodded, then stopped.

“Doors, windows, and towers...” he murmured, his frown slowly deepening. “Headmistress... did you remember to seal the dungeons as well?”

“Why would I seal the dungeons? There no way to get out...”

Her eyes widened. Snape let out a groan.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Harry followed the basilisk through the dank, narrow tunnels, shivering in the chill and cringing every time a sopping wet root hanging from the ceiling brushed his forehead or neck. The newest basilisk was only a few years old, and just a little larger than Inana. It was considerably more talkative, however.

I've never had a visitor before. Except for the rats, which are very yummy, but aren't very funny. Well, it's knid of funny when they get frozen in weird positions, but that makes them hard to swallow which isn't funny at all. I wish I had someone to talk to though. It got very boring down here after I got done exploring all the tunnels. Not that is isn't nice, because it is. Lots of room and food and swimming pools, but awfully quiet.

Harry didn't say anything, concentrating on not tripping over the debris in the tunnel which was nearly invisible. Thermal imaging glasses may have protected him from the young basilisk's deadly gaze, but it did make spelunking a hazardous affair.

He really couldn't afford to fall into a puddle of water, or he would loose whatever strength he had left. At least his boots were both warm and waterproof.

...and maybe you could awaken one of my sisters? I'd settle for a brother, but boys can be so...eh... well, not all boys. You seem nice enough, listening to me jabber on and on, but most boys just can't do that, you know?

Harry let the basilisk's voice flow over him, distracting him from Luna's broken declaration repeating itself over and over again in his head. They're all dead. Who all was dead? Her family? The entire colony? All the werewolves in the country? Were his godfathers among them? Had they even been with Luna's colony or had they already left for France? Were they safe even there?

The tunnel came to an abrupt end, a large stone carved with thousands of intertwined snakes coiled around each other blocked the way.

This is where I stop, the basilisk hissed, and turned around. It's cold out there.

Thank you for your help.

You're welcome. And she disappeared back down the tunnel.

It took him nearly twenty minutes to figure out how to open the passage way. Sticking ones hand into a moving mass of coils to search for an equally mobile knob was not an easy task, and talking to statues had earned him nothing but being laughed at.

It was still snowing when he stepped out into the Forbidden Forest.

All around him the trees hung heavy with snow, those trees that had not lost their leaves soon enough were near bent in half and some had already snapped. The air was cold and quiet, but even in his exhaustion he knew better than to be complacent. He kept his wand in his hand.

Now what? How was he going to get there?

He had no broom or horse and couldn't apparate. He might be able to get to Hogmeade, but they would have been warned about him and even he didn't think he could sneak through a floo without people noticing. His options were in fact extremely limited.

But he did have one left...

The Knight Bus driver kept giving him odd looks, but didn't ask questions. He was too over worked and under paid to question why a fifteen year old needed to be picked up in the middle of the Forbidden Forest and taken to a werewolf colony, especially someone who looked extremely familiar for some reason.

At least, the shivering had finally stopped. The running and the warmth of the bus had finally restored his body temperature to normal, but now he was left with the reminder of how hungry he was, even as the thought of eating was nauseating.

Was she okay now? Pomfrey had taken her, but she had been so weak already. He could feel her strength just drain out of her when she let go of his arm, her eyes sliding shut. Had she been dead in that moment and he not even realizing it? No, he could remember the medi-witch was still working on her when Snape brought him to the infirmary. He had to believe she would recover.

“Shut up,” he whispered.

“You say something?” the bus driver asked, turning around. This seemed a very bad idea since they were still driving through a forest with no road.

“Er... nothing.”

“Well, we’re almost there. You sure you want out here? It’s a nearly twenty miles to the nearest town. Heh, unless you’re a werewolf,” he laughed, then sobered. “You aren’t a werewolf are you?”

Harry gave him one of his nastier smiles, and the man paled and stepped on the gas. At last the bus broke out of the trees and onto a wide dirt road, and stopped. Harry stepped off the bus. He didn’t pay the fare, and the bus driver didn’t ask for one, shutting the door on him and speeding away as fast as he could. This was all well and good because Harry hadn’t thought to grab any money when he fled the castle.

The ground was blanketed in nearly four inches of snow and a few light flakes continued to fall from the silvery-gray sky above. He tightened his robe around him and pulled up the hood to conserve heat. He kept his invisibility cloak off. He couldn’t see properly with it on, and in the tracks he left in the snow would make its power meaningless. He would just have to be cautious and hope the danger had already passed.

He spotted the first body just outside the borderline of the werewolf territory. It was a woman, naked, and completely unmarked. She was partially curled, her eyes half lidded and cloudy, and her black hair pillowing her head. He didn’t need to touch her to know her skin was icy cold. Shakily, Harry tried to closer her eyes, but they merely opened again.

He took a shaky breath and continued up the road. He was terrified of what he would find, but he had to know. He encountered three more bodies on the road. One of them Harry recognized as Jackal, and the other two were brothers, still at each other’s side even in death. The brothers were also completely unmarked, but Jackal appeared to have been gutted, his entrails blessedly obscured by the snowfall.

The colony itself was gone, nothing more than smoldering ashes and scattered cookery. He saw another woman, but didn't look too closely. He could smell her partially charred flesh and didn't think he could stand seeing it for himself. It wasn't until he reached the clearing just beyond the commune that the sheer horror of what happened became truly apparent.

There were bodies everywhere.

Dozens upon dozens of them. Some of them were completely untouched, while others were torn, burned, crushed, or killed in some other completely sadistic manner. Some of them were huddle together and other alone as they tried to flee. There had to have been at least forty in the clearing alone. He stared, completely frozen at them. Men and women he had known for years, so alive and powerful and filled with laughter and that brazen werewolf attitude, lying so still and quiet.

Trembling, he began searching for his godfathers, but in doing so found so many other familiar faces. Here the woman who had shown him how hides were cleaned and tanned. There the man who beat him in a game of cards once. Then he found Greyback and his family.

The Head Alpha hadn't fallen easily. Harry could follow the blood and visceral trail nearly twenty feet, and by then the man was only so much meaty pulp. Just beyond the alphas reach was one of his sons, curled tightly in a lifeless ball. He couldn't have been more than eight. Then another son, spread out on his back as if asleep, his eldest at fourteen. It was Athena that set it off though. She was nearly unmarked but for the deep diagonal slash across her back, but she must have been trying to protect her youngest boy, just barely two, and when she had fallen he was beneath her and...

The long keening wail that escaped him echoed through the forest, piercing the haunting silencing with an even more haunting noise.

He shouldn't have come! He didn't want to know this! HE DIDN'T WANT TO KNOW THIS!

He sobbed, loud and messy, like he hadn't since he was eight. Even more than when he was eight. This was too horrible. Why? Why? Why? He collapsed to knees and covered his eyes, trying to block it out, but it was already burned in to his mind into his very soul and he would never be rid of it again. This would never leave him. Rhiannon, why didn't you save them?

He wasn't certain how long he sat in the snow and wept, it could have been hours or minutes but the pain would not ease. It just went on and on until he felt a hand touch his hair. He pulled away his hands and looked up, expecting to see Snape but it was Voldemort who stood over him, his expression the closest to sympathetic Harry had ever seen.

"What are you doing here, Harry? You shouldn't be here."

"I-I had to-to know," he choked out, and still he couldn't stop. The Dark Lord helped him to his feet, and lead him away from the clearing, not to the commune but deeper into the woods.

"Your godfathers are safe," Voldemort said, "They left for France a week ago, and I have verification from the Queen herself that none of their own werewolves were attacked. Of course, they're still being secured inside their fortresses and under heavy guard. A much less convenient target than an isolated colony in the middle of nowhere."

The relief he felt at his godfather's survival warred with his grief over the death of the Goddess Clan, and ultimately the grief won out. When he finally saw Sirius and Remus again he might feel differently, but right now it was a mild balm against a gapping wound.

"What happened?" he asked. He knew too much already, what was this little bit more?

They stepped between two trees, and Harry jerked in surprise as nearly a hundred witches and wizards appeared before him, Brass Culties and Sentinels mixed together, appearing and disappearing into the half dozen black tents that had been erected. The overbearing silence of the forest was smashed by the dull roar of activity. The roar dimmed a bit as curious faces turned in puzzlement and sympathy as Harry was escorted to one of the tents. The tent was black on the outside, but inside it was a near glaring white and uncomfortably warm. Six beds lined either side of the wall, and Harry's heart gave a little sigh at the handful of survivors he saw resting there, all of them unconscious and wrapped in blankets. One of them was Fenrir's sons, Fierro the second oldest, but the others Harry didn't immediately recognize.

"The boy escaped into a fox hole and waited out the fighting, nearly catatonic when we finally pulled him out. The others men were knocked unconscious and left for dead. They cannot remember a great deal of what happened, their human minds do not hold animal thoughts well, but what we managed to piece together is that maybe two dozen wizards on broomsticks came during their transformation, before they had scattered for the night and killed them. My men have investigated the wards. They were... inefficient at keeping out such a large group of attackers. Several ward posts are all but melted."

"Are there any other survivors?"

"No. None except Luna, and her condition is questionable."

Two Medi-Cults approached to check Harry for injuries, but the Dark Lord waved them off. He grabbed a bowl of water and a towel from a nearby table and set it beside Harry. "Wash your face. You look awful."

"Was it the Germans?" Harry guessed. He took off his gloves and his glasses, scooped up a handful of water and splashed his face, scrubbing with his hands. He was starting to feel calmer. Voldemort was here, the danger had passed, and now they would deal with what had happened in the cool collected manner he handled everything else. Now was a time for decisions and action. Grief could come later... hopefully much, much later.

"Yes. When Seitler came to Lucius with news of the werewolf's appearance at Hogwarts, he had squadrons sent out to investigate all the werewolf colonies. This colony was already abandoned, but we managed to intercept their next attack point. Most got away, but a few were killed... one was captured alive.”

Harry stiffened, and pulled the towel away from his face.

“You caught one?”

“Yes. He’s in one of our tents now. Morgan is prepping him for interrogation.”

“... I would like to see him.”

Voldemort stared at him thoughtfully. “Why?”

Harry didn’t really know the answer to that himself, but he wanted to see for himself who was capable of what he had seen.

“Harry, what are you even doing here? How did you get here?”

“... I took the bus.”

Voldemort blinked. “The bus?”

“Well... that and... that place... in the dungeons,” he could not describe Slytherin’s chamber any more clearly while the medi-cults were in the room. “Snape locked down the rest of the castle. I’m surprised he missed that part actually.”

“You...escaped the castle? You escaped Snape?”

“...Sort of... yes... you could say that.”

The Dark Lord closed his eyes. “I don’t know whether I am extremely impressed with your resourcefulness or extremely angry with you for defying your guardian and forcing him to lock down the entire school.”

Before Harry could voice his preference for the first option, Chief Sentinel Morgan stepped into the tent. He gave a disapproving glare to Harry but spoke directly to Voldemort.

“The prisoner is ready for you.”

“Thank you, Morgan. Harry here will speak with him first, then one of your men will escort him back to Hogwarts.”

Morgan turned an assessing look towards the boy, clearly an emotional mess, but didn't question his ruler. If he wanted his protégé to go stark raving mad that was his prerogative. He escorted them to the farthest tent, and held it open for them.

Harry stepped inside first, a feeling of dread seeping into him as he surveyed the room. This tent was also white and sterile. Slick white tile that sloped down slightly into the center where a drain had been placed lined the floor. Harry tried not to think of the reason behind that practical feature, but the tray of strange instruments set off to the side made it easy enough to guess. Three men stood off to the side, dressed in the same sterile white of the room, discussing something. They stopped when he entered the tent.

The room was disturbing, but perhaps more so was the prisoner who was secured to a chair in the very center. He was younger than Harry would have imagine, mid-twenties, maybe younger, with curly blond hair, and wide, terrified blue eyes. Harry could only stare back at him, confused. Surely this wasn't a murderer? No hardened, apathetic mercenary or sadistic megalomaniac.

Then the young man seemed to recognize him and his wide blue eyes hardened into a hateful glare.

“Oh, der Verräter persönlich! Ich fühle mich geehrt!”

Harry just stared at him, sensing rather than seeing as Morgan and Voldemort moved around the room. The prisoner didn't even look away from him, and Harry wondered if he even realized he had the ruler of wizarding Britain standing there with him or if he thought it was just another anonymous soldier or military specialist.

“Was is los? Hast du nichts zu sagen, du Verräter? Bist du nicht wütend? Wir haben alle deine räudigen Schoßhunde umgebracht, und alles was du tust, ist rumzustehen und wie ein Idiot zu glotzen.”

That spurred Harry to speak.

“ Du bist sehr überheblich für einen schlappschwänzigen Kindermörder!”

The prisoner blinked, then hissed like an angry cat.

“ Don’t try your little sob story about them being human and deserving the same treatment and that crap. They weren’t human. They aren’t human. They’re just dumb mon-”

Harry’s fist smashing into the prisoner’s face knocked the chair over and sent him falling backwards. The young soldier choked on the blood pouring from his nose, and turned his head to spit it out into the pristine white tiles. It flowed obediently to the little drain at the center of the floor. Harry wasn’t done yet.

“Nihil valeo,” he said, casting a feather-light charm on man and chair, then grabbed him by the collar of his sturdy black Auror’s uniform and dragged him outside. Everyone froze when they saw him making off with the prisoner, Voldemort, Morgan, and three rather distraught interrogators following behind. Several people made a move to stop him, but the Dark Lord gestured for them to leave the boy alone.

He was curious about what his young friend was going to do, and a part of him wanted Harry to be the one who exacted vengeance on this no doubt worthy perpetrator. Greyback had been Voldemort’s friend, in so far as that goes, but Harry had loved the werewolves and had been an honorary member of their pack. With the four survivors too traumatized or injured to exact justice, it seemed appropriate that it should be Harry who acted in their stead.

Another part of him felt strangely drawn to what he was feeling radiating off of Harry, the pain and anger and horror permeating outwards like an electric field, sizzling along his nerve-endings to his very core where he felt something stir. He had seen his fair share of suffering and inflicted a great deal of it himself, but what he felt now was not the familiar sadistic pleasure of dominance. This wasn't pleasant at all. It was... it was...

Inspiring?

Too feeble a description, but it was far too alien for him to call it anything else. He didn't try, merely let it wash over him as Harry continued to drag the prisoner into the clearing where the werewolves still remained scattered like so many broken dolls. The prisoner was starting to panic now, and that did bring about a bit of sadistic pleasure for him.

"What are you doing? Where are we going?"

Harry stopped exactly where Voldemort had first found him, and threw back to the ground. The prisoner grunted in pain, but it quickly turned to panicked screaming when he found himself inches from the glassy dead eyes of Athena. Harry jerked him back a little but the view couldn't have been any better because now he could see not only Athena but Fenrir and their children too. The prisoner tried to close his eyes, but Harry knelt down, forcing his head back and his eyes open.

"Look! Look at them! Look how he reaches for them. Look how she tried to cover her baby from harm and her children hung close even in their panic! Look! Look and see that these were NOT dumb monsters. You didn't kill terrorists or soldiers or beasts, and I will not let you go to your grave thinking you're some sort of hero. You're just a murderer! A women and child-killing murderer!"

"No, no, no! I didn't know! I didn't know! He said this was where the terrorists were! The ones who killed all those people in Berlin! I didn't know, I swear I didn't know!"

His words did nothing to placate Harry, and if anything they only enraged him further. Harry's hands which had been gripping the man's head slipped to his throat and tightened.

"Liar! How could you not have known? How could you not have seen the pups? You saw them well enough when you killed them! Did you not see them when they turned human? You knew all along what you were doing! You're the monster here!"

The prisoner was starting to turn purple, Harry's small hands an inescapable vice and Voldemort could feel his heart racing as he watched it all play out. He had never seen Harry like this before. It was breathtaking.

"My Lord," Morgan said softly, but urgently. "Perhaps we should stop him. The man's no good to us dead."

"Mmm... maybe in a minute..." he said offhandedly.

"Sir, I really don't think he has a minute."

"Then I'll revive him again. They're always much more cooperative as zombies.*"

Morgan said nothing more, merely stood there and watched with a deepening sense of horror as a child suffocated a man with his bare hands right before his very eyes. The prisoner was starting to turn blue now and his eyes were rolling back in their sockets and Potter's arms trembled with exhaustion and rage. Beside him, Voldemort watched it all, enraptured, and proud beyond measure.

"POTTER!"

Harry, lost in his anger and hatred, burning with such a destructive need it could have been the will of Rhiannon herself, he could hear and see nothing but the prisoner and his choking and the echoing screams of the dead lying around them. And then everything was black, and was being pulled away, his fingernails tearing away bits of flesh as he lost his grip. He screamed and kicked and thrashed, clawing for his victim and at the interloper who had interrupted him, but the person didn't let go and the darkness over his eyes remained, blocking the source of his rage and his grief all at once. He struggled and strained, but without the prisoner directly before him the rage began to fade back into grief until sobbing once again replaced his screams, and his struggles weakened until he merely hung limply in his captor's arm.

"Sssshhh... Harry, it's alright. Calm down. Breath deep. It's over now."

"Pro-fessor? When d-did you get here?"

"Just now. I had to get Lestrage to unlock the entire castle again before I could come after you... and we're going to have a serious discussion about that later."

Harry said nothing, just hung there, too exhausted and too shocked by his own actions to move. The darkness over his eyes, which had to be Snape's hand, was a barrier he didn't want to cross. Not now. Maybe not ever.

"My Lord, I think it's best if I take Mr. Potter back to the castle," Snape said, turning to his master. There was an underlying edge to his voice, a tightly controlled anger that Voldemort might have found amusing if he weren't so angry himself. It had been very close. A half minute more and he would have seen for himself what happened when a pure soul murders. He could have made a horcux for Harry.

But Snape had to go and ruin it with his misguided concern for the boy's sanity. There was absolutely nothing wrong with his protégé's sanity as far as he was concerned. It was perfectly natural and probably therapeutic to destroy something that had caused you such great pain, and despite the social stigma at killing while still in adolescence it seemed a petty thing to stand in his way. He still remembered killing his father and grandparents with great fondness.

He very seriously considered killing Snape in that moment, and that's when he realized he was behaving irrationally himself. He had nearly allowed the death of a prisoner before their interrogation had even started and allowing Harry to become a killer so young went against his original plans for him. He had been so caught up in an emotional maelstrom he had let it dictate his actions, and that was not acceptable.

He would forestall Snape's punishment until he could discern whether it was truly warranted or not.

"Go then. I suspect we will see each other soon enough."

The potions master bowed as much as his position would allow, and dragged Harry away, his hand remaining steadfastly over his eyes until they were far enough from the remains of the colony to apparate.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Harry said nothing to Snape as they made their way back to the castle, nor when they were inside. He said nothing to McGonagall who looked ready to throttle him and then hug him at the same time. He said nothing to Hermione who cried at the sight of him, knowing somehow that he had been through something too horrible to say aloud. He said nothing to Lestrage who did yell at him in words he could hear but not understand. He said nothing to Pomfrey as she helped him change into a pair of hospital pajamas and slipped him a sleeping draught then tucked him in.

He said nothing, but the moment she turned her back he slipped out of the bed again and made his way over to Luna, pulling aside the privacy screen. She was pale, but no longer deathly so, and her breathing was slow and deep. Bandages peeked through the left side of her pajamas, meaning she was not completely healed even though she now stable.

He climbed onto the right side of her bed, and gently rested his chin atop her head and his arm over her stomach, then finally let the sleeping draught drag him under. A moment later, Luna stirred, not waking, but seeking out the familiar, comforting smell of a pack mate, and turning her nose into the crook of his neck.

Snape sat in the uncomfortable infirmary chair in the corner, watched it all, and said nothing.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Prisoner: "Ah, the traitor in person. I feel so honored."

Prisoner: "What's the matter? Nothing to say, traitor? Aren't you angry? We killed all your mangy mutts, and all you can do is stand there like a bug-eyed idiot?"

Harry: "You're awfully proud for a limp-dicked child-killer."

2. Voldemort is a necromancer. This is stated in canon, but I just thought I'd remind everyone since I don't think I mention it in my own story.

Book V:

Chapter 17: Battle Fatigue

Harry woke twenty-six hours later, staring half blind up at Luna's blurred form hovering above him and the warmth of her arms on either side of him. For a surreal moment he felt as if he were dreaming, of what exactly he didn't know. Of the future? Of the past?

And then the present caught up with him, and the warmth of her arms and her presence could not fight off their cold, stark reality. Fenrir Greyback and the Goddess Clan were dead, murdered on their sacred night when they were at their strongest and most vulnerable, and they were two of a handful of survivors.

"Did you see?" she asked, her voice breathy as a whisper and clear as bell all at once.

"I did."

"I'm sorry." She touched his cheek and pushed back his hair. "I knew you would go if I said it, but... I..."

"You didn't want to be alone in this," he finished for her.

"I'm sorry."

"Don't be. I don't want you to be alone either."

He could feel her begin to tremble, and he reached up and gently guided her back down, curling her up underneath his chin just as they had been sleeping previously. Her weeping was silent, but he could feel her every sob and tremor against his chest and felt it echo in the emptiness he felt inside. He could so easily resent her now. She had sought him out, for safety, for comfort, for who knows what or why and in doing so drawn him into her pain. He could resent her, but then they would both not only be hurt but also alone in their suffering.

"I'm sorry... I'm sorry..."

“Ssshhh... I know. It’s okay. It’s done now.”

The soft tap of footsteps drew his attention, and he instinctively sought out his wand on the bedside table, moving in a defensive position over Luna, who stilled beneath him. He waited tensely, until the privacy screen around their bed was pulled back just enough to allow a woman to enter.

“Good Heavens, Mr. Potter, you’re lucky I’m not a reporter! You have no idea what an inappropriate picture you two are making right now!” Madam Pomfrey chided, and Harry jumped off the bed as soon as he realized what she was talking about. Redness bloomed across his face. He had been grief-stricken, exhausted, and too shocked to question his initial instinct to seek Luna out before falling asleep, but if anyone had actually seen him he would have a hard time offering explanations. The fact that Pomfrey wasn’t demanding any was vaguely disturbing.

“I’m glad you’re up,” the medi-witch continued. “I need to give your friend...?”

“Luna,” he clarified.

“...your friend Luna an examination. One I don’t think you should be present for if you catch my meaning?”

“Er...not really, but I’ll take your word for it.”

“I think she wants me to get naked,” Luna suggested. “Though why that matters I don’t know. It’s not like you haven’t seen me naked before.”

Harry couldn’t see it, but he could imagine several different expressions crossing Pomfrey’s face, ranging from indignation to embarrassment, and busied himself looking for his glasses to hide his disconcertion. He would have to talk to Luna about what she said, but later, when he could speak without stuttering like a fool.

“Uh..er... yes, well, that’s a bit different. Um.... Where can I...er...?”

“Your friends brought you a change of clothes. They’re on the chair by the medicine cabinet. Change and then go take a walk for an hour or so,” Pomfrey said pointedly.

Knowing he had been dismissed, at least for an hour, he just about turned to go but looked back to Luna first.

“Are you going to be alright for an hour?”

“You’ll be back,” she stated, as if it were a certainty, but she held her arms in self-comfort and he felt his heart break at the sight. He went to his clothes, and after ruffling through them, found his watch and brought it back to her.

“Here. It’s the second most valuable thing I own, after my wand, so be careful with it. I’ll be back in an hour. I’ll get you something nice from the kitchen.”

She clutched his watch in her hands, feeling and hearing it beat like a little heart in her palm. His smile was reassurance and heartbreak all rolled into one, and hers was its mirror image. He slipped passed the privacy curtain, the sound of him moving around and changing his clothes persisted for a few minutes more, and then he was gone. At least... she checked the watch... for another fifty-two minutes anyway.

She turned to the woman who had sent her pack away. She wasn’t sure what to make of her. She was a healer, and as a healer’s apprentice Luna felt a sort of respect and sisterhood towards her, but she was also bizarrely alien. The crispness of her clothes, her lack of scent, and the congenial demeanor were not something she associated with women of their craft. If she were in the proper frame of mind, she would be enjoying the experience, but right now she wanted the comfort of the familiar.

“No worries, dearie,” the elder woman said, “The worst of it is over now. It can only get better from here.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry had no intention of returning to class that day if he didn't have to, but that didn't prevent class from coming to him. He had the bad luck to leave the hospital wing between classes and found himself wading through the usual mêlée with an unusual amount of attention being paid to him. He cut through crowd like skiff through calm waters, the students parting before him and only their wide-eyed stares dragged him down. He wondered what they knew, about Luna and that night, about his flight from Hogwarts, the massacre that he had found, the murder he had nearly...

"Harry."

He turned to see Natalie, her expression tight, pained. Guilt clawed at him. Once again he had rushed ahead without thinking about those he left behind, just like Snape said, and hurt those who cared about him. What had he put Natalie through? Hermione? All of his friends and teachers?

I'm sorry, Luna had said. Yeah, same here.

"Hey."

She opened her mouth to say something, but never got the chance as Snape stepped out of his classroom and entered the hallway, immediately spotting the wandering Gryffindor.

"Potter, are you making another escape attempt or just being a general nuisance?" he snapped, then cast a sweeping glare at the students milling about. "Don't you all have somewhere to be? If not I could use a few volunteers for my first years to practice on."

The inertia that followed in Harry's wake broke, and dozens of bodies hurried on their way. Natalie lingered, but a particularly sharp look from Snape sent her on her way with only a few backward glances. Snape turned his malevolence back to his original target.

“Well?”

“General nuisance, I suppose,” Harry said, looking pointedly at the floor. He wasn’t sure how he was supposed to act around the man who had prevented him killing another. Should he be grateful? Angry? Dismiss it altogether as a moment of temporary insanity? “Pomfrey kicked me out of the infirmary for an hour. I was going to the kitchen.”

“Yes, I suppose that is one of the few options left to you at the moment,” Snape said, almost off-handedly, and stepped back into his classroom. Harry made a move to follow, but before he could step through the door he felt himself repelled backwards. He stumbled and fell to his back. Snape was back at the door a moment later, glaring down at him.

“What part of your suspension don’t you understand, Potter? The ‘you shall not enter any classroom or library’ or the ‘compliance will be strictly enforced’?”

Harry glared up him. “How about the part where someone actually tells me I’ve been suspended?”

He climbed to his feet, angry and humiliated, and walked away. Suspension. On top of everything else he was bloody fucking suspended! Well, screw them! What did he care?

“Where are you going?”

He jumped, and turned around to see Snape had followed him.

“The kitchen, like I said.”

“You’re not going to ask about your suspension?”

You’d bloody well like that, wouldn’t you? Wait for me to come running to you for answers, and all I have to do is sit through your mockery to get them, he thought bitterly. Not this time.

“Ignorance is bliss. Behold my blissening state.”

He turned to leave. Snape touched his shoulder and he surprised even himself when he recoiled violently. They both stood there for a moment, staring at one another in shock. Awkwardness and uncertainty came over Harry, and he quickly moved to leave.

“Potter-“

“I don’t care!” he said, not looking back. “I don’t care one damn bit!”

By now most of the students had reached their next classes and the hallway was empty, making his escape route clear. It also meant he couldn’t hide from Snape’s eyes burning into the back of his head as he ran away.

Ooo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

“There you are.”

Harry looked up from the pumpkin juice he had been brooding over to find Hermione and Draco standing in the doorway of the kitchen. The house elves were scurrying about making him something to eat, as well as ‘something nice’ for Luna, and aside from their usual wide-eyed adoration they were otherwise unobtrusive. He wasn’t sure if he was glad for his friends distracting presence or anxious about what they would ask him. So much had happened and he hadn’t had time to digest any of it.

“Hey... aren’t you supposed to be in class?”

Draco rolled his eyes. “Faked a migraine. My dear sister here was just escorting me to the infirmary, but wouldn’t you know it? She got us lost.”

Harry gave him a look. “McGonagall actually buy that?”

“Not a chance,” Hermione said, and drew close to him. He shied away when he felt her reach out to hug him, and immediately felt like a right bastard at the hurt expression that crossed her face. He looked away. “Harry...”

He desperately grabbed for the first distracting topic he could think of.

“Snape said I was suspended. I don’t suppose you know the details?”

Hermione wasn’t fooled, but Draco spoke before she could prod him further.

“’ Two week suspension for leaving the school without appropriate supervision or permission and reckless endangerment of students, staff, and self’. You got off light. Lestranger wanted to expel you for the rest of the semester, but Snape nearly bit her head off.”

“He wasn’t the only one! McGonagall and Flitwick argued for him too.”

And didn’t that just make Harry feel like an utter asshole after how he’d walked away from Snape? The guy goes around pulling him out of the fires he’s started, and all Harry can think about is how much the man makes him feel like an idiot sometimes.

“Anyway,” Draco continued, “Two weeks or really thirteen days since it started yesterday. Not that it makes much difference, since you’ve been subpoenaed to appear before the military tribunal and who knows what else and would have been gone anyway.”

Harry blinked at him. What? He was suspended and subpoenaed?

“It does too make a difference! This is going to go on his permanent record!” Hermione protested, but even she seemed to think that was a minor affair, especially given the circumstances.

“Military tribunal?”

Draco and Hermione both turned away, and she remained focused on the elves busying themselves around the oven. "They need your official statement before they can take action against the Germans for what happened. They've been collecting evidence since yesterday. The papers have been flooded with the story. They know about the werewolf coming to Hogwarts, and that you saved her and then went to the colony. They... the papers have these... pictures..."

Harry closed his eyes, trying not to imagine what those pictures had recorded and calculated the possibility of him being able to avoid them for the rest of this natural life. About as likely as he was to forget what had happened, he thought. He checked the time with a tempus spell.

"I have to go here soon. Luna's expecting me."

"Harry..." Hermione said.

"I said I'd only be gone an hour."

"Harry..."

"Filly, how's it coming?"

"We's is wrapping it up now, Master Harry Sir!"

"HARRY!"

"What?!" he snapped back, startling both Hermione and Draco. He quickly reeled back in his anger. It was getting the better of him too quickly today. "Sorry. I'm just... tired, and she really does need me. I'm the only one she has right now."

Hermione gave him a said look. "I know, but she's not the only one hurting. You have people you can turn to also. Remember?"

He nodded, but didn't meet her eyes. He knew she meant well, and he loved her for it, but this wasn't something he wanted to burden her with. It wasn't something she could truly understand, and he didn't want her to. It was bad enough that he had to live with it.

"I know... but I've just been awake for an hour. I need some time to think... and I really do need to go. Filly?"

"Is ready sir!" She grinned up at him happily as she handed him a basket.

"Thank you," he said, and turned to his friends. "We'll talk again later." For the second time that day, he fled, feeling eyes burning into the back of his head. How much longer could he keep running? Where would he find himself when he stopped? The world had changed in just one night or was the world the same and only he that was different? Different how? Angrier if the last hour were any indication, but what else?

All he had were questions he didn't know if he wanted the answers to and decisions that needed to be made.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

She managed to get all the way to the dungeons before the tears came. She had felt the tell-tale signs of it while at dinner. Harry was not there, still hiding away in the infirmary, but his absence did nothing to hinder the talk about him. Much of it was idle speculation, curiosity, and the usual jealous malignment and if that had been all there was she was confident she could have lasted the entire dinner without the slightest reaction. It was concern for Harry that did it.

The Gryffidnor's appearance, however brief, had driven home the tragedy that had occurred to a people they had never met. His grief radiated out from him like a dementor's aura, sucking out the happiness of the air itself. He had smiled, or tried to, and his words had not been particular melancholic, but his eyes and his body language had betrayed him. He was suffering.

And it was so obvious that even the nimrods that inhabited Hogwarts had taken notice, and in their usual lack of propriety had gushed on and on about it to each other in hushed voices, awkward pauses, and trite expressions of sympathy. She had only made it a quarter way through her quiche, when a tightening around her sinuses warned her of impending embarrassment. She feigned lack of appetite and headed back to the Slytherin common room, hoping against hope she would be able to hide herself away before anyone noticed. She only just made it to the dungeons when suddenly her cheek was damp. Horrified, she ducked into an empty classroom before anyone could see her. She wiped away the first few tears, but the more she did it the more that came. Before she knew what happened she was sniffing and choking on sobs and nothing she did would make them stop.

“Natalie?”

She spun around, her eyes widening as she saw Draco standing in the doorway, looking as surprised as she was. It was too late already, but she turned away tried to wipe away the evidence of her crying.

“What do you want, Draco?” she said sharply.

“Are you crying?” he asked, stepping into the empty room and closing the door behind him.

“What do you think, stupid? I got hit with a Crying Hex. sniff.”

He didn’t say anything, and she was hoping against hope that he bought her ruse. If he had she had probably ruined it by looking when he moved to stand in front of her. He handed her his handkerchief.

“Here, use this. And don’t rub your eyes, it just makes them red and puffy.”

Reluctantly, she accepted it and patted her tear stained face and blew her nose.

“You can keep it,” he offered, smiling at her. She glowered back at him.

“This isn’t funny.”

“No, no, of course not. It must be deadly serious if you’re crying. Did something happen?”

She looked away. “No.”

“Does this have something to do with Harry?”

Her head snapped up. “No.”

He gave her a knowing look.

“Yes,” she admitted, and looked down. “Don’t laugh.”

“My self-preservation instinct is too well developed for that. What happened? Did he say something to you?”

She shook her head.

“No... he didn’t do anything wrong... sniff which I think is the problem.”

He gestured for her to elaborate, and she grit her teeth at his presumption.

“He looked so... frail this morning. I’ve never seen him look like that except when he’s sick or hurt. It wasn’t even this bad after Larousse died. He doesn’t deserve this. He doesn’t deserve to have these things happen to him... it just isn’t fair. It’s such a stupid thing to say, but it just isn’t fair.”

And the tears were back with a vengeance and the handkerchief was already soaked, and Draco was smiling in that annoyingly indulgent way. But instead of mocking her like she expected him to, like she would have in his position, he simply reached out and pulled her into a hug. She immediately stiffened, although he his hold was easy and firm, as if he done this a thousand times with her before.

“This is the first time you’ve ever cried for someone other than yourself, isn’t it?” Draco asked softly. “It’s okay. I promise I won’t tell.”

And like that she felt herself melting into his hold. She believed him. Even knowing he was the chief manipulating in Slytherin and a selfish brat, she still believed him. In certain ways, Draco was like her. Neither of them formed attachments to people easily, but when they did they guarded them fiercely and treated them like something precious. Had she somehow fallen into his circle of precious people without her even knowing it? The warmth and strength she felt in his arms, certainly made her feel that way.

oo
oo

Snape did not run but over the years he had perfected a sort of brisk walk that moved him at a speed most other people would have to jog to meet. This was particularly useful when leading miscreant students to their punishment, but today it served to maintain his dignity while still reaching his appointment on time. He had believed himself well prepared to complete his ‘chores’ in London before meeting Ira for dinner, but he hadn’t counted on the pedestrian traffic being quite so high or that he himself was quite so publically recognizable. He had been stopped more than once by complete strangers inquiring into Harry’s well-being, something he didn’t divulge because frankly it was none of their damn business.

Truthfully, he wasn’t sure he could have answered the questions even if he were so inclined. The boy had cloistered himself in the infirmary, spending most of his time with Luna. He didn’t fault Harry’s selection in companions, though their physical closeness left him uneasy. They were two orphans who had both been witness to something horrific that no one else around them could hope to understand. For the time being, they offered the comfort and companionship they both needed. It was when they parted ways, that Snape would really start to worry about Harry. Gryffindors where passionate to a fault, and Harry was no exception. His rage had been so profound he had nearly killed a man with his bare hands, and Snape had a hard time trying to imagine Harry suppressing those feelings for long. Already he had seen glimpses of it directed at himself. Would the boy end up expressing his anger on others or direct them internally? What other feelings lingered? Sorrow, indignation, depression, guilt, fear? It was hard to tell with Harry. As emotional as a person he was, it was hard to tell what was going on with him until some over the top gesture revealed his feelings.

If he were lucky, Harry would have purged a majority of his feelings before he returned to the castle. He had left that day with Luna for Edinburgh and the military tribunal, and wouldn't return until his suspension was over. Snape hoped for the best, but as usual, mentally prepared himself for yet another disaster to descend on him.

At least he had finally gotten rid of the Body Tree, although its ultimate purpose still baffled him. He had kept it too long already, and with the war in full swing he couldn't afford to have that particular threat ignored just to sate his curiosity.

"Name, sir?" the maitre 'd asked as he stepped in the restaurant. Loraine's was not the fanciest restaurant in London, but it did have a respectable serving staff and a cozy atmosphere. Lucius had liked coming here during his collegiate years, when he was still too much of a prig to eat at a pub and too prideful to ask for more money from his parents than the allowance they already allotted him. The booths were charmed so that unless you were sitting there or standing right next to it, the voices you heard would only sound like garbled nonsense, allowing for privacy without the awkward deafness of silencing charms.

"Snape."

"Right this way, please."

He was lead to a corner booth, where Ira was already waiting for him, skimming through an article, a set of glasses perched at the tip of her nose. She smiled as he sat down.

“I didn’t know you wore glasses.”

“What? Oh! These.” Embarrassed, she removed them and tucked them away in her purse. “Only for reading. Bookworm tendencies are hard on the eyes.”

“And what are you reading?”

“ ‘ The Ethics of Creating Unnatural Life’ by Holt.”

Snape made a face. “I’ve read it.”

“You didn’t agree with him?” she asked, looking a bit disturbed. Holt’s work was canon in academic circle, particularly in classes on professional ethics. He was the scientific Jesus of his age.

“He made some very good points, but he also dealt in the realm of absolutes. Creating an animal only to serve oneself is absolutely wrong. Creating a human being at all for any reason is absolutely wrong. Creating life without a specific purpose is absolutely wrong. I can name several examples, particularly in medicine, where these principles are violated routinely and no one questions the moral reasoning behind it. A man with no flexibility in reasoning is a man without imagination or a zealot or both.”

“I see what you mean, but I think he saw the exploitations of those ‘flexibilities’ when he wrote his paper and believed that the atrocities one could cause made the benefits insufficient to justify such an indefinite stance could create.”

They argued congenially for nearly an hour over Holt, which was a novel experience for Snape. Whenever he got into academic debates, in his youth and in adulthood, it typically was with men and usually resulted in a lot of shouting and insults. However, Ira was a generous debater, listening to his arguments without interrupting before presenting him with her own ideas, and though they didn’t agree by the end of the debate, he did respect her rhetoric ability.

“You look tired, Professor,” Ira said, once their conversation switched gears from academic to personal.

“It’s been a very trying week.”

“How is Harry?”

It was a fair question and one he had hoped to avoid.

“I don’t know. He’s been avoiding me... and everyone else. The only company he seeks is the werewolf girl, Luna.”

Ira’s eyes softened in sympathy. “And how are you?”

Now that question caught him off guard. “Well enough. I can’t say I had any particular attachment to the werewolves.”

Wasn’t that an understatement? If it weren’t for the fact that Harry would have gone stark raving mad, Snape wouldn’t have been sorry to see Sirius Black listed among the dead. Logically, he knew what happened was a tragedy, but emotionally he felt it only by proxy.

“That’s not what I meant. It can’t be easy for you, being responsible for Harry and for the safety of all of your students with war knocking at your backdoor.”

“Technically, the Headmistress is responsible for the students’ safety, but... I can’t say I trust her with the task. She’s been practical with the defense of the castle, but her spirit just isn’t in it,” Snape acknowledged. “I am less worried, however, about Hogwarts as I am about your own university. Has there been any added security procedures?”

She looked away, skillfully distracted.

“Oh, well...sort... kind... no, not really.”

He smirked. “So have you given thought to my offer?”

She stiffened, and he had a feeling he should have just stuck his foot in his mouth. Trouble came in threes. Harry had brought it twice already, first with the werewolf cuddlefest, then the romp through the site of a massacre. Ira finishing it off seemed strangely appropriate. She was awfully troublesome for such an unremarkable woman.

“You’re going to say something unpleasant, aren’t you?” he said, urging her to get it over with now. She bit her lip, and he was reminded that she had to be almost ten years younger than him, still in her twenties.

“I... You know when I tried to break it off the first time... I did it because I didn’t want to lead you on...”

“You’re married?” he surmised, feeling something icy settle around his heart.

She looked up at him, her eyes wide. “No! No, of course not! Well, not anymore. I’m divorced. Have been for four years now.”

The iciness thawed a bit, but he was still a little shocked to learn about the divorce. Divorce wasn’t a common practice in the wizarding world, even before Voldemort’s rule, and there were only a few instances in which it could be done. Endangerment of the spouse and or children of their union, murder of another family member, polygamy, violation of the marital contract, or transformatism of a partner (i.e. turned into a werewolf, vampire, fairy, etc) were about the only situations in which it might apply. He wondered which category her husband fell under.

“...But I can’t marry you.”

He was taken back by her forthrightness, and then a bit offended by her presumption. Yes, he was looking for a potential wife, but that didn’t necessarily mean he would choose her. A sarcastic remark was at the tip of his tongue, but she beat him to it.

“I can’t have children.”

And that sarcastic remark died.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry and Luna stayed at one of Voldemort's estates somewhere between Edinburgh and Perth. It was large and roomy and surrounded on all sides by wilderness, and they liked it that way. They spent most of their days outside, walking the swampy meadow and exploring the pine forest surrounding their shelter. They took their meals outside when possible, and in the study by the fire when it wasn't. At night, after the staff had gone to sleep, he would get up and climb into Luna's bed. Victoria must have suspected something, but said nothing. In fact, no one said much of anything, including themselves.

The only times they spoke of what happened was when they were debriefed in Edinburgh, and that was a mind-numbing and painful experience, one that fueled Harry's own simmering anger and resentment. To General Malfoy and his minions it was all just another move on a chessboard, and perhaps Harry could have lived with that, but not with Voldemort's indifference. He knew Voldemort was an apathetic bastard, but he had expected something from the man who had lost an ally and perhaps even a friend only a few days ago.

Yet, there was no change of expression, no tension, no demands of respect as he oversaw Malfoy's ruthless questioning of Harry and Luna. The only time Voldemort had said anything through the entire proceeding was when his general had made the mistake of questioning Harry's sanity and then it had been directed at Harry.

"If my sanity is faulty it failed long before I met the werewolves," Harry sneered, "Voluntarily working so closely with our Lord does suggest some sort of neuroses."

It wasn't an original though. The wording was an adaptation of something Sirius had jokingly said to him once before. The absolutely stunned silence that followed his utterance made it well worth remembering. Even Lucius looked like he had been slapped with a fish. He glanced over at the Dark Lord, who looked less than amused.

“No offense.”

“None taken, but perhaps it would be best to save the witty remarks until later?”

Except there hadn't been a later. After his testimony, he's shied away from further contact with Voldemort and finally just left the court offices in a flurry of camera flashes and shouted questions. That was three days ago and he hadn't seen the man since.

“I wonder what they are now,” Luna pondered, staring out across the moor, her feet half sunken into mud and her eyes far away. Harry, who had been watching a flock of sparrow dancing in the distance, turned to her.

“Who?”

“Father and mother and Diana and Jackal and all the others. Did they find new bodies yet? Have they forgotten us and started their new lives? Or do still cling to their spirit forms and watch over us now? Father... I bet father is still around. I can't imagine father wanting to be anything other than a wolf.”

Oh. Harry had forgotten about that. Pagans like themselves went to neither heaven nor hell, merely reincarnated or transcended into godhood. He had simply thought of them as... gone. Now... now there were so many other possibilities, and if thinking about it didn't dredge up the awful memory of them lying dead in the snow he might have seriously pondered it.

“I don't know, I think he might have made a pretty good goat. A mean, angry goat.”

They turned to see Sirius and Remus coming towards them, dressed in their in their finest leathers and furs (which were still perfectly appropriate for wading through swamp muck) and silent as ghosts. They looked tired, but strong and serious at the same time, and Harry felt the first stirrings of relief and happiness since the full moon.

Sirius and Remus lived. The Goddess Clan still had a Head Alpha, and they would rebuild. It would never be the same, but it could still be good. When Sirius pulled him into his arms and held him tight, Harry relaxed, and when Luna and Remus joined their huddle he all but melted. They were together. They were pack, and they were strong. Everything would be okay.

He almost laughed at the ticklish sensation of Sirius and Remus sniffing at him, puffs of air brushing against his neck and ears. Luna was doing the same, even going so far as to touch her nose to the tip of Remus'. Finally, they pulled away from each other.

"You are hurt, Luna?" Sirius asked first, frowning at the heavy scent of potions that lingered on her breath.

"Not anymore," she said, wistfully, then added a bit more curiously. "You smell of men."

"Being cramped in a boat with wizards for two days will do that. The queen insisted I have an escort," he said, irritated at the memory. He turned to Harry.

"And how are you, pup? I heard you got yourself mixed up in this mess."

Harry smiled ruefully and shrugged.

"I got suspended for two weeks."

"I'll make sure you can't sit for two weeks if you ever run after trouble like that again." His threat might have carried a bit more weight if Harry couldn't have read the pride and affection in his eyes. Remus on the other hand looked more than ready to carry out the threat if it came to that. He accepted both their reactions as signs of their concern and let them warm him.

"How long are you staying?"

Sirius' expression fell somewhat, and Remus spoke for him. "We only came to check on you both. We have to meet with Voldemort in Edinburgh and return to the Goddess colony. We will be performing the ascension rites for Fenrir and funeral rites for the others tomorrow."

A tense silence passed between them for a moment, before Luna spoke.

"I'll bring a ptarmigan. He liked ptarmigan. You'll help me?" she asked, turning to Harry.

"Er... yeah, of course."

She smiled and moved away, deeper into the moor to hunt her decided pray. Harry looked to them both questioningly.

"Why is she bringing a bird?"

Remus and Sirius shared an amused look, before answering.

"Fenrir was Head Alpha, and perhaps the most important werewolves in centuries. The chances of him ascending into godhood are high. He'll be buried with all the respect and offerings we can afford him, so he will be comfortable in his realm. Food, clothing, weapons, all of it. Without it, he'll end up like the demi-goddess, forced to anchor himself to one of the living or dissolve into nothingness."

Harry had not known any of this, and felt a flush of guilt over his own ignorance. He had been seriously remiss in his studies since Brennan's death, and had been relying far too heavily on improvisation and guesswork. Tomorrow would be a rather painful tutorial, he suspected.

"Oh... is there anything you want me to do?"

Sirius shook his head. Remus said, “Just what you’ve been doing. Watch after Luna. She is strong, but doesn’t connect with others easily. Right now, you’re her only friend.”

He nodded, and let them ruffle his hair and say their goodbyes, before he turned back to the moor and followed after Luna.

Ooo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Whatever gentility and patience Sirius had, he left with his godson and Luna, and by the time he reached the meeting hall he had kicked down two doors and thrown a Sentinel out the window (they were only the second floor so he would probably live). Remus might have been able to reel in his temper, but the security had refused to let the beta entry, which only served to irritate him further. At some point, Chief Sentinel Morgan has planted himself just behind him, his presence assuring his own people that they had intentionally let an irate werewolf storm through the building. Voldemort’s expression when he burst into the meeting hall was decidedly unimpressed.

“Welcome, Lord Blackbone,” he greeted blandly. “As rambunctious as ever, I see.”

Sirius’s growl rumbled through the room like encroaching thunder. The dozen men and women in the room reached for their wands instinctively, but only Voldemort had been allowed to keep one in the room.

“I’m bored of your nonsense already. What do you want?”

“A cure for stupidity would be delightful, but I’ll settle for a modicum of civility. Come now, there’s no reason to be irate. Your former Head Alpha and I had a mutually productive relationship, there’s no reason we can’t have the same.”

Sirius’ eyes narrowed.

“I can think of a few,” he said, but settled himself into a chair (after emptying it of its former occupant with a glare). “What do you want?”

Voldemort smiled, and with a gesture everyone in the room left, leaving only the Dark Lord and the alpha. Once privacy was assured, the Dark Lord spoke.

“I want us to help each other, Blackbone. Help each other fulfill our obligations to our people. The murder of your Head Alpha, his family, and his clan is an insult that can not be allowed to go unanswered, anymore than I can ignore the destruction of the wards and the attack on the villages. The weaknesses that they have exposed cannot be allowed to remain unprotected. You need my help, and I want yours.”

Sirius barked out a laugh, sharp and ugly.

“I don’t need your help, and you don’t want mine. You need me to cooperate with you. The Snake and Wolf Treaty and my own blood-bound oath to you means I can never act as your enemy, but the same treaty and all your werewolf sympathy campaigns means you’re in the same position. I may not have free movement outside my territory in Britain, but I have more than enough in France to execute my vengeance. I’ve got a bloody legion of angry men and women dying to fight back.”

Voldemort’s amusement vanished. He should have realized that Blackbone would make things difficult. Fenrir had never been a savvy politician, and never really had a need to be, but he did appreciate the power that being Voldemort’s ally brought to the table. His successor wasn’t so open-minded.

“Don’t over simplify the matter,” he warned. “Your territories and the packs exist only because I let them exist, just as the French werewolf territories exist only because Queen Ophelia is letting them exist. If you make a nuisance of yourself, I won’t hesitate to make your packs suffer for it.”

The depth of hatred in Sirius eyes burns like dragonfire, and Voldemort takes a moment to appreciate the shiver that runs up his spine at the sight of it. It is beautiful and enigmatic, and he wonders if Fenrir, in his ephemeral godhood, has already lain his blessing down on his successor. As magnificent as it was, however, it was also counterproductive. He needed to calm the man down again. He lets out a sigh.

“I am not asking for much, and I am paying for what I ask. Fifty men and women with good health and a bad disposition. In return, I’ll make sure your territories have proper protection during the full moon. I’ll even throw in military pay for the troops. I get the extra man-power and you get the support you need. It’s a win-win situation.”

The burning hate radiating from Sirius cooled to an icy regard, and for a moment Voldemort thought he had won and was somewhat disappointed.

“I want final approval on any mission involving my people.”

Oh goody, round two.

“Absolutely not.”

“Then you don’t get your troops. Did you really think I’d let you use my people as expendable pawns? I won’t be sending them on any suicide missions, dying for your cause of the week or setting them to do your dirty assassin work. If I’m going to give you any of my warriors I want to be damn certain I get at least most of them back and with their sanity intact. We’ve lost enough to your games as it is.”

Touché.

“Fine,” he concedes, because all things considered it’s a cheap price to pay. Blackbone wasn’t the gabby sort, and even if he was he had no one to tell plans to. No one who could use the information against him anyway. “I’ll have a treaty written up. You can review it after your coronation.”

“Fine. Are we done?”

“Yes. Always a pleasure, Blackbone.”

The alpha stalked out without a word, and Voldemort starts to gather up his papers. It had been a long week, but he felt energized, pulled along the momentum of history unfolding. There was waiting and planning and positioning to be done (when wasn't there?), but now there was also action and reaction. Life and death were on the line now, not just for individuals, but for entire populations and every choice he made may well determine his country's future. Or lack there of.

He felt like a god.

“My Lord.”

Morgan came into the room, his usual non-expression tight. Something had happened. Voldemort wondered how many casualties were involved.

“What is it?”

The Chief Sentinel closed the doors, raising his suspicions of some sort of disaster. “I have just received word of some sort of plot being uncovered in London. I believe it worth bringing to your attention.”

Mentally, the Dark Lord sighed. Conspiracies and murder plots directed at his person were weekly occurrences, and he had long been bored of hearing about them. There were very few original ideas nowadays, and most were dealt with before they ever came to his attention. The only interesting parts were when he got to interrogate the perpetrators and frankly, he didn't have time for that particular hobby. Morgan, however, wasn't the sort to waste his time with trivial matters, so when the man handed him a report Voldemort actually skimmed through it.

Then went back and read it again, his brow furrowing. He stared at the picture paper clipped to the document.

He stood up and turned to Morgan. “Take me there immediately.”

He looked ready to protest, but then thought better of it. Half an hour later, they both stepped through the University of London's floor in the campus student center, stalking passed several dozen occupants before they even realized who he was. Dressed in his usual robes and without the conspicuous flock of Sentinels (Morgan had dressed in his civilian clothes for this particular outing) and reporters following after him, he could easily be mistaken for a professor or even a graduate student and no one gave him or his servant a second glance as they walked towards the astronomy building.

The investigating Sentinels had done well in keeping a low profile. Only one woman guarded the front, disguised as a student simply reading on the steps, and once he slipped inside the building Voldemort he located half a dozen more.

"Where is it?" he asked the closest investigator. The man swallowed thickly and led him down some stairs and into a boiler room. A group of half a dozen Sentinels lingered here, gathering boxfuls of evidence and photographic documentation. As the Dark Lord approached, they moved out of his way, revealing one last door. The door itself was unmarked and unremarkable, easily overlooked. He turned the knob and stepped inside.

A child was hanging in the middle of the room, hanging from a tree no less, his pale naked limbs dangling limply at his sides. He moved closer to examine him, prodding the little arms (they were oddly warm) and checking the noose, which he quickly discovered wasn't a noose at all but a vine growing out the child's neck. Lastly, he checked the face, and confirmed what precisely he was looking at.

Tom.

At least, a seven year old facsimile of him. Of himself. But why would anyone want to..?

"Collect a sample of its tissue for testing and then destroy it," he said, not tearing his eyes away.

“Yes, my Lord,” Morgan acknowledged.

“Do you have those responsible for this travesty in custody?”

From the boiler room, an investigator stepped in, her insignia designating her the head of the team. “Not yet, my Lord, but we do have a suspect. A student here at the university. He’s been missing for over a month now. Judging by the recent care that’s been given this...thing... he never left the campus.”

“His name?”

“Horace McGunny.”

Ooo
oo

Book V

Chapter 18: Heaven and Earth

The days returned to their usual autumnal chill, leaving only a bright, silver sky to remind them of the storm that had come and gone. The werewolves, from every colony in Britain down to the last man, woman, and child, had gathered in the remains of the old colony the day after Voldemort's men had finished their investigation, and in those five days leading to the Goddess Clan's funeral rites, tore down the burnt timbers and cleared the scattered debris, until it was as if no one had ever lived there at all. Then they dug out the graves, thirty in total, one large grave at the center and the rest laid in a ring, like the minute markers of giant clock. Then three more holes were dug, larger than the others, equally spaced around the ring, and there they built altars and made their offering to the dead.

Luna brought a ptarmigan. Harry brought a hare. They laid them with the other pack's animal offerings, piled atop the still warm bodies; furred, feathered, and scaled, and wiped the blood from each other's hands. In the second altar, others placed offering of clothing, weapons, tools, furniture, books, flowers, cookery, and crockery filled with foodstuff. There was a third pit, but only one was permitted to place offerings there.

Harry watched Jane Canis as she appeared and disappeared with mysterious bundles in and out of the third altar pit, her once curious brown eyes now distant under the weight of the goddess' possession*. A short distance away, her father, Stephen, watched on with all the grief and frustration of a man who has lost his child to death, and for now that might as well be the case. He could no longer touch his own daughter, not laugh with her, or reprimand her, or comfort her. It would be two three years until Jane became an unsuitable host and the possession ended, and by then she wouldn't be the same. The man had lost something irretrievable.

Luna tightened her hand in Harry's.

"It's not your fault," she said.

“I brought them here,” he countered softly.

“They belong here.”

“He lost his daughter.”

“You couldn’t have known.”

“I brought this down on them, Luna. I brought this down on your family. If I hadn’t pushed Proposal 4-66-“

“And if father hadn’t accepted it, and if those werewolves in Berlin hadn’t killed those people, and if Stephen hadn’t rescued you... A whole lot of ‘if’s, Harry. All the joys and sorrows of the world do not revolve around your decisions alone.”

Harry closed his eyes. He knew that. He did, but it was so hard. In his naïveté, he hadn’t considered the retribution the Germans might exact. It had just seemed like the right thing to do at the time. More frustrating was the fact that a part of him knew he hadn’t been wrong.

A horn sounded, low and mournful, drawing him from his thoughts. The others had finished making their offerings, and were now forming a semi-circle around the ring of graves or carrying wooden pallets up the path towards the clearing. He turned to Luna, who was looking towards the line of men and women heading away from them.

“I have to go. I should help carry some of my brothers.”

“Do you want me to..?”

She shook her head. “You’re not ready yet.”

Slowly, she pulled her hand from his and made her way towards the clearing, where the bodies of the slain had been prepared for burial. He didn’t understand how she could face them so soon, when he himself shied away from the mere memory of what he had seen. She was so much stronger than she looked.

And then he was alone for the first time since it had happened. He felt the autumn chill starting to seep into his awareness, and began to search for familiar faces. Sirius and Remus were not there, performing ritual cleansing for their part in the funeral rites somewhere else, and he doubted Stephen wanted his company at the moment and his wife and children were nowhere in sight. Everyone else he knew happened to be dead. The cold was starting to seep in deeper now, and he tightened his cloak around him. His hands were shaking. His thoughts were becoming disjointed

“Not now,” he muttered, “You can’t do this now.”

A strange, familiar magic brushed against him, and he spun around to find Jane staring up at him. He stiffened, and looked around for her father. Stephen was watching them alright, and judging by his expression he wasn’t as nonchalant about Harry’s role in recent affairs as Luna was. Harry swallowed thickly and turned back to Jane who seemed to want his attention.

“We have a little time,” she said. “Follow me.”

She led him a ways from the others, within sight but out of hearing, and then turned back to him. She stared at him for a long time, before pulling some herbal leaves from a pouch in her pocket and handed them to him.

“Chew these, but don’t swallow. They will help calm you.”

Hesitantly, he did as she instructed and grimaced at the bitter flavor that coated his tongue. They left his mouth feeling dry, but after a minute his hands stopped shaking and his thoughts cleared.

“Thank you,” he said softly.

“You’re still sad,” she said. “Why?”

His expression darkened, feelings of bitterness rising up to swamp his guilt. “I know you’re not really human, but I thought even you would realize people dying makes us sad.”

She tilted her head curiously.

“But they are not dying. They died days ago. Today, they are reborn. Are you not happy for them?”

His fists clenched and he glared at her. “Is that how you see it? That just because they go on as something else, that everything’s fine? That what is lost is completely irrelevant? Is that why the Moon did nothing that night? It’s just like putting on a new pair of clothes, isn’t it? That’s why you let them kill Fenrir and Athena and Diana, because what’s another-“

Being slapped is never a pleasant experience, but being slapped by a demi-goddess is nothing short of brutal. Even in an eight-year-old’s body, the blow was enough to knock Harry to the ground and wash the bitter flavor of potions away with the coppery taste of his own blood. Stunned, he rolled weakly to his hands and knees, and stared wide-eyed at the pint-sized deity.

“Do not presume to know our thoughts or feelings. They are beyond your realm of understanding, mortal,” she state coolly, her expression completely unchanged.

He spat out a mouthful of blood, and idly noted that he’d accidentally swallowed the leaves she’d given him.

“Why did you let it happen?”

She looked at him blankly, and for a moment he was afraid she was going to hit him again, but she did eventually speak.

“My mother and I are forces of nature and spirit, but we are not the only ones. Even we can be overcome.” She moved towards him, and he flinched away but she continued passed him towards the funeral grounds. He watched her go and grit his teeth. There was no way that he could accept that there was nothing they could have done to prevent this. The Moon had the power to move oceans and induce insanity. What was a couple of bullies on broomsticks in comparison to that? If nothing else, they could have at least warned Fenrir. Now was not the time to call her on her feeble excuses, though.

Especially not when his head was still spinning from the smack.

So he climbed to his feet, spat out another mouthful of blood, and returned to the others.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

The cottage was just how he left it and so was Pettigrew, when Voldemort stormed through the front door. The ratty little man scurried into the foyer with his wand out as the wards shrieked at the unexpected visitor, but froze and paled at the sight of the Dark Lord glaring at him. Instantly, he was reminded why he despised Pettigrew so much, and how happy he would have been to let him die out here in exile. If it weren't for the discovery of the body with his own youthful countenance at the University of London's, and the abundance of evidence surrounding it, he might have succeeded but he suspected Tom was once again trying to make his life difficult.

"Ah..ah..m-my lord, w-what an unexpected p-pleasure. Er..ah.. w-what c-can I do for-"

"Silence the wards," he snapped, and headed towards the stairs. By the time the blaring sirens fell quiet, he had already entered his private collection. The familiar display cases, filed with a variety of dark artifacts he had collected throughout his travels, were coated with dust and he could already sense the protective wards on several of them were starting to degrade.

Pettigrew had been neglectful of his responsibilities and he would make sure the rat suffered for it, but first he needed to check the item he necessary to verify his suspicions. He pulled out his wand, and with a violent swish, shattered one of the display cases into a fine shower of glass and dark magic. He toed through the remains until he found what he was looking for and picked it up.

Merlin's death coin lay in his palm without so much as a flicker of magic, dark or otherwise. Tom had was gone. For who knows how long. Anger, frustration, and something akin to fear came over him, and it took his iron self-control to keep his face neutral when he turned to Pettigrew, hovering nervously in the doorway.

"Pettigrew... have you touched this at all since I placed it here?" he asks calmly, but already the rat animagus looks ready to piss himself.

"No, no, no! I never did! I never could even if I wanted to! I don't like coming up here at all if I can help it," the man rambled, and by the neglect of the room Voldemort wouldn't be surprised if he were telling the truth, but he couldn't take the risk. Besides, hadn't he already determined Pettigrew would suffer for the neglect of his duty?

"Legilimens!"

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooooooo

Bagpipes preceded the funeral procession, a loud, echoing bray that drowned out the deathly silence, but not the heavy despair of death as a seemingly endless line snaked its way towards the burial ground. The dead were dressed in their winter clothes and their faces and hair lovingly groomed, and tied to narrow pallets carried by two strong men or women to their respective graves where they were lowered. Those among the dead that were mates were placed in a single grave together, and likewise the younger children were laid beside them. Luna carried her youngest brother swaddled in a blanket to Athena's grave at the center of the ring, and with the utmost tenderness placed him back into his mother's arms.

Harry stood perfectly still, his eyes wide and unblinking, as every man, woman, and child was laid to rest. On either side of him, the werewolves wept silently or watched stoically, drawing closer together for physical comfort and Harry felt their magic slide against him, their grief prickling against his skin.

Fenrir was brought in last, carried by Sirius and Remus, the future Head Alpha and his beta being the only ones deemed worthy to carry him. Fenrir had always been impressive to Harry, but not exactly someone pleasant to look at. He was scarred and weathered, and shaving had never been art he seemed to care about mastering. Like all the others, the former Head Alpha had been meticulously groomed, but even smooth shaven and dressed in the finest clothes they could find, his face looked harsh and grave without the hard, wicked, laughing personality that sparkled in his eyes or hid in the curve of his mouth. Harry found himself missing it. Then the old king was lowered into the grave at the center of the ring beside his wife and sons, and disappeared.

There were words spoken, by Sirius, by Jane, by Luna, by a dozen other nameless faces that blurred together, but Harry could only remember a few things said here and there. The bitter taste of herbs was back in his mouth, and his stomach twisted unpleasantly where the herbs had settled. He wondered idly if he had been poisoned, then dismissed the thought as unimportant. If he died, there were plenty of open graves available.

At some point, Luna returned to his side. Her magic didn't prickle, but soothed and warmed. Or maybe that wasn't her magic so much as her cheek resting against his shoulder. It was getting harder to concentrate, harder to even keep his eyes open, but he knew he had to. Had to watch it all from beginning to end even if he couldn't make out the words.

“, it's funny, ya know,” a familiar voice growled beside him. “Most of them would'a been more than happy to kill me themselves, and now look at'm. Crying like they'd just lost their mother.”

“You're not the only one dead. Maybe some of them are burying their mothers,” Harry pointed out, glaring at Greyback or at least in Greyback's general direction. He was having a hard time focusing. The old alpha threw him a feral grin and chuckled darkly.

“That's no way to be talk'n to a god, brat.”

“You’re not a god...you’re just dead,” he mumbled...slurred... did he even actually say anything?

“Luckily for me, the two aren’t mutually exclusive.”

“You’re not a god, Greyback,” Harry repeated, except now that he looked closer at Fenrir it didn’t seem to be an impossibility. He was wearing the clothes he had seen on his corpse, soft black wool and thick grey furs, but his face was as rugged and badly shaven as he remembered, well suited to the lively and at times abrasive personality he had known in life. The one true peculiarity was his eyes, one bright yellow and the other milky blue. He wondered at the significance. “Alright,” Harry conceded, “What are you a god of?”

The grin he received was chilling.

“War.”

Harry opened his eyes (when had he closed them?) and stared up at halo of faces hovering above him. He was laying on someone’s cloak, he could feel the fur beneath his fingers and the sticks and underneath that against his back. Had he fainted? He hadn’t eaten since yesterday and then the herbs...

“Harry? Pup?” Sirius started, his expression tight with concern.

“I’m sorry,” Harry managed, although it was weak and slurred. “I didn’t mean to fall asleep.”

His godfather’s mouth twitched into the beginning of a smile.

“You didn’t fall asleep, Harry. You fell into a trance. Do you remember anything? Anything you saw or said?”

He thought about it, snatching at his dreaming, trying to recall when it had started was a lot harder than finding where it had ended.

“I saw Greyback.”

Remus, who was on the other side of him, nodded. "Yes, we gathered that much. We were afraid he was trying to take over your body. You started rambling about Greyback not being a god and then you got this look...the kind he used to have some times when he intended to something particularly nasty."

Harry blinked. He couldn't remember rambling, but then he couldn't remember much of anything. "That sounds....really embarrassing..."

"More like really scary. Don't ever do that again."

"Oookaaayyy..."

Sirius and Remus shared a look. "What's wrong with him? Why's he acting all... loopy?" Sirius asked.

"Maybe he's sick?" Remus offered, then touched his head. "He doesn't have a fever."

"Maybe he can hear you even when you don't talk directly at him?" Harry suggested, then scanned the crowd of curious faces until he found one completely indifferent one. He pointed an accusing finger at Jane. "You drugged me."

"It was completely unintentional," she said evenly.

"Clutz."

Luna giggled. Jane ignored her.

"Tell them what you saw."

"Don't you know?"

"Yes, but it will mean more coming from you."

He told them. There was a great deal of talking and shouting and laughing that followed. Apparently, having a war god in the pack was a good thing for some reason, but exactly why Harry was too tired to figure out. Luckily, his little walk through la-la land hadn't really started until the after the major funeral rites had been completed, and Sirius was happy to hand Harry off to a group of healers at the temporary lodges that had been erected to house everyone while the rest of the pack finished. The healers, all women, peppered him with questions, about his vision, about his relation to Sirius, about his relationship to Luna, even as they practically shoved hot food and tea down his throat so he couldn't answer even if he wanted to. Luna hovered behind them, making funny faces that had Harry nearly choking on his food. Then they left him alone with Luna, who cuddled up next to him and wrapped them both in a blanket.

"Are you alright?" she asked.

"I'm okay. It was just weird. I didn't even know I was dreaming until I woke up. Are you okay? I didn't scare you, did I?"

She shook her head and smiled.

"I was worried when you didn't respond to any of my questions, but then you started talking and I knew what was happening. You touched my cheek and kissed my forehead. Do you remember doing that?"

He shook his head.

"Father used to do that all the time. I knew you would be okay then. He wouldn't have hurt you. He liked you."

Harry couldn't say he shared her point of view, as those few instances where they had actually talked directly to one another had been at least partially hostile, and even in his dream or vision or whatever it was he hadn't been particularly amicable. Of course, to Greyback, liking someone and being nice to them probably weren't related. He liked Sirius after all, and he'd gutted him.

“Well, I’m glad I have daddy’s approval. I don’t reckon on getting on the bad side of a war god for canoodling with his little girl,” he said lightly.

She giggled into his arm. “Is that what we’ve been doing? I have to say canoodling is a lot more fun than it sounds.”

“It does sound a bit like we’ve been knitting socks or something, doesn’t it?”

“Yes, just a bit. Harry, can I ask you a favor?” She pulled back a little so that he could see her wide, beautiful gray eyes. He was suddenly reminded, not for the first time, that Luna wasn’t a little girl. Her eyes were dilated, lips slightly parted, and her body pressed against his arm was soft curves and sweet smells.

“Y-yeah, sure.”

“Kiss me?”

And it was only a matter leaning down, ever so slightly and tilting his head just so, and suddenly they were.

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Tom set down the newspaper (the sixth one he’s read today, this particular one was from Britain’s Wizarding Weekly headlining Harry’s suspension from Hogwarts with rumors of him being under mental duress), and rubbed his temple. The pain was becoming more persistent, and negotiating with Horace had done nothing to stymie the migraines. The latest news about the attack on the werewolf colony and Harry’s own involvement had fueled the boy’s righteous indignation, which he was using to continuously harass and annoy him.

It didn’t matter to Horace that Tom hadn’t intended to hurt Harry, that he was in fact sorry to involve his young friend at all and would have taken different actions if he had know it would threaten him. No, all Horace could see was that it was some how Tom's fault that Seibligg was a selfish, opportunistic bully. Brat.

"Halloween is only a few days away."

Tom looked up to see Katarina gliding into the living room with a graceful rolling slink. The sway of her hips was like the swing of a pendulum, drawing his eyes and his mind to her hypnotic grace. The throbbing behind his eyes, however, reminded him that any attempt at (or a yielding to) seduction would bring more pain than pleasure.

"And?"

"We should do something... special," she suggested, a bloodlusty gleam in her eyes. Tom mentally groaned. He enjoyed murder and mayhem as much as the next psychopath, but he wasn't here to play games. Katarina had gotten a taste for the hunt, for the power it gave her and the rush, and it had become increasingly difficult to rein her in. He had feeling that soon she would do something stupid, and he would have to decide if keeping her around was worth the risk.

"I am all for it, my beautiful death," he said sweetly, because he was willing to indulge her if he could use the situation to his advantage, "But we will have to do it outside of Berlin. The Dark Lord's orders. With this latest attack in Britain... Berlin is the only suitable target for retribution. We must leave if we do not wish to be caught in the cross-fire."

She frowned. "Leave? Now? The election is only a few days after Halloween!"

"Precisely," Tom said, his impatience starting to show through. "The Dark Lord has been reluctant to give me any details in advance, but he wouldn't have suggested abandoning such a valuable post unless it was absolutely necessary. Besides, he has important work for us in Frankfurt."

"Goblintown? Ugh," she sneered in disgust. "Absolutely not. That place reeks of money."

“Making it a very good place to start weakening the national banking structure. Seibligg can’t fight a war he can’t finance.”

“If he is even re-elected. A lot of people are angry about the attacks in Ireland and Britain. They see him as twisting their arms into re-electing him rather than hiring someone without experience dealing with Britain. They’re right of course, but that doesn’t mean it won’t work. Doesn’t mean it will either.”

“And we can learn all about it from Frankfurt*.”

“And miss all the rioting? There are always excellent riots in Berlin after a controversial election.”

“You are free to start one in Frankfurt if it means so much to you,” he snapped, his patience finally worn out. Katarina stiffened then glared.

“Mind who you are speaking to, boy. I am your ally, not your toy, and I am quite through with your mind games. We’re staying until after the elections and then we’re going somewhere that isn’t Frankfurt.”

“Katarina-“

“And that’s final!” she snapped. She spun on her heels and walked out, slamming the door behind her. Tom snatched up the closest item he could find, in this case tea pot, and hurled it into the fire place. It shattered beautifully, but the tea doused the flames, leaving him frustrated. Perhaps he should have thrown the blood-sucking trollop in the fire instead, he thought.

“I hope you’re happy. Now we have a PMSing vambitch to deal with.”

Horace’s dark chuckle in the back of his mind was not what he wanted to hear. If it were possible, he’d like nothing more than to put the little bastard under cruciatus for an hour or two.

It's all that bad, Karma, Tom. Perhaps you should take up a new hobby. Like exorcism. You can start with yourself.

“Shut up.”

oo
oooooooooooooooooooooooo

Harry woke late that night to the sound of laughter and music. The lodge house was empty and cold, and he reluctantly climbed out of the pile of furs to see what was going on. It appeared the funeral was over, and now it was time for the reception, which was considerably more jovial after what appeared to be a lot beer and ale than was strictly healthy. Harry looked for Luna in the crowd, but there were nearly a dozen bonfires built around several lodges and in the dark and flickering light he couldn't find her.

He did find his godfathers though, and thankfully neither of them was drunk. They were sitting around a small fire with a handful of men, alphas by the looks of them, away from the others and deep in discussion. He wondered if he would be welcome there, or if he should find company elsewhere until they finished their business. Before he had a chance to decide, someone came up behind him, grabbed his arm, and started dragging him away. Harry instantly dug his heels and started to struggle, ready to shout for help if necessary, but he hesitated when he realized it was Stephen.

“We have to talk,” the man growled, “In private.”

And that seemed like a very bad idea for a variety of reasons, not the least of which was the look in the man's eyes as he pulled him behind one of the lodge houses. If he called out though... if Sirius thought Stephen had intended to hurt him, Harry didn't know what his godfather would do to him. He didn't want the man to get hurt just because he was upset about Jane, and he didn't want to put the rest of the family through anymore grief. So he held his tongue and clutched his wand, and hoped it he wasn't making a huge mistake.

When they were out of sight of the others, Stephen let him go and Harry took a few cautious steps away from him and lit his wand. In the electric blue glow of the lumus spell, the werewolf's was all stark white planes and deep shadows, his eyes so deeply shadowed as to nearly be invisible. Harry kept a close watch on his legs and hands, both already tense.

"What did you want to talk about?"

For a seemingly endless moment, the man said nothing, and as the seconds ticked by Harry was increasingly convinced that this was a bad decision.

"Jane," he said at last, "You can fix her, can't you?"

Harry blinked, confused.

"Fix her? I don't know what you mean by... oh...no. No, I can't."

Stephen's hands clenched.

"Yes, you can! You're a wizard! You're a bloody shaman! You can get that...thing... out of her!"

"I'm not a shaman, and I've never done an exorcism. And even if I were, she isn't possessed by a simple spirit. She's possessed by a god. If I tried to force it out of her, she could die. And afterwards? You'd have an angry goddess running after you! I can't do anything for Jane. You'll have to wait-"

He was so distracted trying to make the man understand, he forgot to keep watching his body language, and was unprepared when he was thrown to the ground. He scurried back, bringing up his wand to defend himself, but Stephen climbed on top of him, pinning him with his legs and his wand arm with one arm. Harry kicked and thrashed and punched and clawed his free hand, but Stephen was larger, faster, and a more experienced fighter and all his efforts did nothing.

"Stephen, stop! You're not helping-"

The punch had him seeing stars, sent his mind flying for a moment in painless, dizzying somersaults. The first sensation to return wasn't pain, so much as the unpleasant panic of being unable to breath. Stephen's legs were constricting the sides of his chest, and blood was clogging his nose. The second sense to return was hearing.

"-ought us here. You said it would be safe! It's a fucking mad house! These people are all crazy, and now they've ruined my daughter!" Stephen was shouting, his voice cracking under the strain of anger and stress. "So you fix her, god dammit! You got us into this mess, so you bloody well fix it!"

"I'm..." Harry wheezed, "...sorry."

There was a choked and bitter laugh, and Harry closed his eyes and braced himself for another blow. A blow that didn't come. Instead he felt the man being tackled, and torn away from him. There was shouting and snarling and the sound of fighting. And it wasn't just two people either. He could hear several voices, male and angry and cursing up a storm. Harry rolled onto his side and coughed up blood, his lungs heaving for air.

"Harry!" Remus called, drawing away from the fight to attend his godson his hands efficiently examining him for injuries. "Are you alright? Are you hurt anywhere?"

He could have given his godfather quite the list, but that wasn't important. What was important was that he could still hear vicious fighting, even though he couldn't see it (where was his wand?). Even without being able to see it, he knew it wasn't Stephen who was winning.

"St-Stop!" he gasped...then gathered his strength to shout, "STOP! SIRIUS STOP IT!"

He jumped to his feet and immediately collapsed again, Remus barely catching him before he hit the ground.

“Sirius, I need your help!” Remus shouted.

“Hold him till I get back!” Sirius snarled to the others.

The fighting sounds stopped, and to Harry’s relief he felt Sirius move next to him, reaching for him but too afraid to touch where he couldn’t see any injuries.

“Harry, oh god, are you alright?”

“I’m okay. It was just a little smack. I don’t think he really wanted to hurt me,” he lied, praying that they believed him.

“Fuck, Harry, he could have killed you! He could have crushed your chest or bashed your head in.”

“I’m okay,” he continued to insist, “Please, don’t hurt him.”

Sirius made an exasperated sound.

“Someone get some light over here!” he ordered. “Are you going to tell me what this is all about?”

“He’s Stephen Canis,” Harry said, and by the long silence that followed he knew that both his godfathers understood the significance of that statement. “He thought I could... help Jane. I couldn’t. He got upset. More upset. Please, don’t hurt him.”

“The hell I’m letting him get away with this-“

“Sirius,” Remus cut in sharply. “Don’t be a hypocrite. You’re Head Alpha. You have to be the bigger man.”

“He’s not in his right mind. He lost his daughter to things he doesn’t understand. How would you feel if Greyback had taken possession of me?” Harry reasoned.

“I...”

“You’d want to ‘fix’ me too, wouldn’t you? He wasn’t right, but his family doesn’t deserve to go through anymore pain then they are already. Please, promise you won’t hurt him?”

Sirius let out an irritated growl. “Fine. I won’t hurt him anymore. But I’m not forgetting this.”

Harry let out a breath. “Thank you.”

“Come on, pup, let’s get you fixed up,” Remus said, helping Harry to his feet, which were steadier now than before. After a few shaky steps, he was able to walk without leaning on them, and let himself be led away. One of the other werewolves arrived, carrying the requested torch. Sirius took it, and turned back to where his men were still holding Stephen.

“Take him to the healers. I’ll be along in a minute,” Sirius promised. Harry wanted to say something, but he had already asked so much of his godfather already, he wasn’t about ready to question his word.

For his part, Sirius was boiling with rage, and well past the point where killing a man seemed unreasonable. He had seen his godson, the closest thing he had to a child of his own, being beaten practically under his nose and despite what Harry had said, he didn’t doubt that Stephen could have killed the boy, however unintentionally. That afternoon when Harry had fallen into a trance, he had been shaken; terrified that he would lose him to forces beyond his control and now he had been threatened yet again.

This time, however, he did have some control.

The three men holding Canis had been with him when the young beta* had run up to them and warned him of what was happening, and obediently fallen behind their leader as he hunted down his godson. They still obediently followed his orders, pinning Canis to the ground with more force than was strictly necessary, but without actually hitting him. The lone wolf himself, didn’t look as if he could take much more abuse. His face was covered in blood and Sirius was almost certain he'd cracked a couple of ribs and broken some fingers, and he didn't pity him in the least. He glared down at him.

"If you ever come near Harry again, I'll kill you, Canis, and then I'll whore your wife out to the mangiest, stupidest, most pathetic omega that I can find. Do you understand me?"

Stephen nodded, or maybe his head was just lolling, but it didn't matter. He would pass his message on to his pack's alpha and he would insure it was understood.

"Good. Let him go."

The other alphas pulled away, leaving their prey abandoned on the ground, and followed Sirius as he walked away.

"Should we take him to a healer?" one of them asked.

"I promised my godson I wouldn't hurt him, but I never said anything about helping."

oo
oooooooooooooooooooo

Just to be absolutely clear, when Diana was killed, the demi-goddess possessing her jumped from Diana's body to Jane's. The Canis family was with another pack at the time and were safe.

Frankfurt is the banking capitol of wizarding Germany, and home to the German main branch of Gringotts. Gringotts is an international chain, but its British Branch is completely cut off from its other branches due to complex spells and laws initiated by Voldemort, so funds can't be transferred to or from the bank, meaning those who left assets in the London Branch after they fled the country, can't pick up those funds anywhere else in Europe. The Gringotts Goblins do, however, have means of communicating with one another.

In case you're thinking, 'well, that's damn convenient', it isn't. That 'young beta' was Bobby looking after his 'familiar'. Why and how, I'll get into later.

Author's Note:

Firstly, I'd just like to thank you all for your patience and understanding, and reassure you that I have no intention of abandoning this story. My hope is that with my semester coming to an end soon, I'll be able to get in some extra writing time and finish book V before the next semester starts. Once the semester starts again... well, I'm taking one less class, so that should help. Fingers crossed.

Secondly, another thanks to all my reviewers. You guys have been wonderful, and I wouldn't have gotten this far in my story if it weren't for your support. That being said, there are few matters of politeness I'd like to address for a few of you. If you're a reviewer and you don't like something about my story, that's fine, you're free to point out flaws or perceived weaknesses in the story or characters. I actually encourage you to do so, BUT if you are going to do that, please sign in so that I can reply. Leaving me a criticism without giving me the opportunity to explain my choices (or acknowledge certain fallacies and thanking you for pointing them out), is rather like shouting 'you suck' over the phone and then hanging up.

Book V

Chapter 19: The Black Wolf King

"Reckless, bumbling fool."

Harry sat up abruptly. A dim light radiated from the candle on his night stand, casting the tent walls in a dim orange glow and deep shadows. The healers had left him to rest, insisting he should be alone for a while after losing his fight with Stephen. He hadn't thought of his smack down in terms of winning or losing, so much as an unfortunate happenstance. A miscalculated step.

Bobby, as dark as the deep shadows, was nothing more than the sound of flutter wings and an aggravated voice.

“You don’t call, you don’t write. And when you do get back, it’s all sweetheart this and darling that,” Harry lamented mockingly, and settled back into his bed. His jaw ached from Stephen’s punch, and the painkillers he had been given were making him lightheaded.

“How you survived this long I have no idea. You have the survival instinct of a kamikaze pilot. Following a clearly deranged man into the woods... If it weren’t for me you’d be...” the shadows snapped, shifting into shapes that could not have been a crow before snapping back into a singular shape perched at the foot of his bed. Harry tilted his head curiously.

“What do you mean ‘if it weren’t for you’? What did you do? What are you even doing here, Bobby?”

There was no immediate reply, and a well of unease began to grow inside him. Harry would be the first to admit that he had a tendency to take people for granted, that they were generally what they appeared to be, good or bad, until proven otherwise. He wasn’t so sure he could afford to be so blithe in his assumptions anymore.

“What did you do, Bobby? And perhaps more importantly, why did you do it?”

Silence.

“Why have you been helping me at all? And don’t give me that ‘you’re fun’ crap. You’re... a fairy. Or of the fairy or part of their realm. Your natural instinct is to kill or convert humans into another fairy, not save their lives. I can only assume you have a reason for not doing so. I’d be very interested in knowing what that reason was.”

Harry gathered his candle from the side of the bed, intent to speak with the raven himself and not just the shadows. He turned to Bobby.

A pale face loomed at the foot of his bed..

He dropped the candle, the flame instantly extinguished, and made a lunge for his wand, ducking and rolling off the bed to the other side of the tent.

“Now your survival instinct kicks in.”

“Lumos.” The tent was filled with a soft blue light. The man was gone, and only Bobby’s avian form remained, glaring imperiously at him. Harry’s eyes widened. “You’re a changeling.”

Even uttering the word sent a shiver of fear up Harry’s spine. It only seemed to ruffle the other’s feathers.

“No. I’m an illusionist. A dream weaver. A magician. All these things, but I am no fae.”

Harry just stared at him for a long moment, before it clicked.

“You’re a wizard.”

“I was a wizard,” he corrected, “I peeved off a few ‘higher ups’ in my day, and poof I get rebirthed as a raven. If it weren’t for Raecellos, I wouldn’t even remember being a wizard, and I would be spared a great deal of this aggravation.”

Wow. Just... wow. That had never even occurred to Harry. It was bizarre and yet... fascinating. Bobby looked rather indignant at his gawking.

“Are you quite done, now?”

He blinked, and then smiled sheepishly.

“Sorry, it’s just... What’s it like? Being reborn?”

“Crowded. There isn’t a lot of room in an egg, although I suppose I was lucky to be spared the joys of mammalian birth,” the raven said, not sounding particularly nostalgic over the event. His dismissive attitude reminded Harry of his earlier concerns.

“So... why are you helping me again?”

The raven preened his wings, the avian equivalent of picking lint, and replied blandly. “I have my reasons.”

“Which are?”

“Which are none of your damn business.”

In a flicker of light and shadow, he disappeared. Harry waved his arm about, casting the blue light around the room, but the raven was already gone, leaving Harry with more questions and concerns than he had started with. What now? Bobby had always been helpful to him, had saved him even, but his evasive attitude was worrisome. Was he truly independent of the fae? He had plenty of opportunities to betray Harry to the fairy folk and never had, but what were his motivations? Was he under orders from Raecellos or even Madris? But then why hide it? Why ask Harry to keep his presence a secret from everyone else?

Most important of all, what was Harry going to do about it?

Lestrangle stared across the desk at the man, if mere man he truly was, that she had devoted her life to and was reassured to find that her admiration for him had not dimmed in the slightest. He was as beautiful, charming, and terrifying as she remembered from the height of the war, the years of relative peace merely refining the handle instead of dulling the blade. It had been a long time since she had been granted the privilege of his private company, a fact she blamed on Potter. That boy, that foolish, naïve little Gryffindor, had pulled at the Dark Lord's attention until he was blind to nearly everyone else, and she didn't understand it. Not in the slightest.

Well, no, that wasn't entirely true. She hadn't understood it. Not in the beginning, not until recently in fact. Potter was as foolish and unrefined as ever, but now... now he had power, magical and political on a scale she never could have fathomed. The Dark Lord had seen the potential she had not. Unfortunately, so had Snape, and that left her feeling all sorts the fool. It also made her wonder why her master was meeting her in private rather than her and Snape, or even just Snape.

“Bella, it’s been a while.”

“My lord.”

This was her castle. She was the headmistress after all, but even here she felt her inferiority. Sitting in his high-backed chair, behind his massive desk, in the office he had carved out of her domain, he was every inch the conquering warlord. His fingers were steepled, his eyes shadowed to the point even his crimson eyes appeared black. He was not here for pleasantries. Their recent estrangement had not so dulled her memory that she couldn’t tell when her lord was angry. She hoped it wasn’t directed at her.

“Your progress with the school’s security is quite remarkable,” he said, “Your talents for combat and military preparedness has not failed you.”

He sounded sincere, but Lestrangle couldn’t shake the feeling she was being mocked. Over the last couple of years, the castle’s security had been breeched repeatedly, in ways she should never have allowed to happen. Even the werewolf girl’s appearance, a mere few weeks ago, should never have occurred. Potter’s actual escape from the castle when it was on full security alert was an embarrassment she was certain she would lose her job over, and possibly her life.

“It’s wasted here.”

Lestrangle stiffened. Perhaps he was going to end it now. At least he had granted her enough respect to do it private, without Snape or one of his other cronies sneering at her. Voldemort moved one of his hands, reaching to flip a photograph on top of his desk. She looked, and immediately felt the spark of recognition.

“You have served me well over these many years, Bella, in some ways better than others. I think its time for you to become my blade once again.”

She stared at the photograph for a long moment, and then up at him.

“I am yours, my Lord, in whatever capacity you desire, but I do not understand precisely what you want.”

The smile that cut its way across his face did nothing to make him look any less angry.

“This is the traitor who helped the Germans escape. I need you to hunt him down and capture him, preferably alive for interrogation. You always had a talent for hunting.”

She took the photograph, staring at Horace McGunny’s cool expression, completely still even as the staff of the Hogwarts’ Herald scurried about in the background. She had not anticipated this. McGunny was one smooth character. He was a smart, no nonsense, slave driver to those under his command, and if his ambitions had been more political than academic she was certain he would have been placed in Slytherin. She couldn’t imagine his motivation for betraying his school and his country.

“You’ll retain the official title of Headmistress for the school year,” Voldemort continued, “but I want you to leave a majority of those responsibilities to Severus while you pursue this. This operation is covert. No one can know what it is about, not Severus and not Lucius. Only you, Morgan, and I know about this and it will remain that way. Morgan is under instruction to provide you with any resources you deem necessary, but I expect you to be subtle.”

It was starting to sink in what was happening, but Lestrage wasn’t sure if she should be ecstatic or humiliated. Was she being promoted or demoted? She honestly couldn’t tell.

“I... It will be done, my Lord.”

The look he gave her told her explicitly what would happen to her if it did not.

November sunlight, draped in a silver cloak, pressed against the stain glass windows, casting the tea room in an ambiguous light, somewhere between brightness and gloom. It matched Severus's state of mind, and that just irritated him. McGonagall had wisely avoided the usual small talk this afternoon, sensing something in her colleague's demeanor that was even less pleasant than usual. She waited until the tea was ready and served before she attempted to break the silence.

"Has Lockhart been giving you dating advice again?"

Severus rolled his eyes, his annoyance shaking him from his sulk.

"No. I have successfully managed to pawn him off on Slughorn for at least a week. They're made for each other."

Her lips twitched, but she quickly smothered the smile. She didn't think he'd appreciate her taking whatever was bothering him as a joke.

"Then may I ask what's wrong? Something is obviously bothering you."

He ignored her, but she simply waited, taking an appreciative sip of her tea. Eventually, Snape broke the silence.

"I think I might be cursed."

She blinked. "Really? Have you talked to Pomphrey?"

He shook his head. "No. Not that kind of curse. I think...someone... I don't know who... might have cursed me so that I'll never have a family."

She gave him an odd look, trying to sort out what he was saying. He didn't fault her confusion. He did sound like a bit of an idiot at the moment.

"What happened?"

He debated telling McGonagall. It was, in fact, a very private matter, one he didn't think Ira would appreciate him sharing with anyone. But... he needed to tell someone, someone practical who could look at his situation and offer a valid solution or state clearly and unsympathetically that there wasn't one.

"Ira... I believe we've broken up for good."

"Oh, Severus, what happened? You seemed to be getting along so well."

He sighed, and took a sip of his tea, not even tasting it.

"We are...were. It's... she told me something about herself that I don't know if I can accept if we were to continue having a relationship."

"What?" Now she was starting to look concerned. There were a lot of possible aspects of a person she didn't think Severus could accept, and a number of them could get poor Ira in a heap of trouble if he so chose.

"She's divorced."

She nearly rolled her eyes. If that was it, she just lost all sympathy for him.

"... because she can't have children."

"Ah." Well, that was a different story. One she had more sympathy for than he could ever know. "I didn't know you were thinking about starting a family with her so soon."

“I wasn’t either until she said it... I... I hadn’t realized until that moment that I had no intention of looking for anyone else. She just... fit. Into everything.”

She nodded, as if she understood, but he didn’t really think she did.

“I mean to say, no matter what I was doing... or what I wanted to do... she could be there, beside me or in the background, and it was just a little bit better than it was while I was alone. Like when she stayed with me this summer, while I was in the lab I could hear in the kitchen or in the sitting room, and normally that would be extremely annoying, but with her... it was soothing. I felt at ease with her in my home. I hadn’t realized that she had become a part of it already, and now... now I think we were both deluding ourselves.”

McGonagall felt a strong maternal urge to get up and hug him, but she doubted that was what he wanted or needed. So she remained silent for a moment, and thought over what he had said, and what she should advise. It didn’t take her long to think of something, but it wasn’t something she could bring herself to say easily. They had both nearly drained their tea before she found the courage to speak.

“Did she tell you exactly why she couldn’t have children?”

He glared at her.

“No, and I wasn’t so morbidly curious as to ask.”

“You should have,” she said, with a sharpness that had him sitting up straight and paying attention. “There are different types of infertility, many of which can be treated and cured or worked around. It’s not a well known field among wizarding kind, but there are still a few medi-witches and wizards who practice in reproductive medicine. It’s expensive and often risky, but not something to be overlooked.”

He stared at her blankly for a moment, the hint of a blush coloring his cheeks. It was obvious the topic had turned awkward to him. Talking about wanting children was a lot different than talking about the mechanics of making children. She wasn’t going to let him clam up though. Certain things needed to be said so that he understood that the situation was not hopeless, before he gave up on yet another possibility at happiness.

Because, oddly enough, she did want him to be happy. She wanted him to be happy, and to share that happiness with Harry and Hermione and even Draco, little jerk though he was. And if that meant she had to embarrass them both, she would do it.

“I’m going to tell you something, Severus. Something I haven’t told anyone since... well, since Dumbledore left,” she said, sending him a warning look that he better pay attention because she wasn’t going to repeat it. “I have a sister, a year younger than me. When we were both just little girls, we got sick. Very, very sick. We recovered, but... we were both told we would likely never be able to have children.”

He stared at her, unbelieving that she would reveal something so personal to him. It wasn’t in her personnel records. No doubt Lestrangle would have mocked her for it mercilessly if she had known. Why was she telling him this?

“I accepted what I was told, and planned my life around the assumption that I’d never have a family. My parents were traditionalists you see. They couldn’t arrange a marriage with damaged goods, and they never would have accepted an adopted child into the family. So I figured the only way to make them proud of me is if I did something with my life that didn’t require a family. The result is what you see today, and I can’t say I regret the course my life has taken. It’s been filled with many joys and sorrows, pride and disappointment, but always my own choices. My sister, however...”

Here McGonagall couldn’t help smiling a bit regretfully.

“My sister didn’t accept it. She absolutely refused to. We got into huge fights about it. I thought she was ‘deluding’ herself, as you so aptly put it. She thought I was settling for less. She ended up marrying some nobody with romantic notions as deluded as hers. My parents were furious. They disowned her, but she didn’t care. She had her dream of a little shop in the city, an endless love affair with her own husband, two kids, and a cat. And you know what? Her dream came true almost as she envisioned it. She has a little grocery store in Edinburgh, is still head over heels in love with her husband, has four children, and three cats last I counted. So as much as I love my life, am proud of it, I can't help but wonder what would have happened if I hadn't been more like my sister. If I hadn't accepted what others told me were my limits.'

'I know it may sound too Gryffindor for your tastes, but I don't think you should give up on Ira. You're a fighter, Severus, you always have been. If you truly know what you want, then do what you have to to get it. Experiment, question, argue, curse someone if you have to, but don't give up. It's much too soon for that.'

She stood up from her chair, and he very nearly stood up as well, but for the hand that pushed him back into his seat.

"Now if you'll excuse me. I think I've bled my heart enough for today. You just sit there and think about what I've said. Decide how much you're willing to risk and fight for Ira. After all, they do say 'third times the charm'."

She stepped through the door, feeling his eyes on her as she went, and wondered if she had made the right decision to tell him. Not just for what she had revealed about herself, but on the very real possibility that he might fail. Her sister may have beaten the odds, but that didn't make the odds better for anyone else.

Sirius' coronation was at dawn. Harry was woken two hours before by Luna leaving his bed. She had snuck in at some point last night and once gone her absence left a rather unpleasant chill. Reluctantly, he got up, feeling barely alive and sore everywhere, with the intention of getting another blanket. Any thoughts of sleep, however, were quickly dispelled when Jane entered.

"It is time for you to wake up, young shaman," she said, laying a bundle of clothes that were not his own at the foot of his bed. "You have responsibilities to perform."

Harry wasn't entirely sure when they considered him a shaman. Maybe it was as far back as when Voldemort had announced him his apprentice or maybe it was as recent as Greyback's quasi-possession. Either way, it meant new clothes, beaded with animal bones and feathers, and Jane painting his face with red markings. His responsibilities were very simple. The coronation was to be held in the clearing, and Harry spent nearly an hour cleansing the area with sage, while Jane painted the faces of a dozen other werewolves. Sirius and Remus were there, a single band of black painted over their eyes, looking all the more ominous for it. They did not approach him, and sensing that this time before the coronation ceremony was important to them, he kept his distance as well.

The sun rose subtly, a gradual fading from the black to dark blue to silver, and with it came the rest of the werewolves. The dark funeral clothes (for unlike wizards, werewolves did where black and dark colors to funerals) had been replaced with festival clothes, which varied from full length dress to barely clothed in every shade. Harry couldn't help but notice that almost none of them had their faces painted, and looking more closely the few that did were all strong alphas and their females or betas. He wondered what it meant. Were they Sirius' lieutenants? Did they hold some special purpose in the coronation ritual?

The ceremony itself was not particularly ostentatious. Sirius wore only his leather breeches and knives, and Remus was little better with actual boots and arm guards. Jane, resplendent in pure white furs, announced them both blessed by the Moon, and kissed their foreheads. The crowd stomped their feet and cheered, but Jane was not finished

"But Rhiannon is not the only god whose blessing you require," she said solemnly, and a ripple of confusion ran through the crowd. Harry stiffened, and turned to Luna, who stared fixedly at Sirius. "If you wish the blessing of Fenrir, our god of war, you will need to make an offering. An offering of battle. Will you sacrifice in the name of our people?"

"We shall sacrifice."

Jane stepped away from them to stand at the clearing's edge with the others, and from among them the painted alphas and their partners emerged, and slowly stalked towards them, forming a ring around their intended prey.

"What is going on?" Harry whispered to Luna, who still did not look away but did reply.

"We're at war, and the Moon alone is not enough to protect us. We need Fenrir. We need his blessing, and he won't give it lightly. Blackbone and Slivermoon, they'll have to fight to prove their worth."

"What? All of them at once? What if they can't do it?"

Luna finally turned to him, her expression tight, almost pained. "Do not interfere, Harry. This is what it means for them to be Head Alpha and Head Beta. The rest of us are putting our lives on the line based on the assumption that they're better than the rest of us. It's not something-

A loud snarl interrupted her, but Harry already knew what he needed to. He turned back to his godfathers in time to see Sirius smash his knee into an alphas' chest, sending the man limp and sprawling onto the ground. His beta, a heavily muscled female, made the mistake of jumping to his defense and got a kick to the face for her troubles. Remus wasn't slacking either. The beta might not be as strong or fast as Sirius, but he did know how to fight smart and dirty when necessary. Another male and female pair made to attack Sirius at once from different sides, but Remus jumped into their attack, smashing his fist into the females face before hurling her into her mate's path, tripping him up long enough for Remus to knock him to the ground.

And then things got ugly. It was horrifying and magnificent at once. Harry had always known his godfathers were special, that they were somehow stronger or just a bit smarter than the others, but he had never seen it demonstrated so dramatically as when they fought. Because they didn't fight as individuals. There was nothing independent about their movements or their techniques. Without looking or speaking, they moved with their backs to each other, defending and attacking with such choreographed movements that neither was ever left exposed.

Even when the knives and the hatchets were drawn and the attacks by the other werewolves became more coordinated, they never faltered. Hits were taken when necessary and they were given even more freely, to the point where Harry was convinced none of them were going to make it out alive. Two of the attacking werewolves already appeared dead, and three others broken or bleeding beyond the ability to stand, let alone attack. But that still left seven.

Luna was practically wrapped around Harry's body, holding him back as best she could, whispering for him to let it play out, to be still. If he didn't know that what was happening weren't necessary on some level, she never would have succeeded in holding him. Magic or not, he was still bigger than her and with far more to lose.

"Damn you, Fenrir," he swore under his breath. "You have your battle and your blood, and you'll have plenty more before this war done, so just stop it. Stop it! Or I will."

He did not know if he had been heard, if even Luna could hear him over the snarls and screams and shouts of battles, and at first it appeared his whispered declaration dissolved into nothing as yet another werewolf swung his hatchet at Sirius, catching him upper arm. Harry fumbled for his wand, but Luna struggled to hold his arms so he couldn't reach. Sirius snarled in pain and anger, and swung his bare fist, smashing the attacker in the stomach and sending him flying... five feet... ten feet... sixteen... twenty... and stopped but only because he had hit the wall of spectators, knocking them all to the ground.

Everyone froze. Then slowly, very slowly, those werewolves still in the fight edged backwards, pulling the dead or unconscious or injured with them on their retreat. Sirius and Remus, both bleeding and panting heavily, growled menacingly at them but didn't pursue. Luna's grip, bordering on vice-like, loosened and Harry climbed to his feet. An eerie silence followed him, no one speaking or moving but for Sirius and Remus' heavy breathing and the paranoid shifting of their eyes.

At last, Sirius' eyes settled on Harry, the only one who dared to approach. It wasn't a particularly welcoming look, and Harry stopped before he got too close. He had learned that much from Stephen's attack at least. There was something off about his eyes, the normally black color lightening to a golden brown.

"Sirius?"

The Head Alpha merely growled.

Harry blinked. "... Fenrir?"

That earned him a grin, and Harry glowered.

"What is it with you and possessing people? Shoo, you've had your fun."

The grin widened, and was followed by a dark chuckle. "For now. I imagine we'll be seeing each other soon enough."

The grin disappeared and Sirius' eyes faded to black once again, but then so did all his fight. He collapsed, and Harry barely managed to keep his head from smacking the ground, and even that much ended up dragging him to the bloody ground with him. Remus wasn't so lucky. He crashed, unimpeded, as dead to the world as Sirius.

The crowd surged forward, and on instinct Harry brought up his wand threateningly, ready to defend his godfathers if they any of them failed to realize that Fenrir's game was over. He needn't have bothered. They merely began to gather up and treat their wounded. Eventually, some of the healers managed to convince Harry to let them take Sirius and Remus.

He followed the Healers to their tents, now crowded with the wounded, and among them was Stephen, pale and bound in splints and bandages. They stared at each other for a long moment, the bedridden alpha's gaze completely unreadable. Harry finally scowled back at him, before turning to focus on his godfathers, attempting to ignore the other.

Very little actually needed to be done. Their wounds were superficial, and all they truly needed was time to rest and they would awaken on their own. Harry lingered for as long as he could, hoping they would snap out of it quickly, but after an hour Stephen's heavy staring and pervading silence it became too much and he left.

It was near sunset when Voldemort finally managed to make it to the werewolf colony. The war was requiring a great deal of his time, and with Tom's escape a whole new list of concerns had popped up, demanding his attention. Missing the werewolf funeral, the ascension, and the coronation ceremonies was more than a little irritating. He had worked very hard to integrate himself into their society when Greyback was alive, and he despised the thought of time and Blackbone's own antagonistic nature getting in the way of that. It was more than likely that he would find himself dependent on Harry to maintain peace between them. Something he would be both proud and irritated by.

He passed through what once was the Goddess colony, and was now a sacred site. Magic was thick in the air and Voldemort felt his inner monster purr. The graves were freshly dug, heaped of loosened dirt marking each place. It would only require a simple spell to... no, no, that was a bad idea. Fenrir may have been little more than beast in his life, but in his death he was something he knew better than to trifle with. Besides, his old ally deserved more respect than that. If he bothered thinking about it at all, he might even miss the mangy bastard.

A short ways behind him, Morgan followed, as quiet and suspicious as ever. Although most couldn't tell, the man didn't like this place, and Voldemort understood that very well. It was haunted after all, by things wands had no power against, and men like Morgan had no business meddling with.

He continued his journey further into the colony, and to his surprise the presence of magic didn't weaken. He attributed this to the abundance of blood he found in the clearing, but he couldn't guess its purpose. The werewolves that could be found to explain it shied away from him. Not unusual, but a little irritating at this point.

When he finally reached the main encampment, the area was thick with werewolves and their rough and tumble merry-making. Even in the whirl and ruckus of a several hundred drunken men and women (plus more than a few rowdy children getting underfoot), finding the Head Alpha's tent was only a minor obstacle. It was clearly visible, the largest structure in the encampment, and stood an oasis against the chaos.

The tent flaps were wide open and the inside brightly lit, revealing the Head Alpha himself and an rather eclectic ensemble. There was the new Head Alpha of course, his beta, several alphas, Harry in the black and encrusted garb of a shaman, that infuriating Luna girl, and what must have been the new vessel of the goddess. Blackbone was swathed in bandages, and beside him Slivermoon didn't look much better. This was a bit odd, but he didn't grow concerned until he saw Harry looking nearly in as bad a shape as godfathers.

"Was there another battle while I was away or did you decide to challenge Blackbone as Head Alpha?" he greeted blandly, inviting himself into the tent and seating himself beside Harry, across from Blackbone. Several of the gathered alphas glowered at him for the perceived impudence, but a sharp gesture from Blackbone had them slinking out of the tent. Harry looked vaguely amused at this, but was quickly distracted when Luna draped herself around his shoulders.

Annoyance reared its head as Voldemort watched her casual displays of affection with his protégé. He couldn't quite forget the one instance where she had defied his claim to Harry, and he rather got the feeling she was challenging him yet again.

"Greetings, God Eater," the young goddess said, regarding him with that same cool omniscience that followed her in which ever vessel she assumed. He nodded to her.

"My Lady. I hope these last few days have proven...fruitful."

Blackbone snorted. "That's one way of putting it. Harry couldn't stay out of trouble, of course."

"You're one to talk!"

Luna laughed into Harry's neck, making him giggle and playfully shove her off. He turned to the Dark Lord.

"Greyback ascended. He's now the werewolf's god of war and has a fondness for possessing people."

"Yeah, you missed quite the show," Blackbone sneered. Voldemort rather suspected he had. He weighed the chances of casting legilimens on Harry without him noticing, and quickly found it unlikely. Maybe...

"So down to business then, so we don't have to bare each other's company for any longer than necessary," Blackbone continued, and made a gesture towards Slivermoon, who was all but giving the Dark Lord the evil eye. "Slivermoon and I have been talking about your little arrangement."

Voldemort's eyes narrowed. "I do hope you are not backing out of our agreement, my friend. That would be... unfortunate."

The Head Alpha smirked and rested his chin in his hand, his casual posture revealing an arrogance that matched the Dark Lord's own. "Nah, I'll keep up my end. No worries there, friend. Just a minor detail we want worked out in advance. We were just thinking about the time in between missions. It occurs to us that a lot of things can go wrong during non-combat situations. We want to have one of my people inspect the living conditions of our troops at least once a month, and report directly to me."

Voldemort suppressed an eye roll. "Fine. We'll make arrangements. Anything else?"

Blackbone grinned and Voldemort realized he'd just made a mistake. He wasn't sure what sort of mistake just yet, but he definitely knew he had. Blackbone turned to Harry.

"Well, pup, you've just got yourself a new job. Congratulation, Inspector Harry."

The Gryffindor looked even more surprised by the announcement than Voldemort did.

"Lord Blackbone," Dark Lord warned, "You can not start randomly assigning responsibilities to witches or wizards. You don't have that authority. Besides, Harry has school."

Sirius shrugged, and turned to Jane, who was tilting her head curiously at this latest development. "Is Harry a part of my pack?"

She blinked. "That is your decision, Lord Blackbone."

"Well, then my decision is that he's part of my pack, and thus under my authority. He's the only wizard my men or I are going to trust, and the only guy, wizard or werewolf, I know you can't intimidate into lying to me. As for school, you pull him out of that for you political crap all the time."

However ineloquently put, Blackbone was right. There was no real reason to not to have Harry work as an inspector, or rather as an ambassador between them, and in a lot of ways it provided the training Voldemort desired his protégé to learn. That didn't mean he was going to agree to the terms without a price. At the moment, Harry looked too stunned to say anything one way or the other.

"Very well, I'll agree to this, but I have a few stipulations of my own."

Blackbone and Slivermoon didn't seem particularly happy about that, but they listened.

"Your girl here," he said, gesturing towards Luna, who blinked at him. "As darling as she is, she is getting rather inappropriately attached to my protégé. When Harry comes here to make his reports, I expect her to be elsewhere.”

“Wait a minute, you can’t do that!” Harry shouted. Voldemort matched his look of outrage with one of his own.

“You might not give a damn about accidentally knocking up a thirteen year-old werewolf, but believe me when I say the rest of society is going to be raising a few objections.”

The boy turned dark red, partly out of humiliation and partly out of anger. “We.. we haven’t! We wouldn’t! And she’ll be fifteen in March!”

“I don’t suppose you’ve taken sex-ed in school yet?” Voldemort asked idly, and Harry turned even darker. He opened his mouth to protest again, but Blackbone beat him to it.

“Fine, but she’s here for holidays and festivals.”

“As long as I’m there to supervise,” the Dark Lord threw in, creating an opportunity to be invited back into the pack’s live just as he had been with Fenrir. Blackbone narrowed his eyes, seeing the demand for what it was.

“Fine. But I get all weekend, Friday nights through Sunday afternoons.”

“Wait a minute!”

“Done!” Voldemort agreed.

“Done,” Blackbone concluded.

“The hell it is!” Harry snapped. By now he was livid, looking very close to setting both men on fire, but before he could spout off a single curse or launch into an angry monologue, Luna stood and dragged him off. The men in the tent all watched curiously as she pulled him just far enough away that they couldn’t hear them speaking. Which wasn't to say it wasn't informative to keep watching them. Harry's face was expressive; twisting between anger, frustration, surprise, and reluctance with every word Luna spoke. As for her, they couldn't see her face, but her hands expressed what her face did not, touching Harry's arms, ruffling his hair, tugging affectionately at his collar of his shirt. Then she kissed him, quick and chaste, and pulled away, disappearing into the crowd almost instantly.

Harry stood there for a long moment, staring out into the crowd, searching for her tell-tale paleness amongst the masses of tanned bodies, but she was already gone. He turned back and stalked to the tent, sinking himself down in his spot. He glared at each of them, including Morgan.

"And here are my stipulations. One, I'm getting paid. 4-66 may have been pro-bono, but if I'm going to have to put up with all of you trying to dictate who I'm dating, I damn well expect to be compensated for it. Two-" he turned to Voldemort, "I want apparition lessons. There's no way I'm driving all over the damn countryside for nine hours every month. And three... that's between Sirius and me, and you will agree to it," he snapped, pointing a finger at Sirius and practically daring him to contradict him. The Head Alpha wisely did not.

Voldemort opened his mouth to argue.

"NONNEGOTIABLE!"

The Dark Lord quickly shut it.

The penthouse suite in the Hotel Pont Royale was not a typical choice of meeting places, but given the variety of places they had been no one was particularly thrown off by their luxuriant surroundings. Phoebe had already raided just about anything that wasn't bolted down, and Johan had rather magnificent view of the Parisian art district, glowing and bustling even as midnight drew close. Krum was dozing in a chair, snatching what little sleep he could before he left for another city, another quidditch match, and another political rally against Voldemort's impending invasion. Tonks draped a blanket over him and turned the lights low.

“He’s late,” Timmons noted, nervous as always. Fredricks just grinned and helped himself to the liquor cabinet, and poured drinks for the both of them.

“Only just, my friend.”

“He wouldn’t be late. Not for something this important.”

Johan let out a biting laugh. “Dis is important to you? Don’t be asinine. He has the ears of kings and queens tonight. His pawns can wait.”

“Always such a cheerful fellow,” Fredricks chuckled. “He’s right though. Dumbledore has other places he needs to be.”

“Which I hope does not make you believe there is any place I’d rather be.”

They all jumped, including Viktor, who had seemed dead to the world only a moment before. Dumbledore walked through the door to the study, as if he had been there the entire time, smiling affectionately at them. He set his hat and traveling cloak on a nearby chair. Beneath them was a set of robes that could have been found in any of the grand courts and parliaments across Europe, but looked oddly out of place on one of the greatest wizards in the last century.

“How did it go?” Tonks asked.

“Rather as I expected,” he admitted ruefully, “Her Majesty is quite the formidable woman, and she was well aware of the dangers she is courting. Time will tell if she is truly prepared to face them.”

“She won’t help us?”

“No,” Dumbledore said, “But she will not hinder us either, so long as we do nothing to damage her relations with Voldemort. She’s not Seibligg. She won’t rush into anything and assume it will turn out in her favor.”

“Speaking of which,” Fredricks said, “What are we going to do about him? The election is in two days, and I don’t think Germany can survive another term under him. Half the Ministry Aurors are threatening to quit as it is.”

Viktor shook his head. “The alternative isn’t much better. Ivers is a pacifist. He might not provoke Britain, but he sure as hell won’t stand up to them either. He’ll compromise until Berlin is renamed New London.”

“ Nevertheless,” Dumbledore interjected before a real political debate broke out, “I believe it is time for a change in regime. What ever Ivers faults, I do believe he’ll try to do what is best for his country. That is something I can work with.’

‘Viktor, I want you in Berlin during the election, rallying for Ivers. You might not be able to vote yourself, but your presence may be what is needed to convince the public that Ivers won’t simply pander to the Dark Lord whims. Fredricks, I want you to do what you can from within the Ministry. Start a few rumors if you must, but I want the rumblings of the Aurors against Seibligg as public as possible. Tonks, you’ll coordinate. If Seibligg does manage to win the election, we’ll need a quick and quiet getaway in place.”

“Vat about the rest of us?” Johan asked, not taking his eyes from the window.

“I want you all in Linz* by tomorrow afternoon. There’s a private militia forming there that I believe holds a great deal of potential, and I want you to feel them out. I’ve made arrangements for Timmons to meet with their commander. I’ll leave you and Phoebe to your own devices.”

Phoebe threw a smirk at Johan, who glanced back at her from the corner of his eye and then pretended he hadn’t, gathering up his things and heading for the door. He had his mission. He’d just as soon get it started, and avoid the inevitable trivialities of plans, concerns, socializing, and anything else that kept anything from getting done. He was barely out the door before three different conversations started at once, and was more than happy to leave the old goat to his pawns.

Linz is the capitol of Upper Austria (Oberösterreich) in Austria.

Book V:

Chapter 20: Retaliation

Seibligg stood, staring out his office window as a small army of construction workers began erecting a large stage in front of the Department of Ministry Affairs, forcing pedestrians to crowd into narrow section of stairs where Auror's waited, discretely checking random passersby for dark magic. Tomorrow there would be Ministry debate, where he would meet Ivers for the first and likely last time, face-to-face.

The thought of his political opponent irked him more than it should have. Ivers was already out there amongst the crowds, ranting about peace and reconciliation and whatever Mama's boy weaklings thought was important. Stupid really. It didn't matter, he assured himself. The German people were proud, and if Ivers thought he was going to get them to compromise he would be greatly disappointed.

"You look worried," Oblitz stated, glowering at him from across the room. He had refused Seibligg's command to sit, like he always did, and forcing the minister into the unfamiliar position of looking up at someone else. "You should be. You're going to lose this election, then Ivers is going to throw you to the wolves in hopes of placating them."

"Shut up. What would a grunt like you know about politics? I won't lose. I can't. The voters know exactly what will happen if they lose me. We've made sure they know it."

Oblitz snorted. Seibligg was a bully, and like most bullies he was self deluded into thinking people thought the same way he did, even if they never admitted it. The voters were split at the moment, it could fall either way, but Oblitz knew the pep rallies over the next few days would be the deciding factor. Ivers was indeed an idiot, but he was charming and articulate without in major blunders to his name. Seibligg could turn on the charm himself, but after his years of well documented tyranny, it would be a lot less believable and his provocation of Britain had done nothing to endear people to him. His singular and one true strength in this battle was the fact that he had set up a situation where his leaving office would leave the country vulnerable. Ivers was untested in the field of war, and had already showed a propensity to shrink away from rather than face it.

It wouldn't be enough. Seibligg had too many enemies acquired over his career to think he would make it through the election on top.

Unless something happened of course. Another attack. Something to shake up the masses. Oblitz had hoped for something just before the election, but it seemed the Dark Lord was biding his time. He must have seen the attack on the werewolves for what it was. Nothing more than poking a sleeping tiger with a stick.

It seemed he would have to take matters into his own hands.

"As you say, Minister. I will see you tomorrow before the rally."

"I haven't dismissed you yet," the Minister warned. Oblitz ignored him and left pretending he hadn't even heard him.

~Page Break~

Snape leaned in the Headmistress' chair, his appearance deceptively calm. Inside, however, his mind was in chaos. He was now Headmaster of Hogwarts in everything but name, a position he had lusted after since he was sixth year Prefect. So strange that this dream should come to fruition as another seemed prepared to wither on the vine.

Except that dream wasn't quite dead yet. McGonagall had breathed some more life into it. He was stuck now trying to decide whether he should smother it once and for all or risk nurturing it with the high probability of failure. His new position made his internal struggle seem more pressing.

As mentor to Britain's 'prince' he had already received (and turned down) several proposals for marriage to several pureblood women, and with a highly influential position to be officially assigned by the next school year his popularity was bound to make his list of potential wives grow. Women who were confirmed fertile and with title and wealth he could apply to his name, the newest primer pater* to appear in Britain since the war.

He would think about this, and his children, and his children's children, and feel a spark of pride and contentment. It wasn't until he started thinking about the present that he would get distracted by thoughts of Ira. Ira would love being the wife of a Headmaster, he found himself thinking. She'd keep house in Hogsmeade (which was quickly growing in population and industry from a village to an actual town), but would frequently be in the castle, making sure her husband wasn't terrorizing the students too badly and that he actually ate what the castles' house elves left him. In the evenings, after she had put their children to bed, he would tell her about his day and she'd laugh at the new way some troublemaker had found to aggravate him and she would tell him what mischief his own children had gotten into. When the children were old enough to mostly fend for themselves, she could take up a teaching position at Hogwarts, Magical Theory perhaps or even Care of Magical Creatures, and they...

Except there wouldn't be any children, because she couldn't have any.

Probably couldn't.

Which was why he should just let go altogether. Except that he had never been very good at letting go. Lily... oh, Lily. His first love, and though distance and silence had numbed that particular pain, thinking of her still brought a dull throbbing ache to his soul. Then there was Vesper, beautiful and darkly glittering Vesper, whose dream he carried on for the both of them. Now Ira, the perfect mix of academic intelligence and feminine warmth, clinging to dreams she could not fulfill.

Probably could not fulfill.

Snape let out a frustrated sigh and stalked out of the office. He wasn't getting anything done, and he still had DA&D assignments to grade. Making his way to the dungeons, he listened to the passing conversations of students, a collective mix of inane prattle, frustrated rantings, and juvenile attempts at political commentary. The last of these centering primarily around Harry, which was hardly unexpected. The incident with the werewolf girl was not going to fade from anyone's minds soon, and with news of the werewolf colony massacre and Harry's own involvement showing up in the paper daily, there was not shortage of fuel for speculation and opinion on the matter. For once, Snape couldn't criticize their rampant imaginations. It was pretty weird and interesting and... worrisome. Snape hated werewolves.

Honestly, he couldn't understand Harry's affection for them, outside of their connection with his godfather who was a tentative connection to his real father. It was possible that Snape himself knew the boy better than anyone else, having been with him since his induction into wizarding society and reluctant guardian for several years now, and in a lot of ways Harry was an open book, but in others...

Thinking about the infuriating Gryffindor was always distracting, and if there was anything Snape needed at the moment, it was a good distraction. Entering the dungeons, he decided he would make his first real concentrated effort on unraveling the paradox that was Harry. It just so happened he had an unusual abundance of material to study from. Hermione had brought his trunk down to him for safe keeping shortly after the Gryffindor had left. Apparently, there was a history of other Gryffindors tampering with Harry's things. Why his goddaughter thought to lug the thing down to the dungeon's rather than to her own Head of House he couldn't begin to guess. It wasn't as if he was the more trustworthy of the two.

It took nearly twenty minutes to open Harry's trunk without setting off the defenses. There were an impressive number of wards and charms protecting it, but Snape had a reputation that was not about to be undone by fifteen year old, no matter how precocious.

Inside was an adolescent's treasure trove of the mundane and the magical. Clothes of course, and the usual hygiene materials, Quidditch magazines and supplies, bundles of letters, a few of which Snape was concerned to find he had never seen before. A fist sized stone of no obvious purpose. A bezoar (that little thief!). School supplies and text books. Three small vials of unlabeled potion (very suspicious). Several unusual, if not exactly rare, magical objects; a reader's ring, an UnSilencing Bell, a couple of wands (where had he gotten those?), a tooth and claw necklace wrapped in leather, and a few other odds and ends. Several disguises of questionable taste. A knife, with no magical properties that he could detect. A sketchbook and several art supplies.

The sketchbook was revealing. Harry, despite his inability to retain a girlfriend, obviously had a healthy attraction to women if the abundant sketches of female students was anything to go by*. There were several portraits in fact of people Harry knew, including himself hunched over a cauldron, and glowering at its contents as if they had somehow insulted him. When had Harry done that, he wondered.

He continued his perusal through his ward's possessions, and nearly keeled over when carding through the boy's pile of personal books and came across Tom Riddle's journal. Merlin Almighty, he had forgotten about that little monstrosity. He had glimpsed in a memory once before, but had soon been distracted by some life or death situation and forgotten to investigate further. Stupid, stupid, stupid! He had to be going senile to have let something like that slip his mind.

Except that the journal was dead. Whatever dark magic had clung to it (he had seen Voldemort kill more than a few unwary witches and wizards with it back in the day, and it was a slow and ugly descent into sickness and insanity), was gone. In fact, any magic on it at all, was completely gone. There were a few scribbles inside of it in Harry's handwriting, some sort of attempt at communicating with the item, but otherwise it was completely blank. Quite the mystery. Had Harry killed it without even realizing it? Why did he have the journal in the first place? He set it aside, intent on studying it further, and looked through the other books.

An encyclopedia of Celtic Gods, which Snape copied a few sections from that related to gods and goddesses he had heard Harry or Voldemort mention before. A few books of ritual, self-defense, dueling, and charms practicum. A large and rather out of place book on Centaurian Prophetic practices, missing the first and probably a third volume of the collection. He opened the book, suspecting it was being used to hide something, but was disappointed when it revealed nothing but text. He scanned it idly, and figured out what it was after a minute.

A naming book of all things, based on the date and time one was born. Curiously, he looked up his own birthday, January 9th, early morning.

Sicsano. Born in the ElderYouth of the New Day of the New Month of the New Year. Fated to a life of consistent change.

Snape smirked at that. True enough. He opened the book to Harry's birthday (one of the few he actually knew). He knew his Centaurian name was Ghihalmelan already, from discussions he had with him immediately after the incident with the dragon. He was, however, curious to see what the book said Harry's life was fated to be like. Fated to a life of annoying Sicsano, seemed a strong possibility.

Except the name wasn't where it was supposed to be. According to the book Harry's name should have been Nuscain, Nuscani, or Nuscast (depending on what time of the day he was born). The first of August. But why would the centaurs lie? Or had they merely been mistaken? Perhaps Harry had misheard. He scanned the page, and found Ghihalmelan a short distance down from where it should have been.

Ghihalmelan. Born as the Seventh Month dies. Fated to a life of conflict against powerful forces.

Snape threw the book across the room as if it had suddenly transfigured into a cobra and bit him.

~Page Break~

Ron was happy Harry was gone. No one would be surprised to hear this, but they might be surprised about why he was happy his pseudo-nemesis was gone. None of his reasons were personal. Harry was a complete crackpot minus nonsensical babbling in his opinion, but he figured there were reasons for that, the primary one being Voldemort (along with the second, third, and fourth reason) and last one being childhood trauma (Hermione had accidentally blurted out once that the guy had found his parents with their heads blown off when he was eight, which earned a few sympathy points even from Ron. But just a few. Less than a handful really), so whatever grudge he had harbored against the other boy had puttered out over the years into a healthy rivalry (healthy in that he didn't plot his death outside of Dueling Club and DA&D).

No, the reason why Ron was happy that Harry was gone, was because Hermione had a lot more free time to spend with him now that she wasn't mothering Harry into doing his homework, eating right, and avoiding man-eating dragons. He was more than pleased to have her all to himself for the Halloween Ball, the Hogsmeade weekend, and any time they weren't in class or officially working on the paper.

"It's awfully gloomy for this time of year," Hermione commented, as they strolled beside the lake. They couldn't go far. New security regulations were forcing them to remain within easy sight of the school's new watchtower, but the weather wasn't good for a long walk anyway. The skies were overcast, threatening yet another early snowfall, and a biting wind was blowing in from the west.

"It's the dementors or so they say," Ron said, shrugging his shoulders. "It's going to be a nasty winter. Lestrangle will probably have us raising yaks for coat liners next."

She couldn't help but smile at that. Lestrangle was indeed keeping everyone busy gathering supplies for the war effort or increasing the protections around Hogwarts, and despite the grimness reasons behind these actions, it was becoming something of a running joke amongst the students. Then her smile faded.

"Do you suppose the war will still be going on when he graduate?" she asked, and Ron's initial instinct was to lie, but he thought better of it. One of the things he liked about Hermione was that he didn't feel the need to sugar coat things. She'd be insulted if he tried.

"I hope so."

“What? Why would you want...?”

“Well, it’s not a noble reason,” Ron admitted, shrugging. “I’m no Gryffindor, after all, but you know this war... any war really... awful as they are, they’re also great opportunities for guys like me.”

She frowned. “Guys like you’?”

“Yeah, guys who’ve got talent but nothing to their name. This sort of thing can make nobodies into somebodies, turn paupers into dukes, and fools into heroes. Of course, even if this war is done with by the time we graduate, there’ll probably be another one soon enough. I’m going to enlist either way. Bet I could make First Officer within a year if the fighting’s heavy enough.”

“Ron, that’s awful! You could be killed!” He felt genuinely pleased that she looked so upset about that, but far from persuaded.

“Yeah, well. Nothing’s free. Not even opportunity. I’ll take my chances.”

She shook her head. It was stupid and selfish, but she had to give him credit for being honest with her. Draco still treated her like a well-read but fragile china doll, and Harry... oh, she wasn’t even going to get into all the issues she was having with Harry’s self-sacrificing protective streak.

“Come on, Warlord Ronald. Lets go back. You can help me fend off Trudy Sabbat’s attempts to usurp my throne. You have my permission to use deadly force.”

He laughed, and followed her back to the castle.

~ Page Break~

“You look very handsome,” Voldemort commented, eying his young protégé critically. The Beast Brigade (a name of questionable taste, but it was the army) uniforms were cut in the same manner as the regular troupes, but they were pitch black and lined with grey fur atop the shoulders. They gave an impression of a rather sinister mix of military ruthlessness and bestial savagery. They suited Harry nicely, particularly when the boy's intense green eyes were flaring angrily through his fringe of dark hair.

Just like he was doing now, from the far end of the conference table, hunched over a pile of forms.

"Although, the glasses lessen the impact. We really need to see about fixing your eyes permanently. If they work so well during the full moon, I see no reason why we couldn't make work for the rest of the time."

Lucius chuckled, taking a sip of his wine and throwing in a bit of commentary of his own. "I don't know, I think the glasses add a... civilizing touch to the whole ensemble. He's a wizard after all."

"I think the wand makes that clear enough, Malfoy," Harry said, his piercing gaze sliding at the man, who had been subtly (subtly as a Malfoy bothered to be anyway) insulting werewolves and Harry since his arrival that morning. He was seriously considering biting the man just to give him a good scare.

"That's General Malfoy to you, Lieutenant Potter."

And wasn't that just a delicious turn of events? Harold James Potter, Britain's beloved prince, under his command? Alright, it was only a technicality, and he would be hard pressed to order Potter to do anything at the moment, but there was so much potential there and he would be damned if he didn't take advantage of it.

"Now, now, Lucius, what is rank among friends?" Voldemort chided, clearly amused by their little tiffs. A little 'sibling rivalry' wasn't necessarily a bad thing. Neither could afford to be complacent. Particularly Harry, who had a tendency to take walking away from a conversation with dark wizards unscathed for granted (walking away unscathed for everything else was practically a miracle).

Or at least, that was what Voldmort thought. Harry, in fact, knew he was poking a sleeping dragon with his attitude, but frankly he was just so angry right now. Since the Dark Lord had shown up last night, things just seemed to worse and worse. He had to say his goodbyes to Luna his morning, feeling both hollow and alone. He left without speaking to his godfathers, and was starting to feel guilty about it, which just pissed him off considering they hadn't even apologized. Ugh. They he had spent the morning following the werewolves through orientation, and inspecting the facilities where they would all live, train, and sleep. Harry wasn't entirely sure what he was supposed to be inspecting, but as far as he could tell everything was clean, working, and devoid of mind altering chemical and spells (he had in fact tested the beds for memory spells just in case). They he had been dragged off to be fitted for his new uniform and fill out the paperwork for his rank and pay, while the Dark Lord and Lucius hovered like creepy versions of the Weasley twins, making inappropriate commentary and feeding off each other's amusement.

“Don't you two have something better to do? Like, conquering Europe or something?”

Voldmort smirked, and looked ready to say something witty and probably mildly insulting, but then paused. His eyes widened. “I knew we forgot something.”

~ Page Break~

The weather was lousy for so early in November. A cold drizzle and hard north was dampening the enthusiasm of the crowds at they gathered for the main event before the polls opened at noon. Viktor didn't mind. Durmstrang had forever set the standard for 'increment weather', and with his collar turned up and his hat pulled low it was fine as any spring day.

He wove his way through the crowd, careful not to draw any attention to his face. His own rallies (played out in the pub and bar districts) had been a rousing success as best Viktor could estimate, and he was never so grateful that he hadn't given up quidditch as he was now. Who knew an athlete could hold that much sway over the opinion of the working man? But now there was nothing left for him to do but sit back, watch, and wait. The first and last debate between Ivers and Seibligg was due to start any minute, and he had agreed to watch for both Dumbledore (who couldn't risk being recognized) and Tonks (who was busy securing an escape route to Linz) even though he wanted nothing more than to go back to his hotel room and sleep for a week.

"How much longer, Dad?" came the telltale whine of a child from behind him. Viktor glanced over his shoulder at a young boy, no more than seven or eight, looking bored and miserable with his mouth scrunched into a full blown pout. He looked ridiculous. Viktor turned away quickly before the kid noticed him laughing quietly into his hand.

"Just a few minutes, Martin. One day you're going to be telling your own children about this," the boy's father promised.

"About what? I can't see anything down here! And it's cold!"

"I'll put you on my shoulders once it starts. And then I promise we'll have some hot cider afterwards. Okay? Just be good, and pay attention? It's very important and you're the only one I could couldn't on to understand. You're sisters aren't' as grown up as you."

Tat seemed to placate the child, and Viktor shook his head. Had he been that gullible at that age? More than likely. Some days he still felt that gullible. His father had raised him on pride and Dumbledore employed him on honor, but sometimes the dark reality of the world came crashing down on him and neither seemed to be enough.

"Ah, I think it's starting! Come on, Martin. Up you go!"

Viktor turned this attention to the platform, where both candidates and their entourage of security, family, and aides were filing onto their respective sides. Seibligg smiled and waved pleasantly, and Viktor fought the distinct urge to throw something at him. Ivers smiled, but it was ill suited to his solemn eyes. Viktor had only ever seen him in photographs, and truth be told they didn't do the man justice. He was rail thin and drawn, but he walked tall and purposefully. For all the jeering about his pacifistic stance, the man looked strong enough to throttle Seibligg with his bare hands.

An excited hum ran through the crowd. Little flags began to wave and groups of people began to cheer, proclaiming their allegiances. Viktor was having a hard time differentiating which side was the more popular and inwardly cursed. He should have found a spot with a better vantage point of the crowd.

“Welcome ladies and gentlemen to this historic event!” announcer greeted, and a loud cheer rose up.

And then another sound rose, wailing and screeching over the din of the crowd like a banshee foreseeing catastrophe.

An alarm.

Aurors drew their wands, and immediately began pulling the candidates from the platform and towards the safety of the Ministry offices. The screech of the sirens were underlaid with the dull roar of confusion, and Viktor could already feel the crowd beginning to panic. He wasn't feeling too calm himself at the moment.

He had to get out of the crowd. He couldn't use his wand-

Heat, pressure, and sound so impossibly loud it felt like punch to the head.

He wasn't sure how long he was unconscious, probably only seconds, but in those seconds the world had changed. There was screaming, fear and pain, and pleas of help and the sound of an enormous fire. The air reeked of burnt hair, smoke, blood. Viktor blinked, realizing his eyes were still open, even though all he could was the black fog of smoke and dust. It hovered just above him, threatening to descend and suffocate him.

He tried to move, cautiously, wiggling his fingers first to make sure they were still there. Slowly, he tried his arms, struggling a moment to pull them free the weight of bodies resting on top of them.

“Uunnn...”

Was that him or someone else? He couldn't see, couldn't think, but he could hear out of at least one ear and really wished he couldn't. People were dying. Why was he just laying here?

He forced himself to sit up, and nearly vomited as a wave of dizziness sent the world flying. Blood trickled down the side of his face. His eardrum must have been punctured. He tried to stand, but couldn't keep his balance on the uneven ground and fell to his knees. Just as well. He could see when he stood.

Others were starting to get up as well, those who could, but it only made things worse. The people were panicked and tried to run, tripping over the dead and injured, hurting themselves and others, blindly groping for loved ones, for help, for a way out of the battle zone. The fallen were being crushed, and Viktor scrambled himself for some place he wouldn't be stamped on and crushed. Someone grabbed him, pulling him to his feet, and he almost pitched over immediately but his would-be rescuer held him firm.

“Quickly, before they come back,” A young man, only a little older than himself wheezed and dragged him through the blinding, suffocating haze. “Into the Underground. Just follow the others. Here, someone take him!”

“He was handed off to a man and a woman, who took each arm and lead him into a steady stream of people. After a while the air cleared a little, and he tried to speak again.

“What ugh huck w-what..?”

“The Brits, they finally did it. They attacked! My god there were children in the crowd!”

Martin, Viktor thought, That little boy was on his father's shoulders when the explosion...explosions?... went off. He was higher up, more vulnerable. Did he make it?

Viktor found himself being taken down a flight of wide concrete stairs, and the smoke cloud and chaos of the outside fell away to reveal gleaming white tiles and fluorescent lighting.

“Where are...?”

“The Underground. The tunnels lead all over Berlin. Some of them lead out into the subway system. We think they’re sticking ot the wizarding area of he city, so it’s the safest place to go.”

“Muggles...”

“We’ll figure something out...”

He was in no position to question it. He was in no position to do anything at all. God dammit, he was a soldier! He should ve out there accessing the situation, fighting the bad guys, rescuing the trapped and the injured! Not... not...

“Hang in there, kiddo. You’re going to be alright.”

It wasn’t himself he was worried about.”

~ Page Break~

1.I’m sure some of you forgot what ‘primer pater’ means. In Latin, it translates to ‘first father’, and it’s a term used in wizarding society to refer the first wizard to appear with a particular last name. This is usually in relation to a long pureblood line, and is applied retro-actively. Snape, however, is banking on the possibility of having a strong pureblood line stretching out for generations.

are not the only thing Harry draws in his sketchbook, but they are the only things he draws repeatedly.

Alright I've just discovered my story seems to have been removed from everyone's alert list without their permission (including my own) and I'm having trouble re-adding it. Dammit to hell. If you've come across this chapter and wondered why there was alert, it wasn't my fault! If you have any friends or are in any forums my story features, would you let them know I've updated?

Hello, everyone! Long time no see. Sorry about that. End of semester, but holiday traveling and Christmas sucked up my writing time. So here you go. I hope to turn out another chapter by next Tuesday, but of course my credibility is shot at this point. You' ll have to keep your fingers crossed.

Book V:

Chapter 21: The Eastern Front

Lieutenant Seitler internally cringed when Potter arrived at the front gates of Hogwarts and saluted him. He had been warned in advance of the boy's recent change in status, but two days was not enough to mentally prepare himself for the sight of a skinny adolescent boy in full military uniform standing in front of him. It was beyond inappropriate. It was an insult to the armed forces, both Cultie and Sentinel, not so much because of the person Potter was (Seitler like many of his colleagues felt he had great potential despite being a walking disaster magnet), but because the employment of someone so young into an extremely dangerous profession (especially these days) went against their very reason for being. They were meant to protect Britain's youth, not paint a giant target on them and set them loose. More irritating was the fact that Potter was probably oblivious to his own mortality, and that was dangerous for everyone.

"You're not going to wear that here," he stated, glaring at the younger man's black and fur-lined uniform. It wasn't quite an order. He wasn't mentally prepared to attempt to pull rank on another Lieutenant from the military.

"It's only for when I'm on duty," Potter said quickly, fidgeting a bit. It was obvious he wasn't yet comfortable in it. Good.

“Are you on duty now?”

“... no, sir.”

“Then go change. This isn’t Halloween and that isn’t a costume.”

“Yes, sir. I mean, no, sir...Er... I’ll go now.”

“Leave your luggage and be back in half an hour. There’s paperwork.”

“Yes, sir.” There was a definite hesitation on leaving his luggage with Seitler and his men, but nothing too suspicious. Civilians rarely liked to leave their belongings to be looked through by government entities. Seitler made quick work of it. There wasn’t much to find. Clothes and the usual hygiene materials mostly.

There were only two suspect items; a bag of leaves and five foot staff. The leaves were common herbs, nothing that couldn’t be found over the counter at any local apothecaries. The staff was holly wood wrapped in leather and studded with bones, feathers, and beads. It obviously came from the werewolf colony and set off their magical detection devices at nearly six feet.

He decided to run that by Snape before returning it.

Privates Tousack and Finn looked disappointed.

“Were you expecting a severed head?” Seitler snipped. Tousack, a recruit barely a year out of academy and who could sass with only his left eyebrow, grinned back at him.

“You never know with this one. Bit of an odd duck, he is.”

Finn tried and failed to suppress a smirk. “Could have stuck a werewolf puppy in here somewhere.”

“Good to know you gentlemen are not underestimating Mr. Potter’s propensity for trouble. I, myself, continue to be amazed at the level of chaos he has managed to achieve.”

Seitler tensed, but kept his face expressionless as he turned to see Snape gliding soundlessly towards them. How had he snuck up on them undetected? He nodded to the man.

“Professor.”

“Lieutenant,” the man acknowledged. Tousack and Finn had once again adopted their ‘game face’ which may have intimidated school children but had no affect on the de facto headmaster. “So he has returned then?”

He gestured towards Potter’s things.

“Yes. I sent him to change. He was... inappropriately attired.”

The other man had nothing to say to that.

“Find anything of interest?”

Seitler pointed out the herbs and staff. Snape checked the herbs first, sniffing tentatively. His expression remained completely blank, but the Sentinel suspected he was thinking very deeply. He set the herbs aside, and went to the staff. He did not touch it, but performed several spells that even Seitler was unfamiliar with.

“This... is coming with me. Inform Potter if you would that I shall be sending it to his vault in Gringotts,” he said finally, carefully taking hold of the staff.

“You do not wish to speak with Potter yourself?”

Snape’s expression remained stony. “Lieutenant, I am a very busy man these days. Idle chatter with delinquent students is not high on my list of priorities right now. Send him to Professor McGonagall. She can deal with him.”

He left without another word, and once out of hearing range Finn muttered 'jerk' under his breath. Seitler wasn't about to jump to the same conclusion. Snape... was not a likeable fellow. He was curt, sarcastic, and intolerant of incompetence. But he was also fiercely protective of his students (Potter in particular who was simultaneously the most troublesome and the most valuable of his peers) in his own merciless way. It seemed odd to Seitler that the man wouldn't speak with Potter directly, if not to chastise him then to at least learn what the Dark Lord was up to these days. The election of the new Minister of Magic in Germany was supposed to be today, and he couldn't be the only one wondering if they would be continuing the war against the idiot Seibligg or some complete unknown.

He wondered if something had happened (something more than the usual weirdness) that had created a rift between guardian and ward. He wondered if there might not be a way to take advantage of it.

~Page Break~

There was no way out of the Underground that lead to muggle Berlin. Those who had fled into the tunnels soon found themselves at a dead end, bricked over and heavily warded. Any spells sent at it ricocheted, and no one dared try more hardcore spells for fear of killing everyone crowded around them. Some turned back immediately, some just sat and waited for help to arrive, some lingered around the blocked passage and tried to find a way to tear it down. Some of those who left came back with medi-witches and wizards to help the injured. Some of them came back with news.

“ They've cut off the entire Court District and Lindt-Wilheim University,” a man said, his thick winter robes smeared with blood and ash, to a small group standing near the blocked wall. Viktor listened with his one good ear as a young medi-witch tried to examine him. She was already exhausted from treating dozens of others, and he didn't try to rush her. She was doing far more good than he was at the moment. “They're raiding all the buildings, dragging out all the people. Sometimes they just took their wands and let them go, but other times... especially near the Auror's headquarters...”

The man covered his eyes and could say nothing else. A woman took up where he left off. She was ashen and despite the bright lights in the tunnels, her eyes remained wide and unblinking.

“It’s like they’ve got a list. This...death list, and they’re just sorting through everyone to find them.”

“List? A fucking list? Where the hell were you looking?” another man snarled. “They were killing anyone who had their wand out! And that was everyone! I saw them! Cut down a bunch of college kids trying to put out some of the fires. Kids I tell you! Not one of them over 22! Fucking sick bastards.”

“It’s not just people either,” another nervous fellow jumped in. “It’s places. They were burning all the wand shops on 42 ½ St. I... I don’t know if the owners were inside or not. They were destroying all the Ministry offices as far as I could tell... but it was dark from the smoke so I can’t be sure...”

“My God, how are they doing all this? How could they?” the woman sniffed, her wide eyes finally squeezing shut as tears began to fall and she sobbed quietly. Viktor, who either from his concussion or some other shock, was thinking clearly enough to know the answer but not clearly enough to realize it was a rhetorical question finally spoke up.

“I know this one. It’s brilliant. Horrible, but brilliant. It’s why they attacked the debate first... well, that and they wanted to kill the candidates I guess... This isn’t even their spell work, you know. They just... pirated it. It’s the Ministry’s. They set off the Ministry’s own fucking defenses.”

The medi-witch glowered at him. “Sssh... enough of that. You’re hurt and confused. Hold still and I’ll do something about your ear.”

But everyone was looking at him now, and it seemed wrong to leave them wondering.

“The Ministry has defenses around the city to protect it from muggles. Most major wizarding cities do. The Brits must have found out where the main hub for controlling them was located. They attacked the debate, the Aurors protecting it all go to help the minister, then those that remain are wiped out by another group of Brits, and then they take over the hub, activate the defenses and then... amp them up. Doesn't take much to make a ward meant to keep out muggles from keeping in witches and wizards, you know.”

He must not have been very clear because they were all staring at him with the same vaguely horrified and confused expression.

“How... how do you know that?”

Viktor snorted. “Vikings did it in Londinium in eight hundred something... I know a lot about Vikings.”

“And I know a lot about healing,” the medi-witch interjected, “And if you want to heal, I highly recommend you shut up for ten minutes. Would all leave us be? He has a concussion, he doesn't know what he's talking about.”

Ten minutes later his ear was healed, albeit temporarily, and he could walk without feeling dizzy again. The concussion was gone, but his certainty in his idea wasn't. It seemed most of the others hiding in the tunnels were becoming increasingly certain of his idea as well, if only because no other plausible or even implausible explanation had been offered yet. He didn't stick around elaborate on his theory. The only one who might actually make use of it was Dumbledore and he had to find him quickly.

He back tracked through the tunnels, unconsciously searching the dirty, frightened faces of the people huddled together for Martin, the boy he had seen just before the explosion, but there were too many people to know if he was there or not. He continued on until he reached the stairs that would lead up to the surface, and found a small crowd standing there with apparently the same intentions. A young man turned to him as he appeared and gestured for him to stop.

“Wait a minute. We’re waiting for the scout to get back.”

He really didn’t have time to wait around for someone who might not ever appear. If Dumbledore was still in the city, it probably wouldn’t be for long. He had more than a little experience slipping through traps. Pushing and squeezing his way up, he tried to listen for any suspicious sounds, but there was nothing but the dull roar and occasional snap and crackle of fire. Outside the air was thick with smoke and steam, buildings and signs stood out as ghostly silhouettes in the haze. He searched for possible threats, but it was uncannily silent. Cautiously, he made his way towards the Lindt-Wilhelm University, an abandoned dormitory the agreed meeting place if things should go wrong.

The journey there was like a dream, shapes forming and disappearing in and out of the gloom, shouts and screams from out of sight, and the uneasy feeling of being watched. Viktor kept to the alleys wherever possible, and made it a point to look upwards frequently for broomsticks and snipers. There was no one else out on the street, but passing by some of the darkened windows he could see people trying to hide under tables and chairs. Some of the windows had been exploded and were now blocked with planks of wood or furniture. Paranoid eyes peeked out at him through doorways and gaps in the woodwork.

He didn’t encounter any real signs of battle until Leipziger, a café and bar strip a few blocks from the campus. Several of shops were now burning, while others were merely cinders and melted glass, and in the street bodies lay scattered. Men and women had been left where they lay, their wands out, some tucked behind a small tree or whatever possible cover they could find. They were not fighters, but even still they managed to take down a soldier or two. Viktor made it a point to memorize the look of their grey uniforms, but shied away from their faces, younger still than most of those civilians they had helped to murder.

Wilhelm was the main street leading to the dormitories, and here Viktor met the enemy. His only forewarning was the heavy trod of boots from up ahead, and quickly ducked a doorway and cast a notice-me-not on himself. It was just in time. A small squadron of soldiers, at least a dozen, appeared with their wands up and their eyes alert, looking like wolves on the hunt. They were grouped together in threes, and positioned themselves in front of different shops, just a short distance away from him.

“Reducto!” one of the men shouted, blasting the door of a small restaurant into shards of glass and winter. Inside, several people screamed in fright. “Come out with your hands up or we’ll burn you all alive inside!”

The words were stilted, a rehearsed line by someone who had no real idea what they were saying. The soldiers stepped away from the doorway and after a moment a middle-aged wizard appeared with his hands up, followed by a busboy, then more and more people began to file out. Two of the soldiers grabbed them roughly and herded them into a line and forced them to their knees while the third kept his wand on those still filing out. When no one else came out the third went inside, and returned a moment later and signaled that it was clear. Some thirty men and women knelt terrified in the street.

Across the street another set of Aurors repeated what had just occurred, breaking down the door and ordering those inside to come out. While that was going on the first trio continued to the second stage of their routines.

“When I stop in front of you, surrender your wand, handle first, and you will be allowed to leave unharmed. If you resist, I will kill you,” he stated blandly. He moved to the first person in the line, the middle-aged wizard, who reluctantly pulled his wand from his jacket and handed it over. The soldier took it and snapped it.

“NO!” the wizard shouted and lunged for him.

“Crucio!”

The wizard fell to the ground and screamed, as did several other people in the line. Viktor clenched his wand in his hand and calculated the odds of killing the soldier and escaping with his life.

They were abysmal, but he could not stand watching the torture for much longer. The screaming finally stopped and wizard collapsed, struggling to breath. The soldier moved to the next person in the line, who surrendered his wand and did nothing more than cringe when it was snapped in front of him.

“Hey, Captain! They ain’t coming out!” one of the soldiers from the second trio called in English.

The soldier who was snapping wands turned to him. “Did you give them the warning?”

“Yeah, twice.”

The captain shrugged. “Burn it down.”

The soldiers nodded and lifted their wands.

“Oprimo viscera!”

Viktor’s curse caught the closest soldier squarely. The result was a shrieking scream, followed by burst of blood from his mouth, and then death. The others stared stunned just long enough for him to repeat the curse on a second soldier, this one as far away as he could still see him. More screaming, from the civilians in the street, from inside the buildings, and finally shouts from the captain to find the attacker. Viktor had already moved from the doorway to the closest alley, running as fast as he could without knocking over debris and giving away his position. A whistle went off somewhere behind him, alerting others to what the attack.

He risked crossing the open street to get to a large park located on the edge of the campus, and ducked into the undergrowth. He kept moving until he found himself at large pond. No one followed him, but he continued to scan his surroundings restlessly. When he was absolutely sure no one was going to be firing any curses at him, he sank to his knees and vomited.

Those people on the street, he may have killed them for all he knew. The captain had been willing to burn innocent people alive, would he think twice about killing those on the street now that Viktor had provoked him? Had his own misguided attempt to stop them really saved those people in the shop or had they burned it anyway?

Stupid, Viktor! If you had just stunned those two they might not have been as angry! They may have been distracted long enough for those people inside to surrender.

There was nothing to be done about it now. Maybe he had helped, maybe he had made things worse. For himself, there was no help. He would never reach the dormitories. He knew that now. They would find him, kill him if they recognized him, kill him if he tried to fight, and Dumbledore wouldn't even be there. He was gone. He had to be. All Viktor could do was run and hide.

For now.

As soon as he found a place to hide that was relatively safe, he would start planning. The Brits were working quickly to unarm the civilian population before a resistance could be mounted, but they wouldn't get everyone. They couldn't. Viktor just needed to find others, find out how deeply entrenched the invaders had made themselves, find a way to tear down the wards that entrapped them, and they might be able to win back the city.

Funny how that sounded so much harder without Dumbledore and a bag of lemon drops backing him up.

~ Page Break~

Katarina awoke choking on ash, her entire body convulsing in panic until she blindly kicked open the lid to her coffin and sent it flying to the other side of the room. She searched the room, expecting to see fire, but there was only a sickening smog trying to invade her undead lungs. Her rooms were shuddered against the deadly rays of the sun, but the electric lamps she kept on at all times glowed and she hunted her way through her room to the adjoining one, where six coffins lay.

“Wake up! Wake up!” she shouted, throwing open lids and pulling her groggy children from their beds and all but tossing them on the floor. “We’re under attack! Wake up the others!”

Disoriented, the younger vampires scrambled to their feet to do as she commanded while their mistress hunted for answers. Despite the smoke, none of the rooms were on fire, and no one had entered. The smell was atrocious, but being undead she was not forced to breathe it in, and despite the lack of fire her instincts were screaming at her to get all of her children out of the house. But what if that was what they wanted? What if they were trying to flush them out so they could cut them down once they left their sanctuary? Who were they anyway?

“Calm yourself, Madam.”

She turned letting out an angry hiss. Horace stood in the parlor, drinking tea, the smoke that had enveloped everything else parted away from him. He did not look concerned.

“What is the meaning of this?”

His expression remained bland, but there was an underlying tension she didn’t miss. He was angry with her, angrier than he had been when she had thrown his last command in his face and sauntered off to do as she pleased.

“The meaning? The meaning my dear lady is... that I told you so.”

“I beg your pardon?!”

“Beg away, I doubt it will save you.”

“You-“

“Shut up, you stupid cow! You didn’t want to listen to me before, wanted to prove something, and congratulations you’ve proven what spoiled brat you are and probably killed us all,” he snarled, a flick of his wand smashing her into the piano. The instrument shattered, leaving her stunned in a pile a dangerously sharp wood and broken piano wire.

Goethe burst into the room, followed by half a dozen other vampires. One of them made a rush for the young wizard, only to burst into flames. He began screaming.

“Horace, stop!” Katarina screamed. “Please, stop! Please!”

The flaming vampire extinguished himself, leaving behind the charred remains of his clothes, and lots of exposed and unharmed skin. It had only been a warning. One she was not going to take for granted. Defeated, she let Goethe pull her to her feet, and looking down turned back to the wizard.

“Please, tell me what’s happening.”

The boy put his tea down, shoving it aside and began pacing.

“Voldemort’s army has invaded Berlin. They’ve locked down the wizarding city. There’s no way in or out. We’re stuck. I filled the house with smoke to trick the Culties from actually setting it on fire, but someone is going to catch on eventually.”

“I don’t understand. What do you mean Voldemort’s invaded Berlin?”

“I’m not sure how I can simplify that sentence,” he sneered. She bit back her own acidic retort.

“I mean... why didn’t you tell me?”

“Because I didn’t know. He told me to leave for Frankfurt so that we wouldn’t be caught up in this but he never told me his plans in case I was ever caught. Dammit, dammit, dammit.”

Katarina wanted to ask more questions, offer some suggestions, but she had a feeling anything she said at this point would only infuriate the boy further. Looking more closely at him, she could see he was exhausted, his eyes bloodshot and shadowed and his hair and clothes uncharacteristically mused. At last, he stopped pacing and turned to glare at her.

“I’ll figure something out, but in the mean time I expect you to follow my orders to the letter or I swear on my life I’ll leave you here to burn with the rest of the city, is that clear?”

Once again, for the sake of her children as much as herself, she bit her tongue.

“Chrystal.”

~ Page Break~

Harry hadn’t even gotten the chance to unpack yet, and Hermione already had him sifting through enough homework to make his brain pop. His suspension meant he could not re-take any tests or make up missed assignments, which after two weeks was going to make a hefty dip in his GPA for the semester, and if he wanted any chance of bringing it back up before the end of the semester he was going to have to ace almost all his assignments and pick up as much extra credit as he could muster.

“ I’ve already talked to Professor McGonagall and Professor Slughorn,” Hermione reassured him, looking her most sympathetic as he gawked at the foot high stack of papers. They were in the library, cloistered into a quiet little nook where the stares and whispers from the other students wouldn’t bother them. “They’re both willing let you complete some extra credit work during the holiday break, and I’m pretty sure I can convince Professor Snape to let you tutor for the first years for extra credit, but he’s been in a mood lately so I think we should wait before we try discussing it with him. Professor Sprout and Professor Flitwick...eh... I don’t know if there’s much to be done about them. They’re both still furious with you.”

Harry nodded, hoping he didn’t look too panicked. “What about Vector and Toure?”

“Simple,” Natalie interrupted, inviting herself to squeeze in next to Harry, while Draco situated himself next to Hermione. “Bribe Vector with one of those cool pagan rituals with all the circles and triangles and things. Don’t even worry about Toure. She practically creamed herself when she heard you became an official diplomat for the Dark Lord. She’ll probably give you an Outstanding in her class just on principle.”

“Oh, yuck, Nat,” Draco cringed. “Do you have to be so vulgar? It’s hard enough listening to that woman’s ranting without you tossing in those wonderful mental images.”

“Prude,” the Slytheriness dismissed. She turned to Harry, and before he could react she pecked him on the cheek. “Welcome back, Harry. You’re looking much better, I have to say. Although, I’m sorry I missed seeing you in uniform. Cullis said you looked quite dastardly.”

He smiled a bit awkwardly. She’d caught him off guard with the kiss, and he was feeling a bit flustered, although she didn’t seem to have meant anything by it.

“We all are feeling quite deprived. How are you, you mad rogue?” Draco said.

“Getting madder every day. Did you hear-“

“No, no, no. Not now!” Hermione interjected. “You’ve probably got more stories than Beadle the Bard to share, but if you start on them you’ll never even get started with your assignments and you’ve got two chapters to study for if you want to pass that quiz in Arithmancy and a foot long essay on transmutation of alloys due tomorrow in Transfiguration!”

Natalie glowered at the other girl. “Oh come on! You’re here. We haven’t seen him in two weeks and the last thing we heard about him was that he got drafted into the military! Did you really get drafted?”

“Uh... yeah, I guess-“

Hermione glowered at him. "Harry, do you want to pass your classes or not?"

"Er..."

Draco chuckled and climbed out of the cubicle. "Uh-oh, she's got the evil eyes on her, mate. Best to just nod obediently at this point. Come on Nat, we can grill him at dinner."

"I'm not afraid of-"

The Gryffindor prefect turned her formidable glare to her. Natalie quickly shut her mouth. She glared back briefly, before letting out an indignant sniff.

"Have it your way, but Ron will be so disappointed."

She stalked off. Draco rolled his eyes as he turned to follow her. Hermione let out a frustrated huff. "That girls sometimes...Argh!"

Harry gave her a thoughtful look. "What was she talking about? With Ron, I mean? Why would he be disappointed?"

"Forget about it." She waved her hand dismissively. "He gets jealous about spending time with me sometimes. It's silly really, and I'm not going encourage his childishness. Now, chapter eight-"

"Hermione..."

"Harry, we really need to get started-"

"Thank you."

She blinked, and he couldn't help but smile at how surprised she looked.

"For doing all this," he elaborated. "You're a really good friend. I know I don't say that enough, but that doesn't mean I don't think it."

Her ears started to turn pink and she looked down quickly at her hands, flitting through her notes. "Oh...I... you're welcome. I mean... I know you'd do the same for me... well, you have done the same thing for me. With the acrumantula and all, except of course you risked your life so really it's even bigger than... um.... chapter eight. Why don't you start copying my notes?"

"Sure," he said, taking mercy on her. Hermione might love being praised for her intelligence, but it seemed any other kind of praise turned her into a modest mouse. He looked down at the parchment containing her small, tidy script, and started to read.

As much as he missed Luna, there was something to be said about the comfort of the familiar and routine. It was a warm, safe place after stumbling lost through the wilderness. They had survived it together and they were bonded forever by the experience, but he had bonds here as well. Bonds formed through steadfast loyalty and shared affection.

It was good to be home.

~ Page Break ~

"Fire!"

Another volley of spells smashed into the wards, causing the air to shimmer like the oily surface of an enormous bubble, only to fade into its undetectable translucent state. Oblitz glowered at the line of Culties grinning at him and his men as yet another attempt to bring it down failed. A few of them actually clapped mockingly.

Oblitz ground his teeth. This was not how he imagined his day going, although even he could find a bitter appreciation for the irony of the situation. It had been his intention to stage a terrorist attack about midway through the debate, blow up a few buildings in a neighborhood shopping district, give everyone a good scare before they went to the polls and remind them of exactly what they were up against.

Except it seemed even Oblitz himself had underestimated what they were up against. He hadn't anticipated the attack on the city on Election Day. The move seemed too impolitic, too audacious for a creature as manipulative as Lord Voldemort. He had only himself to blame. He was in charge of the city's security, and now he had lost over 90 square kilometers, nearly two-thirds of the wizarding section of the city, including all of the Ministry Offices and Auror Headquarters. Seibligg was dead or else soon to be publically executed, leaving wizarding Germany without a true leader...

He might be able to work with that.

He turned to his men, a mere two hundred, not nearly enough to oust the estimated two-thousand soldiers terrorizing the city even without the wards separating them. They would need reinforcements.

"I want a perimeter set around this entire wall. We might not be able to get inside, but I want to make damn sure that none of these sons of bitches can get out either! Stay alert! I catch anyone of you sleeping on the job, I'll make sure you wish you were in there with the bastards," he snarled.

All of them saluted obediently and went off to do as instructed. They were well trained. Ten times brighter than any of the stooges making monkey faces from the other side of the ward, but they wouldn't be enough. Not yet.

"Sgt. Lars," he snapped, and a young Auror paused on his way to follow orders. Reluctantly he stepped up to his commander.

"Sir?"

"You transferred to Berlin from Hamburg, did you not?"

"Yes, sir."

"So you know the Head Auror there?"

"Er... by reputation only."

“Then by reputation only, do you believe he would spare some of his men?”

Lars stiffened. “Sir, with all due respect, any Auror worth his salt in Germany would willingly drop whatever they’re doing to help drive out these tyrants.”

“I’m banking on it. Go to Hamburg, tell them what’s happened. Have them spread the word. I’ll need men and supplies here as quickly as possible. By dawn I want these fools to know exactly what sort of hornets nest they’ve stepped in. Go!”

The Auror apparated away in a deafening snap, leaving Oblitz to wonder if he were truly doing the right thing. What if this was exactly what the Dark Lord wanted? If he took Aurors from the other cities then those cities would be vulnerable to attack. Yet what choice did he have? Berlin could not be surrendered after so feeble a battle.

He would think of something. There was no one else left to do it.

~ Page Break ~

“Harry!”

He awoke instantly, wand in his hand and pointed before he even registered that he had even been asleep. Something broke, a scone maybe, crashing to the floor. He blinked once, twice, grabbed his glasses and tried again.

Hermione stood by the doorway blinking down at the twisted piece of metal currently laying at her feet. He paled.

“Oh Merlin, are you alright?!” He clambered out of bed, ignoring the icy chill of the floor. In the other beds, boys stirred from their sleep, grumbling and cursing at the early hour.

“I’m fine,” she said, still looking down at the scone. “I didn’t know you sleep with your wand under your pillow.”

“I don’t. Hermione? Are you alright? I didn’t... bloody hell, I don’t even remember what spell I used!”

“Potter take you’re love spat outside! We’re trying to sleep here!”

She blinked again, and then seemed to shake herself out of her surprise. She grabbed his hand, leading him out of the dormitory and down the stairs to the Common Room. It was empty, but a fire had been lit to fight off the early morning chill. The grandfather clock showed it was only a little after seven.

“We’ll talk about what happened later. Did you know about this?!”

She shoved a newspaper at him and turned away to start pacing in front of the fire, chewing her thumbnail nervously. Looking down at the paper, it immediately became obvious what had her so agitated. Splashed across the front in words large enough to be read from across the room, Wizing Weekly practically screamed;

BRITAIN CONSQUERS BERLIN!!! MINISTER SEIBLIGG DEAD!!!

Harry’s eyes widened and he quickly scanned the article detailing the invasion of the German capitol city during the election, the subsequent death of the minister during the conflict, and the meager resistance that was so easily swept aside. There was more, much more, but he couldn’t bring himself to continue. He shoved the paper aside, too stunned to know what he should be feeling. Hermione took one look at him and her expression softened.

“You didn’t know.”

He shook his head, not trusting himself to speak. He had seen the Dark Lord the previous morning, the day of the invasion, had breakfast with him, discussed military politics and the werewolf funeral. Some how Harry doubted that the invasion of Germany had simply slipped his mind.

“What does this all mean?” he asked. “I mean... I sort of get why he... why we’re... no, no... I don’t get it. Well, I do, but... how? How can we invade a city? What’s to accomplish? It can’t be held forever! Merlin we assassinated their minister!”

She shook her head.

“I don’t know either. The Dark Lord must have a plan. Lucius must have a plan.”

Movement from the stairs distracted them for a moment, and Clyde ambled down in a bathrobe, looking only half awake.

“What’s going on?”

Harry handed him the paper, and he skimmed it. “Huh. About bloody time.”

They both just looked at him. He shrugged.

“Well, what did you think was going to happen? The stupid jerks got exactly what they asked for. We should have smacked some sense into them last year after the whole tournament plot.”

“People are going to die!” Hermione protested.

“People already died!” Clyde snapped back, the first real hint of anger. “They murdered those people in Dunnan Hill and Timir! They tore down our protective wards so they could go on to murder even more people!”

“How do those sins make it alright for us to commit the same sins against people who weren’t involved?! We’re only escalating the violence. This will only make things worse for everyone!” she shouted back. Clyde threw up his hands and turned to Harry who was staring into the fire.

“You know I’m right. They killed your friends, would killed your godfathers if they had been there. They have to be stopped and this is the first real step to doing that. Explain it to her. I apparently don't speak intellectual."

"Harry, this is only going to get worse," she reiterated, but said nothing else.

Harry closed his eyes. "You're both right."

Clyde snorted and rolled his eyes. Harry glared at him.

"You're both right. This is going to get worse. It's only the start of things. More people are going die. A lot more people... but it... we couldn't do nothing. They did have to be stopped. I just... I can't imagine how this is going to end. I don't know what we're going to lose or win and whether it's going to be worth it. I just don't know."

They all stood silently for a long time after that, until finally Clyde nodded.

"Yeah, okay. That makes sense. Sorry, Hermione, didn't mean to snap at you."

Hermione nodded, not looking any happier.

"What do we do?"

Harry shook his head. "What can we do? We don't even know what's going on. We'll just have to wait. Gather our facts. Figure out what to do after that, if there even is anything we can do."

~ Page Break~

The Dark Lord and General Lucius stood across from one another in the meeting room, staring down at a map of Berlin. On it several pin pricks of blue and red dots were moving. A majority of the red dots were concentrated at the center of the city, with an even larger number of blue dots scattered around them. Amongst the concentration of red dots there was the occasional blue one, but they had been steadily disappearing since yesterday and would soon be gone altogether. Their men had successfully taken the city. It was a matter of holding it that was of their primary concern now.

Around them several lieutenant generals, colonels, and majors were gathered to await news from the battlefield and receive their orders. Among them was Major Beartooth, the official leader of the werewolf troops for all of three days. He was large, bear-like as his namesake, with a thick ruddy beard and arms like tree trunks. He remained out of everyone's way and they likewise returned the favor.

An urgent knock on the door drew everyone's attention, and they all turned as the door as doors opened and a young private entered and saluted shakily.

"What is it?" Voldemort prompted.

"The most recent report from Maj. General Albertson, my Lord!" he said, holding out a scroll.

"Very well. Dismissed."

Lucius relieved him of the scroll and brought it to his master. Voldemort read it, smirked and handed it back.

"The wards remain stable, the Aurors inside have been all but annihilated, and our men have already disarmed an estimated third of the population. Ladies and gentleman, Berlin is ours."

The room swelled with cheers and applause. It had been a risky maneuver. The true scale of Berlin's defenses was unknown, but it would have been at its most alert with the election in place. It seemed providence was on their side. Voldemort let them have their moment of enthusiasm, enjoying it himself for few moments before he gestured them to quiet down.

"This is indeed a glorious victory, but we still have much work to do. The Polish Minister of Magic is a new and skittish ally. Our success in Berlin affords us some confidence, but we will need more victories and soon if we hope to keep it. Albertson has what he needs to hold the city for at least six months, but we're going to need to take the states of Brandenburg and Baden-Württemberg long before then in order to secure the borders in France and Poland. After that, we'll move our troops towards each other through Hesse, Thuringia, Saxony-Anhalt, and Saxony, effectively splitting the country in half."

"Divide and conquer," one of the majors said thoughtfully.

"Precisely. The Aurors will be gathering in Brandenburg and what little remains of Berlin, so we will begin our attack in Baden-Württemberg. We'll start off with shock troops first, take out as many Auror and Ministry offices as possible, and then march our infantry after them to establish control over the local population. After that we'll have to wait and see how the Germans respond. If they stick to Berlin or rush to Baden-Württemberg or split themselves, we have plenty of options left to us in any of these events. Any questions?"

One of the Corporals, a hard-faced woman missing her left ear stepped forward.

"How much force do you wish us to use to subdue the civilian population?"

"As much as necessary," Voldemort said plainly, then added, "And no more than that. As tempting as it may be to punish them for what happened in Ireland and Scotland, they will suffer enough through their humiliating defeat. I expect all of you to be ruthlessly efficient so that they might fear you, but not so utterly ruthless that they will find rebellion the more suitable choice than surrender. Remember, the eyes of the world are upon us."

An audible snort drew his attention to the corner of the room where Beartooth stood, arms crossed.

"You have something you would like to say?" Voldemort asked smoothly. Several men and women quickly stepped out of the way so as not to be between the werewolf and the Dark Lord's wand.

“My people don’t give a damn about the rest of the world. Sure as hell don’t give a damn about German sensibilities. We’re here for one reason and one reason only: Kill as many as the fuckers as possible.”

Those gathered in the room held their breaths, certain that such a bold and disrespectful statement could only end in blood and/or screaming. The Dark Lord must have been in unusually high-spirits, however, because all he did was smile.

“Shock troops it is then.”

~ Page Break~

Snape stared out the window and down at the small gathering of students beside the lake. Harry was out there, weaseling some extra credit out of Vector by demonstrating some sort of pagan ritual for making fire with only diagrams of triangles and pentagons to the entire arithmancy class. Seitler was nearby, scanning for trouble, and more than likely some of his men were out of sight doing the same. He was thankful for their diligence. It was hard enough convincing his own students to be cautious and alert, let alone the castle’s own security detail.

Within a few minutes Harry succeeded in making fire. Small though it was, Snape couldn’t help but be impressed. He had heard Professor Seamus gloat to Vector that the spell was possible but way out of the league of a fifteen year-old novice. There were three hundred and thirty three parts to it after all, and they had to be arranged perfectly. Apparently, Potter had found an abridged version. Or had created one himself.

The Gryffindor made some sort of flinging gesture at the little fire, which suddenly exploded. Those gathered all leaped back in alarm, except for the conjurer himself who had been knocked three feet away and onto his back. Vector hurried to his side, but the boy was already climbing to his feet, patting his clothes to put out the little fires. He didn’t seem particularly concerned that he had nearly blown himself up.

Merlin, this was supposed to be the greatest threat to the Dark Lord?

No, it couldn't be. The child who had been prophesized to destroy Voldemort was dead and gone, and had been for fourteen years now. Buried in some unmarked grave with Frank and Alice Longbottom.

This was just coincidence. A mistake on the centaurs' part. Maybe even a cruel joke. After all, there was no proof Harry had been born on July 31st. There was no reason for Harry to lie about it. He didn't know about the prophecy.

However, Dumbledore did. Dumbledore who could have warned James and Lily. It would explain why they had fled Britain so abruptly, why they would hide their identities and pretend to be muggles, and why they might lie, even to their own child, about his age and birthright.

No. They had reason to flee already. The war was escalating and the end could be seen overwhelmingly in the Dark Lord's favor, and they had fled knowing they and their infant son would be killed if they didn't. Pretending to be muggles... it wasn't like they had any reason to cling to wizarding life after they left Britain. They must have thought being a muggle was somehow better than being a refugee, and in a lot of ways they were probably right.

It was too important a matter to guess at. He would have to know before he did anything. Wait, no, that's not right. If he knew, then he would have to do something. What exactly? Tell the Dark Lord obviously... or tell Harry. Warn him. Explain his destiny. Help him carry it out?

There had been a time in his life, one he was not proud, where he had doubted the Dark Lord's cause. The Death Eaters, men and women he had respected and admired, had been becoming increasingly fanatical, malicious, and barbaric. He had found himself becoming disgusted with their pointless cruelty and their lack of any true motivation beyond the indulgence of their own growing sadism. More than that, he was starting to hate the Dark Lord for encouraging them.

Only Lucius knew of his doubts, and was the sole surviving confidant of those dark times. The death of the Longbottom child and with it the only hope of the Dark Lord's defeat had stripped him of the possibility of defection, and despite the hopelessness that followed the months after, it eventually came to pass that the war ended. Lucius had pulled some strings to have him transferred to Hogwarts rather than taking up a Court appointment, sparing him the company of people he had come to despise (with the exception of Lestrangle of course, but then they rarely sought out the other's company).

Things got better. The country began to heal. Everyday the future looked brighter. A new generation, untouched by the horrors of that conflict, was appearing now.

Just in time for this new war to deprive them of their innocence.

If Harry really was the one capable of killing the Dark Lord, should he help him do so and put an end to this vicious cycle? Would that really help anyone at this point? Pulling Voldemort from his immortal coil would destabilize the government, the entire country, leaving them vulnerable to threats from within and without. There would only be more war.

If Harry was truly destined to kill Voldemort, and there was no definitive evidence that he was, Snape may not in fact be capable of stopping him anymore than he was capable of stopping Voldemort. The infuriating Gryffindor had survived countless obstacles at unbelievable odds for years, and in the process had obtained magical and political power. He had nearly succeeded in killing the Dark Lord once already. What if he sided prematurely? He was caught in a very precarious position between them.

Questions. Too many questions. He didn't know what to do. Had it really only been a week ago that his biggest concern was the future of his own genetic line? It seemed such a small and ineffectual matter, and yet perhaps if the future was really so grim it should be of primary importance. What if he did not survive? Who would carry on his legacy? Ira if he could have his preference, but life rarely asked his opinion.

What if he was just turning into a paranoid loon? Maybe Dumbledore cursed his office before he fled Britain. The years Lestrage had spent here certainly hadn't improved her sanity.

He needed answers to two very basic questions before he proceeded to any others questions concerning his future.

Was Harry truly born on July 31st as the Centaurian naming book indicated?

And could Ira, in fact, be the future mother of his children?

Saturday was in three days. He would uncover the answer to both questions then.

~ Page Break~

"She won't come out," Timmons said softly, as he descended the stairs to the living room of the small town home they were currently borrowing. It all looked sadly empty. Krum was lost to them, as was Fredricks, both killed during the attack on Berlin or else in mortal peril that none of them could save them from. Dumbledore and Tonks had arrived as scheduled, and while their leader informed them of the sad turn of events, she had gone up to one of the empty bedrooms and would speak to no one. Timmons had heard her weeping, but he didn't think that was something he should share with the others. She obviously wanted to grieve in private. "I think we should leave her be for now."

Johan, for once, had nothing sarcastic or belittling to say. Phoebe, likewise remained silent.

"This..." Dumbledore began, then stopped and shook his head. "I find myself at a loss for words in this moment, at a time I know you all need comfort and reassurance. I can find none that would not be an insult to those we have lost."

"We don't know if they're dead," Timmons said quickly. "They're both very clever young men. They still have a fighting chance!"

“Yes, indeed, they do,” Dumbledore agreed, smiling sadly. “Please hold onto that hope for us, my friend. I am afraid we are running short on it. Matters have turned increasingly grave. I had not considered the invasion of Berlin possible with it being so far from both Britain and France. It would seem that the Dark Lord has made a secret alliance with Poland, allowing Britain to flank both sides of Germany. If something is not done, Voldemort will take Germany and make himself at home on the mainland. I don’t need to explain to you how vital it is that we prevent that from happening.”

“To hear people talk in Linz, it shouldn’t be hard to gain Austria’s alliance. It’s the bureaucrats holding things up, but with the invasion of Berlin, they’ll have to take a side soon,” Johan said. “Italy hates the Dark Lord. They’re calling him the anti-Christ over there.”

“Funny, they said the same thing about me at one point,” the old man said, trying at a bit of humor. It died rather ignominiously. “I am going to return to Germany. Without a Minister or their Parliament, the people will be in desperate need of reorganization. There aren’t enough Aurors there to protect everyone from an invading army, but if I can convince the public of the imminent threat I may be able to organize a civilian militia.”

They nodded. Timmons looked up towards the ceilings.

“Will you take her with you?”

The old man’s eyes closed and he let out a deep sigh. “No, not yet. Dear Nymphadora has always been a woman to carry her emotions in extremes, both the good and the bad. When the time comes, she will arise from this tragedy more fierce and driven than ever, but that time is not now. Let her grieve.”

~ Page Break ~

“We should offer a truce with the British. Just because they don’t know about our alliance with the Dark Lord doesn’t mean we can’t make one with them now,” Katarina suggested. She was sitting alone in the parlor with Horace, the room devoid of illumination. They had cleared out the smoke when it appeared the Culties were through with ransacking the city. For now, everything was quiet. Too quiet for an 8:00 P.M. in a city like Berlin, but not even the vampires felt much inclined to merrymaking with the invaders hunting the streets for rebels. Her children were scattered around the various windows of the hotel, looking out for trouble.

Horace didn't even grace her with his usual glare. He simply continued to nurse his glass of brandy, pretending he could actually see it even though she knew he couldn't. "No. Grandfather will wish to maintain absolute deniability. There's no way he'll associate himself with you until the entire massacre fiasco is forgotten or he could convince everyone that you were in Frankfurt instead of Berlin when the attack happened. You'll all be slaughtered."

Katarina mentally sighed. Was he ever going to let that slide?

"Then what do we do?"

"We find the hub, deactivate the ward, and escape," he stated. She was tempted to throw something at him to see if he would duck.

"It'll be heavily guarded, and even if you succeeded, the Aurors outside would get in and slaughter your men. I doubt Grandpa would appreciate that."

That earned a small, barely detectable smirk. Yes, progress!

"The wards can't be continuous. There are too many different types of terrains around the city, some of them are even underground. We may be able to take down a small and inconspicuous section for a short period of time before the Aurors even notice. No harm, no foul."

She nodded, even though she didn't like the plan. It was too risky. The hub would be heavily guarded by trained and armed wizards, and while her own people were formidable, they were not invulnerable. They didn't even know where the hub was and if they did, would Horace even know how to work it without tearing down the entire system?

Also, there were more immediate concerns.

“My children will need to feed soon, as will I.”

He glanced in her direction, his normal ruddy-brown eyes appearing entirely red.

“Then you shall hunt. There are enough dead in the street that I doubt anyone would question a few people going missing.”

Well, perhaps matters the situation was entirely bad.

~ Page Break~

Harry kept himself hunched over his Herbology essay, determined to ignore Draco's snickering from across the library table. It didn't help that if he glanced out of the corner of either eye he could see both Ginny and Hermione trying very hard not to smile.

“I can't believe you actually burnt off your eyebrows,” Draco finally said plainly, and both girls burst into giggles. He glared at them all. His eyebrows, thanks to Pomfrey, were right where they were supposed to be but no one in class seemed quite able to forget the incident in arithmancy. How was he to know that just a drop of blood would have that big of a reaction?

“Shut. Up.”

~ Page Break~

The Detrimonius Age Potion was the most reliable and the most precise age determining potion Snape had ever encountered, and also the most difficult to brew. He had only done it once before during his university days and afterwards had sworn never to attempt it again. It had seemed like such a uselessly over specific potion (who cared if your birth was off by half an hour?) and so difficult to brew he was convinced its inventor a closet sadist.

However, if Harry was 'born as the seventh month dies' he would have been born close to midnight. A half an hour could have him born in either August or July. He had to be absolutely sure.

Time was not on his side. His duties stole away his daylight hours and snatched greedily at his evenings, and the Detrimonius Age Potion required time and concentration. He had taken to brewing it at three in morning in order to make the timing just right, subsisting on catnaps for the last three days. It did nothing to improve his disposition, and certainly wasn't endearing him to his students any. McGonagall actually had the nerve to call him a tyrannical ogre. To his face no less!

He hoped his lack of sleep was not reflected in the letter he had sent to Ira, requesting to visit her. Perhaps it didn't matter. She had written him back after all with her approval.

Snape dared a glance at the clock, before turning back to his potion. Just after six. He was to meet Ira at seven and he was still in the same clothes he had worn yesterday. He could rush his morning routine, but rushing potions was an entirely different matter. She would forgive him for being late, he reminded himself, the potion wouldn't forgive him for being early.

He hovered motionlessly over the cauldron watching as the transparent green fluid began to brighten ever so slowly. Five minutes passed. Ten. Fifteen. And finally, it was just right. He stirred the potion counterclockwise three times with a white elm twig and then clockwise with a cedar twig six times. The potion became colorless.

He let out a sigh of relief, and carefully ladled out the potion into six small vials, then separated the vials between his refrigerated cupboard and the storage cabinet. After all the trouble he went through to make it, he didn't want to ruin his work during a moment of insomnia induced clumsiness.

He looked at the clock and cursed under his breath. Abandoning his lab for his private quarters, he dug out some vials from his sock drawer and downed them. The stubble he had been sporting promptly fell out and his mouth tasted far too strongly of peppermint. Potions were delightful things, but they could not yet replace the need for showers or the regular replacement of clothes, which he did in record time. His hair was still soaking when he stepped out of the castle and into the dark chill of the November morning. A house elf had a horse from the stable ready and waiting for him when he arrived and the sentinel at the portcullis watched him suspiciously. He didn't dare rush his horse in the dim light, and by the time he reached Hogsmeade the sun was just starting to touch the tips of the tallest roofs.

The sentinel station was minimally manned so early in the morning, but the sole guardian did his duty, checking Snape's identity and authorization before letting him into the same room as their floo. He was seven minutes late when he finally stepped into Chief Sentinel Morgan's parlor.

The sun was just slightly higher here, and illuminated the room in a soft yellow light. It was much the same as he remembered it from past visitations. Dark wood paneling and large marble fireplace with a hunting scene carved into suggested it had been designed with a man in mind, but the predominance of artfully curved furniture, an over abundance of pillows, and the half dozen vases filled with flowers stated plainly that a woman ruled the roost.

"Severus? Is that you?" From the entry door, Ira made her appearance. Her hair was down, something he hadn't seen before. It made her look younger, he noted. He bowed politely to her.

"Good morning. Forgive me for my lateness."

She smiled weakly and gestured towards the small round table where a tea set was already prepared for them.

"I know your time must be especially precious to you these days. Morgan told me you had been promoted. Congratulations."

“Unofficially, I am afraid. All of the responsibility and none of the respect. I can’t complain, however. My pay has nearly doubled. And how are things at the university?”

They took their seats across from one another. She looked at him solemnly, as she poured him a cup of tea.

“I was fired.”

He wasn’t entirely sure what he should say to that. Then the slightest hint of a smile tugged at the corner of her mouth. He glowered at him for tricking him.

“I really was fired. Budget cuts. The funds are all being funneled toward military and defense projects. Man-hunting butterflies apparently didn’t meet their standards of scary.”

“I can’t imagine why not.” He poured a little cream into his tea.

An uncomfortable silence fell between them.

“It’s good to see you again, Severus,” she said finally. “I wasn’t sure if I ever would.”

“Yes, I’ve had a lot to think about since our last meeting. I admit, I didn’t think I was going to see you again either for a time.”

She looked down. “I’m sorry I deceived you.”

He smirked a bit at that. “That is quite alright. As a Slytherin, I have fine appreciation for deception. I didn’t come here to make you feel guilty, Ira. I want to tell you what I realized while I was thinking.”

She looked up again, uncertain. He purposefully kept his expression blank. It wasn’t his intention to pressure her or intimidate her. If he didn’t have her full enthusiastic cooperation, none of this would be worth it.

“I want you to be my wife.”

Ira dropped her tea cup, causing it to shatter. Tea instantly stained the table linen, then disappeared, charmed to remove any evidence of its owner's clumsiness.

“I-“ she started, her eyes wide and on the verge of panic.

“And I want you to be the mother of my children.”

Her panic morphed into hurt. She had such an expressive face. There was nothing she could hide from him, or anyone else for that matter, which normally earned his contempt but right now he found it comforting.

“Severus, don't...” she said softly.

“I believe you want the same thing.”

“I can't.”

“I am not convinced it is impossible. I think you should get a second opinion on your... condition.”

“You have no idea what my condition is,” she said, a hint of anger seeping into her voice. “You have no idea what you're asking me to do. I had the hope of a family crushed long ago, and I won't let you put me through that again. I think you should leave.”

She stood up, preparing to abandon him and his plan before even hearing it. He took her hand as she passed, forcing her stop.

“Please, wait...”

Refusing to look at him, she tried to pull her hand away. He didn't tighten his hold, but he didn't let go either. “Severus, don't. I know I misled you, but I never intended to hurt you. What you're doing to me now... it's beyond cruel.”

“I know,” he admitted, unperturbed. “But you’re also playing at being the damsel in distress, and frankly I don’t think it suits you at all.”

He caught her free hand just before it managed to make contact with his face. She glared daggers at him, her eyes darkening in anger. Staring back at her with his same cool, provoking expression he continued.

“Three hours. That’s all I ask.”

“Liar.”

“And unrepentant.” He let her go, and stood. “I have buried dreams myself, Ira. Do not think you are the only one who knows the anguish of resurrecting them. Right now, I’m hemorrhaging self-respect.”

Her expression softened, then hardened again, then cracked. She smiled.

“How can you be simultaneously charming and abhorrent at the same time?”

“I don’t know. Maybe you just find the abhorrent charming. Two hours and forty-five minutes?”

She crossed her arms, but she didn’t try to escape. That was something.

“And what precisely do you expect me to do?”

Half way there. He was very tempted to smile, but he didn’t want to frighten her.

“There is a medi-witch here in London. A woman with a... unique specialty. Her primary practice is prenatal care and midwifery, but on Saturdays she devotes herself to a different kind of patient.”

“Patients like me? Who can’t... un.”

“You do realize we’ve both completed a college-level education? It’s okay to actually say all those naughty words.”

“She sounds like a quack.”

“Geniuses usually do. I’ve called around. She’s very good. I took the liberty of making you an appointment with her at eight.”

She gaped at him. “You’re shameless!”

“It’s completely confidential.”

“Oh god!”

“You don’t need to be nervous. I’ll go with you.”

“Oh god!”

It took considerably more cajoling, arguing, and charming abhorrence to finally convince Ira to go. Snape was supremely thankful that Morgan was busy in Bristol and Mrs. Morgan was away on some sort of retreat, because he didn’t think he could survive the embarrassment of either of them reporting some of things he had said to their circle of friends. Nevertheless, he had succeeded. Five minutes to eight, he was escorting her to a large town house on the upper east side, looking no different from any of the other houses on the row except for the little sign hanging in the front garden reading;

‘Mothers-To-Be Midwifery; Medi-witch Juliana Jacobi’

A plump, middle-aged receptionist answered the door, and led them inside. The entire bottom floor had been converted into a clinic. The parlor served as the waiting room, the library as an office, and the bedrooms as examining rooms. Ira spent several minutes filling out forms, glaring at them hatefully every so often when the questions became a little too personal.

“It’s asking me if I’m a junkie,” she said indignantly. Snape peeked at her form, and smiled.

“It also asking if your chosen partner was ever diagnosed with a venereal disease. I’ll choose not to take it personally. The answer is ‘no’ by the way.”

“Mrs. Beadle?”

They both looked up to see a small woman with poof of white hair and a mouth that was made for smiling. She was dressed in the familiar white frock of a medi-witch, and had a file tucked under her arm. Ira clutched Snape’s arm as if she expected to be eaten.

“Good morning, dear,” the medi-witch said pleasantly. “No need to be nervous. We won’t run any tests today. We’re just going to have bit of a chat. Get an idea of what you want. Would this be your husband?”

Ira blushed. Snape smirked. Jacobi smirked back.

“Ah. A libertine. Haven’t met many of those since college. Hoo-ha, those were the good old days. Follow me please, dear. Boy toys optional.”

He had to lead a gaping Ira into the medi-witch’s office, and quickly sat her down in one of the chairs. She seemed to come back to herself, along with all her embarrassment over being placed in this situation. Things would have quickly descended into an awkward silence if Jacobi weren’t so skilled in ignoring it.

“Would you like anything to drink? You seem a bit nervous. I have some peach schnapps in the cubby if you’re interested. I know it’s a little early, but some things are best not discussed sober.”

“Er...I... no thank you.”

“Suit yourself. Now then, what exactly seems to be problem?”

Ira couldn't even begin to think of how to answer that. Snape frankly hadn't a clue. All he knew was what she had told him and that wasn't anything.

"Let's try this at another angle. Do you enjoy sex?"

The blush that followed could have stopped traffic.

"A lot of infertility is the result of underactive hormone production. If you find you are not becoming aroused, this can affect conception."

"N-n-no, that's not..."

"I didn't think so either. Are you menstruating?"

Ira stiffened. Jacobi nodded knowingly.

"Have you ever menstruated?"

A nod.

"At the usual age? 12 or 13?"

Another nod.

"When did it stop?"

"...I think I'll have that drink now."

It took three shots before Ira could be coaxed into saying anything, during which time her hand found its way into Severus'. It stirred in Snape distant memories of his youth, when his mother lay in her sick bed, weak and desperate not to be abandoned.

"It stopped after my husband poisoned me..." Ira said finally, listless, staring out the window to the empty street outside. Something inside Snape clenched. "...with my own birth control potion."

And the clench tightened until it became a stabbing pain.

“Why would you-“ he started, but Jacobi held up her hand to silence him. Ira went on as if she hadn’t hear him.

“I didn’t want him to hurt the children, you see? He hated children. Hated women. Hated everyone really. He liked money though. And my family had a lot of that. He used to work for my father as manager at one of his mills. I don’t remember what they made. His name was Winston.”

She took another sip from her glass.

“Daddy thought he was a nice man. I don’t know why. No one else thought so. I certainly didn’t think so, but he married me off to him anyway. Said he was a strong, intelligent man and that everyone was jealous of his ambition. Daddy was never very bright.”

Her eyes were starting to glisten with tears, but she wiped them away quickly.

“I wanted children,” she said, turning to Snape, pleading with him to believe her. “I really did, but... I couldn’t... I couldn’t bring them into that house. I wasn’t strong enough o protect them from him. So I started taking a potion. You know, those little home-kit versions? Mix the little blue vile with the little green vile once a week and take once after eating?”

Snape had no idea what she was talking about.

“Oh, yes, I remember those,” Jacobi nodded, “We used to hand them out like candy before the war. Useful, but hardly discreet.”

“So I learned. Winston found out. He did something to the vials. I nearly bled to death... if it hadn’t been for the house elf... Three months in the hospital, too weak to move, and when I came out of it Winston had divorced me, claiming I violated my marriage contract by taking contraception, and ran off with my dowry.”

“You never pressed charges?” Snape asked, unable to believe the man could walk away from such a vile act without some repercussions, especially if Ira’s father really was rich.

“I couldn’t prove anything. The medi-wizards said it was an accident. That I stupidly took the wrong combination of potions too frequently. Daddy believed Winston. What could I do with my own father calling me a lying harlot? Oh god, I can’t believe I’m telling you all of this.”

“Neither can I,” Snape admitted, rubbing her hand gently in his. His mother always seemed to calm down when he did this.

“Mom divorced daddy after that. She couldn’t forgive him for siding with Winston against his own daughter. She tried taking me to some other doctors, but they all said the same thing. That I’d... ruined myself with the contraception. Withered my womb into nothing. No one could help.”

Jacobi came around her desk and handed Ira a handkerchief, giving her a moment to come back to herself. She patted the younger woman on the shoulder.

“There, there, dear. You’ve gone through quite the ordeal, but its all in the past now.”

Ira just sniffled softly.

“Alright then,” the medi-witch said, taking her seat behind her desk once again. “I’ll have to perform some tests, but I think I may just be able to help you.”

~ Author’s Notes~

Just for clarification, the Brass Culties are only attacking wizarding Berlin. I had Oblitz state that the British had taken about 90 square kilometers, which would be 2/3 of wizarding Berlin. All of Berlin combined is about 890 square kilometers. So wizarding Berlin is about 1/8 the size of the entire city combined. If you’re wondering what muggle Berlin is making of all that smoke coming out of seemingly nowhere, I'll get into that next chapter.

Now, as a friend of mine pointed out, some people might think that witches and wizards ability to apparate would make the geographical aspect of the superfluous, but that just isn't the case. Apparating may make it simple for individual fighters to move around quickly, but when it comes to moving entire armies it can't be relied upon. You can only apparate to places you can picture in your head, and since the British are not familiar with any of Germany the geography makes a huge difference. Additionally, you also have to factor in the supplies you would have to take with you for occupying a territory. Food, equipment, weaponry, etc. Once a city is conquered, anti-apparition wards would be the first order of business as well.

And yes, the prophecy exists in this story and has been effecting it from the beginning. Does it apply to Harry? Next chapter.

Sorry, this is just a wee bit late. It just didn't want to get done

Book V:

Chapter 22: Rebellion

It didn't take long for Viktor to find shelter or round up a group of willing resistance fighters. Or rather, they rounded him up. After three days of raiding and unarming the civilian populous of Berlin, the Brass Culties had settled into a routine of control and reconnaissance, leaving the disoriented and frightened survivors to find shelter and sustenance for themselves. Many of those survivors included college students from Lindt-Wilheim, who had found places to hide in the pub districts and underground where even the local Aurors were hard pressed to hunt them out. Viktor, like so many others, had come out of his hiding place in the park in search of food, and been recognized by a pair of young wizards and invited to stay with them.

There current pad was the burnt out shell of an Italian restaurant, another victim of the Culties burning raid. The windows had been blown out from the heat, and they didn't dare repair them lest they gave away that anyone was staying there, which left the place bitterly cold. The basement, however, had remained relatively undamaged, and with a working furnace and seemingly endless supply of stored food, it was a treasure. The city was overburdened as it was, with hundreds of stranded men and women from outside Berlin or the unreachable residential area of the city now cut off from their homes, and forced to rely on the kindness of strangers, the few untouched hotels and inns, and their own wits for shelter.

Ernst and Jacob, the young wizards who had rescued Viktor, were from the university but hadn't been there during the raids and managed to escape with their wands in tact. They intended to keep them too, and use them against the British invaders with extreme prejudice. Viktor was very pleased to hear this. Within in three days, he had fortified their hideout and recruited six additional resistance members, establishing himself as the young, but most experienced, leader of the group and Secret Keeper to their new home.

Now all that needed to be done was to actually make use of those skills he had acquired from Dumbledore. The first one being intelligence gathering.

It was nearly midnight, and their entire party had finally returned, not daring the streets any longer with the curfew in affect. They knew if they were spotted they would immediately be detained and possibly killed. They gathered around in a circle, eating their daily ration and taking in the warmth from the furnace, and waited for Viktor to speak.

Ernst and Jacob, the two university students, Ada, a librarian from the National Wizarding Library of Berlin, Christiane, her 14-year old daughter, Clemens, a mail clerk from the Ministry Department of Justice, Eleonore, a journalist, plus Engel and Hagan, brothers and co-owners of a now destroyed dueling and sporting supply store. Viktor had found them by chance, but selected them specifically for their unique skill sets. Together, they all knew the city like the back of their hands; the buildings, the people, the ways things came together and what caused them to fall apart. Out of them, only Engel and Hagan knew anything about fighting, but the rest could be taught. They were eager enough to learn.

“What have you learned, Ernst?” Viktor started their meeting. The older boy smiled ruefully.

“Nothing that will likely help us. The Culties set up a perimeter around the wards. They got some sort of spell going on that you get a nasty shock if you get too close.”

“How close?”

“Twenty, maybe twenty-five feet? I don’t know for sure, but it’s pointless. You can still see what’s happening on the other side of the wall. There’s a lot of Auror’s gathering there. I don’t know why since they can’t get in to help us.”

Viktor smiled, however. “No, this is good. If we can get close enough to the border to be seen without the Culties noticing, we might be able to get information on what’s happening outside. See if they might have any plans to take down the wards that we can help them with. Well done, Ernst.”

The other boy looked a bit more cheerful to learn his day spent risking his wand by wandering in the cold, gloomy streets wasn't for nothing. The Culties were no longer tearing people out of their homes and businesses, but they were routinely stopping people on the street and searching them. He could have left his wand at the base, as Viktor suggested, but that wasn't something he was yet willing to do.

Their leader turned to Ada, who was gently stroking Christiane's hair, as she watched and listened in solemn silence. The girl hadn't spoken since they arrived, traumatized as she was by what she had witnessed, but she willingly followed her mother out into the city, perhaps hoping against hope to find the father who had not returned.

“What's the status at the Minsitry?”

“They didn't destroy all the buildings, like we originally thought,” Ada said. “They spared six of them as far as I can tell. They're still raiding the Auror Headquarters and training school, but once they're done they'll probably tear them down. They kept the Department of Records, the Department of Transportation, and the Department of Education standing, but no ones allowed into any of them. I think they're using them as dormitories and bases of operations. They're definitely using the Department of Education to store their supplies. It was crawling with people. Lots of security too.”

Viktor nodded. “I'll check it out tomorrow. If at all possible, I want to take it out. The siege has a better chance of working if we can make the Culties as desperate to get out as the Aurors are to get in.”

Hagan chuckled darkly. “Then we can blow these mother-fu-“

Ada covered her daughter's ears and glared at the other man, who smiled apologetically. The others chuckled. All but Clemens, who was staring blankly at the glow coming from the furnace. He was the oldest of their group, a mere fifty-eight or so, but out of all of them he was taking things the hardest. He spoke little, smiled less, and thought on things no one could even begin to guess at. Viktor had no intention of guessing.

“What’s on your mind, Clemens?”

The older wizard didn’t say anything for a moment, nor did he move, and Viktor was just starting to think the man hadn’t heard him when he finally spoke.

“It can’t be allowed to happen again. Not here. Not ever,” he said, without looking at any of them. Without changing his expression at all.

“What can’t be allowed to happen, old man?” Hagan sneered. He hadn’t understood Viktor’s reasoning for taking in the scrawny little desk-jockey and still didn’t, and though he wouldn’t express his displeasure to their leader he saw no reason to hide his feelings from the man himself.

“The Wall. There can’t be another Wall in Berlin. It’s an abomination.”

“What’s he talking about?” Jacob asked, honestly confused.

“The Berlin Wall,” Ada said, “You should know about it. It hasn’t fallen that long ago.”

Jacob just shrugged, mirroring the attitude of several others. The Berlin Wall was not a part of their culture. It had never touched the wizarding section of the city, and even if it had it wouldn’t have made much of a difference to a society that traveled by floo, broom, and apparating. World War I and II were significant to wizards only for the inconvenience of the temporary isolationist policy against muggles that had arisen during the time. The Berlin Wall was little more than an abstract lesson about the tragedy of being a muggle to most wizards and witches.

Clemens, however, could not view it so blithely.

“I don’t expect any of you to understand this,” he said, finally turning to face them. “You didn’t have to grow up like I did. I was muggle-born. Magic could no more solve anything than wishing could, and as a boy that wall was as impenetrable as Avalon. God, you have no idea what it was like... how many families were torn apart by that... thing. My grandmother died of cancer, alone in some cesspit that passed for a hospital and was buried in a pauper’s grave by strangers. My wife didn’t get to see her parents for nearly twenty years. My eldest brother had a daughter and didn’t even know it until she was grown and had children of her own.”

He closed his eyes, his expression beyond painful.

“God, god, don’t let that happen here. I want to see my wife and children again. I don’t want to die here alone because we were so stupidly arrogant to think we couldn’t make the same mistakes as muggles.”

They looked away from him, shamed to think he might be right, that they themselves might have caused his suffering through their arrogance. That somehow, this might all be their own fault. They all looked away except for Viktor, the only one of them exonerated against the crime of indifference, who stood and walked to Clemens, placing a comforting hand on his shoulder.

“You have my word,” he said, “One way or another, that ward is going to come down, but I need your help. I need you to be strong. I cannot do this on my own.”

Clemens opened his eyes, and looked up at him, his expression still painful. They stared at each other for a long time.

“You are so young...”

Viktor, who had heard this often enough to be able to ignore it, just smiled.

“I am what ever is necessary. Can I count on you, my friend?”

The elder wizard stared at him for a moment longer, his stricken expression relaxing. He seemed to find what he was looking for in the young wizards' eyes, and finally nodded.

~Page Break~

Harry was thankful to get out of History of Magic and away from Professor Toure's less than subtle expressions of total adoration, but he wasn't sure how he felt about spending that time with the less than adoring Dark Lord. At least Snape wasn't there for once. The man had been pointedly ignoring him for the last week, and he wasn't sure what would happen if the dour wizard were forced to notice him. Voldemort and Lucius Malfoy together was bad enough. He didn't think his sanity would survive a Voldemort and Severus Snape combination right now.

He didn't bother announcing himself as he stepped through the portrait and into the Dark Lord's office. The man was at his desk, sorting through piles of paperwork, just as Harry expected. There were three assistants there as well, which was a little unexpected, but given how busy things must have been and the fact that Voldemort had left the convenience of one of his Court offices, perhaps it shouldn't have been. It did make Harry wonder why the Dark Lord would chose to come to him rather than the other way around.

His uncertainty must have been obvious, because when the dark wizard looked up from his work at him, he said, "Don't look so worried."

Which, coming from this man, didn't mean much to him.

"How are you settling back in to school?"

Harry could have gone on for an hour long lament of his Herculean struggles to catch up on his course work or how he seemed to be stalked by at least half a dozen people no matter where he went or that he really wanted Quidditch to be re-opened, but somehow he doubted the man would find any of it particularly interesting.

“Fine.”

“Well, that’s unfortunate,” Voldemort said. “Since, I’m going to have to muck it up again. I’ll need you for at least in week in France before the end of the month. I’m not entirely sure of the dates, so you’ll need to be prepared to leave on a moment’s notice.”

Harry could almost feel his blood pressure rising. For Merlin’s sake, was he ever going to get a break? Voldemort tried to look sympathetic, but just came off as inappropriately amused. Harry found himself a seat and plopped down into, trying to make himself comfortable.

“Please tell me you’re not getting married to the Queen of France.”

“Alas, no, although her Majesty is a part of the reason I need you. I am hoping to recruit additional werewolves from the new colonies and install them for training at some of our forts, as well as prepare the way for the Beast Brigade. She and her Parliament are understandably concerned over the rapid pace with which we are organizing ourselves within France’s borders. I believe your presence there will assuage their fears more so than my own. Plus I know you like her.”

Harry ignored the last statement.

“No offense, My Lord, but...well... fuck you.”

The Dark Lord blinked at him. The aides all stopped breathing.

“I’m not entirely sure how I can take that without offense,” he said finally and without looking at the aides, gestured for them to leave the room. They scurried out like rats escaping a burning building.

“Now then, would you care to elaborate or shall I just skip to the Cruciatus?”

Harry glared back at him, a challenge perhaps or just honest to gods anger. He actually had the nerve to stand up and stalk closer to the Dark Lord.

“I spent three days in the middle of a bloody fortress with you and Malfoy leading me around like a damn puppy, and in all that time you couldn’t have said, ‘hey, Harry, by the way, we’re going to invade Berlin’. You know, perhaps the morning you were actually going to fucking do it?”

“We really need to work on this swearing habit you’ve developed.”

“Or how about giving the men you hired me to look after, more than a god damn week to actually train so they don’t get themselves blow to shit in the first five minutes of battle?! God fucking dammit! How am I suppose to get fuck all done with you throwing this at me in the last possible second?! Or is that the point? Just keep throwing shit at me so I’m running around like a headless chicken and don’t know what the hell is going on, so I have to rely on you to tell me what to do and what to think!”

I hadn’t thought I was being that obvious, Voldemort thought unhappily, but Harry was still in full rant mode and plowed on before he could interject.

“And what the hell are you thinking invading Berlin? What possible good could come of that? You’ve just validated their paranoia! And for what? What? A sliver of land we won’t even be able to keep? A couple hundred dead witches and wizards on both sides? I mean, what the bloody-“ Fast as snake, the Dark Lord leaped from his chair, and Harry jumped back just as quickly, but the man caught his wrist before he could truly escape. His right was still free, however, and a flick of his wrist brought it to hand.

“Expell-“

Voldemort jerked him around roughly, unbalancing him enough to undo the spellwork and twisting his arm behind his back. Harry let out a pained cry, but it was smothered by the hand that came to tighten around his exposed throat.

The silence that followed was eerie in its displacement. No curses, no shouts or screams, no threats or taunts, nor shattering glass and wood. None of the noise and chaos Harry had come to associate with fighting. It was just him and Voldemort, wrapped around him like the snake that was his totem, squeezing the air out of him.

“ You seem a little tense,” the Dark Lord hissed softly in Parseltongue, furthering the snake allusion in Harry’s panicking mind. The tone was soft, but the grip told the truth of the man’s anger, threatening to pull his arm clean out of its socket if he didn’t asphyxiate him first. “Perhaps I can help?”

The hand at his throat loosened, enough for Harry to make a desperate gasp for air before a new sensation stole it away again. It wasn’t precisely pain and it wasn’t precisely pleasure, but rather a combination of both mixed with the nauseating exhilaration of falling from a great height. The room spun, his body became numb to all but the burning sensation of Voldemort’s hand on his throat, and his thoughts throbbed in time with his slowing heart beat.

He wasn’t afraid. He knew he should have been. This was a killing hold, and this man, if man you could call him, was a killer. Still, he wasn’t. The feeling wasn’t entirely foreign. It was not unlike that day in garden during the winter solstice, when he had briefly reached out to the earth and felt it reach back. It was like that... only nothing was reaching back.

When his legs gave out, the Dark Lord released his arm, allowing him to fall back against him rather than risk dislocating it. They sunk to the floor, Voldemort to his knees, Harry on his back, staring up at him, stunned. The dark wizard was not unaffected by whatever he had done to Harry, but seemed positively radiant with power as he leaned over the boy. His grin, however, was as dark and disturbing as ever.

“Feeling a bit more relaxed now?”

With the very last of his strength, Harry slung his arm up and over, slapping him squarely across the face. Voldemort jerked in surprised, then threw back his head and laughed. He withdrew his hand from his protégé's throat to comb it through his sweat soaked hair.

“That's what I like about you, my defiant young friend. Always the fighting spirit, no matter who, no matter why.” He chuckled, and Harry had to close his eyes. The sound made him feel dizzy. “Look at you, fighting me, even now, and why? Did you not fight an entire country to be by my side but a few months ago? Was it not you who swore your vengeance against those who threatened your pack and fellow countrymen? I have never doubted your loyalty, but where is your faith? However capricious I have been, I have done all I have for reasons beyond the fleeting passions of the moment. You, who are the culmination of momentary passions and have set in motion the very fate you defy, have no choice but to trust in my foresight. When you have a little foresight of your own, perhaps then you can afford such displays of defiance, but until then...”

Harry opened his eyes again as he felt the man pull away. The Dark Lord was moving towards the door. Was he just going to leave him there? He opened his mouth to speak, to call him back, but nothing came out. Voldemort returned a moment later with his aides following obediently behind him. He made a gesture at as prone protégé.

“Mr. Potter is suffering from magical fatigue. Please escort him to the infirmary and inform Professor Snape of his condition.”

They scurried to obey, two of them carefully picking Harry up from ground and wrapping his arms over their shoulders. They did it quickly and efficiently, and he wondered for an instant how often they had to carry people out of the Dark Lord's office. He turned to Voldemort to ask what he had done to him, but he was already beginning to figure it out for himself. The floating sensation had eased, leaving him was a familiar, bone deep fatigue.

His magic was gone or at least severely depleted.*

Well, shit. He would have almost preferred a crucio. At least then it would all be over and done with. It could take weeks to restore his magic.

“We will talk again when you are feeling more rested,” Voldemort said, magnanimously. In Parseltongue, he added, “And if you can behave yourself, perhaps I’ll even give you back some of the magic you so carelessly fling about.”

Harry cursed at him silently, but even in his head it sounded feeble. In addition to his magic, the man had stolen most of his fight as well. Well, bother. The man was right. He didn’t have any foresight; otherwise he would have known he wasn’t going to walk away the victor of this fight. Merlin, would he ever learn?

Ah, but he had learned just how fast the Dark Lord was.

He made a point of remembering it.

~ Page Break~

While Katarina and her brood hunted the city’s alleys and basements for sustenance, Tom hunted for information. He moved silently through the shadows, alert but fearless, passing by small groups of soldiers every few minutes. He stopped every time to study them as they passed, calculating the odds of getting one of them alone, before moving on. In his head Horace was screaming at him to go back to the vampire apartments and hide, before someone finally noticed his black cloaked figure skulking about. Tom ignored him.

Nothing would be gained if he just sat around and waited. He needed to get out of the city before Katarina figured out his ruse or anyone else discovered him here. To do that, he needed information.

It wasn’t until well after midnight that the soldiers thinned out enough for him to risk taking any of them by surprise. He chose a pair of female Culties. They had broken off from a larger group in order to take a leak without being leered at by the men in their squadron. And of course, because they were women, they were more concerned with watching out for peeping toms than keeping an eye on each other.

He killed the first one with Neck-breaking Curse before she had managed to undo the second clasp of her robe. Completely silent but for the soft 'snap', easily mistaken for a breaking twig. The second went down with a simple body bind, and he dragged her into one of the dozens of empty cellars.

"Lumos buyo," he muttered, sending out an orb of light once they were out of sight of any possible observers. The cellar was empty, but also partially flooded in places with half an inch of freezing water. He didn't bother trying to avoid it as he dragged the woman to the center of the room and dropped her onto her back.

He looked down at her. Her eyes were wide with terror, always satisfying to see, but otherwise there was nothing noteworthy about her. Her nose was a little too big to be attractive, her lips too thin, and none of it improved by the overtly masculine lines of her military clothes and haircut. Her insignia designated her a private, the lowest of recruits.

What are you going to do? Horace asked nervously.

"What do you think I'm going to do?" Tom said softly. Somehow, the woman's eyes grew even wider.

Don't! Let her go!

Tom reached down to hold her head steady as he looked into her eyes.

"Yes, just like that," he crooned softly. "Keep them nice and wide. Legilimens."

Stop! There was a brief moment of pain as both Horace and the woman resisted him, but all too soon they both fell away, overwhelmed by the images that passed before them, the knowledge that came and went, chaotic and meaningless at first. A day collecting sea shells at the beach with her father when she was six, a fight with her best friend just before graduation, her first clumsy attempts at flirting during her freshman year with a boy in her History of Magic class, her favorite uncle's funeral. Slowly, they started to focus on her time as part of the Culties. The first day of basic, the overwhelming sorrow as her long wavy hair was cut and she said goodbye to all vestiges of femininity, her captain forgetting her name for the first three assignments in Walpole, meeting Donna Ravenwood, who would become her best friend when she was reassigned to a squad in Edinburgh, the first real fear since joining as she stepped out of the floo in a seedy little bar in Warsaw.

Warsaw, fearsome and alien, to a twenty year old girl who never expected to leave her own village. She had laughed and grinned with Donna about all the strapping young Polish men they would meet, but inside all she wanted was to go home. She didn't sleep that night, wondering why she was in a dirty little hotel in a country that were not technically friends with and what that meant. The early morning debriefing...

Yes, that was what he wanted! How did they take Berlin? How did they activate the wards? Where were the controls for them hidden?

Spies and traitors, yes, he had figured that was how they had found out where everything was. They didn't explain who exactly, but Tom figured it was a combination of bitter werewolves, French intelligence, and dark wizards longing for the return of a leader of Grindelwald's stature.

The muggles had been informed that there was a fire in a part of the city under construction. The local fire department was handling it. No need for extra fire trucks or ambulances, it was all taken care of. Just keep people out of the area. Who the bloody hell cared about muggles? He wanted to know about the wards!

The Ministerial debate would be attacked first to draw attention from other targets. Both candidates should be targeted, but she didn't get to be a part of that operation. She had been waiting behind a cauldron factory for three hours for the go ahead to start the raid on the university. Wards? She didn't know about them. They were one of the targets after the attack on the debate. No one she knew which one. That wasn't a part of her job.

Whose job was it?

It was a technical job, wasn't it? It had to be one of the officers handling it. Who? She didn't know. She was just a grunt. She didn't hang out with the higher ups.

Tom broke eye contact with her and shoved her away in disgust. Useless! She knew nothing! Didn't want to know anything! She had barely made a splash before he flung out his wand, snarling out a curse.

“Opprimio!”

The woman died quietly, namelessly, her internal organs all but liquefied. Tom wasn't satisfied. Frustrated, he snarled out a half a dozen curses, pointless rending the corpse into so much bloodied meat. When the worst of his anger had dissipated he tore away her clothes and left them in the basement muck. When or if anyone ever found her, they would assume her the victim of an angry group of German wizards, and she would serve as a lesson of caution to other female soldiers if nothing else.

He ascended from the cellar, scanning briefly for any potential threats, then continued on his way. He would need to return to the apartments and clean himself up before the vampires returned. It would be inconvenient for them to smell the blood on him and start asking questions he wasn't prepared to answer. There were reasons he had gone off alone, after all.

It wasn't until he was standing under the hot spray of the shower that he realized Horace was being unusually quiet. Cautiously, he gave a mental knock, but there was no reply. The boy was gone. Hiding? Perhaps.

Some people really had no stomach for this kind of thing.

~ Page Break~

Voldemort did, in fact, visit Harry again before he left. Unfortunately, the boy was sound asleep. At a quarter to midnight, the Dark Lord decided that wasn't unreasonable. The infirmary was dark, the only light from the half moon streaming in through the window, and around him he could hear only the soft, wheezy snores of sleeping children. He moved down the center of the room, looking from bed to bed to find his protégé. He found him at the end of the row. Books and parchment were piled onto a chair beside his bed, and a few pieces had fallen and scattered across the floor. So the boy was trying to keep up with his studies? Admittedly, that wasn't something the Dark Lord had considered when he had been maneuvering him around his political chessboard.

If the size of the pile were any indication, it was clear he had his work cut out for him. It would explain why Harry was so overtly aggravated with him, when he had been much better behaved in Bristol even with Lucius provoking him. He was over worked and under rested.

The Dark Lord mentally sighed, and walked around to the other side of the bed so that he could stand beside Harry's head. He brushed away a lock of wild hair, a source of endless amusement for him. The boy didn't even stir.

I suppose, he thought wryly. This might count as good behavior. By Harry's standards, in any event.

He rested his hand on the boy's cheek, and cautiously, released Harry's magic. It gravitated easily back to its original source, only too happy to return, and he had to carefully adjust the flow else he risk actually hurting them both. Harry did stir now, just a little, sighing softly and turning his head into the Dark Lord's hand, seeking out the magic he had so recently been deprived of.

"Hhmm, you're making me soft. I should kill you, and do us both a mercy," Voldemort hissed softly in parseltongue. "But what's the point of holding the world in your hand if there's no one worth showing it off to?"

When most of Harry's magic was finally returned, he pulled his hand away. There were no further signs of stirring, and if anything his protégé appeared to sink deeper into dreams.

“Sleep well, young prince. There are yet still more dragons for you to slay when you awake.”

He left as silently as he had come, and when his formidable presence had finally vanished, Harry opened his eyes and stared up at the ceiling. He did not close them again until dawn chased away the shadows.

~ Page Break~

I should never have accepted this case.

This was the conclusion Lestrangle had drawn after weeks hunting through London, scouring the McGunny's student and government records, and discreetly (and sometimes indiscreetly) interrogating his family and known associates, and finally drinking herself stupid in a seedy little dive in Knockturn Alley. Perhaps he was dead, she thought, nursing the hangover in the non-descript little inn in Daigon Alley. She might have gotten drunk in Knockturn, but her self-esteem wasn't so low that she'd actually stoop to sleeping there.

There was a police report about some sort of attack in his apartment resulting in emergency surgery. McGunny had given a statement about a burglar to an investigating Sentinel, but had disappeared shortly thereafter before it could be corroborated. Perhaps the statement was true, at least from McGunny's understanding. Maybe what he truly believed was a burglar was in fact an assassin sent by the former Minister to tidy up loose ends, and eventually finished the job at the hospital. Maybe McGunny knew it was an assassin and disappeared before anyone could try for his life again.

With the wards down over England, the little traitor could have escaped. If he was in fact still alive. And that was a rather important matter she needed to have clarified before she could take her investigation anywhere. The only problem was there was no way to verify it unless a body turned up, and that was highly unlikely.

Unless of course...

She smiled grimly to herself. She would have to go to Berlin. If McGunny truly was Germany's spy they would have to have a record of him at the Ministry there. The chances of finding that record were slim, especially after the destruction of so many offices, but she had run out of leads.

If he was still alive and she found him, she made a mental note to make him pay for all the aggravation he was causing her.

~ Page Break ~

"McGonagall wants to see you."

Harry looked up from his essay on Gertrude the Gratuitous (a prominent figurehead during the 13th century Hedonist Movement) at Fred (or was it George? No, he was pretty sure it was Fred this time) standing over him with a folded piece of parchment. Across the library table, Hermione's brow knitted in concern. Harry couldn't recall doing anything recently that would warrant a meeting with his head of house, unless he was now being called away to France.

That couldn't be right. It had only been two days since the Dark Lord's visit.

"Yeah, okay."

He stood up, and as he did so, he could feel everyone in the library turn to watch him. He really wished they would stop that. Following Fred out into the hall, he failed to question how McGonagall could have called him out of his study hall when she herself should have been teaching a class. He also failed to notice George Weasley coming up behind him until the older boy had successfully grabbed hold of his wand arm.

"George!" Harry yelled in surprise. He didn't immediately panic until Fred dropped back to grab his other arm, and they both turned him in the opposite direction they had been heading, grinning like fools. Now he was trouble. "What are you-"

"Don't fret, My Lord Chaos," George said cheerfully. "We're just kidnapping you. You're overdue for it, you know."

That was not nearly as funny as they thought it was.

"We thought you could use a break from honest studying, and join us for a life of crime... or at least a semester of crime," Fred continued.

"What?"

"Step into our office, and we'll explain everything."

"Is that supposed to be an incentive?"

The twins grinned, but didn't let go of him until they reached their 'office', which was in fact 'Admiral' Lockhart's office. Harry could tell by all the obnoxious pictures of him hanging on the wall.

"Er... what if Lockhart shows up?"

"We'll tell him we wanted advice on how to perform a lobotomy on one's self," George offered, then made himself at home behind the man's desk. He opened various drawers, pulling out official looking documents and set them down. Fred guided Harry to a chair in front of the desk, then returned to the door to look out for spies (or possibly to block Harry's only route of escape). "Now then, Harry, you don't mind if I call you Harry?"

"It hasn't stopped you from doing so for the last five years," he said blandly.

"Yes, but that was social interaction. This is about business."

Harry pulled out his watch to check the time. He had twenty minutes until arithmancy, and he was hoping to review his notes in case they had a pop quiz.

“Oi, we’re being serious here mate!” George protested. “This is a serious money making venture I want to discuss with you!”

“You do know I have a job? A legal one with a real paycheck and everything.”

Fred chuckled from the doorway. “Yeah, I heard. Good on you, but for a guy in your position, it doesn’t hurt to have a little non-traceable funds on the side in cases of emergency.”

“Or if you want to buy a hooker,” George suggested. “And we would be willing to set you up.”

“With a hooker?”

“You have a dirty mind, you know that? No, not a hooker, a backdoor account. You see, we’ve got an in with a goblin bank in Belfast that specializes in this sort of thing. It’s no Gringott’s, but as far as discretion goes it’s second to none.”

Harry closed his eyes, not believing what he was about to say next.

“And what precisely is this little business venture?”

George grinned and leaned forward in his chair, adopting his salesman persona once again.

“I’m glad you asked, Harry. You see Fred and I, we were just sitting around the other day thinking, ‘hey, you know what would be great about now? A game of Wizer’s Rent*’, but of course, our last deck was confiscated Lestrangle banned them.”

“You want to open a casino in Hogwarts?” Harry asked dubiously.

George blinked at him. “Well, I didn’t, but that’s not a bad idea.”

Fred coughed into his hand, drawing him back to reality.

“Right then, we were just thinking how much we’d be willing to pay to get those deck of cards. And then we started to think of all those other things that got banned over the last couple of years because of the added security and all.”

“Exploding Snaps,” the other twin said from the doorway, “two way mirrors, radios, food that isn’t pre-packaged, quick-quotes quills, broomsticks, just about anything in Zonko’s, pet mice... although that last one might be because they keep escaping. You know, just a bunch of perfectly harmless stuff the teachers are sick of dealing with. Normally, no body even pays attention to the bans on those sorts of things, but since Hogsmeade weekends were canceled, the only thing we’ve got left is post and the school can actually keep track of that. Unless, of course, you know your way around it. Which we do. So our thought was we’d start ourselves a little business, getting all the good little girls and boys their special treats, for a price of course.”

“Of course,” Harry smirked. “You little fiends. You want to be black market smugglers.”

He couldn’t help laughing, despite himself. It was such a Fred and George thing to do. Harmless and clever and likely to cause someone in authority a monstrous headache. “And what would you need me for?”

“Ah, see, we know how to mess with the mail to get things in, it’s getting the money out that’s the problem. Something about money* really screws with the system we’ve got going, and it all ends up getting diverted to the Sentinels, and that’s a group of wizards I don’t want to be locked alone in a room with ever again. Yick. We would need you to get the orders off the school grounds so they could be shipped without the Sentinels knowing.”

Harry snorted. “Yeah, because they never check my mail.”

George grinned. "Oh, we've thought of that. Now your mail gets checked if you send it by post, but what if you didn't send it that way?"

The youngest Gryffindor rolled his eyes. "Alright, how would I send it?"

"Portkey!"

"What?"

"All you have to do is put the orders and money in a box with a portkey attached to it, and once you step off the grounds, you can activate the portkey and send the orders where they need to go."

"Alright, I'll hand it to you, that's all very clever, but why me? Why can't you do it?"

The twins shared an exasperated look. "Mate, you're the only one who can actually leave the grounds on even a semi-regular basis. You already told us about visiting your godfathers at least once a month. And now you've got that thing in France you're going to. Lately, it seems like you're gone more often than not."

Harry mentally flinched at that particular truth. He sighed.

"And what would I get out of this?"

George grinned as if he had already won, and at this point he probably had. "Well, free use of our very handy smuggling operation for one thing. I seriously doubt you enjoy Snape proofreading your love sonnets to the lovely Miss Luna."

"Hey!"

"Plus ten percent of the profits," he added. Harry glared at them.

"Thirty-three percent. Even three way split."

“We have a fourth partner on the outside who actually fills the orders.”

“Then twenty-five percent.”

George shook his head. “Harry, Harry, Harry... this is going to involve a lot of work that you just don’t have the time or the know-how to pull off. It wouldn’t be fair to split it evenly when you’re essentially just walking out a door.”

Harry thought about it for a moment. “Twenty percent.”

“Harry-“

“Don’t ‘Harry’ me. This isn’t just about effort, George. It’s about risk. If we get caught, and considering Snape is running things now that’s a definite possibility, then guess what? I’m the one who’s really screwed over here. You guys have what? Half a year left? Then you’re gone. I’ve got two and half years and I live with Snape. Not to mention if Hermione found out about this. Twenty percent is cheap, especially since you already said you couldn’t actually pull this off without me.”

George rubbed his chin thoughtfully. “You make an interesting point. You’ll have to excuse me for a moment while I confer with my associate over there.”

The twins stepped out of the office for a minute, leaving Harry alone with the gaggle of Lockhart portraits trying gamely (and failing miserably) to impress him with their smiles and crisp looking uniforms. Honestly, what am I doing? Harry wondered, but he already knew the answer. He was reclaiming a tiny portion of his life. So much of it was already tied to the Dark Lord’s plans, plans Harry was no longer certain he wanted to be a part of.

But what’s the point of holding the world in your hand if there’s no one worth showing it off to?

Those words had stolen his sleep for the last two days, reminding Harry that the Dark Lord great and terrible, and above all else he was a conqueror. He would not stop with Berlin. He would take Germany, and then after that he would take another country, possibly France, either through war or through marriage, and then another country and then another. He would keep going until he held the entire world in his grasp, and he would drag Harry along for the ride, showing him all the terrors and glories a destiny that powerful entailed.

And Harry couldn't stop it. He had already been swept up in it, trapped in the momentum of history.

But he could stop this. If he wanted to. When he wanted to. He could start it or stop it, build it up or tear it down. It was something he could control, something that would be his. A small, desperate defiance.

He needed that if he wanted to hold onto his sanity. The herbs he was taking weren't enough. They quelled the anxiety attacks that seemed to bubble up in the quiet moments, when everything was still enough for him to realize what a train-wreck his life was swiftly becoming, but they could do nothing about the feeling of manic disorientation that dogged him.

Perhaps this wasn't enough to really save him either, but it was a first step away from Voldemort's shadow and that had to count for something.

The door opened and the twins stepped back inside. Harry stood from his chair and walked up to them. They were smiling. That was probably a good sign. Or a really bad sign.

"You drive a hard bargain. We should have known you'd be quite the negotiator," Fred said, looking quite proud of this fact. He held out his hand. "You've got yourself a deal."

~ Page Break~

"Mr. Potter, if you can't be bothered to pay attention perhaps you would do us all the courtesy of putting your wand away before you send someone to the infirmary?" Snape hissed as the boy nearly exploded the armoire he was supposed to be preparing for storing dark artifacts for the second time in nearly ten minutes. It was a perfectly simple lesson, one the boy should have been able to handle easily, but was struggling to absorb.

He shouldn't be surprised however. Harry had been in the hospital wing for 'magical exhaustion' after a visit from the Dark Lord, and though he had returned to classes the next day, it seemed he was not truly recovered from whatever had been done to him. His eyes were wringed and his movements sluggish. Snape considered asking him about it, but then told himself if the boy wanted his help he could very well come and ask for it himself. He had enough going on with his current duties plus the 'Ira Project' as he had mentally dubbed it, without chasing after Harry's demons.

Ira had an appointment for some tests that Saturday with Medi-witch Jacobi, and though she had insisted she didn't want him there and the results wouldn't be in until later that week, Snape had every intention of visiting her later that day. It was a form of courtship, he told himself, for a relationship that was entirely out of order. He didn't think you were suppose to try to knock up a woman before the dating period was even over, let alone before you had actually married her. He wondered if he should be worried about Morgan coming after him in defense of his stepdaughter's honor.

"Mr. Weasley, keep your eyes on your work, not Mr. Potter's head. I assure you that despite the ample storage space you might find there, it would not make an appropriate receptacle for next week's assignment."

The youngest Weasley boy quickly turned away, his ears burning at having been publically outed for glaring at Harry. Whatever tolerance he had developed for the Griffindor had vanished, with Hermione's insistence to help her friend catch up on his studies it seemed. His irritation with Harry, was only irritating Hermione, who thus ignored Ron and continued to perpetuate cycle.

He rolled his eyes.

Good god, when was he going to get out of the classroom and all this teenage melodrama?

~ Page Break~

A week after the invasion of Berlin, the university re-opened. Classes were not officially opened, but students and faculty could now move about the buildings and begin to re-organize. The military presence was thick, the atmosphere tense, but the attempt at normalcy was welcomed by all. Viktor, in particular, was pleased to be able to move around campus without instantly coming under suspicion. People were still being stopped and searched for wands, but it was a half-hearted search by an already bored security force, and Viktor had gone through two of them already, more afraid of being recognized than that they would find his wand in his boot.

There was no worth while target on the campus for Viktor or his small group of rebels. There were a few security posts at each side of the campus that would make easy targets, but they would only serve to make the Culties more alert and brutal in their security measures and served to tactical advantage. His rebels were getting antsy about their lack of action, but if Viktor had learned anything from Dumbledore it was prudence.

The second thing he had learned was that once a path had been chosen it must be followed until its end, without hesitation or regret.

So Viktor's decision to explore the campus was not one of idle curiosity or ill considered actions. It just so happened that the university had a bell tower that overlooked the Ministry Department of Education, now the largest military supply depot in the entire city. He had spent two days straight in the bell tower with a cheap little sneak-o-scope, a note pad, and what seemed like gallons of hot apple cider, marking the movements of the soldiers in and out of the area. The time spent there was for more than just intelligence gathering. It provided him the time and the quiet he needed to make a plan of attack and his people the time to gather what they needed.

And now his plan was ready.

At a quarter to two in the morning, Viktor was once again hidden in the shadows of the bell tower. He had left everything back at the base, bringing only a broomstick and an owl. He stroked the bird's breast gently, watching regretfully as it puffed and preened proudly under his attention. It was a common Tawny owl, one of hundreds trapped within the city along with their wizarding masters. Clemens had taken him from an abandoned owlry half a block from where he had used to work.

"I am truly sorry about this," Viktor said softly, carefully tying a small package to its leg. "It will be painless, I swear."

He moved to the edge of the tower, releasing the nameless owl to the darkness. He could follow it for only a few seconds before it all but disappeared from his sight. Its destination was already known, however, and Viktor turned his gaze to the Department of Education. He didn't have to wait long.

The explosion rocked the tower, knocking him off his feet, and causing the bells to swing in an atonal cacophony of ringing. Viktor covered his ears, which did nothing to stop their vibrations from flowing through his entire body, and waited for them to stop. It did not take long for their swinging to lose momentum, and he climbed to his feet to see what damage his bomb had done. Beneath him the ministry office burned, brighter than he had calculated, so that he had to remain low to avoid being seen. Over half the building had been destroyed by the initial explosion, and the rest now burned with massive blue and green flames. The fire had spread already to a neighboring building, empty as far as Viktor knew, but near enough to the Department of Records to be a threat if it continued to spread. Soldiers were already beginning to flood the area, little more than black ants to from his vantage point, for which he was grateful.

The second explosion was off its mark, exploding harmlessly over an already destroyed building nearly a block away from its intended target; the military dormitories in the Department of Transportation. Viktor swore under his breath. The soldiers were now alerted to the danger, and the third bomb was intercepted with a series of sickening green lights he readily recognized as the Killing Curse. He prayed the bomb would still go off and take out at least a handful of the soldiers, but nothing happened. Dammit it all!

He spun away from the ledge. He couldn't afford to stay any longer. The Culties would be all over the area in minutes, and if he were caught here he would never escape. He wrapped his black cloak tighter around him, and reached for his broom. His fingertips had barely touched it, when an ominous chuckle froze him in his tracks.

"Oh my, what a naughty little boy you have been," a soft voice chided, dripping with femininity and cruelty. He didn't move for a moment, honestly stunned that someone had been able to sneak up on him, then burst into movement, spinning around and flinging out his wand. A curse was on his lips, but before he could utter it, the target moved, and he instinctively brought up his arm to protect his exposed neck and head. The blow caught him squarely on his lower left arm and the topside of his wrist, slicing through flesh and bone, and smashing him to the ground.

"Caedo!" he shouted, catching his assailant as she made for a second strike. She shrieked in pain and leaped away so that she now stood at the tower's ledge and in the light from the fires below. She was not a Cultie, was Viktor's first observation. She was not dressed in a uniform, but rather a shimmering silver dress more appropriate for a cocktail party than a battle.

His second observation was that she was a vampire. He watched in fascination as the normally fatal wound, cutting deep into her body, closed and healed before his very eyes. She glowered at him.

"I liked this dress!" she snapped gesturing to the torn and blood-stained garment. Viktor didn't even dignify her outrage with a comment.

"Caedo!"

She dodged this time, as he figured she would, giving him just enough time to snatch up his broom with his one good arm and leap from the tower. He felt her snatch at the tail end of his cloak, but it dissolved in her hands (as he had spelled it to do in case of the all too common scenario that it got caught on something while he was trying run away) and then he was falling. With expert precision, he swung the broom between his legs and halted his descent with one hand, keeping his injured one tucked close to his body, and sped away from the tower as fast as he could.

Katarina watched him go, intrigued. It had been a long time since she had met challenging prey. Tom would not be pleased to hear that one of her victims had escaped. That is, if she bothered to tell him. Frankly, she didn't see any reason to do so, especially with him disappearing for long stretches of time without explanation. She watched the dark shape flying away until it ducked between a row of apartments and disappeared.

“Run, run, little boy, back to your mommy and daddy. We'll play again another night.”

~ Page Break ~

Lucius made it a point to change out of his uniform before meeting his wife. She respected the demands of his career and admitted freely that he looked very good in it, but she also felt it was the most unromantic thing he could possibly wear out to dinner. The last time he had done so their conversation had resulted in nothing but 'yes, sir' and 'no, sir' from her and ending with a mocking salute and the closest thing to a march someone could pull off in three-inch heels. Narcissa could be quite artful when making a point.

“You should have seen him,” Lucius chuckled, “He was so pissed off. I kept expecting something to spontaneously combust. I heard from Dorian, you know that little fop from the Nielt party?, I heard from him that Potter actually had the nerve to say 'fuck you' to the Dark Lord's face when they met last Wednesday.”

Narcissa nearly gasped, but decided that would be a bit too plebian.

“Oh, my, what happened?”

Lucius couldn't stop grinning. "What do you think? They had to carry him to the infirmary."

"She shook her head, but couldn't hide her own smile at his childishness. "You're taking far too much pleasure out of that boy's pain."

"Nonsense. It's not his pain I find so amusing, it's his stupidity. 'Fuck you', I mean honestly."

She chuckled behind her wine glass. It was pretty damn funny. She wondered what other nonsense those two got into together when no one was looking. Hopefully, he wasn't teaching those troublemaking habits to her children.

Suddenly, her husband's smile vanished, and his eyes which had been riveted on her all evening were now glaring darkly over her shoulder. She turned to see what was wrong. Two uniforms, colonels by the looks of it, were standing in the foyer of the restaurant having words (impatient, angry words by the looks of it) with the maitre d', and staring pointedly at Lucius. She turned back to her husband.

"Don't worry, Cissa, I'll take care of this," he said, kissing her cheek before crossing to the other side of the restaurant to deal with the men who had the presumption to disturb them. It didn't take long for the colonels to pale and begin to stammer excuses, and for a moment Narcissa thought that would be the end of it and they would leave, but then one of them said something and Lucius stiffened. He turned his back on them and stalked back to the table. She sighed internally when he didn't sit back down.

"I'm sorry, but the Dark Lord has called an emergency meeting. I have to go."

A monster temper tantrum was looming in the wings, but she'd let it out on the house elves when she got home. As the right hand to the man who ruled Britain, she understood she could never truly be his first priority, but why did his job have to be the only priority?

“I’ll make it up to you, I promise. Soon.”

She let him kiss her cheek, wanting nothing more than to turn away and spite him, but one thing neither of them needed was to end up the latest topic of conversation in the national gossip rags.

“You better,” she warned. He had the nerve to smirk at her, which meant he already had an idea, and that placated her somewhat. If he thought he could make this up to her, the chances were that he could. He was just that good.

Lucius left his wife at the restaurant to handle things there, and followed the colonels back to the base, where the Dark Lord and the entire war cabinet were waiting for him. Apparently, there had been some difficulty in finding him, allowing for everyone else to slip in before him. He felt distinctly unhappy about that, and the fact that he hadn’t had time to change into his uniform. Voldemort, at least, didn’t seem to care.

“There’s been an incident in Berlin,” his master said without preamble. “We’re going to have to move up our time table.”

Lucius frowned. They were already moving things forward at a ludicrous pace. He wasn’t sure how much faster things could go or why they should.

“What happened?”

“There’s been an attack on some of the compounds within Berlin. It was well organized and clever, but sloppily executed. Only one of the three targets was actually destroyed, but unfortunately it was the main supply depot. What should have been a six-month supply has been reduced to a two month supply, at most.”

Well, bother. Lucius nodded.

“If we’re to hold Berlin, we’ll have to change our plans and take Brandenburg before Baden-Württemberg. Long enough to evacuate or troops at least.”

Voldemort's crimson eyes narrowed. "I have no intention of surrendering Berlin."

The general stiffened, but nodded, not entirely sure how they could possibly take it and keep it with such frantic actions. The Dark Lord, however, did not seem too concerned.

"Don't worry, my friend. They think they are ready for us, and right now that may be the case. But soon, very soon, I'll have something truly nasty for them. Something they will never see coming."

~ Page Break ~

The summons came in the middle of night, without warning. One moment, Harry was deep in an exhausted sleep, and the next Snape was shaking him awake. Everything had already been packed and ready to go, except for Harry himself who couldn't focus enough to put his shoe on the correct foot, let alone make sense of what was happening. Eventually, with Snape's usual bedside manner, he managed to get dressed and out of the castle without breaking his neck. The cold revived him some, but also made him that much more cranky to be pulled prematurely from his warm bed.

There were two trips by floo and an hour long car ride, during which his surly disposition worsened. By the time he actually reached the werewolf colonies, it was nearly two in the morning, and Sirius didn't look any happier to have been dragged from his bed to meet him than Harry did. Snape said something about having to leave for France the next day, but they pretty much ignored him.

They're initial conversation involved a lot of grunting and nonsensical sounds, and eventually ended with Harry crawling into Sirius and Remus' bed with the half a dozen other werewolves* and falling back asleep with all his clothes still on. He woke up the next morning momentarily terrified when he couldn't figure out where he was. He sprung up with a gasp, the room an indistinguishable blur.

“Calm down, pup,” Sirius’ said from the entrance of the lodge, his voice laced with amusement. “It’s home #2.”

Harry squinted at him pointlessly for a moment, before hunting down his glasses from their usual spot beside the now empty bed. He found them quickly enough, and then curled back underneath the warmth of the blankets. He had been warm enough snuggled in with the others last night, but without their extra body heat he was not enjoying himself.

“Here, this should give you a little more spirit,” his godfather said, handing him a steaming mug of something. He sipped it tentatively. It was chocolate, spices, and something he couldn’t quite identify, but which peaked his curiosity.

“It’s good. Thanks,” Harry said, looking up at the older man. They hadn’t seen each other in weeks, and then they had not parted on good terms. Harry had been angry, was still angry in some ways, about how casually he had been passed around between him and Voldemort without being consulted and the careless destruction of his relationship with Luna. Still, Sirius was family. Whatever his faults, Harry never doubted the other’s love for him. “Where are the others? Remus?”

Sirius shrugged. “Working while it’s still light enough. The weather’s been unusually bad this time of year. We’ve had our hands full keeping on top of it.”

Harry flushed guiltily. Here he was lazing in bed while everyone else must have been up at the crack of dawn. Sirius saw his discomfort and ruffled his hair affectionately.

“Don’t worry about it. You were obviously exhausted. You didn’t even stir when we all got up. Have you been getting enough sleep?”

Sleep was never the problem, Harry thought glumly. Most days it was a struggle to stay awake. Left to his own devices he could sleep for nearly twelve hours, and still enjoy the occasional catnap. He suspected it was the herbs, and had stopped taking them for a while, but after the second day his fatigue had given way to restlessness, headaches, and irritability and he started taking them again, fearing yet another anxiety attack.

“It’s just been a bit stressful,” Harry said. “I’m really behind on my school work, and then this thing with Berlin.”

Sirius grinned, and sat down beside him on the bed. “Yeah, that’s something alright. I didn’t know the old snake had it in him. That move took some nerve.”

Not exactly how Harry would describe it. He sighed and leaned against him, taking reassurance from the confident alpha.

“He wants to move the werewolves into France immediately,” Harry said softly. “I don’t like it. They can’t have had the necessary training in that short a time. Not for what I think he wants them for.”

The humor drained from his godfather’s face, and he stared solemnly down at him.

“Don’t worry about it. I’ve been in contact with Beartooth. If they had to be integrated with the regular army, I might be worried, but they’ve been given almost complete autonomy. They fight the werewolf way. They know how to do that just fine.”

“They’ll be fighting armed wizards, not bears. There’s a difference,” Harry said pointedly.

“A lot less of a difference than you think. Like I said, don’t worry about it. They all are proficient with weapons. Some of them even have wands. With the Wolfsbane potion keeping their wits about them, even the full moon isn’t so great a vulnerability.”

Harry wasn’t convinced. The only fight he had seen between werewolves and wizards had resulted in a lot of dead werewolves.

“I’m going to France today... I think that’s what Snape said. I honestly don’t remember much of what he said last night.”

“Hn. I doubt he said anything worth remembering,” he replied dismissively, then smirked. “Going to go flirt with the queen again?”

The young Gryffindor’s ears burned at the reminder of the regal woman. He had completely forgotten that he was going to have to actually meet with her again, and try, try very very hard, not make a fool of himself.

“Er... no, I... I’m going to look at some of the forts along the border. You know, do the inspector thingy. Maybe visit some of the colonies down there and do some recruiting. If I’m convinced I’m not just sending them out to be slaughtered, of course. Not that they have any reason to listen to me-“

Sirius grabbed his arm, cutting him off.

“Hold up a minute there, pup. What do you mean you’re going to the forts? Why would you need to go there?”

Ooohhh, it looked like the Dark Lord forgot to mention a few things, Harry noted. His godfather looked anything but pleased about this latest turn of events. Perhaps now was the time for a little revenge.

“Well, you know,” Harry said innocently. “My job. The one you so generously gave me. Have to follow the men out into the field every so often. Make sure they’re not being taken advantage of. I might swing by Poland while I’m on the mainland, just to get a better view of the action.”

Sirius opened his mouth, but Harry cut him off before he could speak.

“I’m going.”

“No. This was a mistake. I should never have suggested you take on this responsibility. You’re fired.”

Harry burst out laughing, startling his godfather. He startled himself for that matter.

“Just like that? I don’t think so. You gave me this responsibility, and I accepted it. Who else are you going to get to do it? I’m the only one who has feet planted in both wizarding and werewolf society. You need me to do this, and we both know it.”

“What I need is for my godson to be safe. If something happened to you...I’d never...I couldn’t... I didn’t think you’d ever have to get that close to the fighting.”

Harry tactfully refrained from pointing out that he was always close to the fighting. Danger and him were practically dating. He patted Sirius on the shoulder, and climbed out of the bed, searching for his boots.

“Don’t freak out yet. I’ll be surrounded at all times by the men you’ve expressed so much confidence in.”

Sirius glowered at him. “You really enjoy rubbing it in, don’t you?” Harry just grinned.

“There is no point in arguing with him,” a voice came from the doorway, and they both turned to see Jane step inside, solemn and mysterious. She eyed Harry critically for a moment, before turning back to Sirius. “He will leave and he will return, regardless of what you say or do. He understands the meaning of ‘the greater good’, something a Head Alpha would do well to learn.”

Hey, midget, Harry nearly greeted, but caught it quickly before it escaped. It probably wasn’t the best idea to provoke her. Especially since she’d decked him good during their last visit. Sirius, however, didn’t bother hiding his eye roll, causing his godson to hide his smile by taking another drink from his cup. Jane might be the nine-year old, but Sirius was definitely the biggest brat in the room.

“Hn. ‘Greater good?’ Seems to me every time I’ve ever heard that phrase used it was to justify the unjustifiable,” the man said coolly. He stood and headed for the door, but turned back to Harry before he left. "This conversation isn't over."

The young Gryffindor watched him disappear, feeling exasperated and mildly triumphant. He turned to Jane.

"You think he's gone to find rope to tie me up with?"

She shook her head. "He is going to find Slivermoon and whine to him, until he agrees to come talk you into seeing things Blackbone's way. He is better at it than Blackbone himself."

Yeah, that sounded like Remus. He shook his head and went back to hunting down his boots.

"You are ill," Jane said, her bland expression never changing. He stiffened. "You have been taking too much of the Du'on nadi."

He looked away. There was no point in denying it. Although, he thought it more than a little hypocritical of her to criticize, seeing as she had been the one to give him the leaves in the first place. She seemed to read his thoughts, for her eyes narrowed very slightly.

"It is meant to be used in spiritual rituals, not as a recreational drug. What you are doing is more than dangerous. It's blasphemy."

So you did know what would happen when you gave me those leaves at the funeral, he thought bitterly, but didn't say. He had no intention of getting into an argument with the goddess he no longer trusted. What would be the point? He might as well argue philosophy with a Martian. They lived on entirely different worlds, and could never truly understand what the other.

"Oh," he said, simply. "Sorry, I didn't know."

She just stared at him for a long time, and he wondered if she could interpret what he was really saying when he himself didn't know. Was he going to stop taking the herbs? He should. That much was obvious. How exactly he was going to do that without going nuts was a different matter altogether.

~ Author's Notes~

Voldemort stole Harry's magic. Yes, he can do that. Most witches and wizards are capable of it, but they can't use it themselves very often or at least not very well. It's like trying to use a wand that isn't yours (with the exception of course being when you've defeated the previous owner, which doesn't apply with directly stealing other people's magic). If one does wish to steal or use other people's magic, they usually do it through a variety of magical objects, which can absorb and store magic. Keystones are like that, except they can only be used by a single person (usually the owner) and are least likely to disrupt the magic while it's being stored. There are other ways of absorbing and then converting another person's magic into one's own. Cannibalism for instance, as well as various dark rituals. Stealing magic is taught to Sentinels (and previously Aurors) as a means of disarming, but not widely learned among the general population because it's dangerous and unlike most spellwork it requires skin-to-skin contact. Not something witches and wizards are particularly comfortable with.

Wizer's Rent is a wizarding card game, in which each player draws six cards. The first player asks the person to their left "Do you have 'insert number' galleons for 'insert number between one and the number of cards the person is holding' rooms?" If the person has a combination of cards that add up to the 'rent' then those cards disappear from other player's hand. If the player to the left doesn't have enough 'rent' or has too much, it goes to the next player, and then the next, until there are no players left and then the 'renter' loses a card. For example a player asks the person next to them "Do you have 13 galleons for two rooms?" and that person has a six and a seven card, those two cards disappear from the other person's deck and end up in the first player's deck. The object of the game is to be the only person left with any cards. Don't ask me how I thought this up. It's just a complicated version of 'Go Fish'.

If you're wondering about how the twins smuggle things into the castle but can't get money out, it involves transfiguration which is nearly impossible to do with wizarding money (it's spelled at the mint in a highly secretive process to prevent it from being counterfeited or transfigured for purposes other than currency). You can tell if money is counterfeit if you are able to transfigure it into something else, otherwise the entire monetary system is likely to collapse.

During the winter months, werewolves usually share their beds with several members of their pack to share body heat and as a bonding experience. There's nothing sexual about it.

Book V:

Chapter 23: Musketeers and Madmen

Hermione woke up earlier than anyone else in her dorm on Saturday, which was typical even before she had started helping Harry pull up his grades. It was still dark as she made her way down to the kitchens for some tea and coffee for Harry. The castle's house elves were all darlings, and doted on her just as Dobby did at home, luckily with somewhat less dramatic results. Part of the reason for this, she knew, had to do with her doting on Harry, whom they regarded as some sort of savior for something she could never get out of them clearly.

"But Mistress Hermione," Koki, a spindly elf with extra long fingers, said as she began to boil the tea, "Master Harry is gone. He left last night."

"Gone? What do you mean 'gone'?"

Koki nodded cheerfully. "He was summoned away. Professor Snape had Bicki and Po pack for him. Half asleep, poor Master Harry. He's going to France, yes? Meet important people! The Queen, herself!. Very exciting."

Hermione frowned. "Already? I would have thought he would have a week or two before he had to go. And why in the middle of the night? Did something happen?"

"Koki does not know, Mistress. Would Mistress like some muffins? Po is making banana nut and orange cranberry."

"Thank you, Koki. Would you send them up to my office? I think I'll try and get some work done today."

"Yes, ma'am! Koki is happy to help!"

Hermione left the house elves to their work, and headed for the Hogwarts' Herald office, lost in thought. She was worried about Harry.

That was hardly something new, but also something she couldn't shrug off. Harry had been acting... off... for a while now. As happy to be home as he seemed, he wasn't falling back into his usual routine with the same ease as he usually did. His concentration was shoddy, he kept forgetting what day it was and what classes he had, he barely ate and dozed off at meal times, and his performance during practicals was slipping. At first, she wrote it off as tiredness from his trip and being overwhelmed with catching up, but that didn't quite fit. He had mood swings, gotten angry over nothing and not reacted to something that would normally leave him livid, and no matter how much he slept he didn't seem any more rested.

He was obviously under some sort of stress aside from the obvious, and she had wanted to ask him about it today, but he had already been taken away. Another thing to worry about. If he was acting oddly here, in the closest thing he had to a home, what was it going to be like for him in another country and a whole new load of responsibilities weighing him down?

She should talk to Uncle Severus about her concerns, knowing he was the most likely to be able to help Harry sort himself out, but at the same time she didn't want to go behind Harry's back. He was a private person and she respected that, but sometimes he got in over his head. At the same time, with her godfather so extremely busy these days and more than a little stressed, involving him in Harry's problems could make things worse.

She sighed. Honestly, when did she go from being Harry's friend to his life coach?

The Hogwarts' Herald press office was empty as she knew it would be (she was one of only two people who actually had a key after all, Toure being the other), and didn't expect that to change until after lunch, when the staff would start coming in to work on their articles before their meeting later that evening. They were putting out another release that Monday, so if Harry's absence had an upside it was only that she would have more time to work on it.

Po's muffins and a steaming cup of cinnamon tea were already waiting for her at her desk, and she took a moment to appreciate it.

She got so very little time to herself these days. Between schoolwork, the paper, Dueling Club, Harry, Ron, and her sometimes needy foster brother, there was never any time to just sit and think.

After about ten minutes of thinking about her life and those she share it with, she decided thinking outside of schoolwork was vastly overrated and somewhat dangerous, and decided to start working. She began by making a check list of everything that absolutely had to go into the paper; the standard articles first; Teacher's Tutorial, School Announcements, advertisements (they did have a few sponsors from Hogsmeade, but with the cancellation of Hogsmeade weekends the ads were primarily for student tutors and selling of old school supplies or nic-nacs), sports, horoscopes, etc... then the main articles; this week it was Natalie's continued relief campaign for winter supplies for the Irish victims, a guide to preparing for Newts and Owls for the upperclassmen, and twenty different ways to entertain oneself indoors (important to know since everyone was getting stir crazy with all the extra security keeping them inside). Then the optional favorites; the gossip column, student opinions, romance advice (a section she tried to exclude whenever possible), other miscellaneous articles, and what Hermione suspected was going to be a speculation piece on Harry's abrupt departure for France that day.

She would have to write that herself, what with everyone else already working on something and her being the first to know, but it rubbed her the wrong way to do so. He was her friend, and socially and professionally it was in bad taste to write about him. Maybe she could just pretend she hadn't heard about it until it was too late to include in Monday's edition. It seemed dishonest to her, but at the same time it felt a lot better than betraying her other ethics. She started sorting through articles that had already been submitted and checking them for spelling and grammar mistakes.

By lunchtime, she had completed just about everything she could possible get done without the other staff members present, which was good because they were starting to trickle into the office. First, Collin Creevey, hurrying to the dark room to print his latest roll of film, then Susan Carmichael; who was responsible for Natalie's article, and gradually more and more. A few dropped into her office to submit their articles, but a majority lingered outside it to gossip and discuss their work. Hermione didn't go out and join them, but left her door open so she could listen. The staff had a tendency to be intimidated by her, and sometimes it was easier to get an idea of what they wanted out of the next edition by ease-dropping rather than asking directly. Given sufficient time and quiet, most forgot she was even back in her office and could hear them clearly.

Trudy Sabbat was particularly forgetful, or perhaps just plain reckless.

"Slipped out in the middle of the night! Of all the nerve!" Trudy's perpetually scandalized (because everything that anyone ever did seemed to be a scandal after being processed by her twisted little brain) voice floated into her office, and Hermione let out a mental groan. It seemed Trudy had heard about Harry's leaving and decided to orchestrate a new melodrama. "Probably gone off to have a tryst with that werewolf girl! Mark my words, by the end of the school year she'll be knocked up!"

Hermione clenched her fists. Of all the nerve!

"Can it, Sabbat," Ron's irritated voice snapped. "No one wants to hear your trashy shit. The guy's gone to France for some diplomatic mission or something. I heard it from Malfoy."

"So he's gone to knock up that that Delacour tramp? Oh that's much better!"

Ron burst out laughing. "What is it with your obsession about who Potter is screwing around with? You're like a crazy ex-girlfriend stalker person."

There were several other snickers, and Hermione settled back in her seat, hoping that would be the end of it and she wouldn't have to go out and call Sabbat in her office for another 'little chat' about her rumor mongering. It wasn't meant to be.

"Screw you, Weasley. The only reason you're standing up for him is to earn points with Granger, who so in blindly in love with Potter he could set fire to an orphanage right in front of her and she'd still think he was Merlin reborn. You're pathetic. You're both pathetic."

Collin's ever eager voice protested first, "That's not true. Why are you-"

"Shut up, you stupid little homo."

Ron voice cut in, physical violence a promise rather than a warning. "Why don't you shut up, you stupid little wh-"

"That's enough!"

The entire staff turned to their editor, who was now standing at her office door, her expression arctic and her body tense. Most of the Hogwarts staff was there, but had quickly moved away from the center of the rising fight, looking anxious. Collin was looking down, red-faced and humiliated, while Ron was looking directly at Trudy, red-faced and his fists clenched. If Hermione hadn't interrupted when she did she didn't doubt that he would have hurt the other girl. Not that she cared so much about that, it might even be somewhat satisfying, but it would also be the end of Ron's career at the paper and probably Hogwarts itself. Trudy, a pixie-faced little brunette who would have been quite pretty if she didn't look so superior all the time, was gripping her wand, probably realizing she shouldn't have provoked Ron, the only person aside from Hermione completely unintimidated by her acid tongue and with a reputation for violence under his belt. Trudy looked to Hermione, and smirked, probably thinking she was going to walk away from this having caused more harm than she had acquired.

She was wrong.

"You have to the count of three to start apologizing, Sabbath," Hermione said coldly.

The girl had the never to look indignant.

“Apologize! For what? He started it!” she shouted, pointing at Ron, who was still glaring death at her. “And then he threatened me!”

Hermione expression didn’t change. “You are the only I heard insulting anyone, Sabbath, and the only one with their wand out. One.”

“That not true! You’re just picking on me again! You always pick on me! You all saw it, didn’t you? Didn’t he threaten me?!”

“Two.”

No one said anything. Even Greystoke and Parker, two of the biggest gossips on the staff and the most tolerant of Trudy’s attempts at ‘creative journalism’, remained silent. The jilted girl glared furiously at all of them.

“You-“

“Three,” Hermione finished. “You’re fired. Leave now, and don’t come back.”

The other girl practically hissed in fury, and her grip on her wand tightened. Hermione might have been worried, except that Ron was still watching her intensely and she trusted him. That was a bit shocking to her, that even after their all their recent bickering, she still trusted him to protect her without hesitation.

Trudy’s arm lifted ever so slightly, and Ron’s wand flicked into his hand so quickly it was if it had always been there. She froze, her eyes darted to him. She apparently trusted him to look after Hermione as well. Reluctantly, she pocketed her wand and turned to stalk out the door.

“And one more thing,” Hermione said, before the other girl could escape. “If I find out you’ve started rumors about me or Weasley or any of my staff, I will formally challenge you to a duel. I want you to think about that very carefully before speaking to anyone else.”

“Are you threatening me?”

“I am warning you, just like I warned you about disrespecting the other staff members, and about making up stories without any proof. You chose to ignore me, and these are the consequences. If you choose to ignore me again, the consequences will be considerably worse. You can leave now.”

“I’ll tell Professor Toure about this!” she cried, petulant and unwilling to admit defeat.

Hermione didn’t even acknowledge her, and returned to her office.

“Just you wait! Everyone loves my articles! They’ll be demanding me back! Just wait!”

A door slammed and after that Hermione didn’t see or hear anything else from her, although she suspected this would not be the end of things. After a few minutes the deafening silence in the bull pen broke out into low gossip. It wasn’t hard to hear what they were saying, and luckily it was nothing too disgruntled about her short little power trip. Very few people had actually liked Sabbat, even though she was a natural leader when she wasn’t degrading everyone in the room.

After a few minutes, Ron walked into her office without knocking. She was about to snap at him for barging in, but he tossed down his article before she could say anything and she let it go. He sat silently, watching her as she skimmed his article, occasionally marking it with red ink.

“You alright?”

“I’m fine.”

“You seem a bit stressed.”

“I’m fine,” she reiterated.

“...You did the right thing.”

She looked at him, exasperated. "Oh, yes, I'm sure you think so. Abusing my position to oust someone I don't agree with without consulting the rest of the staff and then threatening her with physical violence is a wonderful example to set."

He snorted. "Don't even. You gave her more chances than she deserved, and she mistook that for weakness and deluded herself into thinking she was somehow more important than she is. You did what was needed to protect this paper and everyone who works here. That girl's poison and we both know it."

"Forgive me if I don't take your assessment to heart. I may not have called you on it in front of everyone, but she was right about you threatening her. You would have cursed her if I hadn't interrupted."

Now it was Ron's turn to look angry. "I don't curse girls. Even girls like that. I'd have silenced her, but that's it."

She held his glare for a moment, and finally nodded. Yes, that sounded right. He would have silenced her, maybe even scared her a bit, but he wouldn't have hurt her. He was Slytherin through and through, but he had an honor code that he stuck to as rigidly as any Gryffindor. More so, perhaps, given that so much of his personality was otherwise amoral.

"My mistake, but don't do it again."

He shrugged. "I don't have a beef with anyone else on board."

"With anyone."

He smirked. "Don't start power tripping on me now, princess. It didn't work with for your brother and it didn't work for Potter, it sure as hell won't work for you."

"If you don't get your temper under control, you're going to end up expelled."

“Now there’s the bit of sweetness we all know and love,” he laughed. “Don’t worry about me. I can take care of myself. How’s my article?”

“I doubt Professor Toure’s going to let an article encouraging the student body to riot unless quidditch is reinstated is going to make it to print,” she said blandly, but added, “No matter how well written.”

He took decidedly cheeky about the compliment and she regretted giving it.

“ Well, we can’t have the masses thinking we’re under the professors’ thumbs now, can we? We’ll lose their trust.”

“I’ll see what I can do. I’ll have to speak with Professor Toure about Sabbath anyway. No promises though.”

He got up from his chair and did a mocking little bow.

“I leave it in your very capable hands.”

He ducked out before she could snap something at him, and she settled back in her chair. Honestly, he was incorrigible. Incorrigible, but at least he was also on her side.

When Collin entered her office a few minutes later, timid about seeing her after such a scary display of authority against Sabbath but needing to run his photographs by her for approval, he was surprised to find Granger was actually smiling.

~ Page Break~

“Would you like some of that peach schnapps, I know you’re so fond of?” Dr. Jacobi offered as Ira stiffly went about redressing. Her patient shook her head, not meeting her eye. Poor dear, she really was self-conscious about her body, and despite what the medi-witch had thought of Professor Snape, her examination made it obvious to her that the young woman hadn’t been touched by a man in a long time, perhaps since her first husband.

“How long before the results are ready?” Ira asked once fully dressed, and was finally able to look at Jacobi more directly. Jacobi lead the younger woman to her office so they could discuss the next steps.

“The blood tests should be ready in three days, but they won’t mean much until I can analyze the tissues sample I just collected, and that may take several days depending on the initial results. I’m optimistic, however. I’d like to see you again next Saturday.”

Ira nodded, a bit distracted, obviously anxious. This was always the worse part for the patient, not knowing if they could be helped or not, wanting to be hopeful but afraid of yet another disappointment.

“Professor Snape did not come with you today,” Jacobi said, hoping to distract her.

“I... no, I didn’t think...Umm... it’s a bit embarrassing really.”

“Oh? So he offered? What a supportive fiancé,” she laughed. “Most men are more squeamish about this stuff than the women who have to actually go through it!”

This made Ira smile a bit, although she was blushing too.

“Yes, he’s been really supportive. It was his idea to come here in the first place. I’d never even heard of this type of medical practice before... well, outside of the usual nonsense, of course. Drink ground up unicorn horns, sleep with phoenix feather under the mattress, that sort of thing. Even if I had known... I think I would have been too scared. I never would have gotten this far without him.”

“You two must be very close.”

Ira’s wistful smile faded somewhat.

“Do you think so? Would you find it funny to know that I’ve been on four dates with him, and broken up with him on two of them?”

Actually, yes, Jacobi laughed mentally, but it quickly faded. She was starting to wonder precisely what these two were up to.

“Ira,” the medi-witch began, cautiously, because she was going to mix personal and professional matters (how could it not when the creation of a child was involved?). “Have you given any thought to what you and Professor Snape will do if there’s nothing that I can do for you?”

The younger woman nodded. “I’ll let him go.”

Jacobi thought on that for a long time, before she asked her next question.

“Are you both together for the sole purpose of having a child?”

Ira opened her mouth, then closed it, then tried again.

“It’s more complicated than that,” she said, softly, “I love Severus. I really do. He’s the first man who ever made me feel like I was desired in my life, and the only one who made me feel like a real woman since...well, since Winston... I love him, and I’m grateful to him. That’s why I want him to have everything he wants, and he wants children. If I can’t give him that, then...I’ll let him go find someone who can.”

“And you? What will you do?”

“I’ll go back to what I did before. Work. Look after my mother. Maybe I’ll try dating again. There are men out there who don’t want children or who are willing to adopt. Whatever happens, I’m not going to regret having met him.”

“You don’t think he’s selfish? Requiring you to have children before he’ll commit to you?”

Ira shook her head.

“He is just being honest, both to himself and to me. Love isn’t enough. Not in marriage. We both have to be completely honest if we’re going to make that sort of commitment. We’ll only end up hating each other if we don’t.”

Jacobi’s profession brought her into contact with all sorts of people, all sorts of families, and far more unhappy marriages than she liked to think about. Young couples unprepared for the responsibility of a child that turned on each other, women haunted by the sin of infidelity against their husbands, unmarried women who through whatever course found themselves with a child and no one to help them raise it, and even women whose fertility lead the family into financial ruin. Ira and Severus were not those sorts of people, yet she couldn’t help but feel a bit of anxiety over what they were trying to do. Their hopes, precious and beautiful, were bound up in spider silk, ready to unweave at any moment.

“True enough,” she said, helplessly.

~ Page Break~

Harry took a train from London to Paris. It was not like the Hogwart’s Express beautiful and whimsical at once, but a military train, black and ominous with armored plating and more protection smells on it than a Gringotts’ vault. The interior wasn’t any friendlier. There were no private compartments in the passenger cars, only row upon row of open seating for the optimum number of soldiers and personnel to be transported from one place to another.

The passenger cars were all full with soldiers, and Harry’s was no exception. He had been invited to the officer’s car before the trip began, but opted to stay with the Beast Brigade. He said it was to keep the werewolves and regular soldiers from getting into fights in such closed quarters, but honestly he hadn’t wanted to be left alone with a bunch of witches and wizards of unknown intentions towards him. His excuse, however, turned out to be perfectly legitimate.

The Beast Brigade lingered together at one end of the train car, the soldiers on the other, and between them an invisible line none one would cross. There was an obvious uneasy tolerance by both parties. It didn't help that the witches and wizards looked decidedly uncertain of Harry's safety, as several of the werewolves were engaging in dominance rituals (swearing, arm wrestling, glaring matches, and general rough housing) that the young Gryffindor had long since gotten used to (it was a very rare instance where any of the alphas felt the need to challenge Harry, either because he wasn't a werewolf or because his somewhat undefined status exempted him) and that they weren't allowing anyone else near Harry.

He suspected it had something to do with the letter he had hand delivered to Commander Beartooth on Sirius' request, but it may simply have been typical territorial pack behavior. He wasn't too concerned, but it was obvious the other soldiers were. They knew who he was, and they knew his rank and position both in a military and a political context, and it just didn't seem proper for him to be slumming it with the werewolves. Even if he was probably in the most highly secured position on the entire train.

Harry would have liked to talk to the other soldiers, perhaps get the werewolves to lighten up enough were they could interact civilly rather than glare and posture their way around each other, but Beartooth would have none of it, and Harry couldn't even pull rank on him. Not that it would have done much good anyway.

So he resigned himself to the company of the werewolves, and settled in to read the book he had picked up in London while they amused themselves loudly around him. The book was on Animagi, one specifically recommended by Remus from which the Marauders had originally learned their shape-shifting skills, and he was lucky enough to find it in the Londinium Public Library (the oldest wizarding library in Britain still in existence) before he had to leave to board the train (and before Beartooth nearly gave the librarian at the check-out desk a coronary). It was not exactly a large book. In fact, compared to many of the great tomes found in the Hogwarts library, it was actually rather modest, but the print was small, and the phrasing obscure, perhaps because it was meant for someone with a complete university education in transfiguration and animal physiology. He very quickly wished he had brought not only a dictionary, but perhaps Hermione as well. One thing was obvious; he wasn't going to be doing any self-transformation anytime soon.

Four hours into the trip and they were well into France, the skirmishes had died down, the soldiers had started to relax, and Harry had given up on his book and was watching the scenery pass by in his window. He thought about his mission and what he wanted to accomplish, about his godfathers looking anxious and guilty as he left them safely within their territory, about the study date he had missed with Hermione, and most of all he thought about the little bag of herbs in his back pocket and whether he shouldn't just toss them out the window or the nearest trash bin.

He couldn't keep taking them. He knew that. Had known it before Jane had spoken to him, but now the reasons were more explicit. Taking the herbs was not only bad for his body, but bad for his soul. Blasphemous, Jane had said, although he doubted he could trust her anymore. She had manipulated him that day at the funeral, and he suspected she was manipulating him now or at least trying to. Maybe taking the herbs so often now would give him an immunity later on, so that he couldn't be possessed or go into a trance or whatever it was that had happened.

He still couldn't keep taking it, even if that were the case. The side affects couldn't be brushed aside as simple fatigue for much longer. Someone would figure it out, Hermione or Snape or anyone really, and then the whole point of taking it- not letting people realize he was probably going crazy- would backfire spectacularly. Lt. Harold James Potter of his Lordship's Army, student of the most prestigious school in Britain, diplomat, drug addict, and potential psychotic. Fan-bloody-tastic.

So he had to get rid of it.

Except that he couldn't.

At least, not now. This trip was going to be stressful, there was no getting around that, and he was already anxious about more things than he could count. This wasn't like at Hogwarts, where at least if he had a fit, he would be the only one directly hurt by it. If he had an anxiety attack while with the queen or while addressing the werewolf refugees or while touring the forts with the Culties, the results would be humiliating for all of Britain with potentially disastrous results. He needed to find something safer to replace them with first. Which would probably require a prescription from a medi-witch or wizard, and that wasn't something he could be discreet about while in France.

He was such an idiot. He should have gone to Madam Pomfrey from the start. She would have understood. She dealt with stressed out students all the time, she had to have given out some anti-anxiety potions. Or did you need parents' permission for that? Would she need Snape's permission? Voldemort's?

Stupid, don't think about it. Just get through this trip and the first thing you do when you get back is go to Pomfrey. She's a meddlesome woman, but she's also discreet. If it's just for a little while, maybe she won't say anything, and you can find something more permanent. Charms or something. Maybe there's a God of Calm, Happy thoughts out there. Yeah, okay, you've got a plan.

Now you can think about something else.

Like whether or not the Beast Brigade is actually going to be more than cannon fodder for Voldemort's games and what the chances of getting back home without being kidnapped or attacked by Germans were.

That occupied his thoughts for the remaining two and a half hours, and much to his self-disgust resulted in him needing to discreetly swallow a few leaves of the Du'on nadi. No one noticed, or if they did they probably assumed it was just candy or gum. The anxiety melted away into a cool detachment, but his concerns seemed just as valid as before. He had a bad feeling about this trip, and the feeling would not dissipate even under the influence of the herbs.

He was still feeling detached and a little drowsy by the time they pulled into the station house in Paris, but after nearly seven hours on the train he wasn't the only one. There was a lot of yawning and stretching as the Culties roused themselves for their departure from the train. Harry pulled his duffle bag from the overhead storage compartments, along with his sword (another reason for concern because when he had found it in his luggage that morning he could not recall having packed it before leaving and its spontaneous appearance usually involved immediate and life-threatening danger) which he strapped to his side. The Culties did not generally carry swords, but the Beast Brigade did (un-ornate, but enchanted to be light-weight and strong with the ability to deflect some simple hexes; Harry had considered several ways to make them even stronger defensively) and no one thought twice about him carrying one of his own, even if it was of a finer quality than the others. He strapped it to his side and followed Beartooth closely as they exited the train.

The train station was packed with military personnel, mostly British but also several French officers and even a handful of Musketeers, plus a few reporters and photographers milling about to talk to the soldiers. Harry made it a point to keep himself as obscure as possible behind the larger bodies of the soldiers, but it didn't take long for one particularly sharp reporter to spot him and scurry in his direction. The reporter, a scruffy young fellow in a leather trench coat and a quill in his fedora, pulled up short when several of the werewolves turned towards him and growled.

"Ah..." he started cautiously, holding up his hands to show he wasn't carrying a wand or any other sort of weapon, "Ezcuze me...um... you are Harold Potter, yes?" His accent was heavy, his English stilted, but he kept stumbling through it. "Why are you 'ere? France? In France? Why are you in France? Are you staying far?"

Harry just blinked at him, and several other men snickered at his broken English.

A camera flash caused him to jump, his wand leaping into his hand without thought, but Beartooth was already shoving him behind him while the rest of the pack rose up around him in a singular, well-orchestrated, and unspoken move. Harry would have been impressed except now he couldn't see a damn thing now.

An argument broke out, in English (some of it heavily accented) at first, but then followed by French as others seemed to join in. It only lasted a minute and Beartooth and the others relaxed and the their formation widened enough that Harry could see both the reporter and what was probably his photographer speaking to a musketeer dressed in blue and his young apprentice dressed in red. He couldn't tell what they were saying to the reporters, but they were obviously not happy about it. They also obviously weren't going to argue because the reporter nodded once and stalked off. Then the musketeer turned to their unit, and Harry once again found himself being shoved behind Beartooth.

"Oh, for Merlin's sake!" Harry snapped and stepped around the alpha. "Would you relax? What are you going to do when I meet Her Majesty? Tackle her to the ground?"

The musketeer let out a laugh, rich and rolling, his face curved with humor beneath his lightly graying beard. It was something of a relief after an entire day with so many glowering faces.

"As funny as that might be to see, please don't. She would be quite put off with my men and me if that were to happen. Lieutenant Bodine, at your service." The man took off his hat and made a dramatic bowing gesture, never taking his eyes off of them. Harry saluted him, and after a moment Beartooth did so reluctantly as well.

The name sounded vaguely familiar, and after a split second Harry turned to his apprentice. He did a double take. The apprentice smiled.

"Fleur? What did you do to your hair?!"

Gone was the flowing blonde hair that had seemed to dance with her every movement, and in its place was a shockingly short head of dark blond curls, the kind he might expect to find on a boy. In fact, he had thought she was a boy up to this point. She just grinned at him and pulled off her hat. There wasn't any more hair under there either.

"You do not need to look quite so 'orrified! It will grow back!" she laughed, and opened her arms. He slipped passed the other werewolves and into her hug, laughing himself. He hadn't seen or heard from Fleur since summer, and seeing her now was an unexpected surprise of the good variety. Lieutenant Bodine laughed.

“Come, my friends!” he said, gesturing towards the werewolves, “Let me take you to your living quarters before young Monsieur Potter ‘ere runs away with my apprentice.”

The hotel that was putting them all up was only half a block from the station, which the entire Brigade and most of the other Culties marched to. Fleur gave Harry an apprentice’s overcoat and hat as a disguise, telling him that his visit was a secret one until he was safely returned to Britain. The greatest protection they could offer him was anonymity.

There was a bit of a problem once they reached the hotel, however. It seemed that while the soldiers themselves were being housed there, a few of the higher ranking officers had been invited to the palace and Harry was among the requested. Beartooth wasn’t having any of it. He stated plainly that Harry was in his keep and he had no intention of letting him go anywhere without werewolf security. Bodine discussed it with him for several minutes, during which time Fleur snuck Harry out the back before anyone noticed. This seemed like a sure fire way to cause an ‘international incident’, but Fleur assured him that by the time Bodine was done with Beartooth everything would be smoothed over. There was a closed carriage waiting for them in the alleyway behind the hotel, complete with a footman and driver in resplendent matching uniforms and a quick, amused look that reminded Harry of Bodine.

They climbed into the carriage together and once alone, the playful atmosphere suddenly dissolved. They stared at each other for a long moment, each in their own uniform, both of them little more than teenagers and serving their respective countries at the potential cost of their lives.

“’ Ow are you, ‘Arry?” she said at last. “You look tired.”

“It was a long ride. I am alright.”

“I ‘erd about what ‘appened at ze werewolf colony. I am very sorry.”

He shook his head. "It was bad. It was very, very bad. I was there just after... I... don't want to talk about that. That's over and done with. There are other things to worry about now."

"Berlin," she agreed. "And more?" she asked.

"And more," he agreed. Her expression was sympathetic, but he didn't think she really understood what he was saying or if she did it meant something entirely different to her than it did to him.

"Viktor's missing," she said suddenly.

"What? How do you-"

"Everyone knows. It's in all the papers. He was supposed to play at a match with Italy a few days ago but never showed. Apparently, he told some of his teammates he was going to Berlin for the election."

Harry closed his eyes. He had expected this. Not in Berlin and not so soon, but eventually, somewhere and somehow Viktor would find the enemy he had been looking for.

"He may still be alive," Fleur said, a statement of fact rather than just a mere possibility. "He's smart, he might be in hiding or he might not be there at all. He may be using this as a way to disappear."

He nodded, but it didn't matter. Dead or alive, he doubted he would ever see Viktor again and that was a loss he didn't realize he would feel so keenly. They had saved each other's lives, and shared a time that was both frantic with joy and fear. He wondered if he should keep this from Hermione.

~ Page Break~

Beartooth was not happy with Harry when he returned to the hotel that night, but there was little he could do now that it was done and frankly, he wasn't going to get in an argument over it. Harry was not, technically, an alpha, but his shamanic status put him beyond the direct control of any alpha, and to some extent even out of the control of the Head Alpha. The young wizard had been touched by both Rhiannon and Greyback, and despite the misfortune that befell the Goddess Clan, it seemed the boy was leading the werewolves to a future of glory and prosperity that they had never known. He never doubted that was the boy's intention in any event.

So he let Harry off with a glower, and instructions to get a full night's sleep. He complied gratefully, barely making it to his bed before collapsing. Walking up the next morning, Beartooth had to all but drag Harry out of bed, while the other men laughed to themselves as their leader was made to play mother. A shower and two cups of coffee, and the boy finally woke up enough to take care of himself.

"Queen Ophelia wants me to visit Vosges. They have a colony in the mountains there that's been particularly restless. I believe she wants me to recruit the more discontented werewolves into our army, so that the colony can stabilize in their absence."

Beartooth grunted, taking another bite out of his ham. He would give the Frenchies credit for one thing, they knew how to treat their guests. After two weeks of mess hall dining, it was good to have some real food, even if the wait staff looked distinctly horrified by his men's table manners.

"We could use the extra man-power," Beartooth said plainly. He had twenty good men and women, but that was small pickings for a military unit. Right now he didn't have anyone to replace the casualties they were likely to suffer either, and definitely none suitable to lead in his place if he were killed. Harry shook his head though.

"I want to see the Lorraine's Gate and the Stroudsburg Gate* and their commanders first before I recommend the military for any of them. I would have preferred seeing them before you all got dragged here to be quite frank," he said, looking irritated. Further down the table, Ire and Deepbite were getting into a scuffle over the last buttermilk biscuit, and Beartooth let out a warning growl. Harry shot them a warning look of his own. The older werewolf wasn't entirely sure whose warning had them more cowed in the end.

“You needn’t be so worried. We can hold our own against wizards. Greyback proved that in the last war, and thousands of years of continued existence proved it before that.”

Harry’s eerie green eyes looked up into his, sharp as knives and just as dangerous.

“It isn’t just about survival. You deserve more than just surviving. This is about respect. Mutual respect. You are men, as well as beasts, and should be respected as both. I would not see you mistreated simply because others believe they can get away with it or even because you do not really care.”

Ah, yes, this was why he was putting his faith in this frail child. More than Blackbone’s commands, more than simple protectiveness for a pack mate, Harry was the future. He saw things not just as they were, but how they should be, and possibly how they could be. Beartooth didn’t hold much faith in wizarding kind, but here lay the exception. Here sat a miracle-worker.

The vivid green stare slid sideways, back to Ire and Deepbite, who were now cat-calling a nervous young waitress bringing an extra tray of food.

“Respect,” Harry snarled, causing the two misfits to fall silent. “Works both ways. Stop embarrassing our unit.” When they looked down, appropriately contrite and the waitress could gratefully continue doing her job unharassed, he turned back to Beartooth. “I know you don’t like wizards much, and I don’t blame you considering, but please try to get along with them. You might find yourself delightfully surprised every so often.”

Beartooth shrugged, as if it was inconsequential, but he would try if only because he had more faith in the boy’s vision than he did his own. He wanted what was best for the werewolves. He had been a part of them since before the war, a listless young muggle looking for a purpose or at least a job, while hitchhiking across the English countryside when his life took an unusual turn. Surviving the werewolf attack had been the easy part, surviving as a werewolf in the wizarding world was another matter altogether. The war had actually made things better for him, providing him a place to go and regular employment under Greyback, even if the work was dirty, but by then he had learned to hate witches and wizards and hadn't cared. Greyback had made him proud of his own strength, but there was little pride to be found in their history. Murder and persecution stretched back to time immemorial, and this new war was just a continuation of that for him. Only now it was revenge, cold and bitter and delicious, but as inconsequential as every other fight before it. If Harry could find consequence in it, find meaning and purpose for what they were doing, then he would try his best to help him.

Even if he did have to play nice with other soldier boys... and the occasional waitress.

~Page break~

"Morgana! Alyssa! It's time to go!" Kyle called out for what seemed like the thirtieth time in ten minutes. He was tired and aggravated after helping the movers pack up their belongings for most of the day, and he still had to get the children to the new house and then get some groceries to make dinner before he could call an end to the day.

"I can't find Izzy!" Alyssa whined, looking ready to burst out into tears as she scurried down the stairs.

"Oh, baby, we probably packed her up with the rest of your dolls. She's on her way to the cottage right now. Just like we should be," he said, trying to keep his voice sympathetic, when his patience was all but in tatters.

"But I had her just a minute ago! I know she was with me after the truck left!" she insisted. "I can't go without her! She'll be scared all by herself!"

Kyle sighed. "Alright, I'll help you look for her. Where's your sister?"

Alyssa shrugged and ran off to continue her search. Robert came into the foyer from the study and watched her disappear. He shared a sympathetic look with his husband.

“It’s just anxiety,” he said, “They’re worried about leaving. They’ve never lived anywhere but here. It’ll be alright.”

“I wish you were coming with us. They would feel so much safer if they knew you were with us. I’d feel safer too.”

“It’ll be alright,” he promised, “I just need to finish up with these last two clients, and then I’ll join you Saigr as soon as I’m done. I’ll be by every Sunday in the meantime. We talked about this, remember?”

Kyle nodded but didn’t look any happier. Morgana trudged into the foyer, with a glass of milk and a plate of cookies.

“Where are your coat and gloves?!” Kyle demanded. She just shrugged.

“I got hungry waiting for her to find her stupid doll.”

“She’s not stupid! Izzy’s the top of her class!” Alyssa shouted from somewhere upstairs. Kyle ran his hand through his hair in frustration. Robert just glowered.

“I’ll handle this,” Robert said, taking the glass of milk and cookie from Morgana and calling Alyssa down stairs and into the kitchen. Five minutes later they re-emerged, both of them looking very subdued, but dressed and ready to go. “They won’t give you any problems for the rest of the day.”

Kyle wasn’t sure if he should laugh or cry. “What am I going to do without you?”

“Funny, I was wondering the same thing.”

“Promise you’ll be safe?”

“I promise. The Fortifyers* will be in this Thursday to secure the house, and I’ll be done with business before Christmas. Nothing’s going to happen before then. Just be patient.” He turned to his daughters, who were still looking sulky from their reprimand. “And you mind your dad, you hear? I’ll be by every Sunday to make sure of it.”

They nodded petulantly, but didn’t turn away when he bent down and kissed both their foreheads and hugged them. Kyle took his turn as well, holding tight for a moment longer than was really necessary.

“I love you.”

“I love you too, you silly sap. Be careful.”

And with that, they left for the central Floo station in the Court district. Their private floo had been de-activated a week before as part of a city wide security measure, so that only a few select places in the city was connected to the national floo network. It was one of many security measures that had convinced the Reicher patriarchs that it was time to get out of the city before whatever the Court feared would happen did happen.

They had talked about what to do several times in the last month, until at last Robert decided to rent a cottage out in the Scottish countryside, in a little wizarding town called Sairg that was so obscure it wasn’t even listed on ninety-percent of the maps he had looked at. He would send Kyle and the children ahead to settle in while he finished his business obligations in London, then join them until the worst of the fighting was over. His tentative association with Harry had resulted in an unexpected influx of business by several very wealthy clients, many of whom were stationed out of their own country estates away from the big cities and he was confident he could continue to support his family from the little cottage and the London flat in the mean time.

They really were going to have to thank Harry for that later.

All of this was practical and responsible and for the best, but Kyle couldn’t help but look back at their little townhouse at least once, and feel an uneasy regret. Would it still be there when they decided to come back? Did it even matter, so long as man still inside was with them in the end?

“Come on, dad, I’m still hungry,” Morgana whined, tugging him along. He forced a smile as he turned back to his daughters, staring up at him expectantly.

“Oh, now you’re in a hurry to go!”

~ Page Break~

Lord Voldemort arrived in Paris two hours after Harry’s departure, but did not overly concern himself with that. His protégé would be back in Paris in a few days, and they could discuss his progress then. For now, he intended to focus all his attentions on Her Majesty and take full advantage of the courtesy she was bestowing on him during his visit.

At this moment, he was enjoying her company in the palace solarium, a refuge of warmth and lush foliage in the gloom of winter. From somewhere way above them he could hear the soft twitter of birds, and brief flashes of red and gold. The room its self was like an enormous gilded birdcage, with magnificent granite and marble mosaic of Apollo and his burning chariot spread across the floor. A tea set had been laid out for the sake of decorum, just as the ladies-in-waiting and his own ‘man servant’ positioned unobtrusively at one end of the room were, even knowing that if either one of them decided to do something ‘inappropriate’ none of them could have done a damn thing about it.

The queen herself was looking no less resplendent than the room in a white and gold gown, the bodice accentuating the beauty of her feminine form, the seemingly endless tapestry of lace, pearls, and gold silk accentuating the beauty of the human imagination. Her wide, dark eyes should have made her look innocent but instead gave an air of magnanimity and the not-quite there curve of her mouth a gentle humor.

He could see why his young protégé would fall in love with her, however childish that love, but it was not attraction (although she was very attractive) that drew him to her. It was power, and they both knew it. Etiquette allowed them to pretend otherwise.

“You have made a great many people angry with you,” she said gently. The smile he gave her was not gentle, but he could tell by the slight hitch in her breath that she liked it.

“Have I made you angry at me, your Majesty?”

“Angry? No. Concerned? Very.”

“Then I feel doubly blessed. For having avoided your ire and been bestowed with your concern for my well-being at the same time. I am, indeed, a lucky man.”

“I am not sure if I should admire your confidence or disdain your arrogance,” she admitted, her expression never changing. “It is only a matter of time before the Germans re-group to attack you... perhaps attack my countrymen as well.”

He raised an eyebrow. “I doubt I am the only one in this room who hopes that is very much the case.”

She tilted her head, her eyes narrowing ever so slightly.

“Do you believe me so eager for war?”

“No, of course not. War is just a means to an end. Like fundraising or studying. I believe you are eager for change.”

“What sort of change do you think I am looking for?”

“The same kind I am looking for. A revival. A return to the glory days of our respective histories, when our politicians were the great thinkers, warriors, and dreamers of their day rather than the spineless sycophants to the mob we now have. Mediocrity has weakened our people, just as brutality and decadence ruined our people before that.

It is time to revive that which is worth reviving and learn from that which should remain buried. This war will shake Europe from the apathy that has overrun it, and force the ordinary to the extraordinary and the extraordinary to take responsibility. The threat of imminent death has a way of doing that."

"You have an interesting way of looking at war."

"Fire is my element. I have an interesting way of looking at anything that is traditionally seen as destructive."

"Hate?"

"The spiritual rejection of an injustice."

"Fear?"

"A means of survival, of the body, the soul, and society as a whole."

"Betrayal?"

"The limit of tolerance. There must be limit to everything. All of these ideas have their limitations. They are habitually destructive, but destruction is as necessary as construction for survival and for growth. I notice you did not mention 'love'."

He leaned in just a little, and her mouth curved up a fraction so that her not-smile was now a very modest grin. At the other end of the room, the ladies-in-waiting held their breath and the manservant frowned uncertainly.

"Do you see love as destructive?"

"Of course. I thought the French had a very good understanding of this. So much of your literature has love end badly. But love is dual in nature, just like hate and fear and betrayal. It inspires us to acts of selfishness and selflessness, for joy and despair, and is the motivation of countless acts of conception and of murder. It is a source of some of the most powerful magic in existence.”

“And you have known this sort of magic?” There was the slightest, barely there hint of flirtation in that question, but he missed it due to the mental jolt of the words themselves. Had he known that sort of magic? Oh, yes. Not the exact kind she was thinking of, but...

He recovered quickly enough to give his own vaguely flirtation response without a hint of hesitation.

“It is also the rarest sort of magic.”

Let her interpret that as she would.

~ Page Break~

By early afternoon, the coffee had worn off and Harry was seriously wanting to hit someone. Beartooth had been willing enough to ignore the other Culties that morning, but neither he nor the rest of the unit expressed any interest in interacting with them either. In fact, they didn't seem to care one way or another about anything as they were flooded from Paris to the Lorraine's Gate, an abandoned castle at the base of a small mountain that had been reclaimed and refurbished by the French government to accommodate their British allies, and were escorted around the premises.

As far as Harry could tell it was a very fine facility if a little tight in the way of space, and the surrounding countryside was thick with old growth trees and rocky hills. The sort of place the werewolves could patrol and hunt in and feel at home, but which they seemed to show very little interest in. To make matters worse, the commander in charge was personally showing off the grounds and having detected their disinterest, was becoming increasingly irritated himself.

“If our fortification doesn't meet with your standards,” General Maxxis said, gritting his teeth as Beartooth snorted quietly. Harry shot the werewolf a warning look. They were alone in the man's office, a rather somber little, and he didn't want to have to be the adult one out of the three. "You can always request a position elsewhere."

"General," Harry said with more calm than he felt, sitting in one of the chairs and trying to swallow what had to be the worst tea in the province, "Please do not take my friend's attitude to heart. We are all tired from our travels, and neither of us has the experience to critique this base one way or the other. He is placing his faith in my judgment, and as far as I can tell you meet all the requirements I think necessary to house this unit."

Maxxis, who was middle-aged and had the look of a Sentinel without the scars, nodded and seemed to calm somewhat. He eyed Harry curiously for a minute.

"It's an odd world we live in," he said. "When I was your age my biggest concern was whether my old man was going to flog me for failing Arithmancy."

Harry smiled a bit ruefully. "Oh, I'm still worried about failing Arithmancy too. I just have a few other things to worry about as well."

The commander nodded, but didn't smile back. He drummed his fingers for a moment, thinking. Then spoke again. "If you wouldn't mind, we have some time before your escort arrives to take you to the Stroudsburg Gate, and it would mean a lot to my men if you could talk with them a bit. Nothing formal, just shake a few hands, trade a few names. It might go a long way to ease any tension between them and well..."

"The nasty little beasties..." Beartooth finished with unfriendly little grin.

"Your words, not mine, but perfectly accurate if this your general behavior!" Maxxis snapped. Harry could feel a headache come on. He held up a hand to interrupt them both.

"Respect," Harry reminded them both, but doubted it was any use. Beartooth was already in a tiff about something and now had Maxxis's hackles up. Maybe that was a good thing. Better to know that pairing them together wasn't going to work before the real fighting started. He had to hope he would have better at Stroudsburg Gate. In the meantime, there was no reason not to visit the other soldiers stationed here just because their commander was oversensitive. Maybe Beartooth just needed practice interacting with wizards without antagonizing them. "Alright, I would like that. Mind if I borrow your bathroom for a minute first?"

"Certainly, go right ahead."

The door had barely closed and already he could hear Maxxis and Beartooth muttering things at each other. He closed his eyes and wondered what he should do. He didn't trust placing Beartooth in the other's command, and likewise it was dangerous to leave the werewolf with someone he didn't respect enough to obey. But could he really request the unit be stationed somewhere else? Stroudsburg, maybe, if they didn't pick up any more recruits from the colony and overcrowded the barracks, but there was no guarantee that fort would be any better than this one. What was Beartooth's problem anyway?

Merlin, what if he couldn't find anywhere that they could fit in? Perhaps they could be stationed out of a private post, but that was only temporary solution. They had to integrate with the army at some point, and the sooner the better.

Almost without thinking, he reached into his pocket, grabbed a few leaves, and placed them in his mouth. A sense of calm detachment descended. Descended a little too quickly. The room swam in front of him for a moment, darkened, and with it came noise, growls and laughter and then pressure against his chest. It only lasted a moment, and the world brightened and then righted itself, and he found himself staring blankly at a shattered mirror, his reflection broken into a dozen pieces. He blinked, and spun around but there was nothing and no one there. He looked at his hand to see if he had hit the mirror, but the skin was whole and untouched.

What happened?

Shakily, he withdrew his wand and fixed the mirror. Maybe... maybe he had taken too much Du' on nadi. Had he taken some this morning and forgotten about it? He didn't remember doing so, but then again he had been groggy that morning so perhaps had just forgotten about it. It didn't feel like an overdose. He had never broken anything during the few incidents where he had taken too much. He didn't feel any different than he normally did after a normal dose, but what the hell was that?

A warning perhaps?

A knock on the door made him jump.

"You okay in there, Harry?" Beartooth asked.

"Uh, yeah... just a second."

Later, he could wonder about it later.

~ Page Break~

Bobby lingered in the upper tiers of the hill lodge with the other birds and minor sprites, trying not to fidget too much lest he gain the unwanted attention of the fae below. Dwarves and gnomes mostly, uninterested in someone of Bobby's skill, but scattered about were a few of the more dangerous members of the Seelie court; a veela, an earth elf, a young rock lord, any of whom might find a traveler of his skill and knowledge quite useful. If he were above ground, he would not be so nervous, but inside of a fairy hill Raecellos' influence and more importantly his protection was greatly diminished.

Normally, he would avoid a hill unless specifically invited inside, allowing for the protection of the host, but he needed information, the sort that one only seemed to find in the drunken ramblings in the taverns of the Underground. Nothing made fairies more philosophical than drink, and the philosophical discussion that resulted always involved one of three things; love, sex, or politics. Occasionally all three could be worked into a ramble, but usually it was one or the other.

Bobby was hoping for politics, because he had been hearing some disturbing whispers among the wind sprites. Normally, they were too frivolous and scatterbrained to take seriously and forgot what they were talking about within minutes of saying it, but for the last two days the gossip had been unusually persistent albeit vague.

Harry, Twilight Seeker, Gilhalmelan they all chattered and laughed.

Greyback, Devil God, the Black Wolf King, they all growled and hissed.

Nothing to worry about really. These were common enough names these days, Harry being the latest pawn of the gods and Greyback being the newest of an otherwise diminishing pantheon. It was the fact that they were being mentioned together that had Bobby worried now.

“Bullocks!” snarled a particularly irritated gnome. “First god we’ve had in... what? A hundred years? Two hundred? And it’s got to be a damned war god, just what the hell we need. Nasty fellow too.”

“I hear he’s got a wife and kids, but you don’t see them none. Keeps them in their den, asleep. For protection... or maybe they’re dead and he’s just weird,” his rather subdued drinking companion muttered. “He’s got a whole court in that den. Servants and gold and meat and weapons. All of it. Won’t hire out locally though, and that’s bloody unfair. How’s an honest chap suppose to get any work what with all the minor gods dying off and the few new ones comes along aren’t hiring?”

The irritated gnome snorted. “Who’d want to work for that freak? Got blood on the brains. Crazy.”

“Like a fox,” murmured the earth elf, inviting herself into the conversation. She was rather fox like in appearance herself, with a pointed face and black gloved paws for hands. Sipping her wine, she waited a moment to see if her bait had been taken, and when the gnomes waited for her to elaborate she continued. “He’s a god. Not a fairy. He's got plans. They all have bigger plans. He was in his denkingdom until a few days ago, but now he's traveled to the mainland. What do you suppose he's doing there?"

The gnomes looked to each other, apparently having not heard of this latest bit of gossip. Bobby leaned in as far as the shadows would allow.

"What's he up too then?"

She shrugged. "I don't know, but the Twilight Seeker left for the mainland a few days ago too. Maybe he's following him."

"What for? He gonna kill him?"

"Maybe."

"Naw, he'd protect him, yeah? He was a part of his old pack, yeah?"

"Maybe."

"Except it might be the boy's fault they all got killed."

"Maybe. We won't know until the Black Wolf King catches up to him, now will we?"

The gnomes made some sort of reply, but Bobby had already retreated to the shadows and into one of the little rabbit tunnels that would lead him outside.

He had heard enough.

~ Page Break~

They huddled silently in the dark of their cellar, relying on the light of a single candle. Their furnace had stopped working the day before, and nothing they did seemed capable of restarting it. Lanterns and candles were in short supply in Berlin, the Culties having taken to raiding the local residences and business for supplies in order to replenish their dwindling stores. Despite the initial thrill of their semi-successful assault on the British supply, Viktor and his rebels were now keenly feeling the backlash of their actions.

The Culties were pillaging those few places that had survived the initial raid, ousting stranded witches and wizards from what little shelter was available into the streets, stripped of anything of use from food and candles to parchment and medicines. Men and women were interrogated at random and not all of them walked away from the experience. The result was a lot of desperate witches and wizards roaming the streets, looking for food and for shelter, the strongest of them forcing out the weaker until it was almost as dangerous to meet a German wizard as it was to meet a British one.

To make matters worse, the Culties had begun to massacre the local owl population. They killed them by the dozens in the owlry, in the air, when they found them in residences, or anywhere else. There were rumors that the Culties were intending to eat them, but Viktor and the others knew better. Their previous plan would not work again.

And still, Viktor refused to relent.

“We mustn’t waiver,” he stated firmly. “We must increase our efforts. They are desperate. We’ve made them desperate.”

“Yeah, along with everyone else in the damn city,” Ernst grumbled. Viktor ignored him.

“What do you have for me?” he asked the others instead. Ada spoke up first.

“I got the maps you wanted; although I don’t know how much good they’ll do you. Some of them are at least a hundred years old. Half the routes are probably blocked or destroyed by now.”

“I’ll worry about that later. They’ll be a good starting point for what I want to do. Eleonore?”

The former journalist smiled, and it was decidedly unpleasant. She did not take kindly to the injustices she saw being perpetrated, and it showed in the casual mercilessness with which she had completed her assignment.

“It’s been arranged. We’ll have our weapons. I can’t guarantee it’s not a trap. These aren’t the most trustworthy guys we’re dealing with.”

“It’ll be fine. We know more about them than they do about us- ugh!” Viktor choked at a sudden wave of pain, unable to catch himself before letting the pained moan escape. Immediately, Clemens was on his feet and checking his wounded arm. They may have had plenty of food, but medical supplies was a different matter altogether, and Viktor’s wounded arm was slow to heal without the aide of potions. Clemens did what he could, but his knowledge was limited to first aide, and aside from a few wound cleaning and clotting spells not of much use.

“Dammit, Viktor,” the bespectacled man admonished, unwinding the bloody cloth he had been using as a bandage. “You need a medi-wizard! You’re going to bleed out or get an infection at this rate!”

He shook his head, and carefully extracted his arm, his expression once again masked by his usual resolve.

“It is nothing. God damn, vampire. Must have been trying to take advantage of all the fighting to hide her feeding. She might not be alone either. Keep your wits about you if you go out at night, got that?”

They all nodded obediently, not buying his attempt at distraction. Viktor was strong, but his wound worried all of them. He had every intention of helping them in the actual fighting, maybe even doing most of it himself, and he could not afford to have such a weakness. For now, however, there was nothing they could do but try and keep him from straining himself or making any reckless decisions before he was properly healed.

“Alright,” he continued. “I’ll review the maps tonight, and we’ll investigate the tunnels tomorrow morning. We’ll worry about the weapons when they’re ready. Everyone get some sleep. It’ll be a long day tomorrow.”

~ Page Break~

Katarina hunted the streets near where she had seen her prey escape first, but after two nights of fruitless searching, she moved deeper into the city in search of him. She had hoped that the Culties would have identified him for her, but the numerous wanted posters offering a reward for information on the ‘terrorists’ responsible for the Depot Explosion told her otherwise. Horace seemed utterly uninterested in the matter beyond the fact that it had conveniently eliminated one of the three places he suspected housed the ward hub and inconveniently increased security. She hadn’t told him about the man who had escaped her, and didn’t tell him that she was hunting him still. They were pointedly ignoring each other as much as possible.

So now she hung to the shadows of Lintz Street, haunting the alleyways and rooftops, hunting open cellars and abandoned ramparts. Prey was numerous, newly displaced and increasingly desperate, unarmed witches and wizards searched recklessly in the darkness for entrances to half destroyed buildings in hopes of getting out of the wind and coming snow, if not the cold altogether.

She ignored them. Let her children find them and feast. She had something a little more... challenging in mind.

~ Page Break~

“Civilians keep coming in demanding information or for action or whatever,” Auror Juelsvene complained to the other half dozen men around the table. The sun had set, and they were gathering to discuss their progress, or lack thereof. “They’re making a damn nuisance of themselves. Half of them don’t know their way around the city, and my men have their hands full just keeping them from wandering into the muggle areas!”

Oblitz closed his eyes and shook his head in irritation.

“We can’t have civilians in an open combat zone. If some of them want to stay and help I’m sure we can find jobs for them to do, but otherwise I want them out of the entire city. The Dark Lord will have to send additional troops and supplies eventually, and if they’re still here when that happens it’s going to be a bloody mess! Start the evacuation first thing in the morning.”

“What about the people who live here?”

“Give them two days notice and then get them out of here, as well. We could use the space.”

No one looked happy to have to oust people from their homes, but Oblitz was right. It was too dangerous for civilians to be loitering around. They had received news just that morning that the Dark Lord had moving more troops into Poland and France, and more attacks seemed inevitable.

“Have we heard anything from the Austrians?” Oblitz asked.

“Nothing yet,” a tired looking female Auror said, sighing. “I don’t expect we will for another day or two. The minister will sit on his hands for as long as possible. I sent a request to some members of the Wizengamot to host an emergency session to help speed things along, but I don’t know if it will do any good.”

Oblitz snorted in disgust. “What about the Swiss?”

“Some good news, some bad. The Minister has agreed to lend us two hundred men, but they reserve the right to call them back if they come under attack themselves. We received a missive from Rome promising three hundred on the condition that we collaborate to assassinate the ‘Dark Spawn of the Devil Gods’. I assume they meant Lord Voldemort.”

“Sounds reasonable to me.”

The other men shared a look at that. They were not Voldemort fans, but they knew attempting to kill a man... a being... of that great a political and magical power was easier said than done. He had already destroyed most of their political infrastructure and overrun their capital. The German Wizengamot, who was laughably weak and ineffectual in comparison with its neighbors, had been called to into session in Dresden to take the helm until a new Minister could be found, but they were slow to make decisions and several members were attempting to use the opportunity to increase the power of the Wizengamot and themselves by proxy. Oblitz received orders from them every couple of hours and he ignored them for the most part. He didn't technically have the authority to ask for aid from other countries without their permission, but until someone actually questioned him (and for the last couple of weeks no one had dared) he wasn't going to question it himself.

And if someone did question him, he wasn't above insuring that they never did so again.

~ Page Break~

Crowded into the undersized mess hall, hot from the crowd of bodies and the warmly glowing lanterns, Harry was starting to feel a bit dizzy. He had traveled to Stroudsburg Gate, done another rather unproductive tour, and by nightfall had moved on to the colonies where a very enthusiastic crowd was waiting for him.

"It is so good to meet you in person! I cannot believe how young you are!"

"I wish to fight! Let me fight for you! I will make you proud, I swear!"

"Please let me shake your hand!"

Beartooth's characteristic over protectiveness had all but disappeared once they had entered the Vosges-Woolf , a two hundred strong colony with a disproportionate number of grown men eager to be out fighting rather than rebuilding their lives. The colony itself was only partially constructed, and much of it appeared to have been done by wizards. The buildings were all wooden and cabin like, but with little character, much like the clothing the werewolves wore which were practical brown wool robes that all looked the same. Harry supposed they had not yet acquired the skills to be a fully self-sufficient colony, which likely hadn't been helped by the fact that Sirius and Remus had been called back to Britain before replacements could be sent.

The werewolves themselves couldn't have been happier with their accommodations. For many of them the little one or two room cabins were the finest homes they had had in years and the surrounding countryside was a vast improvement over the crowded slums they were used to. Those who actually had some experience with country living were granted a great deal of respect for what ever skill they could pass on to others, from anything as simple as cutting firewood to more complex skills like hunting or butchering meat. The witches and wizards that visited and dispensed supplies were few but kind, mostly volunteers from local church and civil rights organizations.

And they attributed all of this to Harry.

"Lord Blackbone told us all about you!" one lone female had gushed. "How you were rescued by a family of werewolves and promised to do the same for the rest of us! You even managed to convince the Dark Lord and Britain almost entirely on your own!"

There were several inaccuracies in that statement, but she looked so happy he didn't feel particularly inclined to nitpick. There were other stories his godfather had told them as well, about escaping from under the German Minister's nose and defeating several Aurors all by himself and apparently even Greyback had listened to him (which Harry thought was stretching things a bit) and he was able to walk with werewolves during the full moon.

He really wished his godfather weren't so damned chatty. Beartooth had laughed and said it couldn't be helped. It was a 'father's pride' sort of thing.

“What about the fighting? Are they going to send any of the werewolves to Berlin? I’d love to give those bastards a little payback for the shit they put us through,” snarled a thin, heavily scarred man. Harry noted that several of those scars had the unique shape or color of a Dark Arts curse, and mentally shuddered.

Several other werewolves were in agreement with him.

“Yeah, when can we sign on? Get our own spiffy uniforms?” one of them laughed.

“What’s the pay like?”

“What if you don’t have a wand? Damn, Auror snapped mine back in ’92.”

The Beast Brigade was hung out around the edge of the mess hall, grinning like indulgent fools, completely clueless as to what the other werewolves were saying (they were speaking in German which was not their forte) but having a pretty good idea what it was about. These were their future allies and pack mates, and already they were showing their allegiance to one of their own.

No help from them, Harry thought helplessly. How could he explain to these people that they shouldn’t join the fight? The visit to Stroudsburg Gate had convinced him of that. Where General Maxxis had been uneasy and irritable, General Thurston had been down right hostile and two fights had broken out between the stationed Culties and the Beast Brigade (which Harry had to break up before one of his men killed the others). Apparently, in close quarters and with a weapon, untransformed werewolves really could be more dangerous than wizards. It was a mess, and more than ever Harry was convinced that he couldn’t leave them in the charge of the commanders. They weren’t ready for it, and obviously didn’t even want to try. The whole fiasco had Harry reaching for more herbs, but luckily he caught himself.

For all the good it did him. He had three more dizzy spells since that afternoon, one of which Beartooth had actually seen. He had said it was simply fatigue and a lack of food (Thurston apparently didn't have any dog food on hand, to which Harry said pointedly if he made one more smart ass remark like that he would be the damn dog food). He was having another spell right now, and it didn't seem to want to dissipate.

He felt himself tilting too late, and only another werewolf sitting beside him kept him from falling out of his seat. "Hey, are you alright?" someone said, but it sounded odd, as if it were from far away or underwater.

An uncomfortable heat came over him and with it the sound of growling and laughter, and a pressure against his chest. He had felt this earlier in Maxxis' bathroom, but now it was stronger. He couldn't breathe.

"Harry? Harry, what's wrong? Everyone get back! Give him some room!"

He was on the floor he realized. How had he gotten on the floor? The ceiling was swimming above him, the lamp light swinging oddly and making the shadows fly. Why couldn't he breathe? The voices in the room were getting dimmer, even as the voices that couldn't have been there grew louder. His vision was starting to darken around the edges, and all the strength in his limbs died.

What was happening? Had he been cursed?

A familiar, unpleasant laugh rumbled in his ear, and he closed his eyes tight as the nightmare rolled over him.

~ Page Break~

Beartooth's heart nearly stopped when Harry suddenly tilted and nearly pitched himself off the table. Then it nearly beat itself right out of his chest, as he scrambled to the boy's aid. Within moments, the dizziness had become full on disorientation, then paralysis, followed by tremors and a burning fever. Poison was his first suspicion and he shouted for a medic, and one of his men rushed out to find the witch.

In his arms, Harry struggled to breathe, his chest rising and falling quickly but unable to take in air. His wide, unseeing eyes finally slipped closed and his body stopped shaking, and for an unbelievable moment he thought him dead.

Then he started to breathe again, slow and steady. Beartooth (and not a few of those gathered around him) started to breathe again as well.

Then Harry opened his eyes and they stopped again.

One green eye, and the other... the other was milky blue.

A dark, wicked grin spread across the boy's face and everyone quickly moved away except for Beartooth, who could only stare and ask in wonder.

“Greyback?”

~Page Break~

The Dark Lord slipped out of the Queen's chambers silently, easing the doors closed gently so as not to awaken her. Pleasant dreams, he thought to himself, feeling simultaneously smug and generous. Harry might not talk to me for a month if he ever finds out about this. Which was also amusing for entirely different reasons.

The musketeers guarding her chambers did not look at him as he passed, but he could feel their hatred for him at his back. Their beautiful and pure queen, corrupted by a savage beast such as himself. Oh the horror. It's the way of the world, gentlemen. The queens mind a lot less than you think.

He was feeling energetic after his first tryst with royalty, and since he rarely slept to begin with, he didn't see the point in doing so now. Her majesty wouldn't mind his absence. She would prefer his discretion over his sentimentality any day, and he had no intention of humiliating her by having their sordid affair caught by a gossipy servant. Not unless he could find some gain from doing so at least.

He wandered the halls towards his quarters, still brightly lit even at 2 o'clock in the morning, and admired the architecture and the art that seemed to overrun every available surface of the palace. He marveled at the impossibly high arching ceiling, the stained glass windows, each made of thousands of different pieces of glass, the marble statues of naked maidens who looked away and smiled shyly as he passed. Such opulence was not to his taste, but he couldn't help but be impressed with the sheer quantity of it. There had to be easily ten times the number of magical artifacts and artwork within this building than there ever had been in Hogwarts, and one could spend their entire lives making a record of it and still only get a third of the way through.

And this was only the winter palace. He hadn't seen her summer palace in Versailles yet.

He wasn't exactly jealous, per se, but he did experience a definite sense of... competitiveness looking at it all. Could he create something that would surpass all of this? Without making it so damn awful gaudy? He decided to look into it when he got home.

His chamberlain was waiting at the door for him when he arrived, looking both tired and extremely nervous. The man was French, and for a servant very competent, and the Dark Lord was seriously considering asking the Queen if he could keep him but then decided that would be tacky.

"My Lord," he greeted respectfully, with barely a hint of an accent. "Thank goodness you're here. I sent servants looking for you hours ago!"

Voldemort lifted his brow. The servant opened the door to let him into his suite, and went through the expected routine of turning on the lights. Normally, he would help the Dark Lord disrobe into something more comfortable and offer a bath, but it seemed something else had to be addressed first.

"Some of your men stationed at Stroudsburg Gate arrived a while ago with some urgent news. When you could not immediately be found, they left to try and take care of it on their as best they knew how.”

The Dark Lord frowned. If there was one thing that made him nervous, it was soldiers relying on their own judgment to make important decisions.

“What is it then? Have the German’s made a move?”

The chamberlain frowned, his expression pinched with genuine worry. “They do not know. I am not sure how to say this, but... Young Master Potter... he is... he is missing.”

Voldemort stiffened, his good mood vanishing.

“What do you mean by missing? What are the details?”

“I am not entirely certain, my Lord. They would not tell me everything, but from what I gathered Master Potter was visiting the Volges-Wulf colony as per his schedule, when he had some sort of fainting spell. One of the soldiers went to get a healer for him, and when they got back, Master Harry, the entire Beast Brigade, and almost the entire colony had simply... disappeared.”

The Dark Lord said nothing for a long moment, neither moving nor changing expression, and the chamberlain strained to detect any sort of emotion over the news that his protégé was gone and might possibly be dead. Finally, the Dark Lord turned away and headed for his desk.

“Please lay out my traveling clothes and then notify all relevant parties that I will be indisposed for a while, but they should expect me at any moment. Also, extend my apologies to her Majesty for my hasty departure. Given the circumstances, I am certain she will understand.”

~Author’s Notes~

The Lorraine's Gate and the Stroudsburg Gate are the names of the English forts in France near the German border.

Fortifyers are professional witches and wizards who install security and structural reinforcement to magical homes to protect them from thieves or those who wish the occupants harm.

Book V

Chapter 24: Destiny Unfolding

The forest was bare and colorless; nothing more than black skeletal limbs, clean white earth, and a grey sky that hung low and spread out into eternity. It should have been dreary and lonely, but beyond his five senses he could feel life in abundance. Or at least, what passed for life in this place. Perhaps Harry could not see them because he, himself, was not alive. He was very aware that he left no prints in the snow as he walked.

He stopped, and turned around, looking back in the direction he had come. None of it looked familiar. Had he really come from that direction? Where had he come from? How long had he been walking and where had he intended to go?

Turning in a circle, nothing seemed familiar. Another circle and he couldn't remember which way he had originally been pointing. There was nothing distinctive, the trees were all unique and yet uniform in their style of twisting limbs. Above him the sun was lost, dissolved into a diluted silver glow.

"Hello?" he called out, but despite the emptiness, his voice sounded muffled and barely discernable even to himself. "Hello?!"

He stopped to listen, but there was nothing be heard. Not an echo, not the wind, and certainly not a reply. What now?

There was really only two options available to him. He could stay where he was and wait for someone to find him or he could start walking and hope he found a way out of... whatever this place was. Passivity having never been one of his defining characteristics, he picked a direction at random and started walking.

~ Page Break~

Simon bolted upright in his bed, startled from deep sleep by the booming crack of the gun. The second shot had him leaping out of his bed, scrambling for the hunting knife on his dresser. The floor was icy cold against his bare feet, and a faint blue glow from the window told him without a conscious thought that it was at least half an hour until sunrise. He stumbled over his things in the dark, the sounds of shouting and breaking glass from downstairs muffling his own clumsiness.

He regained his footing and seized the blade, pulling it free of its protective sheath. It was brand new and wicked sharp. His father had given it to him on this trip to teach him how to field dress pheasants, wild ducks, and rabbit and he knew just how to hold it without hurting himself. His father said ten years wasn't old enough to handle a rifle yet, but oh, did he wish he had one now.

There was someone... or something in their cabin. Something two shots hadn't managed to kill or scare off. Opening his door and creeping into the hall, he realized the shouting had stopped but there was still movement down below. Heavy footsteps and the opening and closing of doors and cabinets, as if it were looking for something. Dread threatened to steal the strength his adrenaline rush had given him, as his mind flitted through memories of all the scary books and movies where bad things happened to people who went out into the empty woods. Families haunted by murderous ghosts, hunters killed by demon possessed animals, vacationers hunted by mad hermits.

But this wasn't images on a screen or words on a page. This was real and it was inside. It had his parents.

He could still run away. He was on the second floor, but his bedroom window opened to the roof which slanted down until it was only six or seven feet off the ground. He had snuck out that way before, but he couldn't go yet, not until he knew if his parents were okay or not.

He inched towards the end of the hall, silently as he could, aware that the floor creaked in certain places and he couldn't remember where, and it didn't seem to know he was there and he intended to keep it that way. As he drew closer to the stairs, he started to hear voices, but he couldn't understand what was said. It wasn't French whatever it was.

"There isn't enough to feed everyone." The voice was deep and something about its accent made Simon think he might be Scottish. A Scottish killer hermit? In Volges? He didn't know and his English was really bad.

"This gun is for hunting. They probably have an ice box in the cellar for preserving meat. Tell one of the Frenchies to ask them," said another, this one English and somewhat nasally.

"Why don't you just go down and look, you lazy ass?"

"Because I'm the one with the gun now. I'm on guard duty, not recon. That's your job, idiot."

"The thing's empty!"

"How would you know? You were a wizard. You probably never touched a gun in your life!"

"I'm muggleborn. I know a thing or two about guns."

"Both of you just shut up."

The third voice caused Simon to falter mid-step, freezing his breath in his lungs. It was a voice like no other he had ever heard. It echoed on itself, simultaneously clear and young and deep and guttural. It was unnatural.

"Take these two into the cellar, check to see if there's a freezer while you're there. You check the upstairs. It'll be tight, but there might be enough room for all of us... if only for a few hours."

"Yes, Master," the other two agreed.

Then there were footsteps heading towards the stairs, and before Simon even had a chance to back away from the edge, a man he had never seen before appeared below him. He was a very strange looking man, tall and muscular in some odd sort of black uniform and a roughly cut beard. He stopped at the base of the stairs, his blue eyes widening, as surprised to see Simon as the ten year old was to see him. He tilted his head curiously in a rather animalistic gesture.

"Well, what do we have here?"

Simon turned and flew to his door, slamming it shut and twisting the lock on the knob. He made it to the window just as the man reached his door, rattling the knob that would no longer turn. Sticking his knife between his teeth, he struggled to unlock and pry open the window, crying in fear and frustration as it jammed part of the way up. The rattling of the knob turned to heavy blows against the door, threatening to tear it from its hinges. He leaned over and squeezed his head through the space he had made and pushed his body through, tearing his sleep clothes as he went, until he was through. Behind him he heard the door finally yield to the intruder, smashing open.

From somewhere inside he heard his mother scream his name.

If the floor inside the house had seemed cold before, out on the roof it was mind-numbingly cold. It drained the warmth and feeling from his bare hands and feet, but he barely noticed in his adrenaline haze. He crawled awkwardly but quickly to the edge of the roof, while his pursuer struggled with the window and was still struggling with it when Simon slipped off the edge and tumbled the few feet to the ground. The ground was frost covered beneath him, but he paid it no mind as he ran for the gravel road.

And then a man stepped out from the trees in front of it. Simon stopped. Another person appeared, a woman this time. Then another man and another. He turned to flee in another direction but there were people there too. Then more people. They came from amongst the trees, dressed in black or grey, like ghostly apparitions, barely visible in the predawn light. No matter what direction he looked there were more there, and the harder he looked for an escape the closer they managed to draw towards him. He pulled his knife from between his teeth and held it out in front of him. It had seemed so large and impressive yesterday, but now it felt tiny and useless in his trembling hand.

"Stay back!" he shouted, voice cracking and shaking as badly as the rest of him.

"What have we here? A little rabbit?"

The others stopped moving in, and impossibly, Simon felt more afraid of that strange voice than all these strangers gathering around him. Turning, slowly, he found its source and he could not have been more surprised. It was a boy, not old enough to be out of school, small and pale and with glasses of all things.

Simon thought he should laugh, but even as ridiculous as it all seemed, he was still terrified of him. Perhaps it was the way the others turned to him for guidance, or the sword his hand rested on, or his strange eyes; one vividly green and the other a milky blue. Most likely, it was because he was looking at his hunting knife and grinning like the Devil.

"No, not a rabbit," the strange boy continued, "Rabbit don't have fangs. A fox then. You know, I had son about your age..."

The only words Simon understood were 'no, not a rabbit' and 'fox' and 'fangs', which sounded simultaneously nonsensical and ominous; quite in keeping with the speaker. When the strange boy stepped forward, hand held out, Simon slashed at him jerkily, but the move failed. Fast, much too fast, his wrist was caught and twisted, and a flare of pain forced him to drop the knife. Another twist and his arm was folded behind his back, and a hand was wrapped around his throat.

Simon shrieked and struggled, but a harsh shake made him realize how futile and painful that was. He stood there, terrified, expecting at any moment for the hands to tighten and his life to end for reasons he couldn't even begin to guess at. But the hands did not tighten. Instead, after a moment, his captor tossed him negligently to a man in grey, who held him by his upper arm, but otherwise kept his attention on the leader.

~ Page Break~

"Take him to the cellar with the muggles. The rest of you find someplace inside to sleep. We'll be leaving again come nightfall," Fenrir ordered, and those gathered seemed to sigh in relief. Their flight from the colony had been a sudden decision and none of them had been properly rested for an entire night's travel through cold, dark woodland and fields or had thought to bring food for the journey.

He snorted in annoyance, but knew there was nothing for it. Even he was tired, or rather, Harry's body was tired. It really was a frail and ridiculous bag of flesh, for all the conflict it had survived.

"Master Fenrir."

He turned to see Beartooth approach him cautiously, head as low as he could make it without actually stooping. He still towered over him by several inches, which grated on the war god's nerves, but wasn't worth addressing at the moment.

"What is it?"

"There was some meat found in the freezer, but I sent a few of our men to find some deer. What will you do with the muggles?"

Fenrir shrugged. He had originally planned to kill the cabin's occupants in order to secure it for his people, counting the owners as nothing more than a few casualties of war, but the boy made him hesitate. He had killed children in his lifetime, accidentally and always during the full moon, and quickly realized it never sat well with him once he regained his senses. He supposed it had something to do with his own traumatic encounters as a child, which had not only stolen his innocence but also three of his younger siblings. Orphaning wasn't much better. He couldn't let them go with what they had seen, and while he could glean some spells from Harry's mind the boy was not skilled with the spells wizards typically used to deal with muggles who had seen too much. The adult male might die anyway. He hadn't exactly been gentle when he trying to neutralize the threat of the rifle. If he did die, the woman and the child would need someone to look after them. The full moon wasn't that far off...

"I'll think of something."

"And the wizards? Voldemort will not ignore the disappearance of his protégé."

Fenrir snorted at that. If the Dark Lord cared about his 'protégé' so much, he wouldn't have sent him out here in the first place.

"We will leave the women and the children here in France to act as distractions until we are in Germany. After that... he's welcome to follow us."

"What if he hurts the ones you leave behind for helping you?"

Fenrir laughed at this. "They are all French citizens now, even the German ones. If he hurts them he risks ruining his alliance with the Queen. Jane explained it to me. All we have to do is get into Germany. After that, revenge will be our only concern."

Beartooth didn't look convinced, but Fenrir waved him off. He did not need to explain himself to the mortal. What must appear to be a mad suicide mission to the alpha, was in fact going to be a turning point in werewolf society. Too long their place in history had been remanded to the killing of random wizards or mass slaughter by wizards. Now, for the first time, they were going to unite as an army, as a people, to protect not only their lives but their newly founded sovereignty. They were a nation, scattered perhaps, but bound in a common lineage rather than a common land, and this battle would set the precedent that united they could overcome their enemies, even if they were wizards. Many would not survive, but they would not fail.

Rhiannon's daughter had foreseen it.

~ Page Break~

Land passed below Bobby like a dream, verdant green even in what should have been winter and interwoven with lakes and rivers, and the only sight of civilization the odd stone bridge and ancient castle fortress that looked as ancient as the land itself. Mists hung heavy here and moved around like a living thing, hunting for the unwary to devour. Even Bobby had to be careful of it, as the sky was no safer than the land, and he could just as easily disappear into that blinding vapor.

The faerie realms were dangerous places; particularly those that brushed just a little too close to the spirit realms (or vice versa). It was easy to get lost in such places, easy to wander a little too far afield into the mists and find you had died without even realizing it. If Bobby didn't have Raecellos as his patron he would be considerably more concerned about this than he was, but the gift of an infallible sense of direction had not failed him yet.

For now all he had to watch out for were fae, and ravens were common enough even here that he doubted anyone would give him a second glance. His primary concern now was expedience. Greyback was apparently hunting Harry, and he wasn't certain how much of a head start the devil god had.

There was still a chance he could make it before the other. He actually knew where Harry was. Or at least, he had a general idea. They were both touched by Raecellos, so finding each other wasn't a problem as long as one knew what they were doing. Which Bobby did.

He passed over a small pond, unnaturally clear of reeds and water plants, and doubled back. He circled it twice, calculating how far he had traveled in the fairy realm and how far that would translate in the mortal one. He estimated that he was somewhere in North Western France and that if he waited until the next portal to appear he'd probably be in Germany.

Decision made, he dove straight down into the mirror like water, flying fast and hard to what would normally be his death. He slammed into the water without making so much as a ripple, and emerged above a shallow lake, the air icy cold and the sky painted with the first touch of dawn. He flew up higher and higher, letting the momentum of his fall carry him as far as it would go, until he was high enough to get his bearings. From here he could see mountainous forest deep into autumn, small townships and villages scattered here and there, and what he thought was the Saone River winding its way through it all.

This was farther from Paris than he had thought it would be, but it was possible Harry had been sent this way. There was supposed to be a werewolf colony a couple miles north of here. That was as good a place as any to start.

~ Page Break~

Voldemort glared at the Ward-Master, a middle-aged French wizard in charge of installing and maintaining the wards around Volges-Wulfe and looked more comfortable in an office than out in the field, or perhaps just more comfortable out from under the invasive presence of the Dark Lord. This was probably true of all the men and women the queen had given him to aide in his search for Harry. There were just under twenty, and he didn't want to risk anymore knowing what had happened, which wasn't really a problem at the moment since no one knew what had happened.

"Say that again," he ordered the Ward-Master, who swallowed thickly.

"The wards are all intact, and there was no way through them. Portkey, apparation, even floo don't work up here. The entrance ward only came down once yesterday, and that was at the same time your... people... arrive. No one came in. There's no sign of a struggle anywhere. For all intents and purposes, it appears they all just... got up and left."

"And your wards can confirm this?"

The Ward-Master looked down, obviously embarrassed about what he was going to say.

"I...no, I haven't... Um, there are very strict laws about what sort of wards we can use. The colony falls into a sort of grey area. It's not a prison and technically it's private land, so we're not really allowed to monitor when the... residents... come and go. I mean, we have wards set up to keep them inside during the full moon, but that's a public safety issue and they're all aware of it and...uh..."

Voldemort just stared at him. That was one of the stupidest things he had ever heard. Ministry stupid, except even the Ministry had known better than to give werewolves too much freedom of movement. The Ward-Master started to sweat and fidget, as if he could read the wizards dark thoughts. He couldn't, of course. If he could, the man would have pissed himself. Finally, the Dark Lord turned away from him.

"Do not allow anyone to disturb me for the next half hour."

He didn't wait for an affirmation, but stalked towards the main lodge, the last place his protégé had been seen. Inside, the state of the place adhered to the Ward-Master's theory. There were plates of food and un-drunk beer in crude clay mugs, but no signs of struggle. No overturned furniture or curse-marks scarring the wood. The two remaining werewolves, one a part of the Beast Brigade and the other a German refugee, both swore they had been gone for only a few minutes after seeing Harry collapse and when they returned with the volunteer Medi-Witch, the place had been completely empty. They had done a search of the colony, and when they found nothing the lone Cultie had run to the nearest town and fire-called the nearest fort. Bureaucracy had tied things up for hours before word had finally reached him, and while search efforts were already underway the Dark Lord couldn't help but be furious over the delay.

Harry was gone, probably kidnapped, possibly dead and no one knew what was happening. How had anyone even known the boy would be here? Had the werewolves conspired to kidnap him themselves? He couldn't even begin to guess for what purpose. German aurors were the most likely culprits, but something this bold would only serve to draw the French closer to direct conflict with them and they didn't have the strength yet to fight two powerful nations at once. It was still possible, however. Current intelligence stated that Oblitz had taken command and was organizing the Aurors, and he was potentially hateful and reckless enough to attempt to kidnap Harry. Just as likely was a group of rogue aurors acting on their own without thought to the long term consequences. Dead or held hostage, Britian's Prince would soon be missed, and he didn't like to consider what that might mean for the war effort. He didn't like to think of what that might mean to him personally either.

A fatigue fell over him. It had been a long time since he had been concerned about the consequences of his decisions, and had forgotten how they could drain a man, even one such as him. He moved himself to a chair in the darkest corner of the room and sat himself down, pondering different spells he might try to find Harry or even just to determine if the boy were alive or dead.

No one came to bother him. Not even after the thirty minutes of required solitude had passed, and he had formulated a number of spells and rituals to divine the knowledge he sought even in the event of other spells put in place to prevent it. Time and supplies would be needed, neither of which he had in abundance while in France. He couldn't honestly afford to be away from Britain for more than a day at a time, but he couldn't imagine going back right then.

He was about to stand and begin the proper preparations, when one of the side windows sprung open without warning and a raven flew inside. It circled the room once, barely avoiding smacking into a beam and alighted clumsily on a table, apparently half blind after moving from the bright sunlight to the dim lodge. Voldemort's conscious mind went completely blank, struggling between the sudden recognition and the seeming impossibility of it. Luckily, his unconscious mind was ready for the unexpected, and he was casting a spell without thinking.

"Stupify."

The spell flew true, and the raven let out startled squawk before falling over, its black talons clawing at the air. Voldemort snatched the bird up off the table, examining him from head to toe, before realizing he was being stupid. If this was indeed who he thought it was, his physical appearance wasn't going to be what gave him away.

"Rennervate."

Immediately, the raven flailed and pecked and clawed at his hand, attempting to escape. Voldemort flinched as it drew blood, but didn't let go.

"Stop that or I'll kill you."

And suddenly, the raven froze. Slowly, it tilted its head up to look up at him.

"Bobbitimus."

Raven's don't glare. They lack the facial musculature to do so, but the Dark Lord could read the hatred in those beady black eyes easily enough.

"So it is you." This was... stunning. If it were any other time, he might be able to discern some sort of emotion, some sort of nostalgia, but at this moment his only thought was the raven's presence and his protégé's absence was too uncanny to be mere coincidence.

"Where is Harry?"

Bobbitmus' jerked, blinking at him stupidly. "He's not here?" Immediately, the raven realized he had already revealed too much. Before he opened his big beak he could have denied any interest or involvement with the young wizard. The Dark Lord's crimson eyes narrowed.

"Were you looking for him? What business do you have with him? Or rather, what business do the fae?"

Indignant, Bobby stabbed him sharply with his beak.

"Our business is our own. Not yours or the fae. Neither is my master, as you well know, seeing as you killed the one who was."

Voldemort's tightened his hands around him painfully, threatening to crush his fragile bones. He held his breath, held it in, refusing to scream from the encroaching pain that was soon to follow. But the Dark Lord's gripped eased, until he could once again breathe comfortably.

"It is only out of respect for your master that I do not kill you now, but I promise you agony beyond measure if you attempt to withhold Harry from me."

"Well, I'm not hiding him in my back pocket if that's what you're implying!"

"Don't try my patience, Bobbitimus. I ran out of it long ago. Tell me what you know."

The raven considered lying, considered saying nothing, and briefly considered pecking out the bastards eyes (although this was primarily done to make himself feel better about a really lousy situation), but realized rather quickly that of the two of them, the Dark Lord was the best suited to help the missing Gryffindor.

"The War God, Greyback is hunting him. I was sent as messenger to warn him. If he truly is not here and you don't know where he is, then perhaps it is too late."

Voldemort's eyes widened. "Why would Greyback..." a series of awful ideas slipped through his mind, and to his dismay all of them seemed possible with Greyback. In his moment of distraction, Bobby made his move. There was angry curse, and the Dark Lord snarled in pain as the mass of feathers beneath him transfigured into hundreds of razor sharp quills, stabbing savagely into his unprotected hands. Force to open his hand, Bobby tore free and flew as fast as he could through the still open window, leaving behind several of his transfigured feathers in the Dark Lord's hand.

The curse that followed after the raven took out half the eastside of the cabin and several fine old oaks, but Voldemort could hear the raven's wicked laughter ringing through the trees for a long time after.

"Lord Voldemort!" someone cried, and several witches and wizards swarmed to the door of the cabin to see what had happened. He only spared them an irritated glower, before turning to his injured hand. There were easily three dozen ebony quills buried deep into his right hand, and they were not going to come out on their own. He pulled a few of them free with his teeth, and hissed as he discovered in a rather painful way that they were not only sharp but also barbed.

"Just like old times," he muttered to himself, then turned to the frightened little minions hovering at the door. "Fetch me pen and paper, Lt. Potter's luggage, and the finest blade you can find."

The dozen or so men and women just stood there and stared dumbly at him, unable to comprehend exactly how (or why) he had just blown up part of a cabin and injured himself so badly. He flung out his wand, which sent anyone not quick enough to dodge, flying several feet.

"NOW!"

~ Page Break~

"This sucks Mermaid eggs," Ernst grumbled, as he sloughed after his comrades through the ancient sewers. The murky water was only ankle deep, but it was icy cold and hid the uneven floor so that they had to be constantly alert to keep from falling into it. The Schnauzer sized rats weren't exactly pleasant either. Viktor was at the front with the maps, carefully marking their progress through the underground, while Eleonore held up her lighted wand for everyone to see by. He was stuck playing pack mule carrying all their supplies and Engel rounded out their little party and followed behind them to guard their backs.

"Shut up, kid. You're the one who wanted to come along so badly," Engel grumbled. This was perfectly true, but then Ernst hadn't known their mission was going to take so damn long. The ancient tunnels had been interesting and sparked his sense of adventure for about an hour, but by the second he had had enough. They were on their fourth hour now, and he didn't like the idea that they hadn't reached their destination and after they did they would still need to go back.

"We're almost there now," Viktor said tightly. "We're right under the Department of Muggle Affairs, so the Department of Education has to be about a sixty meters to the left of us... there'll be a turn in just a couple of feet."

"I'm with Ernst," Eleonore muttered. "The sooner we all get out of this pit the better. This can't be doing your arm any good."

"It's fine," he snapped, and no one said anything else. It was obvious to everyone that it wasn't fine. It was clearly causing their leader a lot of pain, and the way he was stubbornly refusing to let anyone look at it made several in their group suspect it was infected. The only reason they hadn't pushed him to stay at home was that this might be their last mission together. If the ward hub really was under the Department of Education, then destroying it would cause the wards to come down and the German Aurors would re-take the city and allow Viktor to find a medi-wizard to treat him. Then what?

Eleonor had made it clear she would write about what had happened in Berlin for everyone to hear, maybe even a book, and do what was her journalistic responsibility demanded of her. Ada would take her daughter Christiane somewhere quiet and safe to recover from the loss of her father. The others... it was harder to say. None of them were technically Auror material aside from Viktor, but that didn't mean they wanted to sit on their hands while their country was under attack. Whatever Viktor's plans were, he kept them to himself and they respected that.

Viktor suddenly stopped and looked up from his map.

"Did you hear something just now?"

Immediately, they were all on alert and scanning the darkness for potential threats, which of course was pointless. No one could see anything. They remained motionless and listening for a long moment.

"Must have been a rat," Viktor finally said uncertainly. "Stay on guard just in case. It's possible that there are traps down here."

They didn't need to be told twice.

"Switch to dark vision," he ordered softly, "I can find the spot without the map from here."

Eleonore extinguished her wand, and a few softly whispered spells pervaded until they could all see again. The tunnel was... not exactly clear as day, but easily visible in a spectrum of white, grays, and blacks; nothing more than shapes and shadows. The map was useless to them now, as the spell made it impossible to see anything written or drawn on a flat surface, and Viktor tucked it away into his robes. It freed his hand to carry his wand, and he was thankful for that. His left arm was stiff and useless, unable to unbend at the wrist or even clench his fist, and he had been forced to pocket his wand while carrying the map.

"Did you hear something?"

Everyone froze.

That hadn't been one of them. It came from ahead of them somewhere, the barest echo. Viktor turned and gestured for them to fall back further into the tunnels and they all ducked into another, and waited to see who it was.

"Echoes from the street and nothing more. There is no one down here. No one knows of this place," a female voice said simply.

"You know of it."

"But of course. These tunnels are the safest way to travel, night or day. We have the greatest mobility underground than above during the daytime, and the Ministry is unable to track our movements during the night. We are more familiar with the tunnels than the streets. The tunnels have remained the same for centuries."

"How much further, then?"

"It's just up ahead and to the right. Five minutes at the most."

"Hhhmmm... it seems you may yet redeem yourself, Katarina."

There was no response from the other, but Viktor felt his heart race. He knew that voice! He knew both of them! Their combination brought up a whole range of dark possibilities. He waved the others further back into the tunnel. They had to distance themselves.

He didn't fancy fighting vampires in this place.

The others moved back cautiously, but then the vampiress spoke again and they froze.

"Wait... I smell something... Goethe, Ramone, check it out."

"Yes, Mistress."

"What is it?" Horace asked, staring after the two vampires as they moved into the tunnel.

"There's someone here..."

"You said... never mind. We'll have to take care of this before I can-"

"Incendio!"

"Shit! Negatus incendius!"

Goethe and Ramone both just barely managed to get behind Tom's counterspell before the wall of fire swallowed them. The fire dissipated into scalding cloud of steam, burning and soaking them simultaneously. Katarina snarled like a lioness, and the moment the flames dispersed she flew down the tunnel to meet their attackers. This territory was hers and had been for centuries. She would not yield it to the wizards.

"Katarina, wait!" Horace shouted after her, but she ignored him. "Go and assist your mistress, you useless fools!"

She could sense the others, Goethe, Ramone, Fiore, Nanz, and Lila follow after her, foolishly leaving the wizard unguarded. She thought to counteract his command, but the enemy was already too close. She could hear the loud splashes and thuds of their feet as they scrambled to escape. Slowing just enough to let the others catch up to her she ordered them quietly.

"Split up and get ahead of them. Drive them into the Bone Well if you can, but whatever you do, keep them from reaching topside."

"Concido!"

The tunnel ahead of them collapsed, but Katarina merely smirked and turned down another tunnel with her minions. Gradually, they started to break off in different directions and passages opened up for them in order to find and surround their prey. The thrill of a true hunt filled her. This was so much better than the simple stalking and surprising of helpless witches and wizards caught out on the street or sheltered in the rubble. There was danger and strategy in this. If she made a wrong turn or didn't respond fast enough they could escape or catch her in one of those awful spells.

She kept track of their movements by the echoes of the curses and footsteps, carefully calculating how she might cut them off and in which direction they might next turn. It was obvious to her that they were completely lost now, turning randomly, and cutting off their ability to back track by collapsing tunnels behind them, and only through sheer luck had they avoided being caught in a dead end.

Their luck ran out as they made a turn down a wide tunnel that emptied out into the Bone Well. The Bone Well was a nickname given to the thirty foot wide chamber into which six other tunnels emptied at different levels. The chamber floor had collapsed into another tunnel beneath it centuries ago, creating a two story pit from which the only escape was a two foot drainage pipe that was routinely flooded or blocked or both. Whenever it rained the pit flooded with water and when the water finally receded a new collection of animal and human bones from the nearby catacombs, trash, and was left behind. The water was low at the moment, and dozens of mucky skulls leered up at them as they frantically searched for a way to one of the other tunnels.

"Ah hell, what are we going to do now?!" Ernst shouted.

"A bridge! We need to make a bridge!" Engel snapped, pushing him aside and pointing his wand to the rubble down below. "Pon constructio de os et later et mortarium!"

Beneath them the rubble started to move, rolling around and shaking itself loose from the muck, before pulling itself together into pillars of bone and brick and muddy mortar. Taunting laughter rang out behind him, echoing through the tunnels and into the chamber, almost deafening after the long standing silence.

"Incendio!" Viktor cursed, driving back the shadowy figures he could see coming up behind them. "Dammit, how long?"

"Give me a damn minute! I don't have anything descent to work with!"

"Just hurry!" Ernst demanded, fidgeting frantically as the macabre bridge slowly began to take shape. The pillars were too thin and shaky, but it only needed to stand for a few seconds, long enough for them to cross into another tunnel. The walkway was only starting to form, when out of sheer panic, Ernst rushed it.

"You idiot! It's not ready!" Engel shouted, but it was too late, Ernst was already on the still forming bridge and it swayed under his added weight, threatening to throw him off and into the pit. He struggled to keep his balance then struggled to keep free as bones and brick came together around his feet, still in the process of forming the structure. Ernst screamed in terror and scrambled across, feeling the structure a hair's breadth from collapsing beneath him completely. By some miracle he managed to get to the other side, and still caught up in his terror he continued to run into the tunnel, abandoning his fellows behind him. Viktor called after him.

"Wait! Ernst, wait! Damn it! Go after him! I'll follow behind and destroy the bridge."

"But-"

"GO!"

Engel grabbed Eleonore's arm and dragged her onto the bridge. It swayed beneath them, but nothing like it had with Ernst. They were almost to the other side when they were met by Katarina. She stood at the entrance of the tunnel, smirking down at them, her right hand covered in blood. Viktor shouted for them to defend themselves, but it was already too late. Too quick to see, she moved from one side of the bridge to the other, catching Viktor's arm before he could execute his spell. Engel and Eleanore, still on the bridge, fell soundlessly to either side, the silence of their death a direct contradiction to the intensity of sound that followed as the bridge collapsed, bricks and bones smashing into the walls and the floor and each other.

Viktor stood there, stunned. They were dead. All of them. His people, his mission, gone in an inexplicable moment. How? How had this happened? Why?

"Well if it isn't the naughty little boy. I had hoped that I would see you again, but I never dreamed it would be here, of all places," Katarina crooned, smiling happily. He turned to her. He blinked once then kicked out at her, but she didn't release his arm and with her free hand she caught his leg and tossed him onto his back. Filthy, icy water flowed around him, soaking the back of him from head to toe and when he rolled over to get back on his feet the rest of him was equally drenched. He only managed to make it to his knees, before he was grabbed again and thrown against the tunnel wall, and everything went dark.

~ Page Break~

It took the French minions hours to get everything the Dark Lord required, and if it weren't for the fact that it took almost as long for his own soldiers at Lorraine's Gate and the Stroudsburg Gate to arrive and that he had to wait around for the medi-witch to finish fixing his hand (apparently no one had invented a spell to deal removing so many barbs at once and most of it still have to be done manually) someone would have died, whether they were French or not. By early afternoon, Voldemort was feeling unequivocally frustrated and the rest of the camp thoroughly terrorized, but he finally had what he needed for the location spell.

The usual locating spells had naturally come up empty handed, and this was not surprising. Locating spells were notoriously easy to block or fool, and it took a sort of creativity and arcane knowledge that most people lacked to find or create truly magnificent locating spells. One of them, the Dark Lord had used to find Harry while he was in Germany through the use of dreams. He could not use that one here. If Greyback truly was involved in Harry's disappearance, the spell could easily be destroyed, and its reliance on Harry dreaming was likewise problematic. There was a very high probability that the boy wasn't asleep or was trapped that way by Greyback and out of his reach. He needed a different sort of spell.

He let the others watch as he prepared the spell. Even now he was something of a narcissist, and he knew what he was about to do would have them talking for weeks. They gathered around the partially destroyed lodge, peering in through windows or the blasted out wall, as he blasted furniture out of the way to clear a space for himself.

"Vocabulum sanguis," he hissed, planting his still bloody hand on the floor. There was a delicious burn as the dozens of little wounds in his hand reopened to spill his life blood onto the floor, only for it be caught up by some invisible pen to inscribe a diagram and three hundred and thirty three symbols spiraled out until it was six feet in diameter. He withdrew his hand and the red symbols glowed for a moment before turning black, burning themselves into the wooden floor boards. At the center of the center of the spiral he placed a piece of paper written in Harry's hand, for some sort of barely started homework and at the end of the spiral he set his toothbrush. He stood at a short distance from the edge of the spiral diagram. After that, the incantation was simple.

"Patronus de Harry James Potter, ego invito protego tuus dominus."

The end of his wand glowed white to the point of blinding and he looked away with the rest of them. When it faded to a tolerable level he turned to examine his handy work. Harry's patronus stood stiffly in the center of the spiral, staring at him unhappily. Voldemort took a moment to admire it. He had never had the privilege of seeing it before, and though Severus had described it to him it seemed the potions master failed to convey its true magnificence. The stag was large and strong, his antlers heavily pronged, its gaze fierce and unflinching. Voldemort, who had always thought of deer as prey animals, knew this creature held a warrior's spirit.

There were several gasps from the observers, for even if they didn't know the patronus belong to Harry, it was well known that Voldemort's patronus was a snake and to have summoned someone else's was unheard of.

"Your master is in trouble," the Dark Lord said to it, earning him an interested ear twitch. "A devil god has taken him, and I must rescue him before it is too late. I need you to guide me to him."

His message seemed to agitate the patronus, for it walked itself in a circle within the spiral, but did not leave it. This was the only truly difficult part of the spell, convincing the patronus to leave the spiral. Inside the spiral, the patronus still had the option of staying or returning to its own spirit realm, but once it stepped away it would be bound to the bidding of its summoner until its true master freed it or died. It circled once, twice, a third time and finally stepped out of the spiral.

"Come then," Voldemort commanded, and led it outside, and everyone there quickly moved away to give them room. He addressed his soldiers first. "Mount your brooms and prepare yourselves. This will happen quickly. When we find the werewolves, do not engage until I give the order."

As the Culties all began to mount their brooms, he turned to the patronus.

"Take me to your master."

A handful of Culties barely managed to dodge out of the way as the spirit deer careened through their ranks and into the woods. Those already mounted, shot after it while the rest scurried after them. It was a fast patronus too, the Dark Lord noted mentally, before he too followed. He had no broom and didn't require one, but instead employing a technique he had taught to many a Death Eater during the war years, dissolved his body into a thick smoke and shot into the air to follow.*

It happened as quickly as he had suspected it would. The patronus ran the gamut of trees and hill, ravines and streams, briar and boulder, and still all struggled to keep up from the air. Those who flew too low had to be cautious of the trees and those who flew too high risked losing sight of their guide. Only Voldemort, who's insubstantial body held as little fear of the physical realm as the patronus did, was able to keep up easily, often moving so low and close he brushed against the side of the spirit deer, urging it to ever greater speeds. Less than half an hour later the patronus suddenly stopped before a large cabin in the woods, straightened itself to full height, ears spread wide and alert, and did not move.

Unprepared, Voldemort shot passed it, and ended up circling back, surveying the perimeter of the cabin as he did so. Immediately, he knew this was the place. It was heavy with magic. He reformed himself beside the patronus. It did not acknowledge him, but stared unblinking at the cabin.

"Go. You have done your part," the Dark Lord commanded, and the spirit deer disappeared in plume of mist. General Maxxis and General Thurston dismounted their brooms to stand beside him and receive their orders.

"Do not engage the werewolves unless I give the signal. I will discern the situation myself."

They looked ready to protest his engaging the 'enemy' directly, but he was already moving towards the cabin. He had barely taken half a dozen steps before the front door opened and Harry walked out of the cabin to meet him.

The next half a dozen steps and it became clear that it wasn't Harry who had come out to greet him.

"Greyback, you son of a bitch."

"Why yes I am," the monster laughed in his strange dual voice.

"Release Harry this instant," he snarled, stalking forward. There were several warning snarls from inside the house, and men started filing out from doorway. Voldemort ignored them. They were meaningless.

"I don't think so," Greyback said offhandedly. "I need him for something."

"I really don't care."

The devil god laughed. In an instant, Harry's wand was in his hand, and a spell he should not have known was cast. "Ignis draconis."

A dragon, composed purely of fire, formed from the air and sprang for the dark lord, setting the leaf littered ground ablaze as it went. The Dark Lord apparated out of the monster's path a few meters away from its massive fiery teeth, and then again when the thing spat fire at him. Culties sprang into action, sending offensive spells at it, but they were ineffective against something so strong. Voldemort himself was somewhat astonished at the level of the spell. 'Fire Dragon' was not really a difficult spell, but typically it was only intended to be the size of a large pony not an actual dragon, and for someone to make it that large required a great deal of magic and control. Greyback should not have had either. The monstrosity roared and swung its tail, smashing several trees into smoking cinders and sending a handful of Culties flying without the aid of their brooms.

"Ignis dissolutus!" Voldemort snarled and the dragon exploded into so many embers, floated up, and disappeared. He turned to Greyback who was still leering at him confidently.

"That was fun. I see why wizards might like this sort of thing."

"How?" he demanded, but the devil god merely waved the question away.

"Not something ya need to worry about. I was just showing off. Those German bastards are in for quite the surprise."

"Stupify!"

The spell caused Greyback to stumble backwards, but he threw it off with shiver and a smirk.

"Mine was cooler."

The Dark Lord's crimson eyes narrowed. He was not prepared for this fight. He knew a thousand spells that could kill a man or a god, but none that could kill a god without hurting the body of the one possessed. Stunning spells and simple hexes wouldn't work on the likes of Greyback, and anything stronger risked Harry's body.

"What do you want, Greyback?"

The devil god grinned and spread his arms, as if welcoming him for a hug.

"I want the same sort of things you want; a strong nation, a happy people, and my enemies writhing in agony at my feet. Is that so unreasonable, old friend?"

"I was giving you all of that already! Why betray me now?!"

Greyback narrowed his eyes, and Voldemort felt an uncomfortable anxiety at seeing the devil god's anger and hatred shining through Harry's young face.

"You cannot give pride! We are not your dogs! We will take our revenge on our own terms."

"And you would betray your allies to do so? You would dare to betray me? I will kill all of your kind down to the last man, woman, and child before I will tolerate such arrogance!" he warned, raising his wand towards the house where the werewolves were still trickling out the door. They froze when they saw the Dark Lord pointing his wand at them. It would only take one simple spell and cabin and everyone inside (and likely anyone anywhere even close to it) would be dead.

Greyback glowered at him, but made no move to obey.

"It's funny ya should say that," he said darkly, and from his back pocket he removed the hunting knife he had taken from the muggle boy and raised it to his neck. "I was thinking the same sort of thing."

The Dark Lord hesitated, the devil god grinned.

"You wouldn't..." but they both knew he would.

"Harry is as much mine as he is yours, old friend. He belongs to my Queen and to my people. Killing this body means nothing to me. He will die as Britain's prince and be reborn a godling in Rhiannon's court, my brother and my servant. Do not attempt to test my resolve here. I'm fucking crazy and we both know it."

Black hatred welled up in the Dark Lord, the likes of which he had not felt since the war, when Dumbledore continued to aggravate and harass him and his forces at every turn. He had thought he had outgrown such pettiness, but now he could feel it blooming again like a perennial flower.

"If you harm a hair on his head, I crush the souls of your last living children and feed them their own hearts."

Greyback snarled, lifting Harry's wand to truly attack him, but a new voice interrupted.

"Quit being so stupid, the both of you. Threatening each other won't get you anything but a lot of very dead innocents."

They both turned to a rather singed tree, where Bobby had landed himself, his feathers blending in to the blackened wood. His feathers were looking rather disheveled, having lost several of them in the Dark Lord's hand, but otherwise he looked as arrogant as ever.. Greyback glanced at the Voldemort.

"Did that bird just talk?"

"Unfortunately."

"My Lord, should I...?" General Thruston began, his wand raised and ready to silence or stun or kill the interloper, which honestly was all very tempting to the Dark Lord at the moment, but he wasn't making any progress with his 'negotiations' and Bobby used to be fairly good at such things. He gestured for his men keep their wands lowered. Greyback made the similar gesture to his own people, one of which lowered the rifle he had been aiming.

"Who the hell are you and what do you want?" Greyback growled.

"I am Bobbitimus IV, and I represent an interested third party that consists of everyone who isn't a raving psycho. Now, how can we get back young Harry without him getting killed?"

Greyback thought about that for a moment. It was not Harry that he needed per se, and killing the boy served no purpose, but he did need the collateral to keep Voldemort off his back and the magic Harry had to deal with any magical defenses he came across along the way. He thought on it for a moment, glancing at the Dark Lord to see if he was willing to listen to this 'interested third party'.

"Safe passage to Berlin is all I require. My people will take care of the rest from there."

"If you go to Berlin in that boy's body, he will be killed," the raven pointed out.

That was very true.

"I'll leave him somewhere safe before the fighting starts. I have plenty of other willing followers that I may inhabit for the battle. I just need to be left alone."

At this last part, he looked pointedly at the Dark Lord. That's all he really needed, just to pursue their justice on their own terms and not as cogs in the dictator's machinations. Voldemort shook his head.

"You'll never make it to Berlin. You're hardly being subtle. The Aurors will find you and kill you before you get ten miles across the border. If you had just waited a few weeks, we could have invaded from the Polish side and done this properly."

"We will make it. We'll take the bloody train if we have to."

"Subtle," the Dark Lord muttered.

The raven cocked his head, considering.

"I can take you there. I can even make sure neither the Germans nor his Lordship here can bother you while you travel."

Voldemort glared at him, but it was useless. Greyback was already interested.

"I'm listening."

~ Page Break~

Harry wasn't sure how long he walked. No matter how long or how far, the sky never lightened or darkened and he did not tire. Every so often he would blink and wonder if he had been dreaming. Then he reminded himself that he was probably still dreaming and started walking again.

However long it had been or how far, he wasn't where he had started. His surroundings had ever so slowly begun to change. At first, it was the trees. They started to become larger and more spread out. The change was so subtle and gradual he hadn't been sure there was really any change at all, until the ground started to change too. Before it had been blanketed in thick white snow, but that snow had begun to melt away the farther he went until blades of grass and pale purple crocuses had started to pierce the icy barrier. Harry wondered if he went far enough he would find the place in full spring. How long had he been traveling?

The sky was as silvery grey as ever, but it hung low now, obscuring the tips of the tallest trees. By the time he reached the theoretical spring, he might not be able to see it if the fog continued to descend.

He still had no idea why he was there or where he was going. It was hard to concentrate in this place, hard to tell when he was daydreaming and when he wasn't. It took him a long time to realize the sound of water wasn't merely in his head.

It wasn't particularly loud, but in the endless silence it could not be missed. Harry stopped and listened, then turned in the direction of the sound. It didn't take long to find. It was a creek, wide and shallow with round black and bronze colored stones lining the bottom. They reminded him of his own keystone. Curious, he reached out to pull one of the stones out.

"I wouldn't do that if I were you."

Harry nearly leaped straight into the creek. He just barely managed to stop himself and fell clumsily onto the bank.

"I am sorry. I didn't mean to startle you. It's just better not to touch those stones. Once you do you'll be stuck in the creek until you find a willow to pass under. Funny rules this place has, but there you have it."

Sitting about fifty feet away and partially obscured by a bush was a man Harry had never seen before sitting on an overturned log. He was in his fifties or very spry sixties, with thick brown hair on his head and face, both neatly trimmed and streaked with grey, giving him a distinguished look. He bore the robes and staff of a druid priest.

Harry closed his eyes tightly for a moment and then opened them. The priest was still there. In fact, the priest was the most real thing he had seen, and the dreamy cloud that hung over his thoughts seemed to dissipate at the sight of him.

"I'm not a dream. Don't worry. Come sit with me," he said, gesturing to a spot on the log.

Cautiously, Harry did so, taking a spot just out of reach. From there he could see the man's eyes were green and wrinkled with laugh lines. He seemed amused by his cautiousness.

"You need not be afraid. I would not hurt you, Harry."

"Who are you? How do you know me? Do you know why I'm here? Where is here?"

"Hhmm... to answer your questions in order of their importance; you're here because this is where Greyback thought he could hold you the longest, and you're stuck here because the gods saw fit to punish you for abusing the Du'on nadi. Which, by the way, was very very stupid."

Harry ducked his head in embarrassment. Yes, he was realizing that now too.

"'Here' is a spirit realm. It has various names that would be meaningless to you, but it is the place where a spirit resides when the body is at the edge of death, when it might return to either the mortal realm or deeper into the spirit realms at any moment. Typically. You're a special case. You're here for timeout."

"So I'm not dead?"

"No. Just in trouble."

Well... that was something... different. Honestly, how did he get into these messes?

"Wait a second, you mentioned Greyback. What does he have to do with any of this?"

The priest's expression shifted from mild condescension to sympathy.

"Unfortunately, it is Greyback who is currently in possession of your body. I dare say he's proven almost as troublesome as you. He is leading a battalion of werewolves to Berlin as we speak."

"What?!"

"You know, I'm never going to finish answering your questions if you keep throwing in new ones."

Harry was very close to snapping something, but when he glared at the man he immediately felt like a fool. He had a million questions, and so far this man had answered them, and he had to be some sort of jerk to take his own frustrations out on him.

"You...I... never mind. Please continue."

"Thank you. My name is Carrigan by the way. Seamus Carrigan."

It was like getting hit with a Lighting Jinx and a Stunner at the same time. He felt as if his heart was going to leap out of his chest and yet he could neither think nor move, his head and body filled with a electric buzzing. This was the Dark Lord's mentor? The only person, according to Dumbledore at least, that Voldemort may have ever respected and loved?

"I see my reputation precedes me," Carrigan chuckled.

Harry could only stare.

"I'm flattered and all, but I'm dead. It would never work out."

His ears burned in embarrassment and he ducked his head. Merlin, this was ridiculous.

"As for how I know about you... honestly, it wasn't that difficult. You're hardly inconspicuous," he said. There was something about the vagueness of the response that bothered Harry, but he decided it honestly wasn't that important.

"How did you find me? I've seen... nothing... since I've gotten here."

"Which isn't surprising given how focused you've obviously been. I assure you, you are hardly alone here. If you truly want to get out, you're going to have to be more alert to your surroundings."

"There's a way out of here? You mean, I don't have to wait to be released?" he asked, although he was aware that Carrigan, if that was who this truly was, had once again evaded his question.

"If you wait your body will likely be destroyed before you can reclaim it. You'll be released once you've gone through an ordeal fitting to the severity of your crime. Waiting is a trial in and of itself, but you can't afford to stay here for much longer. Not if you want to stop Greyback."

Harry nodded. He was still confused and had a thousand questions, but he knew enough to know what was truly important. If he didn't stop the war god the werewolves who he was responsible for would be massacred, and that was something he didn't want to ever have to experience again.

"What do I have to do?"

Carrigan turned and pointed at the creek with his staff.

"Water and caves have always been the natural portals between realms. This creek leads to a lake. That lake is your portal to the mortal realm. Once you reach it you will submerge yourself and then emerge in your own body, evicting Greyback in the process."

"He won't try to fight me?"

"He will, but not in the mortal realm. He can't win against you there. He lacks the necessary skills to anchor himself. Instead, he'll try to stop you here in this realm, where he has more power. He will place obstacles in your path. The closer you get to the lake the more dangerous it will become."

Harry grimaced. The idea of fighting Greyback, who was a god for Merlin's sake, was terrifying. He took a deep breath and rallied his courage. It wasn't as if this were the first time he had faced danger head on. It should have been as routine as Wednesday at this point.

"Okay. I should get started then."

He stood and turned to Carrigan.

"Thank you," he said, sincerely, but knew it wasn't enough. He may never have found his way out of there without the other's help. He had an idea. "Would you like me to give Lord Voldemort a message from you?"

Carrigan serious expression broke into a smile. "Tell Tom... no, no don't tell him anything. He won't believe you. Tell Bobby-"

"Bobby? As in Bobbitimus IV? You know that Bobby?"

The priest was all out grinning at this point. "I certainly ought to. He was my familiar. After he died and became a raven, of course. Before that, he was my brother."

"...There is a whole lot I want to say about that, but I'm afraid I don't have that much time to spare. What did you want me to tell Bobby?"

"Tell him to take you to the Numanti Ring when you have the opportunity. You'll find a stone that has no business being there. I have buried something underneath it that I would like my dear Tom to have. Do this for me, and I will consider any debt my assistance has earned to be paid in full."

"The Numanti Ring... okay. I'll remember it. Anything you want me to tell Bobby directly?"

"Tell him to get a girlfriend."

Harry couldn't help but grin, despite the circumstances. He and Bobby really needed to have a little chat about what the raven had been keeping from him. They hadn't parted on the best terms, but if he wanted to keep his word to Carrigan (and he most certainly did) then he would have to track him down eventually. This might be an interesting way to open up a conversation.

"I'll do that. Are you going to come with me?" he asked, although he already knew the answer.

"No, I am afraid not. This is as far as I can go."

There was something ironic in the other man's smile, but Harry didn't have time to question it. He had already wasted enough time as it was. He turned and started walking. If there had been enough time, he knew he would have spent hours, days even... just talking to the man about a thousand different things, but he didn't that time. Not today at least. He turned back for one last question.

"Hey, do you think we'll ever see..."

Carrigan was already gone.

~ Page Break~

It was raining in Warsaw when Lestrangle stepped out of the International Floo Depot, after having spent almost two hours in customs and she couldn't afford to wait it out if she wanted to check in with the British Embassy before the office hours ended. Spells kept her from getting drenched in the down pour, but did nothing to take the wet chill out of the air or from soaking her boots.

Wizardsing Warsaw was an odd little city, seeming to contain a bit of architecture from every country except its own. Tidy little Dutch tenements, Russian orthodox cathedrals, French style cafes, Italian fountains, and British gardens rose up around her and fell away as she made her way to the Embassy. All of it obsessively maintained in a picturesque state, so that while the structures could have been anywhere from a hundred to a thousand years old they looked as if they had been built the year before.

And that probably wasn't far from the truth. The war against Grindewald and the German air raids during World War II had been hard on the city and its people, and it expressed itself in their need to utterly erase any reminder of those dark days.

Lestrangle didn't care. She wasn't there to play tourist. Her primary concern was that the recent events in Berlin and the Polish Minister of Magic's fickle loyalty was going to complicate her own mission. At the moment, entrance into Berlin was impossible, and communication was spotty and unreliable. Even if she did request information, without being able to reveal its purpose she doubted that anyone would bother to help her. Her best hope was to somehow implement herself into one of the Cultie troops for the second wave invasion of Berlin, and begin her search for McGunny amongst the German Ministry records once things were stabilized in the city again. It was risky, but she had run out of leads in Britain and she needed to demonstrate that she had not been idle when the Dark Lord called upon her to give a report of her progress.

Perhaps she might even be of some greater use in the invasion. It had been a long time since her Death Eater days, but she remembered that time clearly as some of the best in her life. She had never felt so powerful or feared as when she had been running missions for the Dark Lord. This could be a renewal of those incredible times. This cheered her a little, but not much. As much opportunity as there was to be had, she couldn't forget that she had been banished on a wild goose chase because of that damn Potter boy.

She didn't think she would be truly happy until she found some way of paying him back.

~Page Break~

Madam Puddifoot's Tea Shop was not normally a place Snape would be caught dead in, but he had few options available for a visit from Ira. He had no intention of bringing her into the castle and inciting an endless wave of shameless rumors, and since Madam Rosmerta in the Three Broomsticks was as shameless as most of the students at the school that option was out, as well. He wouldn't take a lady within a hundred feet of the Hog's Head, so that left Puddifoot's. The Tea Shop was ridiculously feminine, but at least the owner and her employees were discreet.

"It's not that bad," Ira said, trying to hide her amusement and failing miserably. She too, found the décor ridiculous, but unlike her companion she could enjoy the absurd now and again. He glowered at her, which only made her smile widen.

"Any word from Jacobi?" he asked, changing the subject.

"No, and I doubt I will hear from her until my next appointment. I think she likes to give news in person when she can. How are things up at the school?"

"The usual nightmare. The restrictions on the grounds have left everyone a bit stir crazy, which is driving me crazy. I'm going to strangle one of the little dunderheads before Christmas. I know it."

She rather naively thought he was joking and kept smiling. He nearly corrected her presumption, but then thought she look rather pretty when she smiled like that and decided to let it go.

"Which reminds me, how is Harry? Not getting into too much trouble, I hope."

He sighed.

"No, he's been unleashed in France for the time being. I expect we'll hear word of burning villages any day now."

"France? What's he doing in France?"

"I honestly have no idea. Some diplomatic mission. He'll be back soon. Not that it will make a difference. He's going to fail his classes if he keeps taking all these excursions, and coming back acting like a zombie. He's going to need tutors-"

Snape flinched and dropped his tea, and the porcelain cup shattered on the floor. He grit his teeth and reached for his arm that was now throbbing painfully. Ira jumped from her seat.

"Severus?! What's wrong?"

He shook his head. "It's nothing. Just...a summons. I have to go."

He watched Ira's eyes widen as she realized what he was saying. They had never spoken of it, but he knew she knew that he had been a Death Eater during the war and wore the mark on his arm like all the others. He would have been happy to never speak of it, but the unwelcome reminder wasn't something either of them could ignore. One day, one day very soon, he was going to have to explain exactly what that mark meant for both his past and their possible future, but that day wasn't today.

He kissed her hand, which made her smile but did nothing to wipe the strained worry from her eyes as he walked out of the tea shop, leaving a few sickles on the counter as he went. He would worry about it later. The horse he had taken into Hogsmeade was ready and waiting for him outside, and he rode it full speed through the village and up the road to the school. McGonagall was waiting for him at the portcullis, her expression tight.

"It's Harry," she said once he had dismounted and left the horse to find its own way back to its stable. Snape's first thought was, no duh.

"Are burning villages involved?" he asked sarcastically, startling the older woman. Her eyes suddenly narrowed.

"Not to my knowledge. The Dark Lord is waiting for you in his office."

He shivered. This was the first time in nearly ten years since he had been called by the dark wizard in such a manner, but he could recall very vividly what the man had done to those who had arrived late. He wondered what sort of idiotic mess Harry had gotten himself into that would incite Voldemort to that extent, and how he was going to thank the walking disaster once it was all sorted out.

The Dark Lord was in his office, but fortunately wasn't waiting for him. He was talking animatedly with several Culties and Sentinels of rank, Lucius among them. None of them looked happy, and it didn't take long for Severus to figure out why.

"My lord, I'm not sure how we can do this," Lucius said, struggling to remain calm. "We were told we had another week. Our people are still scattered all over the country. They haven't been assigned official commanders, and we haven't finalized our plans of attack so I couldn't even debrief them even if they were. Not to mention we've only gathered about half the supplies we need-"

"I don't want to hear excuses, General," the Dark Lord snarled, stalking away from the man so that he could stand behind his desk. "I taught you everything I knew about warfare, including how to organize a battle on short notice. Do not tell me you've gone senile since then."

"No, my Lord," Lucius said tightly, and Snape suspected he was biting the inside of his cheek. The potions master hoped his friend remembered his lessons from the war quickly, particularly the one about swallowing his pride in the face of the Dark Lord's verbal abuse.

"Good. Now get out. All of you. Finalize your plans. I will meet you in Bristol in two hours to help you," he sneered and sat down in his chair, gathering up parchment and a quill. Snape's eyes were immediately drawn to the blood soaked bandages around the dark wizard's hand. Lucius and his men saluted respectfully and left, completely ignored by the man who was now focused on new task. The Malfoy patriarch gave him a completely unnecessary warning with his eyes as he went, and Snape nodded in acknowledgment. When they were gone, he was left alone with the Dark Lord.

Patience was one of Snape's natural virtues (one of the very few he actually possessed), so standing in the office without fidgeting or trying to draw Voldemort's attention was not so difficult. Even after twenty minutes of doing nothing but watching the other man write a letter and giving no indication that he even realized Snape was there.

"Harry's leading a small army of werewolves to Berlin," the Dark Lord said at last, not looking up from his paperwork. Snape knew he should be surprised, and to some extent he was, but not enough that he couldn't hide it.

"Ah," he said, "Is he under a spell or some other form of coercion?"

The Dark Lord finally looked up, and despite his obvious aggravation he seemed pleased with Snape's question.

"He's being possessed by Greyback. It is how he is able to command them even against Blackbone's instructions."

Snape wasn't entirely sure how Harry could have been possessed by the dead alpha, and thought now was not the time to ask. He had set a good precedent for this meeting by asking only what needed to be known, and thought he might yet walk away in better favor with the dark lord than when he had entered.

"What do you need me to do?" That was usually the safest question, even if the answer wasn't always pleasant.

"Right now I cannot simply stop him. Greyback has threatened to kill Harry if I try, and he has moved himself and his people beyond my reach."

Snape had a hard time believing that was possible. Where could anyone go and be safe from this man?

"I will have to intercept him in Berlin, but in doing so I must engage the Germans in a battle I was holding off for another week. If I am fortunate, I will be able to remove him from the battlefield before the fighting starts, but if I am not, I will need to keep him safe until the fighting is over. That is what I need you for. You will be his protector and his keeper until I am able to deal with him myself."

Snape flinched at the very notion of going into a full out battle. He had done his fair share of fighting since the war (not a little of it because of Harry), but a full out battle between wizards and werewolves was not something he ever wanted to be a part of. It wasn't as if he had enjoyed that sort of fighting. It was all chaos and luck and who was the most ruthless. He still had nightmares about it sometimes.

His only consolation, and it was a very small one, was that the full moon wasn't for another week and it seemed the battle would start well before then. Fighting both German Aurors and fully transformed werewolves was the stuff of nightmares.

"As you wish," he said, because there was no backing out of it. "I do not know that I am the best choice, however. I am not as young as I used to be."

The Dark Lord smirked and turned back to his papers.

"That is exactly why I need you. Someone with your experience will not panic and over react to every little thing that happens. Besides, potions are more effective at subduing werewolves than spells. I suggest packing a broad selection. You have an hour."

Knowing he had been dismissed, he bowed respectfully and walked out of the office. Once outside he set a tapestry on fire for the hell of it, and stalked down into the dungeons. He had an hour to pack his things, find a substitute for his classes and his headmaster duties, write to Ira to explain why he couldn't make it to her appointment this Saturday (and perhaps that he wouldn't be coming back at all), all because the Dark Lord had a soft spot for the kid who was possibly going to kill him in the future.

That thought stopped him dead in his tracks. Harry might one day kill the Dark Lord, if he was the truly the boy from the prophecy... It was something he had managed to push out of his head for the last few weeks as he concentrated on Ira, but now it couldn't be ignored any longer. He had to decide now where his loyalties lay before he risked his life for all the wrong reasons.

"Dammit," he hissed under his breath and continued further into the dungeons. Once inside his rooms he went straight for his private lab, and opened the refrigerated cupboard, pulling of the age testing potion and setting it on the counter. From another drawer he pulled out a tiny little vial labeled 'HP/Blood Nov. 6, 1999'. He added a drop of blood to the potion, shook it once, and set it aside.

Forcing himself away from the potion, he went to his bedroom to pack what he would need. It wasn't much. Mobility was key on the battlefield, and most of what he needed would be worn on his persons. His old battle robes were a little tighter around the middle than he remembered, but otherwise fit like a glove. They were not the same as the ones he wore to dueling club classes or competition, half the spells he had on this gear would have his exiled from the sport for life if he did. The duffle bag he carried across his back was weightless and served as an extra layer of protection. Inside he could fit those bare necessities he would need. Potions for injuries, non-perishable food for energy, a spare set of clothing in case his own was ruined irreparably, and a book for those unbearably long hours of boredom before and after the fighting.

By the time he was done packing, he knew the age testing potion would have his results, but he chose to write his letter to Ira first otherwise he might not be able to do it. He kept it brief and vague, stating only that Harry had run into some trouble and he was going to pick him up before things got serious, and he would hopefully be back within a few days. He couldn't bring himself to get any more detailed than that. He didn't want to worry her, not when she was already so nervous about the test results.

He checked the clock and cursed. He had ten minutes to inform McGonagall that she was in charge until he got back and to send his letter. There was no putting off checking the potion any longer.

On the counter, he could see the potion had already turned a dark purple and as he approached little golden number could be seen floating inside it. He picked up the vile and held it close to face to read.

07311982

He closed his eyes. His suspicions had been confirmed.

He opened his eyes and shoved the vial in the drawer, slamming it shut. What now? He couldn't delude himself into believing it was all a fluke. Neville Longbottom had been murdered for nothing, and the true assassin was perhaps the Dark Lord's favorite. He didn't believe in God, not in the traditional sense, but he hated Him at the moment. Hated the twisted little world He had created and the intolerable cruelty of the fates it wove. He hated Harry and the Dark Lord both for dragging him into it.

The only question now was who did he hate more? Voldemort with his blatant cruelty and undeniable greatness or Harry with his selfish nobility and endless potential? Either of them could destroy the world and rebuild it anew.

But only the Dark Lord was a guaranteed winner.

...Or else the dark lord shall reign for a thousand years...

That had been part of the prophecy as spoken by the ever questionable Sybille Trelawny, a hack fortune teller from a long line of true seers. He knew. He had been there when she had related it to Dumbledore, and likewise related it to the Dark Lord. But there had been no future foretold if the Dark Lord were defeated. There were no promises of a steady rule or even that the 'hero' would survive long after. Fate apparently didn't think it was important to mention.

But Snape needed to know. He needed to know what would happen if he sided with Harry and the boy eventually defeated the Dark Lord. Would he rise to take the dark wizard's place? Or would he leave wizarding Britain without a leader, vulnerable to her enemies and civil war? Harry was not immortal like Voldemort. Even if he did take the role of leader, how long could he survive in a government founded by the man he had destroyed? He would have to tear it all to pieces and build it anew, and that was civil war all over again. Lucius would be the greatest threat, and behind him Draco and Narcissa would always stand, with Hermione caught in the middle.

The only sure thing was Voldemort, and though he felt squeamish and uneasy about the Dark Lord ruling for a thousand years, he couldn't imagine the chaos and fighting that would follow his absence would be any better. The fight now... he could see an end to it. Not soon, but eventually. Fighting for fighting sake was not the Dark Lord's intention. He had a vision, a glorious vision that sometimes left even Snape in awe.

Harry just wanted to save everyone.

As horrible a person that it made him, Snape knew that wasn't enough.

He checked the clock again. Three minutes. He was out of time. He went to the secret cupboard, the one hidden behind a secret wall, where he kept his collection of poisons. There was no need to think which one he should take. Merciful Sleep was obvious. It was his own special brew; tasteless, colorless and like its name suggested a painless and quiet death in a bottle. It could be applied orally or topically, slipped into food or drink or bathwater with the same affect. There was no way to test for it. No one but him even knew of its existence.

He had never used it on a person before. He had never imagined that Harry would be the first to test it.

Shoving the inconspicuous blue bottle into his duffle bag, he hurried out the door before he could think on it any further. He knew what he needed to do now. There was no point analyzing it endlessly, clouding the waters with uncertainty that he did not yet possess. If he were lucky the boy would be dead before he ever reached him.

Che. Like he hadn't thought that before.

McGonagall was still waiting for him at the portcullis, convenient since he didn't have the time to track her down or write her a letter. She looked just as tense as she had when he first arrived, and he supposed she knew no more now than she did then. He spared a quick glance around them, but the Dark Lord was not there and the Sentinels had to be elsewhere guarding their flock of students.

"What's happening?" she asked, immediately.

"I have to go get Harry in..." he wanted to say France, but McGonagall wasn't Ira. He was less worried about frightening her than losing her trust when she found out he had lied to her. Despite the Dark Lord's favor, he didn't have many allies within in Hogwarts, and she would have been his most important one in any case. "...Berlin. I don't know how long I will be gone. I will need you to look after the school in my absence. The wards already recognize you as Deputy Headmistress so there shouldn't be any problems."

She took a deep breath.

"Berlin? How did he get... is he alright?"

Snape shook his head. "I don't know. I can't tell you much. Please don't mention this to anyone else. Not the other teachers and most certainly not my goddaughter."

She nodded, worry lines dominating her expression.

"Don't worry. I'll hold things down here. You just concentrate on getting Harry out of there," she said. He felt uncomfortable as her voice hitched a little as she spoke, and her expression continued to tighten with repressed emotion. "It's really bad this time, isn't it? Worse than the first time they took him?"

Technically, no one had taken Harry. Not in the traditional sense, but he nodded anyway.

"You'll find him, won't you?" she asked. He nodded. He didn't doubt for a moment that he would find him. In what state was another matter altogether. "You promise?"

He hesitated. It wasn't a promise to find him that she was asking for. She wanted him to protect Harry as well.

"I can't," he said. "You know I can't promise that in complete honesty."

She closed her eyes, her expression laced with pain. "Please...for Lily's sake if no one else's."

She couldn't have hurt him more with those few words than if she had stabbed him in the heart. Lily, long dead and gone and never his to begin with. He had managed to not think about her as more than one of a thousand regrets for a long time now, a moment of nostalgia in his better moments. Now he was going off to kill her son, and he might as well be killing her all over again. He jerked away from McGonagall, hating her in that moment as much as Harry and Voldemort for smashing his certainty without even trying.

"Do not make a liar out of me, Minerva. I have enough sins to my name as it is," he said coldly.

What was a few more?

He was spared her reply, her possible begging, by the arrival of the Dark Lord who swept between them from out of nowhere. He spared neither of them a glance, but headed straight for the horses that were waiting for him at the end of the portcullis. Hurrying to catch up to him, Snape didn't look back. He didn't want to see the hurt in his colleague's face at his callous refusal.

He didn't want to see her disappointment in him.

He hated himself enough at the moment.

~ Page Break~

"You better not be playing with me," Fenrir warned, glaring up at the raven as it circled low, but not low enough to snatch out of the air as he wanted to do. Around them the air was warm and clear, and the land stretched out in an endless green sea of rolling hills. Everyone had stripped down to their underclothes, it was too warm otherwise, and a few had even taken off their shoes and were carrying them in makeshift bundles on their backs. There was no road to follow, but the ground was soft and made their traveling easier. Their numbers were fewer now that he had left most of the women and the weak behind, and without the trees steep hills in their way they traveled in a neat little line behind Fenrir. Most of them seemed to be enjoying themselves.

He wasn't so naïve to think this might not all be a trap.

"I could say the same thing," Bobby said, the edge of warning in his voice. "You might be a god, and a nasty one at that, but don't think I couldn't dump you in hell if you double crossed me."

Fenrir smirked. So the little feather duster had a spine? Good. It would give him something to chew on later.

"How much further?" he demanded. The raven circled once more, letting him hear his irritated sigh. The bad part about traveling in such open country was he had few places where he could safely perch while in Greyback's company.

"At this pace? Three days. Like I said the last time you asked. And the time before that. And before that."

The war god glowered up at the raven, contemplating shooting him out of the sky with his wand but decided against it. He had no idea how to get through the faery realms. He doubted anything here could truly hurt him, but he had two hundred other people to look after and a bloody revenge to exact. The unpleasant fact was that his run in with arrogant bird was a turn of good fortune. He now had the means to safely travel to his destination without worrying about either Voldemort or the Germans finding him before he reached it, and the distance they now needed to travel was a small fraction of what they would have had to go before. Jane's promise was starting to come true. It didn't mean he had to be grateful for it though.

"If you double cross me-"

"I'm ignoring you now," Bobby said pointedly and flew off ahead of them.

Fenrir grunted in annoyance, and counted the ways one could eat a raven.

~ Page Break~

Viktor could hear before he could see, and before he could hear he could feel. He felt the too tight pull of ropes on his chest and on his wrists, the weight of his head and the ache in his neck from holding it, and the freezing chill of his still damp clothing. From this alone he knew he was alive and had been captured by the enemy.

When hearing came he learned who that enemy was and what they wanted.

"You know him?" That was the vampire that had been called Katarina, the one who had killed his comrades. His hands twitched involuntarily at the sound of her voice.

"I do... you could say we were school acquaintances." This voice was familiar too, but for the life of him Viktor couldn't understand what it was doing here. He had last seen Horace McGunny the day he had warned him of Voldemort's orders to arrest them during the TriWizard Tournament, and had not thought of him since. Now he was back, playing a dangerous game with dangerous people for reasons he could not even begin to guess at.

"What will you do with him?" the vampiress asked, and moved to stand behind him. He could hear the rustle of fabric as she moved, and he suspected she had changed out of her tunnel wear and into a dress.

"That all depends how useful he proves to be. These maps, for instance, are quite valuable."

"I could have told you anything you found on that map."

"Except what I needed to know. These mark the location of the ward hub. I was wrong assuming it was in the Department of Justice. It's under the Department of Education, as our dear tunnel rat apparently figured out. We were fortunate to have found him when we did. An hour later and the entire system would have been destroyed, and we would have been trapped in the middle of the fighting again."

Viktor's confusion mounted. McGunny wanted to find the ward hub but not destroy it? Why would the vampires bother helping him do that?

A hand touched his shoulder and he couldn't stop from flinching.

"So you're awake," Katarina purred in his ear, and he shifted away from her, pushing up his shoulders instinctively to protect his exposed neck. She chuckled cruelly and moved away. Cautiously, he opened his eyes.

He was in a bedroom, a suite, with lavish furnishing that swung towards the feminine. Two large windows were sealed shut with heavy shutters, leaving a series of candles and strategically placed mirrors to light the room. There was a fire burning in the fireplace, and McGunny was watching him with a cold expression he had never seen on the boy before. Katarina stood by the bedroom door dressed in a dark green chiffon evening dress and eyed him hungrily.

"Hello again, Krum," McGunny greeted, smiling at him humorlessly. "I see you've continued to make a nuisance of yourself after graduating. They must be missing you on the Quidditch Pitch by now."

Viktor just glared at him. Seeing the young man wasn't interested in playing his game, Horace got down to business quickly.

"These are very interesting," he said, gesturing to the maps in his hand, the same ones Viktor had brought down into the tunnels. "Where did you get them?"

"The library," he replied, because he saw no reason not to. It was hardly going to incriminate anyone now.

"Huh. I suppose I should have thought of that."

"Why are you doing this McGunny? What are you even doing here? If-"

"Stupify."

Viktor immediately fell limp and senseless in his chair. Katarina frowned, disappointed.

"You're not going to question him more?" she asked.

"Later. He's not really important right now. I'll interrogate him properly once we're safely in Frankfurt."

She didn't believe him. Something in the boy's eyes as he studied Viktor told her he had something in mind, and it wasn't interrogation. A wave of irritation and jealousy washed over her. It wasn't fair. She had seen him first. She had been the one to catch him. What possible use could Horace have for him?

Whatever it was, he didn't say and merely turned back towards the maps he was holding, ignoring her completely until she left.

~ Page Break~

There were rumors circulating in the school. Well, there were always rumors circulating in the school, but for once some of it was of interest to Ron. Nancy Salibi said she received a letter from her brother, who was a private in the Brass Cult saying that they were moving to invade Germany within the week. Ron wondered if Private Salibi was going to be taken into the woods somewhere and executed for sharing national secrets with a thirteen year old girl within that same week.

There was also a rumor that Professor Snape had been drafted to fight by the Dark Lord himself, which seemed a bit silly to Ron but he couldn't account for his Head of House's abrupt departure the day before and none of the teachers were talking. McGonagall had taken over in his place, and the Slytherin in him cringed at seeing a Gryffindor as the school overlord, even if she was a scary woman in her own right.

Potter still hadn't returned from France, and aside from a few odd suggestions that he might be involved in the fighting (which even the most gullible of them had a hard time swallowing) there wasn't much talk of him. Ron intended to take full advantage of his absence to continue practicing his charm on Hermione. She might act all frustrated and irritated with him in public, but he knew she secretly liked his company. If it weren't for the bloody Chastity spell he was quite certain they would have had more than a few snogging sessions in the broom closet by now. There had to be a way around it. He bet Bill would know.

He was contemplating writing his elder brother a letter about it when Natalie intruded on his corner of the Slytherin common room. She stopped in front of him and sneered and he smiled back nastily.

"Your mum's here."

His smile vanished, replaced by confusion.

"What do you mean my 'mum's here'? In the castle?"

"No, the 'here' that means she's in Istanbul," she said sarcastically. "Yes, in the castle, you dolt. She's in McGonagall's office now. You must be in some sort of trouble. The old crone sent me to get you."

He frowned. He couldn't think of anything he had done that would earn a special trip to the school from his mother, especially since she wasn't his legal guardian anymore despite their keeping in touch. An sense of unease settled in his gut, and he stood and walked out of the common room, ignoring Natalie and her 'you're welcome!'

He had been to McGonagall's office only twice, both times for detentions, which did nothing to endear the place to him. The fact that it was close to Gryffindor Tower and the area was usually teeming with the little jerks didn't help either. He tried to distract himself about the upcoming meeting, which couldn't be anything good, by imagining that he hexed every Gryffindor (and the odd Hufflepuff) he happened to come across. The exception being the few people he recognized from the Hogwart's Herald. He felt it was professional courtesy not to imagine turning your photographer into a gopher, and had nothing to do with liking or god forbid, respecting them.

"Ron?"

He turned around to see Ginny coming up behind him, a confused look on her face.

"You got called too?" she asked.

"...I guess so. Mum tell you what this was all about?"

She shook her head. "I didn't even know she was coming. Do you think something's wrong?"

Yes.

"Dunno. Guess we'll find out."

They walked together to McGonagall's office. Inside, they found Fred, George, and Percy had already arrived and were studying Molly Weasley with worried expressions. Their mother was sickly pale, her eyes red-rimmed. In one hand she clutched a handkerchief and in the other a folded piece of parchment with a broken official Court seal.

McGonagall sat behind her desk, her expression soft with sympathy and making Ron more nervous than he otherwise would have been. She wasn't known for her sentimentality. He jumped when Ginny closed the door behind them, and to cover his own nervous reaction he broke the silence first.

"Mum? What going on?"

She looked up at him, and he wished he hadn't said anything. He wished she wouldn't answer, and force on them what had left her a weeping mess. But wishing was futile. Wishing was for little children who still had mommies and daddies taking care of them to make them come true.

"It's your father..."

~ Author's note~

In the fifth HP movie, the Death Eaters transform themselves into smoky missiles and terrorized muggles and wizards alike. I thought this was a very cool concept, so I'm incorporating it here even though it wasn't described in canon. My theory is it some sort of self-transfiguration

Book V

Chapter 25: Converging Conflicts

By the next morning, Snape was in Warsaw with the Dark Lord and over five hundred Brass Culties and fifty-six Sentinels. Three were placed in his command, two Sentinels and a Cultie with emergency medical training. Neither Sentinel looked happy to be placed in the command of a civilian, but he had established early on that their feelings on the matter were irrelevant. The Pain Curse had helped reinforce the lesson. The cultie was thankfully more obedient if not any smarter.

He had his own subordinates well in hand, but what he hadn't factored on was Lestrage being at the embassy to greet them. Voldemort apparently hadn't been expecting her either.

"What are you doing here, Bella?" he demanded softly, as she approached, escorted by a cultie who had been assigned to watch her. The cultie happily left when the Dark Lord gestured, cringing pathetically as Lestrage glared at his retreating figure before returning to her master.

"What you have assigned me to do. My investigations have led me to believe that the..." she glanced at Snape distrustfully, "target is being kept in Germany. The ministry offices in Berlin should have records."

The Dark Lord frowned, but unfortunately he didn't caste a crucio on her like he had been doing to just about everyone else since yesterday. Snape tried to hide his disappointment.

"I see," Voldemort said, and then seemed to dismiss the matter in favor of ordering his men about. Before he could walk away from her though, she called back his attention.

"My lord, perhaps, since I must wait until Berlin is once again secured, I might be of use to you? An experienced soldier should not be wasted."

Snape glared at her. He suspected if she got her way she would make herself a nuisance to him at every opportunity. "Madam, you don't even know what is going on," he pointed out."

She smirked at him.

"Considering how quickly all of this is going down, I doubt anyone else does either."

Voldemort considered, glancing between the two rivals. He shook his head.

"Fine. You will replace Captain Nocentelli, have him debrief you, then report to the auditorium at 1100 hours."

"As you command, my lord," she said, saluting crisply and retreating, but not before throwing a smug look back at Snape. He pretended to ignore her, knowing that would be the greatest insult of all. He knew he would have to deal with her directly soon, but now was not the time.

Maybe if killing Harry proved unnecessary (in other words, he was already dead by some other means) he could try his poison on her. If he were lucky, the Dark Lord would be so distracted he wouldn't even notice.

~ Page Break~

Hermione hated the dungeons. She didn't tell anyone this, knowing it would offend both her brother and her godfather who called the place home, but she could never quite convince herself she was comfortable there. They were dark and creepy and chilly, and she had nightmares about getting lost in them. She was a Gryffindor though. She could brave the dim and sinister place when necessary.

Although, one could argue about how 'necessary' this particular trip really was. She didn't have potions today, and her brother was in class at the moment. She should have been in the library studying during this, her quiet period, but she had decided to check something out first.

Ronald Weasley hadn't shown up for dinner last night or breakfast that morning or even for Transfiguration. Professor McGonagall had said he wasn't feeling well, but when she went to the infirmary he wasn't there. When she asked Draco, he said he had gone to bed early last night and refused to get up that morning. Natalie piped in and said he had gotten into some sort of trouble and his mother had even been called in to chastise him.

Hermione knew that wasn't the case, but she had no intention of correcting the other girl. She didn't like the idea of Natalie having anything with which to torment Ron, especially not now. Not after what Ginny had cried onto her shoulder the night before.

Looking around briefly to make sure no one was there to see her, she whispered the password to the Slytherin dormitory and slipped inside. It was thankfully empty, everyone else either in classes or busy elsewhere. Cautiously, she made her way towards the boys' dormitory. She had visited her brother enough to know where it was and how to get passed the wards, although she was thankful her godfather was gone otherwise she doubted it would have escaped his notice.

The fire play burned green flames, providing a great deal of warmth but only a little light. The torches were turned low, casting the room in deep shadows and the silhouettes of snakes. She shivered. She didn't know how anyone could sleep in here comfortably.

"Ron? Are you here?"

"Hermione?" came a groggy reply, and she could just make out movement behind one of the bed curtains. "Lumos domesticus."

The torches flared and the fireplace turned from green to a cheery orange, lighting the room to something that looked less like it had been pulled from the dark imagination of Beadle the Bard. Ron sat up in his bed, still dressed in his bed clothes and his hair looking a mad and unkempt as Harry's tended to. He gave her an irritated glare that was somewhat ruined by the enormous yawn that followed.

"What are you doing in here?"

She sat down at the foot of his bed. "I came to see you. Ginny told me what happened."

His eyes, darkly circled and puffy, widened in alarm. She hastened to reassure him.

"Don't worry, no one else knows. I promise. Everyone thinks you got chewed out by your mum. Natalie's doing, no doubt."

He seemed to relax a bit, and let out a deep sigh. He turned his sad brown eyes to her, and shook his head.

"You expect me to talk about it?"

"That's up to you. Whatever you want."

"Careful, luv, I might just take advantage," he joked, but it rang flat. His half-hearted smile died a pitiful death as he looked down at his hands resting in his lap. "My father's dead."

She reached out and placed her hand over his. They clenched into fists, but he didn't pull away. "I know."

"I knew... I knew he was dying, but I... I pretended... like it wasn't worth thinking about. My father died f-for-" his voice hitched and cracked, but he forced it out even as he felt it rip and tear at his throat. "Forgotten."

He continued to talk, stammering and choking on the words and the tears as he told her how the official cause of death was 'pneumonia', but that was just the cheap way of saying he grew too weak to live and no one tried to help. There would be no body to bury. Even dead, the prisoners of Azkaban were denied their dignity, and his remains would be sent to a medi-wizard university where some know nothing student was going to hack him into pieces and then toss him the incinerator like so much refuse.

Half way through and he was sobbing into her shoulder, feeling stupid and sick and grateful, but all he wanted was to feel numb and empty. She promised she would try help his father receive a proper burial and at the very least he would receive a proper ceremony. She didn't know how much of what she said reached him, but eventually the crying stopped and he merely leaned against her quietly and listened.

"I should go now," she said. "I have arithmancy in ten minutes. Will I see you at dinner?"

"Yeah," he said softly, hardly enthused, but it was something. "I just... gotta clean up a bit."

"Teabags are good for puffy eyes," she suggested.

"Any advice for hiding my freckles?" he teased, and it sounded little more genuine than his last attempt although still pretty weak. She smiled anyway and kissed his forehead, blushing as she pulled away.

"I'll talk to you later. Try to eat something, okay?"

"Yeah... thanks."

Her heart was hammering in her chest as she slipped soundlessly into the hallway. Belatedly, she straightened her rumpled clothes, and felt her blush deepen. Honestly! There hadn't been anything even remotely romantic about what had just happened. Aside from the bed and the holding and his sad, dark eyes... He had just lost his father for Merlin's sake! She had only been trying to comfort him, exactly as she had done for Ginny the night before. Nothing more, nothing less.

So thoroughly dedicated to convincing herself of this, she failed to take proper stock of her surroundings. If she had, she might have noticed the shadow that didn't quite fit sticking out from behind the suit of armor that she passed or the feeling of malicious triumph at the back of her neck. So she went on her way, completely unaware that Trudy Sabbath was plotting how to use what she had seen against her.

~ Page Break~

Harry thought perhaps he should have asked Carrigan exactly how far the lake was before he left him, but it was too late now. He had been running along the creek's edge for what could have been hours or even days, and still come across no lake. Eventually, he did hit the spring season though. A wet, muddy spring season that threatened to suck his shoes off his feet every time he took a step. He couldn't help but wonder if it wasn't one of Greyback's traps. He hadn't left any prints in the snow, so why was he sinking in the mud?

The low hanging clouds had descended even further, so that soon he was blind and forced to follow the creek's edge by sound alone and nearly fell into it several times and lost track of it more than once. In the fog, sometimes he heard sounds that were not the creek. Rustling sounds, like leaves being moved, but never a snapping twig or a thud or a splash from a mud puddle. It would have been simple to dismiss it as the wind moving leaves about, but one thing that hadn't changed in this strange place was the absence of wind (and night).

He was being followed. He was certain of that, but whatever it was remained far enough from him that the fog rendered it invisible.

Refusing to let it frighten him, he pressed on, running as fast as he safely could in the poor visibility. His body did not tire here, but he had discovered falling or running into a low hanging branch did hurt.

Gradually, the mud grew deeper and the fog grew denser. The haunting sound of loons echoed eerily and he knew he was getting closer to the lake. But the closer he came, the closer the other sounds became until at last he started to see shadows in the fog, sweeping in close then leaping away before he could get any really impression of their size or shape.

He had stopped several times, startled by the proximity of the potential attackers and their speed, but he always forced himself to continue, reminding himself that it wasn't real. Not really. Nothing more than a trick, a test. Nothing more. He told himself that over and over again, forcing himself to take one slippery step after another without pausing even when the phantoms darted in so close he thought he felt something brush against him.

He didn't stop walking, but he didn't stop flinching either.

~ Page Break~

"Commander! Commander Oblitz?!"

Oblitz paused on his way to tour the defenses on the western end of their camp, glancing inconspicuously at the young man frantically searching the crowd for him. It was not an auror, much too young for that, but he did have an arm band identifying him a volunteer and he was clutching a messenger's bag tightly to his chest. Oblitz calculated the possibility of the enemy sending him a booby-trapped letter, found it was likely but also realized it was even more likely a legitimate and potentially important message from his allies.

"Over here," he called at last, drawing the boy's attention. The messenger quickly scurried over to him. He saluted clumsily and fumbled with his bag. "Slowly," the man ordered, and the other froze. Slowly he looked up.

"Sorry?"

"Move slowly."

The messenger looked dumbly at him for a moment, then turned back to his bag and with a bit more caution, opened his bag and pulled out a letter. Oblitz took it carefully at the very edge of the paper, glancing at the seal which was a pentagram, a generic and anonymous mark. The boy watched him nervously as he cast several spells on the paper, but aside from a few protection spells against moisture and spying it was completely clean.

He opened it. Inside was a short, half page letter with neither a greeting nor a signature. After reading the content, however, he could easily guess its source. He folded the letter and placed it in his pocket, removing a coin. He showed it to the boy but didn't immediately hand it to him.

"Who gave you this letter?"

The boy just shrugged. "The postmaster, sir. All my letter are given to me by the post master."

Oblitz figured as much, and toss the coin to the boy, who smiled his thanks before hurrying off. No doubt he had many other letters to deliver what with the owl post being suspended in Berlin. Owls were too easily intercepted. The chances were high that the postmaster wouldn't even remember where this particular letter had come from or if it hadn't simply 'appeared from nowhere'.

It wasn't important. What was important was that he believed in the contents of the letter. He needed to call all the aurors together and quickly so that they could make their preparations.

They only had a day and half to prepare for the Dark Lord's next attack.

~ Page Break~

"I'm going," Tonks stated, shoving the last of her gear into her traveling case. Dumbledore stood quietly in the doorway; his expression was sad, sympathetic, and pissing her off. Everything was pissing her off lately. The cute little townhouse in Lentz, the quaint little people with their stubborn dispositions, and especially how everyone was treating her like she was made of fine porcelain. She had no intention of cracking. She had things she needed to do. "If there's even a small chance that he's alive, I'm going to find him."

"My dear, even if he is alive and you were to go, you would only risk both your life and his. Voldemort is due to invade within a few days and Oblitz is no friend of the Order. Right now, if Viktor is indeed alive he has successfully managed to hide himself from the Dark Lord's forces. Should you go in search of him you risk exposing both of you to not only our enemies, but also to Oblitz himself who so far has no knowledge of Viktor's association with us."

Tonks closed her eyes and clenched her fists. Merlin, she hated this. All of this. The not knowing, the knowing and not being able to doing anything, the ability to do something and deciding it was against the 'greater good'. It had seemed so clear in the beginning what she would have to sacrifice in order to protect the world. Love, a family of her own, a career, a home... all of it she had willingly thrown away in pursuit of a cause she felt was worth more than herself.

But she hadn't counted on losing her own honor along the way or the loss of those she felt were worth more than the cause itself. Viktor had been the best of them. Oh, Dumbledore was a great wizard and a genius, but Viktor had been a great man... for the brief time he'd had been a man. He had a bright future; a future that could change the world for the better, but he was gone now and all for nothing. Despite what she had told Dumbledore, she did not truly believe he was alive, but he deserved more than what he had been given. If nothing else, she hoped to take his body home to his family.

"What do you want me to do? What do you want?" she hissed through her gritted teeth. "I can't...I won't just forget him."

A firm hand rested on her shoulder, belying the fragility of the wizard's age. Despite her resentment, he was a soothing, steady presence.

"Of course not. That is the last thing I would ever ask of you. But you mustn't remember Viktor as only your friend. He was also your comrade, your fellow idealist. Through his actions and his words he fought to preserve justice and freedom of nations, and he was willing to sacrifice his life to do so. He would not want you torn from that path out of grief or a sense of obligation. He was never that egocentric."

She gave a little half laugh, half sniffle and nodded.

"No, he never did think of himself much. He was always forgetting to eat or sleep or you know, be human."

"Just so. Now come downstairs and have some tea with me. There is still much to be done here in Lentz and I need your help."

She sighed and nodded. He was right. She couldn't just up and leave. With Viktor and Friedrichs gone, they were short on man power and needed her expertise to start organizing a defense here before the war reached their doorstep. Lentz was only the beginning. Once the militia was up and running, they could begin recruiting and organizing additional forces across the nation and into the neighboring countries. Now was a critical time. Germany was likely lost, but there was the chance even it could be saved if allies were roused quickly enough.

It was what Viktor would have wanted.

She had to believe that.

~ Page Break~

Night had fallen in the faery realm and Fenrir had halted travel in favor of a full night's rest. Tomorrow they would arrive in Berlin, and he wanted his people well rested for the battle that was to come. They were still upon the rolling hills, with no cover and no shelter, but he had used magic to create campfires and to warn them if any danger approached.

Above him the stars were a shimmering blanket, so different from the odd speck of light he was used to seeing as a mortal, and around him his people were shifting shadows in the fire light. They were restless, saying very little but all of them thinking of the same thing.

Berlin.

"You're all going to die."

He glanced behind him at the raven, which was perched on a pile of clothes. It wasn't much of a roost, but enough to see over the surrounding tall grass. He turned back to the fire, considered poking at it to encourage it to burn but being a magical fire it would be a meaningless gesture.

"I didn't ask for your opinion."

"It's an observation. Not an opinion."

"Hn."

"Half your people don't even have weapons! It will be a slaughter."

"I have a plan."

"I hope it's better than your last one."

Fenrir ignored the remark.

"All you have to concern yourself with is getting us there, and getting your boy wizard safely out again. I will take care of me and mine."

"...Idiot."

The raven flew off, which was just fine with him. He didn't want the creature's company to begin with. They would be in Berlin the next evening, and then he would prove which of them was truly the fool in this game.

~ Page Break~

Katarina stared down at Viktor, lying in the coffin, arms crossed in a traditional position. Goethe had probably thought it funny. It wasn't often that one not of their kind slept in such a manner, even if the sleep itself was unnatural.

She rather thought it suited him. Even in the artificial guise of one dead, Viktor maintained a regal and dignified bearing. He had a strong chin and his brow was low, giving him a look of perpetual concentration even as the rest of his face was smooth in sleep. Slowly, she reached out to touch his cheek with her bare hand. His skin felt no warmer than her own until she ran an immodest thumb over his lips and felt a burst of warm breath against it.

"It would be such a waste..." she lamented, "if all Horace wanted was to prolong your suffering. You impressed me that night on the tower and again down in the tunnels. So brave. So resourceful. You were meant for things greater than being that child's plaything."

Gently, she brushed a few stray hairs from his forehead, and then pulled away. Her thoughts turned inward. Viktor would not be the only one being wasted under Horace's unique brand of tyranny. With every passing day his arrogant, bullying nature was coming to the fore, provoking Katarina and her coven with his imperious demands of absolute privacy and absolute loyalty. She had stopped herself several times from simply snapping the wizard's scrawny little neck, and now she was starting to wonder if that was a good thing or not.

She had a truce with the Dark Lord, who had entrusted his own kin to her, but with she was beginning to think Britain's ruler didn't care one way or another if the boy lived or died here. He certainly hadn't thought to keep the boy safe or send others to ensure his safety. There had been no communication between them for nearly a week now as far as she knew, though perhaps the wards affected their psychic communication. She wasn't sure. Either way, if something ...unfortunate were to happen to Horace, well... who's to say what happened? They're in the middle of a war zone after all.

She looked back down at Viktor who slept on, oblivious. She smiled softly and leaned in to whisper softly in his ear.

"Do not worry yourself, my darling. I won't let that nasty little boy hurt you. I won't let him hurt either of us."

And then she moved lower, her mouth moving from the shell of his ear to the bare skin of his neck.

~ Page Break~

Fenrir woke them before dawn, had them eat the last of their rations and moved them hard for the rest of the day. The green hills turned to thickets and young woodland, thick with animals, common and faery bred alike, and Bobby was careful to keep them off the game trails. The raven was becoming increasingly nervous, fidgeting and looking back frequently as if contemplating turning them all back around.

He never did though, and just as the sun was starting to hang low they came upon a cave. It was carved out of a hillside, half hidden behind a grove of mulberry bushes, and looked like little more than an large animal den.

"This is the place. It will take you right into the middle of Berlin," the raven said, alighting on a small tree. "Now release Harry."

"Our agreement was for when we were in Berlin, not before. I'm not letting him go until I know this doesn't lead straight to Azkaban or Voldemort's office or hell as you previously threatened."

The raven's feathers puffed out in irritation, but nevertheless he flew straight for the cave, whisking past Fenrir as he did so and disappearing into the dark. The war god turned to the others gathering behind him.

"Anyone with a wand or a weapon follows directly behind me. Anyone without stay towards the back. Don't wander off and don't get distracted. This may be a trap."

Not waiting for their response (they could only reply in the affirmative to his commands anyway), he ducked into the cave. Inside, the cave hung low and its soft clay walls crumbled under the hand he used to guide himself along. He could neither see nor hear his guide, but it didn't matter. There was only direction to follow.

He cast a lighting spell and led the way.

He wasn't sure how long or how far they traveled in the underground. There was no sense of day or night and his own anxiety made his judgment of time questionable. Everything was absolutely silent. It quickly grew cold in the underground, and they stopped only once in order to put on their winter clothes.

What little Fenrir did know was that they were traveling downwards by the gradual yet persistent sloping of the ground, and the deeper they went the larger and stonier the cave became until it became a great cavern, and he had to weave around sparkling white stalactites and stalagmites reaching for each other.

Yet no matter how large or small or winding the cave became there was only ever two directions to travel, forwards and backwards. Backwards was never an option.

The caverns grew smaller, the stalactites and stalagmites disappeared, and their route started to slope upwards again. There was still no sign of their guide. Then, without warning, the rough limestone gave way to smooth brick that shook beneath his touch as the sound of a train passed over head, shaking loose bits of dust to rain down on them. He listened intently after it had passed.

In the distance he could hear a female voice, electronic and monotone, announcing something in German. He grinned. So they had made it after all. He ordered those few with wands to start casting Notice-Me-Not charms (although honestly he didn't know if even muggles could not notice two hundred something people dressed as if they had walked out of medieval battle re-enactment. It wasn't important. He lead them forward, until their one way tunnel split into several different directions and then he followed the one where he could hear the most people. It emptied out into a wide tunnel with several tracks laid across it. Across the tracks was a station house and a large platform, crowded with muggles going up or down escalators and through security gates. A good sign. The aurors would never set a trap in the middle of such a large crowd of muggles.

"Don't step on the rails," he warned the others, knowing they could be electrified. He had past experiences with muggle transportation, when the ministry made the usual travel methods unsafe. "And watch out for trains."

They crossed cautiously to the other side. The platform stood up to his chin and there were no stairs or ladders, so Fenrir used a little of his magic to jump up and startled a pair of old ladies when he landed in front of them. He grinned at them.

"Sorry, ladies."

"Be careful, young man," one said, distractedly, already starting to forget about him. "This isn't a football field."

He nodded and turned back to check on the others. They were working in twos and threes to help each other up and required little assistance, so he monitored the muggles closely to make sure the spells were working well enough. Most of the muggles were suitably distracted by cell phones, video games, books, or private conversation that they barely noticed the new arrivals except to move as the platform became more and more crowded. Even security and the ticket takers were suitably distracted checking on those coming from outside that they didn't seem to notice they were being invaded from within. The few who seemed to notice something odd was happening were those standing alone without anything to pre-occupy them, which were few enough that Fenrir didn't feel particularly concerned.

When the last of his small army were finally gathered on the platform, Bobby finally decided to make his appearance, landing on top of a nearby trashcan.

"I've kept my end of the bargain, now keep yours," he demanded.

"First, tell me how to get to wizarding Berlin."

"No!" the raven snapped impatiently. "First, you release Harry and then I'll tell you."

Fenrir growled low. "Don't push me, you stupid pigeon."

"Don't push me, you rabid dog. We had a deal, and I've kept up my end. It is time you kept up yours. Unless promises only have meaning to wizards these days."

"Fine," he snarled so viciously, that several muggles standing nearby suddenly leapt away from him. He closed his eyes and more softly, he said, "Give me a minute. I have to-"

There was a sudden loud swooshing sound from somewhere on the left side of the platform. He knew that sound well. He spun around, drawing his sword in the same movement. Despite the sudden arrival of dozens of wizards at once, his gaze invariable found the Voldemort's first.

"Hello, Greyback," the Dark Lord greeted coolly. Fenrir flung his sword out, not at the wizard but at Bobby who just barely managed to dive to safety and landed clumsily on the edge of the platform.

"You tricked me!"

Now muggles were really starting to take notice, including security, but the Sentinels tossed out several spells to distract and confuse them again.

"No, he didn't," Voldemort said evenly. "There are only three entrance points from the faery realms directly into Berlin, and one of them is within the warded area. I had my spies plant a portkey at both available locations and waited for your unique brand of magic to activate them. Now then, if we were able to detect you here from Warsaw, I guarantee the German Aurors have as well. So if you wouldn't mind releasing Harry quickly-"

Another familiar wizarding sound suddenly filled the station house. A distinct popping noise.

"Ah shit," Bobby muttered. "It's too late."

There were shouts from the other side of the platform as several muggles were rudely jostled by men who had not been there only seconds before. Men, who it seemed, kept coming. The wizards who arrived stared horrified at the mass of people around them, whether because of the security risk they presented or the sheer potential for casualties or both was hard to tell.

"Hey! Where are your train passes?" a security officer shouted, even as more aurors continue to pop in from out of nothing.

"Watch it!"

"Move! You're blocking the elevator!"

Fenrir rolled his eyes. The Dark Lord just looked embarrassed for them, and contemplated slaughtering muggles just to get them into proper form. Fenrir, however, took the initiative. He turned to Lloyd who was carrying one of the two rifles they had and made a gesture towards him. Lloyd unslung his rifle, aimed, and fired. The fluorescent lights above the arriving aurors exploded, raining down sparks and shards of glass. The muggles were faster to react than the aurors, letting out terrified screams and rushing for the exits.

The second shot hit an actual Auror, splattering those closest to him in blood and brain matter. After that, the muggles were nothing more than obstacles for the aiming of their own spells. Lloyd took the first hit, screaming and smoking as he was thrown from the platform. The second strike, Fenrir blocked with his sword, grinning like a lunatic. Behind him, Voldemort threw up a massive shield, buying his own men time to prepare their spells and protecting the werewolves as well. Several muggles were either thrown or smashed into the invisible wall, knocking them down and further terrifying those who hadn't yet escaped. Spells flashed and skidded off the shield, taking out several of the overhanging lights and darkening the platform. Muggle security had drawn their fire arms and shouted commands to lay down their weapons, but they had no definitive target and hadn't yet fired for fear of hitting the civilians.

"Release Harry this instant," Voldemort commanded, his tone cutting through the cacophony of voices warring in the echoing tunnels of the underground. Fenrir grinned back at him. He made a terrible sight, a child dressed all in black, blade in hand, sanity in question, and a promise of something worse.

"I've got a better idea."

Voldemort raised his wand to cast a binding spell and prevent whatever the mad creature had in mind, but his shield failed under the Auror's onslaught and he had to quickly adjust his aim to block the flurry of spells directed at him. His retaliating spell set the entire ceiling ablaze, exploding the remaining lights and electric cables as it blanketed outwards towards the Aurors before descending in blazing spears. The screaming now was from pain rather than panic, from those not quick enough to bring up their shields or apparate to safety.

It was a good attack, but it did nothing to move the fight in his favor. Out of the corner of his eye he saw three Culties fall to a curse, sinking into the liquefied floor until only their hands were visible and floor re-hardened, killing them instantly... hopefully. The Aurors were still arriving, and ready for the fight. One even apparated right in the middle of Voldemort's men and managed to take out four more culties before Snape caught him from behind and slit his throat.

"My lord," Snape hissed in his ear, drawing his attention even as he tossed out a countercurse and a shield without speaking. "Potter's doing something to the others!"

The Dark Lord turned his attention, as much of it as he dared, back to Fenrir. The war god had stupidly turned his back to the enemy, the sword of Gryffindor flitting this way and that without looking to block and destroy the curses being flung at him. His other hand was held high in the air and over the other werewolves who had collapsed to the ground and were now writhing in agony as he chanted something that was lost in roar of battle. It took Voldemort a moment to realize what the war god was doing, and when he did he was momentarily stunned. Only Snape's presence beside him, kept him from losing an ear as a cutting curse drew a little too close.

They both fell to the floor, cutting the exposed skin of their hands faces on the glass covered floor. It was irrelevant. He was back on his feet, his strongest shielding spell thrown up to protect him so that he could continue to watch the dark miracle unfolding before him. Snape tried to get up as well, but Voldemort pushed him back down into the protection of his shield, forcing him to his knees. The potions master was confused for a moment, until he too saw what was transpiring before him.

Fenrir's army was getting back up.

Getting back up on four legs. On four long, hairy legs with two and half inch claws and a matching set of fangs.

"Oh my god," he heard Snape breath out.

Fenrir turn back to the aurors, eyes burning with gleeful insanity. With the hand he had used to cast his spell, he made a gesture towards the enemy. At once, over two hundred fully transformed werewolves leapt into the fray, running full speed and mad towards the aurors. A dozen were cut down before they could engage, but in the low confines of the tunnel, there was nowhere flee. The shields which could be used to block spells were useless for fending off werewolves, who broke through them as if though they were nothing. They tore into the fringe of the group first, tearing witches and wizards from the group and within seconds rendering their prey into pieces before going for the next victim. Over a dozen German fighters were lost within half a minute.

"Defense spells only!" Voldemort shouted to his people, but he needn't have bothered. They had stopped firing on their own to watch in morbid horror. This was not the same fight they had befallen the Goddess colony. Here, there were no brooms to fight from. Here there was nowhere to retreat to. The aurors fought desperately, throwing out their most vicious attacks, killing werewolf after werewolf but there were too many and before another could be taken down they were overtaken.

And still Aurors just kept coming.

Separate from it all and yet a part of it as well, Fenrir laughed and laughed as if it were the most hilarious thing he had ever seen. Any other time, Voldemort might have joined in, but he really wanted to get Harry out of here. The war god was proving stupidly careless with his protégé's body, standing out in the open like that.

And then all of the Auror's disappeared.

A series of loud pops indicated their method of escape. The why of it wasn't immediately apparent. Well, unless it was simple self-preservation, of course. Their prey gone, the werewolves turned their attention towards Voldemort and his soldiers.

"Do you mind?" the Dark Lord muttered at Fenrir, who was smirking at him now.

"Not in the least." He wasn't amused. The war god gave a little pout. "Oh, fine. Be a spoil sport."

He waved the werewolves away, and they turned and contented themselves with feasting on the dead. Half a dozen culties broke away from their group in order to vomit over the side of the platform. Voldemort released Snape and allowed him to climb back to his feet.

"This isn't the end of it," he told the others. "They'll regroup and come back. Keep your guard up."

Snape nodded in agreement, although he didn't look away from the monsters as he spoke.

"They'll collapse this tunnel. It's standard operating procedure. We need to get out now."

From above the sound of sirens could be heard, summoning more muggles to complicate an already messy situation.

"Retreat into the tunnel. There should be another platform a mile or two up the line," Voldemort ordered, then turned to Fenrir who was still chuckling softly to himself. "If your pets can behave themselves, I suggest you bring them along. I'll need to destroy the bodies before I leave."

Fenrir nodded, and with a little whistle drew his wolves' attention. They quickly padded towards him, some of them picking up small body parts to take with them and jumped from the platform. As soon as they were out of the way, Voldemort set the platform ablaze in brilliant green fire. The Culties flinched at the wave of heat drew towards them, and started retreating off the platform as well, albeit with a careful eye on the werewolves moving soundlessly in the darkness. Fenrir admired the blaze for a moment, stepping back slowly so that he might watch his enemies and his comrades alike be reduced to nothing more than ashes and cinders. Then he turned away, and made his way off the platform. As he did so, something gave him pause.

"What have we 'ere?"

Reaching down into the shadows at the platform's edge, he pulled something out of the darkness. Bobby remained stiff and motionless in the war god's hands, eyes wide and terrified. Fenrir grinned, but before he could do anything Voldemort snatched the raven from him.

"Hurry up," he snapped, storming passed him and into the tunnel. Fenrir glared, but followed after. They were hardly off the platform when it gave a horrid lurch and exploded from the floor upwards, smothering the green fire and burying whatever hadn't been turned to ash. Dirt and smoke blew into the tunnel in a fierce wind, and once it had passed it left everything in a choking fog.

"That wasn't me," Voldemort stated, if only to clarify that indeed, the fighting was far from over. He turned to Fenrir. "My protégé if you don't mind."

"You really want to wake him up now?" he laughed. "He'll freeze up, get himself killed."

"I will see to Mr. Potter's safety," Snape stated, daring him to contradict him. Fenrir didn't contradict him, but he didn't acknowledge him either. From up ahead on of the werewolves let out a piercing howl.

"Incoming," Fenrir warned.

~Page Break~

Book V

Chapter 26: Vengeance

The lake was near. Harry could hear the soft, eerie call of loons and the croak of frogs, and the sound of flowing water had slowly died. He could hear it, but he couldn't see it. The fog had swallowed his world in a damp white blanket, and he was forced to stumble through the thickening muck with his hands held out before him as if blind.

It did nothing to deter the shadow stalkers. Indeed, they only became more bold, flitting in closer and closer and then retreating shorter and shorter distances, until he felt wet fur brush against his outstretched hands. It was nerve-wracking, and though he managed to keep himself moving, he couldn't stop himself from shaking and flinching.

How close to the lake would they let him get before they attacked? Would they attack at all? Could they? He had no idea how vulnerable he was in this place or whether anything in it could truly hurt him. He hoped not. His wand and his sword were back with his body, and he had nothing to protect himself with.

A shadow stalker brushed against his hands again, and this time he could briefly feel a cold, wet nose. Another rushed in from behind, knocking into him and making him stumble. His arms came up to protect him against the fall, and the mud swallowed them until his nose was nearly touching the muck. Another attacker ran over him, a single claw foot striking him in the back as it went. He pushed himself back up and flung out his fist, felt it brush against more fur and the shadows retreated yet again.

He climbed to his feet and winced. His back hurt where he had been stepped on. Apparently, they could hurt him. Trembling, he simply stood there trying to decide what he should do. He had found that if he didn't move they didn't touch him, and as urgently as he needed to leave he needed a break for the sake of his own sanity.

Under the sounds of water fowl and amphibians he could now just barely make out the rhythmic hush of water lapping against stones. He couldn't have been more than a hundred feet away, probably less than half of that, and yet the closer he got the more impossible it seemed. The mud was up to his knees now, and though he didn't tire he could barely move either, and... the things Greyback had sent were getting as desperate to stop him as he was to keep going.

He stood there and thought for a long moment, but no clever plans presented themselves. He took a deep breath, and surged forward again, stomping over the thickening mud as quickly as he could. The attack that followed was no surprise, except perhaps in its intensity.

A mouth filled with pointed teeth clamped onto his outstretched arm, pulling down and forward, back into the mud. He screamed in pain and fright, and struggled to rip his arm free but the teeth only sunk deeper until he was almost certain the bones would break. A second attacker leaped onto his back, pushing him forward so that his stomach and chest sunk into the mud, clawed feet digging into his back before another set of teeth clamped onto his shoulder. There was not enough air available for him scream, with only one arm to support himself and the massive weight on his back he barely able to keep his head up high enough to gasp for air or risk suffocating.

"Aahh!!" he gasped, "Sto-ahhhh!!" Teeth grazed his collarbone, threatening to snap it. Harry felt lightheaded from the pain, but struggled to keep his senses. They were close enough now that he could see them. They were indeed wolfish creatures as he had suspected, but were not in the shape of true wolves or even werewolves. Their legs were extremely long and thin, more deer-like than canine, their claws almost talon like in their size and curve, and their fur had a nacreous sheen like the inside of a clam shell. Their head and body were completely wolf-like but for the eyes, black, empty, and unblinking.

They were horrible.

They were going to kill him.

What do I do? What do I do? he thought desperately, trying to think, between the desperate gasps for air and the excruciating pain. I don't have my sword! I don't have my wand! I don't have anything!

There was an audible snap and agony bloomed in his captive arm, pulling out another scream even as collarbone started to crack under the pressure of merciless teeth. I don't want to die! I'm sorry, I'm sorry! I should never have taken the Du'on nadi! It was stupid and selfish, I know! I know! But please don't kill me! Don't let anyone else die for my mistake! Please, please, someone help me!

The shadowstalker on his back released his shoulder, and for a blessed moment Harry thought it was over, that someone had answered his prayer, that he was free. Then the teeth returned, this time clamping firmly over the back of his neck.

Harry screamed.

~ Page Break~

The Aurors were more prepared for the second attack and on the offensive, driving heavily into the ranks of their enemies. Several of them now carried crossbows as well, laden with silver quarrels. Voldemort and Greyback's forces had lost their element of surprise, but they were far from outclassed. The werewolves, despite their bestial minds, were excellent group hunters, fast and clever. Those few Aurors who had experience dealing with them, had only ever dealt with them one at a time or from the safety of a broom, and had never seen their true potential unleashed while in a pack. They were fast and quiet when it suited them, infinitely strong and terrifying when it didn't. All of this, combined with Greyback's strict control and intelligence, made them a terrifying force to reckon with.

Voldemort's Culties were by no means on the same level as Aurors, but their rigid discipline and numbers supplemented their more skilled commanders, the Sentinels, Lestrage, Snape, and the Dark Lord himself. While the more powerful let loose their own mental repository of dark spells, the Culties supplied the protection and the distraction to allow them the time and space to do their worst.

"Frango vitrum!" Snape snarled, catching an Auror on the leg as he dove for cover. The leg instantly exploded into thousands of glassy shards, and the Auror screamed briefly, before a pair of werewolves caught up with him and silenced him forever.

"Hhmm... I've never seen that spell before," Greyback said off-handedly, before turning back to his werewolves and summoning them back towards the main group with a whistle. One werewolf limped slowly over to its god, causing Snape to cringe a few steps back from him, but only long enough for Greyback to pull out the silver quarrel that had hit its back leg. It yelped in pain as Greyback pulled it free, but lumbered along quickly enough on three legs. Around them, Culties tossed up shields and counterspells as Aurors hurled curses down the tunnels from somewhere up ahead in the darkness, illuminating the brick walls in a flashing rainbow of colors.

Voldemort, whose patience was starting to wear thin, glowered at Greyback. In one hand he held his wand, in the other the raven, confined to a small wire mesh cage. The raven had not moved the entire time, and anyone who thought to notice it assumed it had been stunned. Bobby certainly hadn't been spelled, as far as the Dark Lord knew, and was likely shocked more than anything. Despite all his traveling, the raven had been uniquely sheltered against the true horrors of the battlefield. Voldemort didn't spend much time thinking about it, or what he was going to do with the raven once this was all over, as he still needed to get Harry out of this mess first.

"The second attack should be occurring any moment now," Voldemort said to Greyback. "The Aurors will be forced to abandon the fight here to defend what remains of their city, and when that happens, you will leave that body."

Greyback glanced back at him, and smirked.

"Of course. No point sticking around if there's no one else left to kill."

Voldemort contemplating the possibility of killing Greyback in his god form, but ultimately decided it wasn't worth it*. He would find some other way of punishing him later. Maybe he'd eat Luna instead.

The sound of a train coming drew him from his thoughts of revenge to further down the tunnel. The underground was loud with shouting and screaming and small explosions, but nothing could dampen the ear-splitting screech of trains. Whatever traffic that was supposed to have come down the main tunnel must have been rerouted once it had collapsed, and only now that the fighting was moving into other sectors were the trains truly becoming a risk. The train was far enough away that finding a spot to keep out of its way wouldn't be a problem, but confining their movement in the already confining tunnels was dangerous. The only consolation was that the Aurors were likewise confined.

"Cross to the other side of the tunnel. They won't dare fire on us while the train is passing," he commanded, and everyone moved to obey except the werewolves who were moving about the shadows in any which way they pleased, dodging quarrels and spells, exhausting their enemies' supplies and energy as they prepared their next big rush.

Greyback crossed the tunnel with the others, not so arrogant as to stand as the sole target of a hundred angry Aurors, but stopped when a howl pierced the air. It was not a howl of pain or a battle cry, but something else, something that brought an unholy light to his mismatched eyes. Bright white light appeared around the turn of the tunnel and a deafening blow from a horn filled the cavern. The spells stopped flying, just as Voldemort predicted, no one daring to risk derailing the train in such closed quarters. Greyback glanced briefly at Voldemort, then in the direction of the howling, now drowned out by the approaching train. The Dark Lord himself was distracted, calculating distance and time and his next offensive move, but Snape's responsibility was Harry and he hadn't forgotten it, not even in the middle of their fire fight.

"He's escaping!" Snape snarled, dashing after Greyback when he changed his direction towards the other side of the tunnel. Lestrangle spun around, and cast a stunner at Greyback, but either it didn't hit or had no effect because he didn't stop. Snape managed to get across the tracks, along with one of his underlings, but before either the Dark Lord or any of the other soldiers could follow. The train was already upon them, and they were forced to cower back against the walls, covering their ears and their heads as the sound rattled their brains inside their skulls.

After what seemed like minutes, though it could only have been a fraction of one, the train finally passed them and they brought up their wands to prepare for the next assault. It proved pointless. The Aurors were gone.

And so were Greyback and the werewolves.

~ Page Break~

Oblitz was furious. They had two days notice, two days! That should have been plenty of time to prepare for the second invasion, but they were getting humiliated out there! They had lost nearly seventy men already, while the enemies' casualties was less than half that! It was ridiculous, that should have to leave the command central to bail them out.

He had not been in the underground fighting, instead sending out the soldiers and taking intelligence on the battle as injured Aurors apparated back to base, and he knew it had gone very badly. To be fair to the fighters, there were several factors Oblitz hadn't prepared them for. One being that Voldemort himself would be there, a veritable army all his own but never a more valuable target, and the other was Potter and the werewolves... which honestly, he still wasn't sure he believed. He shuddered to think how it might be true, and if Britain didn't have two Dark Lords running around.

Then the second attack had started on the edge of their base, Culties on brooms sticks swept in for a surprise attack. There were not many, but with they were vicious and well armed. Oblitz killed two, before apparating to the tunnels to call the Auror's back. He knew the little Blitzkrieg was only the first strike to soften them up for the heavier fire power, and he needed his other soldiers there ready to face it.

They set up anti-apparation wards before they retreated, and hoped they would keep Voldemort and his people trapped in the underground long enough for him to defeat the enemy topside, before they joined the fray or made their own escape. The only problem with that of course, was they had to get out of range of the wards themselves before apparating to the battle grounds. Oblitz wasn't familiar with the muggle tunnel system, but one of the Aurors knew a few places where it intersected with the wizarding underground.

They were running there now with only the Lighting spells to see by, and casting the walls in shining wetness and deep shadows. They moved as fast as they could carrying the wounded on their backs, hoping the passing train would buy them enough time to disappear. Oblitz wasn't counting on it, and as usual his pessimism proved correct.

They were half way to their destination when the first man screamed. He turned around just in time to see one of his Auror's dragged away into a side tunnel, where the screaming persisted for a few more seconds before ending in a choking, wet gurgle. Oblitz sent out a fire curse to incinerate the attackers, but the stream of molten fire merely illuminated the figures of nearly two dozen werewolves and one lone man before the flash of a sword caught the curse and shattered it into harmless little sparks and then darkness.

Laughter rumbled through the artificial cavern, echoing off the walls so what was only one sounded like dozens. Around him, Oblitz could smell the stink of fear wafting of the Aurors like a wave. It was no Dark Lord, but what they had glimpsed ever so briefly in the darkness was even worse. They were men and women who had been prepared to fight and die violently in the line of duty, but against dark wizards and witches. There was something innately more horrible, something primordially terrifying about the sort of death that was stalking them now.

"Oblitz," the laughing voice called, and for a moment the commander wasn't certain he had heard right. "Cameron Oblitz. I know you're there. We all know you're there. We've come a long way to find you."

Suddenly, the Aurors' fear was his own. They were here for him? There was no point questioning the why of the matter, he wasn't so deluded as not to understand their desire for vengeance, but the how was something he couldn't begin to guess at. No one had known. He had made absolutely sure of that.

He mentally shook himself. He couldn't afford to loose it down here. This was a war, there were more important things than his own sins coming back to haunt him. He shouted out orders to his people.

"Kuster! You're in charge now. Take everyone topside and meet up with Gersten if he's still alive."

"Sir!" she protested, her wand drawn and ready to fight to the death. He was glad of it, but if she was going to find death it wasn't going to be fighting for an old soldier like him. Berlin needed her strength, needed all of their strengths, and he had no intention of them losing their lives down here.

"Go! That's my final order."

"S-"

"Go, damn you, or I'll curse you myself!" he snarled, grabbing her by her cloak and all but throwing her down the tunnel. She stumbled, but straightened, gave him one last look of regret and ordered them forward. Oblitz didn't watch them go. He didn't dare turn away from the enemy, he could no longer see.

When at last the echoing footstep faded behind him, he stood in absolute silence, the floating orbs of light the only source of illumination. It was so utterly quiet that, if it weren't for the overwhelming feeling of malevolence directed at him, Oblitz might have been able to convince himself he was alone.

Then another wand lit, and the figure he had seen briefly stood some twenty feet away, and behind him the two dozen werewolves had multiplied to nearly a hundred, sitting obediently behind their master in tidy little rows, a bestial army of monsters.

Harry Potter stood smiling darkly at him; in one hand his wand, in the other a sword, and a black cloak hanging round his shoulders. There wasn't a trace of fear in his hooded eyes, no trace of sanity either, and if Oblitz had any doubts about a second Dark Lord they were gone now.

And then suddenly, the sword vanished.

~ Page Break~

Teeth closed around his neck, just as his fingers closed around steel. Harry didn't think, didn't have time or a clear enough head to think, to realize what exactly had appeared in his hand, but swung his free arm backward, clubbing rather than stabbing. The blade hit the shadowstalker awkwardly, the edge tilted so it slivered shallowly against the flesh rather than slicing deeply.

It was enough to startle the monster, though, and it released its prey and skittered out of range, its fellow hunter releasing the captive arm to disappear into the mists. Harry swung wildly at their retreating forms, even as his wounds screamed in agony to be stretched. He shouted and screamed into the nothingness, terror and hatred and anger bubbling out in mad frenzy. Trembling, he climbed to his feet, ignoring the pain and surged forward into the mist.

Sanity was slipping away from him, replaced instead by a primitive instinct to escape. He needed to get out of this place, not to save anyone or out of necessity, but for the simple need to survive. Predators surrounded him and there was shelter in sight, and even with the sword in his hand he felt no safer in this cursed place. The mud wouldn't let him run, would barely let him move at all, pulling his downward like a predator all its own. He struggled on, eyes wide and still seeing nothing but endless white, his chest heaving and stretching his torn skin and cracked bone.

The faintest of sounds, perhaps nothing more than an echo of his own frantically beating heart or the wet slurping of mud as he moved, blew timidly into his ear and sent him swinging around like a madman. The blade sliced through nothing but air and he swung back to his exposed side. He hit nothing. There probably had been nothing to hit. His cloak dragged in the muck, twisting up in his arms, and forcing him to struggle with it. Frustrated and terrified, he tore the cloak from his neck and tossed it aside, frantic to free himself like a rabbit in a snare. The next steps had him pulling free of his boots, leaving them stuck in the sucking mud. All the while, he searched blindly and swung pointlessly into the colorless abyss.

His paranoia slowed him, but eventually he found himself at the waters edge, cattails and pond grass shooting up around him, thick enough that he could finally walk without sinking into the earth. The water was icy cold, his first experience with temperature since he had entered this strange place, but he didn't care. He had to go, get away, to the center of the lake, deep enough to submerge himself.

He managed to get far enough in that the water reached mid thigh, and he was just beginning to hope he had moved beyond his attacker's reach when snapping and splashes from behind had him spinning around to meet the second attack. He caught the shadow stalker as it leaped for him, spearing it through the neck. It was dead before it fell, but the momentum kept it on its trajectory, smashing Harry in the chest and throwing him back into the frigid water. He struggled to right himself, but the weight of the dead held him down, pushing him deeper. One arm broken and other trapped between the body and his own, he floundered pathetically, struggling to raise his head the mere half foot to the water's surface.

He was feeling light-headed and convinced he was going to drown when his kicking leg was seized savagely in another pair of jaws and was carelessly dragged from beneath the shadow stalker's body and out of the water. His strength waning, he lost his grip on his sword, leaving it lodged its victim as he was pulled back to the muddy bank. Gasping for air and then screaming it out again, he kicked uselessly at the beast with his bare foot. It didn't even slow, dragging him further from the lake and into the mists to Merlin knew where. He dug his one good and heel into the mud, but there was nothing to hold onto and it slid easily beneath him.

More out of lack of options than any true plan on his part, he scooped up a wad of mud and hurled it. There was startled yelp, and his foot was released. He scrambled back towards the lake, hobbling and crawling, although all he wanted to do was lie down and sleep. Maybe if he didn't move it wouldn't attack?

Not something he thought he could bring himself to do, not when every instinct was screaming at him to run. He was back amidst the reeds, finding the dead shadow stalker and searching for his blade. It was harder than it should have been to pull it free, his strength all but gone, so that he had to put his whole crippled body into it. He fell backwards into the water, just managing to keep his head above the water. He didn't bother to stand, he didn't know if he had enough strength left to do so. Instead, he stayed floating on his back, kicking weakly.

The sword rested across his chest, feeling like a lead weight trying to drag him down, but he dared not let it go. He swam what felt like hours. The icy waters numbed the pain in his limbs, but robbed him of his strength. With every passing moment, he felt his legs losing the struggle to move and his body sink lower and lower. He could no longer hear the loons and frogs, only the muted pounding of his heart as the water slipped over his ears. The adrenaline rush of his escape faded, and with it came the certainty that he was going to die here anyway.

A soft splashing drew his attention, and as weak as he was, he could do little else but stare into the mist as the splashing drew closer. As close to death as he was, he felt a resurgence of horror as the head of the shadow stalker glided through the water towards him, its mouth opened and panting, its teeth bared in a monstrous grin.

"No," he cried, his voice barely more than a whisper. "Not you. I won't be killed by you."

Decision made, he stopped kicking. His legs sank, just barely avoiding the teeth that attempted to snag one. After his legs, the rest of him quickly followed. An exhalation of breath and his head finally slipped beneath the surface. He kept his eyes open though, watching the black silhouette of the monster against the dark blue tint of the sky as he slipped deeper into the water. The creature dived for him he noted vaguely, but it was a slow and clumsy swimmer, meant for hunting on the muddy marshlands and shallow pools, and the sword in his hand was an anchor, quickly pulling him down into the cold darkness of the lake.

~ Page Break~

"You know, I gave the sight in my left eye to know your name," the boy purred in two dissonant voices. He had acknowledged the sword's disappearance with an irritated glare at his hand, then turned his attention back to his enemy. Oblitz suspected a trick, but he couldn't think of exactly how such a thing would work. The werewolves had remained seated as their master approached him, a small consolation to him as their master was frightening enough all his own. Oblitz had met Harold Potter before, and honestly he hadn't thought too much of him at the time. The boy's escape and rising political career had been curious, but not entirely sinister. He knew now he should have paid closer attention. "I sold it to a crone. Can't imagine what she intends to do with it, but I suppose in the end we both got what we wanted."

"I'm flattered you think me worth such effort," Oblitz sneered, all the while scanning his surroundings for the battle that was to come. "Although, I can't imagine what I in particular have done to earn such enmity."

Potter tilted his head a bit, his expression unwavering.

"You killed my wife and children."

Oblitz blinked at him. Had Potter just made some sort of joke? As punch lines went, that was pretty bad. Greyback chuckled darkly, acknowledging the look of confusion that flittered across the German wizard's face.

"Don't let this body fool you. Potter's gone off on a little vacation and I'm keeping house for him while he's away," he clarified. "The last time we saw each other in my true flesh I believe you had just disemboweled me."

Oblitz started. Greyback attacked, rushing for him. The wizard leaped back barely avoiding the knife blade that had appeared as suddenly as the sword had vanished. He stumbled and Greyback pressed his attack, but was knocked back by a boot to the chest. Rolling back, he landed in a crouch, ready for another strike.

But Oblitz was already fleeing down the tunnel, dousing his wand as he went. Greyback sneered in disgust. To have been killed by such a cowardly opponent was more than insulting. No matter, he would be unburdening himself on the little bastard soon enough. He ran after him, the army of werewolves rising up to follow and assist if necessary. He didn't light his wand, preferring to bespell his glasses rather than risk exposing himself to the wizard. The werewolves that followed needed no such consideration and could see easily as they pursued their quarry.

The man didn't go far, only far enough to put a little more space between them and grant him the space and time he needed to cast his spells.

"Castrostinatum!" he snarled, all previous hesitation gone. The spell glowed darkest red as it hurtled toward Greyback, who cast a simple protego and strengthened it with his own power. The magic smashed into each other, hissed like water thrown in boiling grease and dissolved each other.

"Expelliarmus!" Greyback countered, not expecting anything to come of it, but using the time Oblitz spent blocking it to further close the distance between them. He had no intention of ending this with magic. When he killed the wizard it was going to be with bare hands and bare teeth.

The elder wizard didn't bother blocking, instead casting castrostinatum again, letting it smash through the Disarming Charm and continue on to its target. Greyback didn't have time to block it, and dodged to the side instead. The curse missed him, but hit a werewolves not quick enough to get out of the way, and there was a hideous wail of pain. It only lasted a second or two before it stopped and the tunnel was filled with the reek of burnt fur and sulphuric acid.

Greyback growled. "I would have thought you had better aim. You seemed quite adept at hitting even the littlest child from atop your broom."

Oblitz turned and ran, trying for more distance again, but Harry's body, for all its weakness, was built for speed. He caught up with his prey quickly, slashing at his back with his blade. It tore the fabric of the cloak, and the wizard spun around and smashed his fist into the side of his attacker's face. Greyback stumbled, lost his glasses, and righted himself. He swung his knife again, but the wizard caught it and tried to wrest it from his grip. Greyback smashed his forehead into his opponent's nose before he could succeed and grinned when he felt it break.

Yes, yes! This was the sort of fighting Greyback could really get into. Blood and bone, wits and wills, clashing in a heady mix of exhilaration, rage, and pain! Oblitz had stumbled, and the war god grabbed him by his thin, graying hair so he might smash his knee into his face and see what else he might be able to break. The wizard twisted in his grip, losing some hair and some flesh, but broke away long enough to shout out another curse at him.

"Exsanguis!"

They were too close for Greyback to move completely out of the way, and it caught him on the side as he tried to twist away. He kept twisting until he had spun around completely, bringing up his knife to sink into the wizard's unprotected back. The man cried out in agony and surprise, and with a sense of satisfied sadism, Greyback twisted the blade and then stepped away. Oblitz collapsed to his knees, alive but momentarily crippled by pain. The war god took the moment to assess his own injuries. There was no pain from the curse he had received or the resulting injury, but he had heard a disconcerting pop, and touching side revealed it was now gushing blood.

"Sanguis restrictus," he growled. The bleeding instantly stopped, but the countercurse was ironically more painful than the curse itself. He grunted, ignoring the pain as turned back to his prey to finish it. Continuing the fight any longer on this plane was likely to destroy this body, and that wasn't what he came for. He could continue his fun in the comfort of his own home. "I think we better wrap things up, don't you agree?"

Oblitz glared up at him hatefully, clutching stubbornly to the wand he likely couldn't even lift to use. Greyback let out a sharp whistle, and one of the werewolves that had been waiting patiently from the shadows loped obediently to his side. The war god patted the beast affectionately, like a well-loved hunting dog and turned back to the wizard, who was eying them both with growing apprehension.

"I bet you think I'm going to kill you now," he said idly. "And admittedly, the idea is tempting, but you know, since I've become immortal I've come to appreciate lasting pleasure...and make no mistake I am taking great pleasure in killing you. If I were to kill you now... well, that would be it. You'd suffer for a while, then your body would just give out. You'd go to heaven or hell or whatever, and I would be left here rather unsatisfied. So I came up with this brilliant idea. I think even Voldemort will be quite impressed with it."

Greyback paused, giving the wizard enough time to ask what exactly his oh-so-brilliant plan was, but Oblitz wasn't going to play and remained stubbornly silent. Finally, the god continued without prompting.

"I'm going to turn you into a werewolf."

Oblitz still said nothing, but now it was from horror rather than stubbornness. Greyback was pleased, and went on.

"I'm going to have Amsel here bite you. And then, no matter what happens or how you die, your spirit will belong to the moon and to me. Once you slough his mortal meat bag you call a body, I'll drag you into my lair and tear you apart every day and night from here until eternity. Doesn't that sound like fun?"

He laughed at the wizard's expression and at his own gruesome imagination, laying down plans for punishment he would reap against his family's murderer. The laughter boiled out, laced with pain from his wounded side, but uncontrollable. It was over. It was so close to being over!

Caught up in his own twisted glee he didn't notice the wizard starting to chant voicelessly, mouth moving rapidly for one last spell. Oblitz had lived his life on his own terms, an ambitious and proud man seeking always to better himself by working to better his nation. He had fought against Grindelwald, against dark creatures, against apathy and incompetence. He would have liked to stay to fight one last war, to see his country and his people rise above the tyranny of yet another dark wizard, but it seemed he would have to be satisfied with what he had managed to accomplish so far and hope that he had tipped events far enough into Germany's favor to make a difference.

He had lived by his own terms, and if he were honest with himself he had always known he would meet a violent end, so dying on his own terms was possible even now. If he had to die, taking a dark wizard and a hundred werewolves with him seemed a good way to do so.

He was just finishing the last of the complicated incantation, when the insane laughter suddenly broke off into a choking gurgle. The dark wizard before him pitched over onto all fours, vomiting up water. Oblitz's first thought was that Potter had been hit with a drowning curse and someone had come to save him.

The second thought was that it was already too late.

His magic was already welling up inside, sliding out from his very core and expanding inside of his body in an ever increasing pressure. It burned, turning his blood into acid, his breath into fire, and flesh only so much dry kindling. Worse still was the emptiness that was left in the magic's place, a crushing emptiness, a hunger that knew no bounds. It was excruciating, physically and spiritually, and now it all seemed pointless as Potter floundered for air before him. The previously missing sword miraculously reappeared again, now glowing brighter than the strongest lumos..

The power swelled and with it the pain, and Oblitz thought for certain this would be it and in an instant it would all be over, but still it kept coming filling him like a balloon that should have burst long before. It was all so excruciatingly mind-numbing, he missed everything that happened after that.

The werewolves, waiting patiently with their bloodthirsty glares, burst out into long, tormented howls and shifted back into their naked human forms, released from the unnatural transformation and collapsed onto the cold, dirty floor and each other. Potter himself had finally stopped choking, and was now gasping desperately for air on his hands and knees. Disoriented and blind, the young wizard flinched away from the rising magical power more out of instinct than anything else. He moved his wobbly legs beneath him and backed away, raising his sword to fend off the newest threat.

It was the likely the only thing that saved his life.

~ Page Break~

Snape kept his distance. He wasn't a coward, but he wasn't fool either and he had no intention of wading through veritable ocean of werewolves in an attempt to wrestle Potter... Greyback?... whoever into submission. Greyback was no friend of his, and while he might have refrained from letting his minions tear Voldemort's people to pieces, Snape doubted he would extend the effort to him alone.

He followed just far enough to follow the werewolves by sound, and kept well out of sight of them. They could probably smell him, but none had turned to investigate and as long as he didn't pose a visible threat they didn't seem interested. One of his Sentinels, the fool who had initially challenged his authority, was following close beside him, visibly shaken by the battle that had just happened and the one that might yet happen. Snape's only order to him was to be absolutely quiet and to watch for danger, and so far the man hadn't deviated from that task.

When their quarry finally stopped and engaged the enemy, Snape hung back and considered his options. There really wasn't much he could do. There were at least a hundred werewolves between him and Potter... Greyback...ugh... and his initial attempt to apparate ahead of them had failed, likely do to anti-apparation wards. With only one other wizard, any chances of fighting through would be impossible...well, maybe not impossible, but dangerous and with little chance of success.

Something had to be done though, and soon.

Greyback had recklessly engaged Oblitz, a master duelist, in a fight in Potter's body. This might be the situation in which Snape was relieved the necessity of killing the boy, but to do nothing while the Dark Lord's protégé engaged in a life and death battle was enough to have him killed or worse, sent to Azkaban.

Harry had to die. That was a hard and, though he would never admit even under the threat of torture, tragic truth. One of hundreds he had seen play out before him over the years. Snape, however, didn't have to die (or worse), and that meant setting up the situation where it appeared he had done everything conceivable to protect the boy and yet failed. At least then, he would only be tortured briefly while the Dark Lord excised his rage, and then limp away with only a few extra scars and another lead bar of guilt weighing down his soul.

For that, everything had to be set up just so...

Then everything just fell apart. Greyback started to choke on something, the potion master's first thought being blood, and then the werewolves who had been ominously quiet until then, sudden burst out into pained howls and writhed on the floor. Within seconds, canine limbs began to shift into human ones, grotesquely misshapen in their transition.

"This is it! Let's grab Potter and get out of here!" the Sentinel hissed, and jumped out from their hiding spot. Snape let out a furious hissed and reached to pull the fool back, but an explosion of uncontrolled magic burst through the tunnel. His arm caught some of it, and flared with heat and pain as he stumbled further back behind the cover of the stone tunnel. The Sentinel, completely exposed, received the brunt of it. The potions master watched horrified as the other man stiffened, glowed blue for a scant few seconds, before his clothing and skin burned away like paper, leaving only the blackened tissue beneath it. He turned away, unwilling to watch the rest of it, fearing the man might somehow still be alive and aware of what was happening.

Instead, he looked at his own arm. His robes and dueling armor had been burned away, but he had managed to pull his arm back quickly enough that only the top of his hand and lower arm appeared to have second degree burns. There would be more scars he noted clinically, but the nerves at the tip of his fingers and palms were intact. Dueling and potions were not yet lost to him. Merlin, that had been close. If it had been just half a second later, I would be... like Sentinel what's-his-name. His heart was pounding in his chest, deafening him. He closed his eyes tightly, reciting instructions for the healing balm he would need for his magically burnt skin, willing himself to be calm. 14oz of aloe vera, 3.6 oz of boomslang skin, underbelly would be best, half a drop of dragon's blood, 1.4 oz of silt from west bank of the Thames, at least thirty miles north of London...

The rising panic began to fade, enough for him to control his shaking hands. Enough for him to grip his wand firmly. The magical energy, although powerful and violent, faded quickly and he cautiously moved from his hiding spot. The sentinel was dead, a black smoldering heap on the ground, and he didn't waste time on him. He moved further into the tunnel until he came upon the werewolves. Many were dead, killed in the blast, but a surprisingly large number were still alive, weeping and wailing from pain and fear. They had all been low to the ground when the blast hit, partially protected by each other's bodies, so that now in their frail human forms some still managed to live with partial burns that Snape himself suffered from. He didn't linger long enough for a deeper assessment, but stepped around and over them to center of the attack.

Harry is dead, he told himself. There was no way he could have survived ground zero of such an attack.

His hand clenched around his wand. Harry was dead, and it was over now. The Sentinel was dead and the werewolves were incoherent. He would state that he had tried to intercede in the fighting, but there would have been no stopping the explosion. He had the injury on his arm, to prove he had tried to save the boy.

Harry is dead.

... 13 pieces of marsilea...no, it will be out of season. Substitute ½ dandelion leaves and three drops of vinegar... white silk for the burial shroud and silver pieces from Ireland for the eyes... a pint of plum wine, heat slowly so the alcohol does evaporate too quickly...they will build the pyre on the tallest hill across from Hogwarts, the weather mages will make sure the sky is clear and windless so that everyone will see the smoke for miles... add the boomslang skin all at once, then sprinkle silt in slowly, stir clockwise twice then counterclockwise twice, let sit for 23 minutes... Hermione would lay the white rose on his heart, Voldemort the Lotus crown, Snape would hide the Scarlet Pimpernel beneath his crossed hands and hope the boy somehow found a way to bring it to Lily...

"Uuhh...uugh..nnn...he..hel..nngh..." a voice begged somewhere, and by all accounts Snape should have dismissed it as one of the dozens of werewolves doing the exact same thing and continued his search through the charred bodies at the front of the pack for some clue that would distinguish Harry from the rest. But something about the voice, maybe it was the childish tenor or maybe it was the direction it came from, made him pause and turn behind him.

At first, there didn't seem to be anyone there. Part of the roof had come down due to the explosion, and a broken pipe was pouring a steady waterfall over a pile of rubble almost as tall as he was. Could someone be alive under there? Impossible.

"He..ahh..help!....HELP!"

There was no mistaking the voice now, not even with it so distorted with pain. He moved closer to the pile of broken bricks and mud, scanning it for some sort of opening from where Harry might be trapped inside, but it was solid. No one could be underneath and calling for help. He was a fool, hallucinating, the magical backlash was poisoning him-

"Agh...p-please..."

No, it wasn't from inside the pile. It was behind it. Quickly, and rather gracelessly, he scrambled and stumbled over and around the loose brick, scraping his hands and bruising his knees as he went. He was half way over when he came across another body half buried in the debris. A blackened skeleton leered up at him, loose bits of meat and hair clinging stubbornly to its skull. He very nearly buried his hand in its open mouth before he realized it was there, and reared back in disgust. He froze and stared at it for a long moment. That couldn't be...?

"Is-is some...s-someone... ah..ahh...help."

He turned around, and there was Harry, laying half buried in mud, his clothes almost burned away completely. Snape felt his heart leap into his throat when he saw almost the entire body was black.

"Lumos!"

The tunnel bloomed into light, and he squeezed his eyes shut as he willed away the Night Vision spell. When he opened his eyes again, expecting to see this horror in full color, he was infinitely relieved to see Harry's body wasn't as blackened with burns as he had first thought. Most of it was blood. Blood and mud and whatever filth he was currently buried in.

He moved in quickly, then to lean over him and stared into a pair of brilliant green eyes. Eyes that were wide with terror and agony, unshielded by his glasses.

"Pro-professor?"

Snape blinked. Harry wasn't dead. How the bloody hell was he not dead? Looking for some sort of clue, he spotted a sword handle gripped tightly in the boy's hand. The blade had shatter in the explosion, and what little remained of it was pitch black. The Sword of Gryffindor, he realized. It must have absorbed most of the magical explosion. It destroyed itself trying to protect its master.

He turned back Harry's face. "Yes. It's me."

"I-I d-died again," he stammered, his breath hitching. "I d-drowned. Did you s-save me, again?"

Drowned? What is he talking about? He must be delusional from the pain.

"Where are you hurt, Potter?" Because, clearly something wasn't right. The sword obviously hadn't stopped everything, and there was no telling what sort of injuries the boy had sustained before the explosion.

"E-everywhere..." he managed, and then gasped, "But my side...m-my s-side...hurts...most."

Snape wiped away some mud from the boy's naked side, and cringed when the hidden wound there spurt several ounces of blood all over his hand. Mentally cursing, he muttered a spell to help seal the wound and then tore his bag from his shoulders. He tore open a side pocket and pulled out a thick roll of cloth, and unrolled it to reveal nearly twenty potion vials secured safely inside. His hand immediately reached for the pear-shaped vial with the Blood Replenishing potion, only to pause.

Right beside the life-saving vial was another, innocuous little tube with a clear, colorless liquid inside with another purpose altogether. Snape stared at it, frozen.

What am I doing? Didn't I come here to end his life? To solidify a prophetic future for Britain and myself? He is dying already, by his own stupidity no doubt. How long will you continue this foolish game? How long will you continue to save him? Until his recklessness or his destiny destroys you both?

His hands were starting to shake again. No, no, he couldn't hesitate now. He didn't have much time. Voldemort couldn't be that far behind him. He reached for the clear vial.

Add 6 pints and 4 oz water, bring to a quick boil, do not stir...You have to stop shaking or you'll poison yourself first... for ten minutes and thirty-six seconds, then clockwise eight and a half rotations. Add shredded dandelions and wait for potion to turn pink...

He turned back to Harry, and froze again. It was a sudden and terrible realization that the boy looked far more like his mother than he had originally thought. The trademark Potter rats' nest for hair, was now smoothed back from the boy's face with wet mud, exposing a hairline identical to Lily's and a beauty mark in the upper right of his forehead just where she had had one. The eyes... they had always been Lily's eyes, but never had they been so wide and so vulnerable. She had never looked at him the way Harry was now, but he had nightmares about it during the war when any day he expected to hear news of her being hunted down and murdered by Voldemort's Death Eaters... or tasked with the job himself.

"I...I'm glad you're here," Harry gasped out, the pain obviously getting worse with every passing moment.

"Shut up, Potter," he snapped, unscrewing the vial.

Lily's dead and gone, and you're a fool and louse to cling to her memory. You have a fiancé; sort of, a woman alive and probably in love with you, promising you more than Lily was ever willing to give. Her son is going to destroy you, just like she nearly did. Are you going to help things along? Stupid, masochistic fool!

...siphon excess fluid through cheese cloth, place remaining solid in cool glass mixing bowl. Add dragon's blood, folding gently until paste is a soft pastel orange, leave to set at room temperature overnight...

The vial hovered over Harry's open mouth. The boy's eyes were no longer wide, but starting to drift close. He was starting to fade, slowly and painfully. Still, somehow, he managed to focus on Snape.

"I don't want to die..."

Green eyes drifted shut.

No, no, no! You forgot the vinegar! It'll be too acidic and ruin the aloe extract! It's useless! All that planning and preparing and waiting was for absolutely nothing!

He threw the vial into the rubbish heap, heard it shatter, and knew its contents were diluting in the water and would soon become inert as they mixed with the chemicals in the brick. His hands were already plucking potions from his cloth. He moved behind the boy, propping his head onto his lap to keep it angled, pouring Blood Replenishing potion into his open mouth, and massaging his throat so that he would swallow rather than choke. Then concentrated stinging nettle extract to flush foreign magical energy, Berphilium's healing draught for internal hemorrhaging, Timmelson's Infection Fighting Draught (because there was no way Harry wasn't catching something in this damnable sewer), and glucose dissolved in water (not a potion, and technically not magical in any way, but an excellent source of quick energy in a pinch nonetheless).

Harry's eyes still didn't open, but his color was slightly better. His breathing still sounded atrocious, and Snape remembered hearing him choking on something before the explosion. He had nothing for it. If he were bleeding into his lungs, the anti-hemorrhaging potion would stop it for a while, but could do nothing to expel what was already there...

He said he had drowned...maybe he hadn't been delusional when he said that after all.

Removing his cloak, he wrapped it around Harry, and pulled him up until the boy's back was pressed to his chest. He was uncomfortably heavy, but even still Snape could feel each rib beneath his fingers as he was re-positioning him. Shoving aside the questions that brought up, he concentrated instead on conserving his body heat and monitoring his heart rate and breathing while he waited for help to arrive. It couldn't be much longer.

But plenty of time to do the deed you set out for yourself. You fool, you've damned yourselves and who knows how many others. One day, Voldemort will figure it out and know that you betrayed him or Harry will make his move against the Dark Lord, and it will be chaos or civil war or both and all your damn fault! All for some stupid, mudblood who never gave a damn about you anyway!

Except of course, as he sat there in the filth, cradling the fifteen year old who had brought more stress and danger into his life than the Mafraiders and the first war combined, he knew it hadn't really been about Lily. For the last five years, it hadn't ever really been about Lily. For all the resemblances and reminders Harry may have brought about his mother, Snape could honestly say that his interactions with the troublesome Gryffindor had been almost exclusively between them and not him and ghosts of school days past. Their relationship, whatever it was, was exclusively their own.

He had saved Harry because... because... I am a god damned masochist addicted to stress and misery. *

"Idiot. You're going to owe me after this," he muttered to the unconscious form. "Don't you dare die on me now."

~ Page Break~

Voldemort sent half his troops to locate and dismantle the anti-apparation wards in the tunnels, while he and the rest went in search of Harry and the werewolves. They were not hard to find. They just had to follow the echoing screams. In his cage, Bobby finally started to stir, but said nothing as he shifted uneasily in his tiny prison.

Stumbling upon the naked mass of men and women writhing on the ground, while not the first time Voldemort had encountered such a thing, was rather worrisome. The Culties certainly didn't know what to do about it, aside from the medi-witches and wizards who immediately went to work sorting the injured from the dead. The Dark Lord let them dally. Harry wasn't amongst them, but he couldn't have been far. The most obvious place to look was underneath the debris that half blocked the tunnel. He stopped and stared at it for a long time, unsure if what he should even admit to the possibility that Harry might somehow, inconceivably, be dead.

"My Lord?" Bella said, drawing him from his distraction. He turned to her, and she flinched, but continued. "Should I have the men search the rubble or...?"

"May as well. We aren't going anywhere until the others take down the wards. Is Snape amongst the d-"

"Here!"

Voldemort spun around towards the debris and the sound of the shout. Several Culties immediately began scaling the brick to see the other side. One turned back and shouted.

"He's got Potter!"

The Dark Lord grinned in triumph. Why did he ever doubt Harry's ability to survive even the most-

"Medic! We need a medic over here!" the same cultie was suddenly shouting, and quickly scrambling to the other side. Three medics abandoned their position with the werewolves and rushed over the pile. Voldemort followed after them, arrived quick enough to see a flash of naked skin before the medics and Culties swarmed around and hid him from view. He didn't dare get any closer and distract them from their task until he knew it was safe to do so. He could see nothing, but they narrated well enough.

"Shit, he's practically hypothermic. Someone get me some Pepper-up!" a medi-witch shouted. Snape was quick to countermand the order.

"No. I had to give him anti-hemorrhaging potion. It'll become toxic if they're mixed together. Heat some blankets and wrap him in them."

"Harry? Harry? Can you hear me? Squeeze my fingers if you can... nothing."

"He's filthy! Who knows what's getting into his wounds. Start cleaning him off so I we can see what we're doing! Lavo corpus!"

"What other potions have you given him?"

The Dark Lord listened with growing concern as Snape rambled off a rather daunting list.

"Where's his wand?" one of the Culties asked.

"Check what's left of his right sleeve, otherwise it's gone."

Nothing else was said for a few seconds excepted warming and diagnostic spells, until the same Cultie spoke again.

"Ha! Found it! Lucky devil."

"Do shut up. What do you got?"

"Water in the lungs for one, but that's better than blood. He's definitely going to get pneumonia, no matter what we do at this point. Six fractured ribs. He's going to need a hospital soon just to keep breathing properly. How about you?"

"Minor fractures along both the upper and lower vertebra. No more sudden movements. I don't want something to chip off that close to his spinal chord. Some internal hemorrhaging, but I can't tell how bad because of the potion."

"He was bleeding extensively from the side," Snape clarified. "He would have bled out before I got to him if it weren't for the mud."

"The burns are pretty bad below his knees. Thank Merlin for quality boots or he wouldn't even have legs right now. We can still probably save them."

"How's his temperature?"

"Just below normal range, and dropping!"

"Alright, everyone we've done what we can here. Cover him up and get him secured! Tutus corpus leviosa!"

Voldemort watched mutely, as they finally moved away far enough for him to see Harry clearly. They had wrapped him in a thick, white blanket strapped securely around him with black buckles, hiding the worst of the damage. As if in mockery to everything he had just overheard, the boy's face was smooth and untouched, though far too pale. Under some sort of levitation charm, he hovered, stiff as a board. It all reminded the Dark Lord uncomfortably of funeral pyres. He watched numbly as his people carefully hovered his wounded protégé over the debris to the others.

"Um...my L-lord?"

Slowly, he turned his head to the young Cultie who had been among the melee. He was holding out a wand to him, and it took Voldemort a moment to recognize it as Harry's. Suddenly furious, he snatched it out of the fool's hand. It was slightly blackened, but nothing a gentle sanding wouldn't undo. It would still needed to be checked for structural integrity. It wouldn't do to hand a seemingly undamaged wand back to its master only to have it explode in his face the first time he tried a spell. If his protégé ever touched the wand again.

What have they done to you, Harry?

He turned away from the startled soldier, and returned to the other side of the debris. Harry had been moved safely out of the way, under the diligent care of Snape and a medi-witch, while the others began working on the werewolves again. He felt another irrational wave of anger at them for neglecting their prince, but forced himself to squash it. They had done what they could for him here. He needed a hospital; equipment, surgeons, an apothecary... He needed out of these damned tunnels.

As if fate had heard his thoughts, a Cultie came running up the tunnel, shouting not to curse him as he rounded a corner. The wizard blinked stupidly at the scene before him, before shaking his head, and running up to the Dark Lord and saluting.

"My Lord, the wards have been destroyed. Captains Worthington and Gaona await your commands."

Voldemort started at him for a moment, processing what had been said, looked to Harry on the verge of death, and came knew exactly what he was going to do.

"I want twenty men to start transferring the wounded out of here. Apparate them to our infirmary in Warsaw. Professor Snape will transfer Harry is to the Pitié-Salpêtrière Hospital du Sorcellerie* in Paris under an alias as soon as he is stable enough, and have her Majesty Queen Ophelia informed of the circumstances."

"Yes, sir...er... what are the circumstances precisely?"

The Dark Lord narrowed his eyes at him. "That is for Professor Snape to decide. He has experience in such matters. As for everyone else... I haven't quite satiated my thirst for blood this day. We're going topside. Inform the others I will be there shortly. That is all."

The Cultie saluted and hurried off as quickly as he had arrived. Lestrage, who had been lingering close since they had arrived, stepped forward to say something but he walked passed her without listening and made his way over to Harry and Snape. The potions master looked over to him briefly as he approached, and then quickly back to his ward. His fingers were pressed to the boy's throat, measuring his pulse, while his eyes focuses on the unsteady rise and fall his chest. The medi-witch was busy filling out a medical form, cataloging his injuries and treatment thus far for the next set of medical wizards, and he ignored her.

"How is he?"

"I am fairly certain he will live," Snape said, evenly, without looking at him. It was just as well. Voldemort wasn't looking at him either. He had reached out and gentle touched Harry's cheek. It was too cold, too still.

It made him inexplicably angrier.

Pushing aside a wet lock of hair from his ear, he leaned in to whisper.

"I give you my word, Harry, they are going to pay dearly for this."

If he heard him, the Gryffindor gave no indication, not even an eyelash fluttered. Snape, however, stiffened noticeably. Voldemort glanced up at him darkly before straightening.

"What happened exactly?"

"I am not entirely sure, honestly. He... Greyback found and cornered Oblitz of all people, said something about... sacrificing his eye to find him. And then... he dueled him, if that's what you want to call it. I didn't see most of it. I was trying to find a way to cut him off while my man followed from behind. I managed to get ahead of him, but then there was the explosion. I received minor injuries trying to reach him, but I was already too late."

He made a gesture with his arm, revealing the burns without removing his fingers from Harry's pulse. Somewhere behind them, Lestrangle snorted. Voldemort nearly turned around and snapped her neck.

"It must have been a... what do you call it? A exhalation furibundus de magi ex corpus*."

Snape frowned, but didn't look up. "My Lord... I was not aware of that being anything other than an urban myth."

"No myth... just a well maintained secret. Now isn't the time to discuss it," he said, then gave the man his instructions.

Snape, through all of this, did not look at him, and if it were under any other circumstances, Voldemort would have been extremely suspicious of his evasive behavior. Under these circumstances, however, all he cared about was the man's nod of acknowledgment. With one last glance at his protégé, he turned to order his soldiers into formation and quickly stalked away to meet up with the rest of his battalion.

~ Page Breaks~

Tom moved quickly passed a small squadron of soldiers, not even bothering to hide. They glanced at his familiar Cultie uniform and then didn't bother again. He smiled grimly, amused at the effectiveness of simply transfiguring his clothes and wondered how long it would take anyone to notice the ruse. He had no intention of testing it now, and continued back towards the hotel.

Chaos had broken out on the other side of the barrier, and whatever the wards were meant to keep out, it wasn't chaos. Voldemort had launched his second attack on Berlin, determined to retake the entirety of the city and secure his position there. Civilians still alive within the barrier were panicking, running from their hovels in search of more secure places to hide while still others rallied their courage to resist the second onslaught. There had been several attacks on soldiers caught unawares and vulnerable outposts. Few still had wands and made do with antique weaponry and Molotov cocktails, setting dorms and eateries ablaze and cutting down anyone who ran out in a panic. Or at least trying to. The Culties were soldiers, and once alerted to resistance, they handled matters with their usual brutal efficiency, before moving on to more important things, primarily the fighting going on outside their self-made prison. They were organizing to join the fight, ready to bring barrier down on a moment's notice.

Chaos, it seemed, had created yet another opportunity.

When the barrier came down, either during the battle or afterwards, he would slip away and think of another plan. The vampires had proven more useless than he had thought, lacking discipline or any true conviction. For all their age and power, they were nothing more than children who wanted to play at being monsters.

He would have to deal with them before he left, wiping away the evidence of his attempted subterfuge. He could not risk Katarina going to the Dark Lord and demanding the terms of a contract that didn't exist or allow her to speak of what had truly sparked the fires of war.

Besides, Viktor was there, and he needed a new body. McGunny, despite having retreated to the depths of his mind to cower in horror and fear, had worn out his usefulness. He had gotten safely out of Britain, but now Britain had followed him and he couldn't risk being found. Snape would have informed the Dark Lord of his existence, as much as he knew anyway, and there was no telling if his older counterpart and fit things together yet.

Viktor... Viktor was a target in and of himself, but he was a target with allies and those allies were well established and powerful. Or they at least had the potential to be. He hadn't had time to delve deep in the young wizard's mind, but hadn't needed to. Dumbledore and his resistance (ha!) were at the forefront of his thoughts, moving to gather information and power now that the Dark Lord had shown his hand and the fear of his spreading tyranny would galvanize others into action.

He would infiltrate them, and use the information he gathered to make his move against the Dark Lord and the Dark Lord's enemies all at once. And fucking kill that self-righteous old goat, Dumbledore in the meantime.

Slipping into the secret side entrance, he entered the hotel and headed for Viktor's room. He needed to be quick. There was no telling when or for how long the barrier would be down. He needed to block the entrance to the underground tunnels, kill Viktor's soul (he wasn't making the same mistake of cohabiting again), take over his body, and set the hotel ablaze. With no tunnels to escape to, the vampires and McGunny would be dealt with by fire and sun.

He made it as far as the hotel lobby, when he sensed something wrong. There was music coming from the parlor, an old viola wailing out some Wagnerian Opera. No one should have been up, and certainly no one would have left it on. He paused. He couldn't ignore it. If someone was still up, they might warn Katarina. It was best if he dealt with them now and then went about his plan.

Strolling leisurely to the door, he maintained a cool and collected air, ensuring no one would guess at his murderous plot. He knocked politely at the parlor door, then slid it open... and froze.

The entire clan had crowded into the parlor, sitting in the chairs and sofas, or standing nearby. They were dressed in their better finery, handsome frock coats and ruffled satin skirts, looking for all the world like a picture of a Victorian cocktail party. A muggle picture, based on the all encompassing stillness. They stared at him, their expression varying from smug to unreadable. Katarina was of the former party, lounging on the loveseat in creamy white, looking ready for a wedding.

He did a quick calculation on how fast he could close the door, lock it, and set the hotel on fire and how long it would take them to reach the door and/or break it down. The odds were not in his favor.

"Having a party, are we?" he asked. Flight was no longer an option, and he hoped he would be able to bluff before he was forced to fight.

"Why yes," Katarina said, amiably, "A celebration of sorts."

He knew a lure when he heard one, but for now there was no point in refusing to nibble. He sighed, ever so slightly, but enough for her to catch his apparent boredom.

"Ah, how delightful. May I inquire as to the special occasion?"

Her smile grew ever so slightly, and he knew his little nibble had just sprung the trap.

"Our family, you see. It's grown today. Viktor, why don't you come out and say hello to Cousin Horace?"

Tom's bored façade dropped as from the back of the crowd, Viktor stood up from the piano and moved around to the center of the parlor. He was dressed as the others, in a black frock coat and maroon vest, a cane in one hand and top hat in the other. As gentlemanly as he was dressed, the bloodlusty hatred in his eyes was pure barbarian. He said nothing, and Katarina swatted him playfully on the hip.

"No need to be so shy and sulky. You and Horace go way back. After all," she said pleasantly, her eyes lighting with the same suppressed rage of her new progeny. "You told us so many interesting stories about him."

This is the last time I work with vampires, he decided, and threw out a curse. Viktor dodged, and snarled like a beast, but Katarina was already on the attack. She caught him by the neck and hurled him at the nearby stairs, smashing the banister into splintering pieces, before gravity sent him tumbling down the steps again. He groaned in pain and tried to right himself, but she grabbed him again, this time by the back of his robe, and threw him into the hotel counter. A quick flick of his wand and an unspoken spell turned the wood and marble furniture to the consistency of tofu, cushioning his fall even as he prepared his next attack.

Katarina refused to allow him the opportunity. She rushed him again, kicking his wand out of his hand before backhanding across the lobby floor. He groaned in pain, and she smirked, stalking him at more leisurely pace now that he had been disarmed. Her children gathered just outside the parlor door to watch, Viktor at the front of them, displaying a level of innate dominance that made her feel like the proud new mother that she was. She would give the little con artist to him for his first meal. It seemed poetically appropriate to her somehow.

"Oh, Horace, you played a good game. You had me going there for a while, but you over played your hand. You were just too damn cocky, convinced I would never figure out that you didn't even hold any cards. Now I have to kill you just to save face."

She sighed sadly.

"Goodbye, Horace. It was fun while it lasted."

She removed her silk gloves, baring her wickedly sharp claws. He would be Viktor's first kill, but that didn't mean she wasn't going to soften him up a little first. Then he laughed, painfully, turning slowly to bare his bloody teeth in a macabre grin and she frowned, confused.

"You stupid cow," he chuckled. "Always one step behind. Always missing that one vital piece of knowledge, even now."

She cocked an inquisitive brow, not buying his bluff for a moment. She would never believe a thing he said again. But she would play a long for a little while longer, if only for the excuse to start breaking his fingers.

